SEC. 1319. That whoever in connection with the sale or lease, or offer for sale or lease, of any article, or for the purpose of making such sale or lease, makes any statement, written or oral, (1) intended or calculated to lead any person to believe that any part of the price at which such article is sold or leased, or offered for sale or lease, consists of a tax imposed under the authority of the United States, or (2) ascribing a particular part of such price to a tax imposed under the authority of the United States, knowing that such statement is false or that the tax is not so great as the portion of such price ascribed to such tax, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 1320. That wherever by the laws of the United States or regulations made pursuant thereto any person is required to furnish surety or sureties on any bond, such person may, in lieu of surety or sureties, and under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, deposit with the United States an amount of bonds of the United States issued after April 24, 1917, equal to the amount of such bond, together with an agreement authorizing the United States to sell such bonds in case of any default in payment of the bond. In the discretion of the official having authority to approve the bond, such bonds may be deposited with a Subtreasury, Government depository, Federal reserve bank or member bank, which shall issue its receipt therefor, describing the bonds deposited. As soon as the bond becomes void and of no effect such bonds shall be returned to the depositor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there are two objections to the pending bill:

First. It does not raise enough revenue.

Second. It does not distribute the tax burden fairly.

I do not intend in the present discussion to repeat the argument which I submitted to the Senate in support of a wise and just policy of war finance when the last revenue bill was before this body in 1917. It is enough to say that substantially all economists agree that war should be financed solely by taxation, never by loans.

It is no answer to the soundness of their reasoning to assert that wars generally have been financed more largely by borrowing than by taxation. It is true, Mr. President, that wealth, which has had much to do with bringing on all wars, is potential enough to control the legislation that shall finance wars.

It has been well said, sir, by the great body of economists of the United States—representing practically every great university and college under our flag, in a petition signed by more than 300 of those leading economists, submitted to the Congress that—

> The policy of borrowing within the country itself does not shift any part of the Nation's burden of war expenditures from the present to the future. All it does is to make possible a different distribution of the burden among individuals and social classes, to permit repayment to certain persons who have contributed income during the war by other persons after the war.
> The policy of taxation for war expenditures is demanded by justice. Apart from the injustice arising from price inflation (resulting from large Government loans), the policy of paying for the war by bond issues gives property a preference over life; it deals unjustly as between citizen and citizens.
> The question of taxation versus bonds is not merely one of economics; it is one of morals, of right against wrong.

Wealth, which profits out of war, has had no time, sir, for the consideration of scientific government finance, which from Adam Smith down through all the great students of that great science to the leading men of our own time lays down as a sound, as a just, proposition to begin with, that all wars should be paid for as you go by taxing wealth, rather than by selling bonds and levying upon the labor of the future to pay the interest and the principal of the bonds; and, second, that the expenditures of war should be paid for as you go as a sound, business, financial proposition for the Government itself. And that, sir, is confirmed by all history.

Returning to the point from which I digressed, from this petition:

> The citizen who contributes even his entire income, beyond what is necessary to subsistence itself, does less than the citizen who contributes himself to the nation.

But, Mr. President, while I do not purpose to reargue that issue at this time I must here and now, and shall at all times, maintain that the cost of this war and the cost of all wars should be paid wholly or in the larger part by taxation and that bond issues should be held down to the lowest possible minimum. This is required by the principles which should govern the just distribution of the burdens of war and is demanded as a wise and sound policy of Government finance in time of war.

EXCESSIVE BOND ISSUES BEAR HEAVILY ON PEOPLE.

I am not going to follow, Mr. President, now as I did when the tax bill of 1917 was pending before this body, step by step, the history of the financing of various wars in which the United States has been engaged. It was futile then so far as votes in the Senate were concerned, and I understand perfectly well that it would be futile now. I demonstrated then the peril of raising the money to finance the war by bond issues. You may get along with that policy all right at the time. But if you do succeed in conducting the war on the credit plan the trouble is sure to come later. As a result of pursuing the same policy that we are pursuing now in financing this war we narrowly escaped financial collapse in previous wars of this country, the War of 1812, the war of 1846, and the war of 1861, the expenditures of which were but a pittance compared with those with which we are dealing now.

I am not going to reargue that question. The Senate considered it at that time. I plead with you then to inaugurate the right kind of a plan of taxation at the beginning of this war, knowing full well, if we started out on a policy of taxing too little and borrowing too much, that it would be carried on throughout the war.

Anything that I said at that time did not prevail; anything that I say now I have no expectation will prevail with the Senate. But, sir, it has been the political and the public-service policy of my life to pursue principle, regardless of results; and when I put my hand to the plow I go straight through to the end of the furrow.

We tiptoe around this question of taxing incomes. I do not know as to the mail of other Senators at the present time, but I know that my own mail daily, many times a day, comes to the office loaded with appeals from the families of soldiers who are suffering because the allowances and the insurance have not been paid. Sir, when imposing these taxes upon incomes and war profits we ought to remember that the family that gives up the father and the sons at the call of the Government gives up absolutely all it has, gives up not only its income-producing power, but in giving up the father and the sons it gives up its capital as well as its income-producing power. And yet you balk at taking less in income taxes than is imposed upon incomes in Great Britain, except in the case of the incomes of the few very rich. These are not taxed as high in England, for the very rich made the income tax of Great Britain.

Commenting on the narrow escape from financial disaster which we experienced as a result of the mistaken policy pursued in financing the Civil War, Prof. Henry C. Adams, in his excellent work on Public Debt, says:

> An adequate policy for the management of war finances is a tax policy, assisted by credits, rather than a credit policy assisted by taxation.

When the revenue bill of 1917 was before the Senate I pointed out that the revenue act of that year was wholly insufficient to meet the requirements of the Government for the taxable year and that the only result of adopting the measure would be one bond sale after another by the Government, with all of the hardships resulting to the people from the vastly increased cost of living, as well as the danger in which it would ultimately involve our entire financial system. It is in no captious spirit that I refer to this matter. I make reference to it at all only to show that had the arguments been heeded which were then urged by the minority we would have laid the foundation for a just plan of taxation and one which would prove a protection and a safeguard to us in the great financial stress we are sure to encounter when the period of readjustment and depression incident to the waste and destruction of this war comes upon us finally.

LARGE EXPENDITURES SHOULD HAVE BEEN FORESEEN.

The inadequacy of the present revenue act is attempted to be excused at this time on the ground that unforeseen contingencies caused greater expenditures than were anticipated, and that, while the rates of taxation in the law of 1917 were justified by the then known facts, experience has shown that money enough was not raised.

I know of nothing which has occurred since the revenue act of last year was framed and passed which should not have been foreseen, and nothing whereby the expenses of the Government were increased over the amount which it should have been reasonably expected we would have to meet. We then stood pledged "to our last dollar and our last man" to win the war. We then expected a war longer by at least a year than it has proved to be. Our list of casualties and wounded is truly appalling, but that must have been expected when we entered upon the war. There was never any limit placed upon the number of men or the quantity of munitions we would send to Europe, and the amount of money we would loan to the allies was measured by necessity only. We were to loan the money necessary and send the men and munitions necessary to win the war. That was what every Senator looked forward to, and every Senator knows that by the unexpected breaking of the German war machine we have come out of the war at least a year earlier than we at that time had reason to expect, with the consequent saving of billions of dollars.

No, Mr. President; we can not excuse the now admitted inadequacies of the last revenue act on the ground that we have had to meet unexpected expenses. The fact is that the act of 1917 failed to properly tax war profits and excessive incomes, and subsequent events have only proven what we then knew or should have known.

At the time we framed the revenue bill of 1917 the facts were before us, or could have been obtained, by which the expenditures of the Government for the then taxable year could have at least been approximated with reasonable certainty and something at least approaching a proper rate of taxation could have been adopted.

It will be recalled, without my going into the figures in detail, that when in August of last year the revenue bill was reported to the Senate it was accompanied by a report from the Committee on Finance estimating the expenditures for the fiscal year 1918 at $5,693,000,000, and estimating receipts from various sources at amounts which left additional revenue necessary to be raised by taxation or a further bond issue at $1,943,458,000, and it was further estimated that the bill would produce something over $2,000,000,000.

In the minority report presented at that time these figures and estimates were controverted, and in that report it was said:

> At the very least our people must raise in excess of $13,000,000,000 to be expended in the present fiscal year, even if the war should stop then.

That statement is verified by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1918. That report states that the expenditures on account of war for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, were $13,196,071,287.40. As I understand it, between four and five billion of this amount is represented in loans to the allies. But in the meantime another half year has passed, with expenses mounting at the rate of a billion or more a month, and we are now face to face with the difficulty involved in raising the money to finance the Government for another year.

How are we to meet this situation?

The Secretary of the Treasury informed us when before the Finance Committee that our people have already subscribed for bonds aggregating $17,968,340,000, as follows:

First loan	$2,000,000,000
Second loan	3,808,776,150
Third loan	4,176,516,850
Fourth loan	6,989,047,000

In addition, war savings stamps have been sold and issued amounting to $800,000,000, or a total of $18,768,340,000.

A vast amount of money, sir, has been drawn from the people by the Government loans already made. Many people under the pressure of the times borrowed to buy Government bonds. They must earn the money to pay their debts. A period of reaction is at hand. Hundreds of thousands of men in the change from war to peace will be out of employment. Tens of thousands of them are out of employment now. The streets of our great cities are thronged with men looking for employment. The conditions under which we have financed the war are on the threshold of a mighty change. It occurs to me that Senators would do well to take that into account.

PENDING BILL WILL NOT RAISE SUFFICIENT REVENUE.

Now, what does the present bill propose? It proposes to raise less than $6,000,000,000 by taxation to meet the expenses of the Government for the taxable year. The total disbursements for the fiscal year 1918 are given in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1918 at $21,813,356,508.39. The former Secretary of the Treasury stated before the Finance Committee but a few days ago that we will expend for the year ending June 30, 1919, at least $18,000,000,000. Not a fact has ever been given by anyone which attempts to show that the expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year 1919 will be less than those of 1918. For at least a portion of the fiscal year 1919 we know they will be proportionately larger, and I here venture the opinion that they will be nearer $22,000,000,000 than $18,000,000,000. How is the Government going to float loans covering the next 12 months of from ten to twelve billion dollars of bonds, probably more, in addition to those already taken?

How is it going to do it, especially if it has not properly taxed wealth and war profits? We can, of course, pass this bill, wash our hands of the matter, and hope that in the next few months something will turn up, or that the people will continue to buy the bonds of the Government; but we must consider more than next year.

Beyond that is the next and the next and the next year, during which time all experience shows there will be comparatively little decrease in the disbursements of the Government. Gentlemen seem to be proceeding upon the theory that with the passing of the present or, at most, the next year our disbursements will shrink to something approaching normal conditions and that we may then enter upon the liquidation of our giant indebtedness without too great hardship.

But, sir, nothing is further from the truth than that assumption, as shown by the experience of this country in each one of its wars. For the purpose of illustrating our experience in other wars I have prepared a table showing the total disbursements of the Government for the year preceding the War of 1812, the Mexican War, and the Civil War, and also the total disbursements of the Government of each of the years of those wars and for a period of five years or more after peace was concluded.

ADMINISTRATION'S POLICY IS CONTRARY TO EXPERIENCE.

The War of 1812 began June 19, 1812, and ended with the treaty of Ghent on December 24, 1814. The treaty of peace was dated almost at the conclusion of the calendar year 1814.

Now, Senators, note the expenses year by year. In 1811 the normal or peace time expenses of this Government amounted to $14,110,525.59. In 1812 the expenses rose to $22,831,595.68. In 1813 the expenses were $37,825,932.08. In 1814 they were one million less. Now, mark you, in 1815, the first year of peace, they rose from $37,000,000 to $40,326,248.96.

Senators upon the other side of the Chamber who voted for a reduction of taxation in 1919 on the assumption that the cost of this war was to begin to diminish rapidly by that time did not take into account our experience in other wars.

The first year of peace following the War of 1812 the disbursements of the Government were $3,000,000 more than they were the last year of the war.

Let us go a step further. Let us look at the history of this country in the years succeeding other wars. I have just given you the amount of Government expenditures the first year of peace following the War of 1812. It jumped $3,000,000 above the last year of the war instead of falling below it. The policy of Mr. McAdoo and the other members of the administration in fixing the tax at $4,000,000,000 for the next year, instead of $6,000,000,000, is contrary to the history of the Mexican War. It can not be possible that you did not know that history, and that you were playing politics. It is unbelievable that you thought it would be clear political management to reduce the taxes for next year, just as you are about to lose control of Congress, and throw upon a Republican Congress the onus of increasing taxes or selling bonds to raise money in a time of peace.

In 1815, the first year of peace after the War with Great Britain, the disbursements were $3,000,000 more than they were the last year of the war. Now, let us see about the next year. In 1816, the second year after the war, they were $49,052,370.66, or $12,000,000 more than they were the last year of the war. You were planning in this bill for a tremendous shrinkage of expenditures and disbursements, and you are proposing in this bill and carrying it through the Senate by a party vote that there shall be levied next year only $4,000,000,000 of taxation. Is it possible that you are willing to go on record as being in favor of excessive bond issues, creating inflation, imposing on the people the increased costs in the living sure to result from the inflation attending large bond sales?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have been listening with a great deal of pleasure to the Senator. Whatever the figures may have been with reference to the other wars, I have not any doubt myself that the expenses will be less in 1920. I know the Army will be disbanded; and that expenditure will be gone. I know this enormous construction will decrease; I do not see how it is possible that the expenses in 1920 can be anything like what they will be this year if we manage our affairs well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; of course, I am sure that the Senator does not. I know he must have followed that line of reasoning or else he could not have voted as he did.

He probably did not have in mind the history of the expenditures following these other wars. There is not a single war to which our Government has been a party in which for the first year following the close of the war it did not cost nearly as much or more for the settlement of the debts of the war than the last year of the active military operation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me further?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Without any regard to what took place after those other wars, from my own knowledge of what we have to pay next year and what we will not have to pay in 1920, I still believe the expenses in 1920 ought to be vastly less than those of 1919.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought the Senator believed it. If he did not so believe he would not have voted as he did.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am sure he would not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So far as I know I was the first person to advocate the reduction of taxes for 1919 payable in 1920. I did it because I thought as a member of the Military Committee I knew what the expenses would be next year, and I knew that they ought not to be any more in 1920.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me say to the Senator that in every other war the armies were demobilized immediately after the war closed. You know that in this war we are not to demobilize a large part of our Army at all. We are told it is the plan to keep from one million to a million and a half men in Europe for an unknown period. There is a wide difference between the conclusion of this war and other wars. So I refer to these statistics and every one of those facts as being against the Senator's contention of a relatively large reduction of expenses.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator does not mean that we are to keep them after 1919 in Europe?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We do not know. When the Secretary of War was before the Committee on Finance he said he did not know how long they were to be kept over there; that it depended upon the conditions abroad; that he was going to keep 32 divisions over there until the conditions changed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will it not require legislation by Congress to keep them more than four months after the war ends?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, Mr. President, what has that to do with it? Does the Senator doubt that Congress will bend its knee whenever the administration calls upon it for a change in legislation and for appropriations to meet the change? Has Congress shown any independence in the matter of yielding to the administration when it asked it to appropriate for expenditures for the War Department or for any other department? If the administration without any action on the part of Congress should attempt to use the Army of the United States abroad in countries with which we have not declared war, I have not any doubt but that Congress would vote money to provide for those armies. It has been, Mr. President, of all the Congresses in the history of this Government the most subservient to the will of the administration.

So it is no answer to say that they must come back to Congress for what they wish to have appropriated. If Congress should have an awakening, if Congress should get a grip on itself, if Congress should really become an independent coordinate branch of this Government, as was intended under the Constitution, then the record it has been making since we declared war would have to be radically changed. Since that time Congress has been doing the behest of this administration without any independent judgment or mind upon anything.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator was administering rather a rebuke to this side of the Chamber because the tax for the current year was fixed at $4,000,000,000. The Senator thought that that was too low. I am inclined to think the Senator is right in that observation, but may I not suggest to my friend that his side of the Chamber has not proposed an amendment to the bill increasing it above the $4,000,000,000 mark. So, if we are to be criticized for not levying a tax in excess of $4,000,000,000, I think my friend, in justice, ought to criticize the other side of the Chamber because they have not proposed an amendment augmenting the amount.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to be perfectly fair, as the Senator from Utah, I think, will believe. If the amendment to which he refers, against the adoption of which this side of the Chamber contended, had been stricken from the bill, the bill would have stood at $6,000,000,000 and no other amendment would have been necessary.

Mr. KING. As I understood the contention of the minority——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I am right about that.

Mr. KING. I may be wrong; but my understanding of the contention of the minority was that we ought not to levy a tax at all for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, but that we ought to be convened in special session in March or April of the coming year and lay the taxes for the fiscal year ending in 1920.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That may have been the effect of the argument made before the Senate; but if the committee amendment had been rejected the tax levy for next year would have stood at $6,000,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I heard what the Senator from Wisconsin said, but I could not hear what the Senator from Utah said. I do not want to permit to go unchallenged the statement that the minority were not in favor of levying any taxes at all for the next year. The bill was in such a shape that if that amendment—that I presume the Senator was speaking about as I came into the Chamber—had not been put on the bill there would have been the same tax for the next year that we are levying for this year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I submit that is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the parliamentary situation in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, that would be the fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. The tax carried by the bill would have remained on the statute books until changed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will yield to me, undoubtedly that is true, and that is what he insisted upon, that we were fixing a tax for 1919 and 1920 and indefinitely unless we modified it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And as we did not need by $2,000,000,000 that sum for 1920, we ought in this bill to say so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that was the argument of Senators upon the other side.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The only objection from the other side that I have heard was that we did not continue $6,000,000,000 as a tax; and in the discussion heretofore on the floor of the Senate it was not suggested that you desired to maintain a $6,000,000,000 tax, but that the majority desired to say later on next year——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What the tax should be.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How the $2,000,000,000 should be taken care of, the objection being, and it was not merely the objection of the Senator from Wisconsin, that we left the excess-profits tax, and it ought to come off altogether. I do not mean that they were influenced by the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from Wisconsin. I have no doubt there are several Senators on the other side who were not in any way influenced by that view, but that was the line of discussion that we met in opposition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The situation is this: A bill came into the Senate, and then the Senate Committee on Finance proposed an amendment that would lower the tax after the bill should have been in operation for one year. To that I was opposed, and to that, I think, there was a solid vote in opposition on this side. It may be that some were moved by one theory and some by another, but the fact remains that, if that amendment had not been put on, and if nothing had been said about any succeeding year, the bill would have remained in force at the $6,000,000,000 amount indefinitely——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NORRIS. Unless it had been changed by some subsequent act of legislation. So far as I am concerned, I should rather have increased the $6,000,000,000. We know that we shall not have money enough in either one of these years to pay the obligations of the Government, and it seems to me personally, although I did not take any part in the argument, that it is poor policy for the Government to lower the tax now for a year that is to come, when we know that during that year and during this year we are not going to raise money enough by taxes, but shall have to issue bonds.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; if I might supplement what the Senator from Nebraska is now saying, and when we know that the sources from which we might take large revenues——

Mr. NORRIS. Are going to disappear.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That have made enormous profits out of the war are going to disappear in the next year or two.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish again to express my full agreement with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] as to what would have been the effect of this bill if this modification had not been made. I only wish to repeat that that objection to the modification has been presented, so far as I have heard, to-night for the first time, and it was not the objection which I understood influenced the majority of those opposed to it. I am not surprised to know that that objection influenced the Senator from Nebraska, and I knew that it influenced the Senator from Wisconsin, for I understood their views on the subject of meeting the expenses of the Government more rapidly by heavier taxation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Than by heavy bond issues.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. As I understood the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], he said that the suggestion had not come from this side of the Chamber that the expenses of the Government for the year 1920 would exceed the amount provided for by the pending bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; that is not exactly what I said. I said that I had not heard from that side of the Chamber that they were unwilling for the tax of $6,000,000,000 to be continued for 1919–20. They agreed that it should be reduced, but they desired it reduced when the new Congress came in.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to read a part of what the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said as to the amount that would probably be needed in the fiscal year 1920. His statement was as follows. I read from page 492 of the RECORD:

> Mr. SMOOT. Under the pending bill the estimated receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, are $5,987,406,000. That is to be collected on business for the year 1918 during the calendar year 1919. I am discussing the question as to the amount of taxes we shall raise on the business of 1919 to pay the expenditures of the Government beginning July 1, 1919, and ending June 30, 1920. They are two separate and distinct propositions, and I want Senators to know that they are distinct propositions. I want the people of the country to know the amount of money we shall have to raise in some way to meet the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, will be at least $10,000,000,000.

I have read this, because while the Senator from Georgia says that he did not say exactly what I had thought, yet the impression was left, I think, that there had been no contention on this side that more than $4,000,000,000 would be needed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I proceed to derive from the history of our previous wars such light as experience can furnish to guide the Senate at this time. The Senate will shut its eyes to the light. I know that perfectly well, but I am going to set it before Senators. I am going to put the lamp at their feet, and then let them go blindly on in the other direction if they choose to do so. However, here is what the history of all other wars tells us. Just how we are going to reduce expenditures more rapidly in this than we have in other wars I should be glad to be enlightened.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. STERLING. For information more than anything else, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question or two along this line. How many enlisted men and officers does the Senator from Wisconsin believe will be demobilized and discharged from service within the next few months?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I think perhaps I am not betraying any confidential communication, for I do not remember that the Secretary of War imposed any restrictions upon us when he was before the Committee on Finance, when he said that at the extreme limit we had over there 42 divisions of troops, and that it was the purpose of the Government to keep 32 divisions there; that just how long they would be kept there would depend entirely upon conditions; that was indefinite; and he could say nothing further about it; but that for the present it was the plan of the Government to bring back the difference between 42—I am stating my recollection of the figures—and 32 divisions; that after the troops in the cantonments had been demobilized upon this side that it was the purpose to use these camps for the reception of troops brought back from overseas and for their demobilization as the business of the department would permit.

Mr. STERLING. I mention this, Mr. President, because I am somewhat startled at the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin to the effect that the expenses for the year after the war—and I take it that that means after demobilization also; I think it is fair to construe it in that light—will be greater than the expenses during the war.

I have figured on this basis, somewhat hurriedly, that there will be at least 1,500,000 men demobilized and discharged and out of the pay of the Government within that time, or very soon. Now, that number of men at $30 a month—and that is the minimum for the enlisted men, and does not include the officers—will be $45,000,000 for one month; for the year it will be $540,000,000. That is for pay alone.

Now, I take it that subsistence itself will cost as much as the monthly wages will amount to; and that would be $540,000,000, or a total of $1,080,000,000 in the year after the demobilization of 1,500,000 men. It is a little hard for me to understand where the rest of the extraordinary expenses come in after the demobilization.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I can understand the Senator's point of view. He is merely considering the saving from partial demobilization and nothing else connected with the cost of war; but if he knew that in the last year of the War of 1812 we had demobilized the troops and yet it was the most expensive year of that war, it might suggest to him that there were other things to take into account aside from the discharge of the men from the service.

Then if he knew, furthermore, our experience following our other wars proved the same thing as to the difficulties encountered in reducing the higher levels of war expenditure, perhaps he would conclude that there were quite a number of things outside of the demobilization of the troops to be taken into account.

Furthermore, with regard to the Civil War, if the Senator knew that the troops were almost entirely demobilized within two or three months after the war was over and that it appears that we are to keep at least a million and a half of our men in Europe for an unknown period, he might possibly think that his figures would stand revision.

Mr. STERLING. I am counting on that, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin; but I still find what I have stated to be the result of the demobilization of that many men.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I now resume where I was interrupted.

I said a moment ago that I did not expect to be able to impress the Senate with the result of the history of previous wars; I do not; but I am going to put it into the RECORD. I think it may serve as a warning to the country of what is to follow after this war.

In 1815, the first year of peace following the War of 1812, the expenditures rose to $40,326,248.96, or $3,000,000 more than the last year of the war, the war having closed and peace having been declared in December, 1814, so that the year 1815 was the first full year of peace.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I should interject a remark there?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not at all.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say that I am satisfied with the correctness of the Senator's figures, because I investigated the subject somewhat myself and stated in the committee that the peak of expenditures occurred during the year after the war instead of during the war. I indulge the hope, however, that the second year after the war will not be quite so bad, especially if Congress will practice some of the economies which, as individuals, we are advocating.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I remember the position of the Senator from Colorado upon the subject when it was before the Committee on Finance. But we will do better than our predecessors have following other wars if we even approach the neighborhood of normal expenditures for several years to come, as I proceed to demonstrate:

In 1816, the second year after the war of 1812 was ended, the expenditures rose to $49,052,370.66 as against $37,825,932.08 in the last year of the war. In 1817, three years after the war, they were $41,794,774.90, or $4,000,000 more than they were the last year of the war; in 1818, after five entire years of peace, the expenses still stood at $36,136,674.58, or only $3,000,000 less than they were in any year of the war; and it was not until nine years after the war, or in 1823, that the expenses approached the peace-time status.

Now, Mr. President, I have here in my notes a table taken from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury giving the expenses for the year 1811 to 1823, which I ask to have incorporated in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

WAR OF 1812.

Began June 19, 1812.
Ended December 24, 1814, by treaty of Ghent.
The following table shows the total disbursements, including public-debt transactions, of the Government for the year prior to the war and for the years during and subsequent to the war designated in the table:

Year:	Total of all disbursements.
1811	$14,110,525.59
1812	22,831,593.68
1813	39,825,932.08
1814	38,754,605.18
1816	49,052,370.66
1817	41,794,774.90
1818	36,136,674.58
1820	22,926,216.18
1821	20,268,098.97

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, you will observe the same thing with respect to the Mexican War. Starting with a peace-time expenditure of $34,000,000 prior to the war, it leaped to $64,500,393.84 during 1847, the second year of the war, while in 1848 the expenditures were $64,981,993.46, and the treaty of peace was signed in February, 1848, so that could hardly be reckoned as a war year. In 1849 the expenses still stood at over $60,000,000, and in 1853, five years after the war, they were over $59,000,000, or $20,000,000 more, substantially, than they were prior to the beginning of the war.

Mr. President, I ask to incorporate in my remarks at this point a table showing the expenditures of the years during and following the Mexican War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

MEXICAN WAR.

Began April 24, 1846.
Ended February 2, 1848, by the treaty of Guadalupe.
The following table shows the total disbursements, including public-debt transactions, of the Government for the year prior to the war and for the years subsequent to the war designated in the table:

Year:	Total of all disbursements.
1845	$34,811,140.70
1846	31,708,319.81
1847	64,500,393.84
1848	64,981,993.46
1850	49,817,671.69
1853	59,817,786.44

STATEMENT OF EXPENDITURES FOLLOWING THE CIVIL WAR.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Civil War even more graphically illustrates the same principle. I will assume that the war started at the time Jefferson Davis was elected president of the Confederacy in February, 1861, and that it ended when Lee surrendered in April, 1865. Having these dates in mind, the table I present is peculiarly instructive. In 1860 the normal or peace-time expenditures were $85,373,193.05. Keep those figures in mind. In 1860 $85,000,000; in 1861, $93,000,000; in 1862, $573,000,000; in 1863, $908,000,000; in 1864, $1,265,000,000; in 1865 they were $1,916,829,660.

Now, mark you, Lee surrendered April 9, 1865, and the great demobilization of the Union troops took place in the city of Washington when the grand review was had along Pennsylvania Avenue here in May of that year. That wonderful army disappeared, went back to the vocations of peace, melted away, became no longer a subject of expense to the Government or the country, in the first three or four months of that year; and yet the year 1865 was the big year of expense of that war. It was not the year of greatest military activity. There were few operations of the great armies upon either side after January, 1865. They were at grips, it is true; there was a bulldog tenacity upon both sides. But so far as military expense due to activity in the field was concerned, there was probably the smallest expenditure during January, February, March, and April, 1865, than for any like period during the entire war. Nevertheless, disbursements for the year 1865 were the highest of any year of the war, and the war ended within the first 90 days of that year. In other words, 1865 was a year of peace for 9 out of the 12 months, but it was the costliest year of the whole war.

What justification have you, Senators, for assuming that there will be the enormous reduction in disbursements which you propose in this bill for the first year of peace? All history and experience is against you. Your plan simply means lighter taxes on big incomes, and monster war profits, and more loans, and larger bond sales.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to one statement that was made by the Secretary of War that gives us some idea as to how the expenses of the War Department for the coming year were arrived at.

The Book of Estimates, as first prepared by the War Department—and, by the way, it is printed and any Senator can get a copy of it—showed that the estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, or the coming fiscal year, would amount to $19,169,055,721.60. I asked the Secretary of War: "Well, how did you arrive, then, at the second estimate of the expenses of the War Department for that year?" and that amounted to $1,916,905,572.16. The answer was that his first estimates were based upon an army of 5,000,000 men, and that this estimate was based upon an army of 500,000 men, or one-tenth of the number of men, and therefore one-tenth of the amount of the first estimate. I called the attention of the Senate the other day to the fact that if there are more than 500,000 men in our Regular Army at any time during the year beginning June 30, 1919, and ending June 30, 1920, we shall have to pay more than these estimates call for.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But there was not a suggestion, as I remember the Secretary's statement, of returning to this country, within any definite period of time, more than a fourth of the great army we have abroad. We are going to keep over there for an indefinite period a million to a million and a half of men, unless there is a change in plans.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that if we are to hold the hands of those toddling little principalities until they learn to walk alone, probably we will have to furnish the necessary money.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. That is a still bigger question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, let me go on, if the Senator will permit me, with the figures that I started to give. If I can not, I do not know that I will be able to finish to-night.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think it will be well, however, to have this observation in mind: The Secretary of the Treasury had in mind the fact that, even though the expenditures might prove to be greater than the amount of his estimate, yet the sum of $4,000,000,000 would be as much as we ought to raise in the fiscal year by taxation, because the additional expenditure would be on account of the war, and through all this legislation we have been endeavoring to pay from a third to a half of the actual war expenses by taxation. That was the theory, as I understand, upon which the amount was arrived at.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true; and, of course, the Senator from New Mexico, not being in the Chamber when I made the earlier portions of my argument this evening, missed what I then said. I do not concede that to be sound war finance.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I knew, of course, Mr. President, that there was a difference of opinion on that point; but this estimate and the fixing of the amount to be raised by taxation is in keeping with the plan which we have generally kept in mind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I think it is, Mr. President, and I think it is a bad plan. I think it is a plan that is, in a way, a crucifixion of the great mass of the people of this country. It is a rank injustice. It is a discrimination that can find no justification anywhere; and I believe that when the people come to understand that they will take it into account.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico, it is that the Secretary of the Treasury practically admitted or assumed that we would issue bonds to take care of a part of the money that we would have to raise for the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, yes, Mr. President. I think that is true not only of the position of the Secretary of War but of the position of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury starts off for this year with the assumption that we will need $18,000,000,000, and he assumes that all we ought to raise by taxation is $6,000,000,000; and he said again and again to the committee, "If you will provide for $6,000,000,000 by taxation, I will take care of the rest of it as Secretary of the Treasury," which meant that he would take care of two-thirds of that amount by loans. It could not mean anything else.

Now, Mr. President, I believe that to be an abominable doctrine. I believe it to be a doctrine that the people of this country ought to resent and that any administration which stands for fastening upon the people 66⅔ per cent of the expenses of the war by loans, interest-bearing obligations, ought to be forever turned out of power. That is my notion about it.

I do not know how much better the Republicans would do. I know it is the view of some Republicans that bond issues should be large and taxes should be small; but I do not care who advocates that view. I stand here to say for myself, as one Senator of the United States, that I am against it. I would be in favor of raising two-thirds or three-fourths of the money by taxation—as much as it is possible to raise without blocking the wheels of production. I do not think any other system is just or right.

I remember that the other day, when the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] was speaking—and he made a brilliant speech, and I was very much interested in it—he said that the amount of money that we had raised in this country by taxation was greater, he thought, than that raised heretofore by any country in the history of the world. That is not my recollection of history. In the Crimean War Great Britain paid 52 per cent of the expenses of the war by taxation; that in the Napoleonic wars she paid by taxation in excess of 47 per cent. I do not think, however, that 52 per cent is as much as should be raised by taxation for financing this war.

I say, Mr. President, it is difficult to tax wealth. You can provide for bond issues which, together with interest, the people out of their sweat and toil must pay through consumption taxes. That is the only way in which it can be paid in the end; but it is exceedingly difficult to make wealth step up to the captain's office and pay its proportion. I say "its proportion," for I assert that if you took all the income of wealth, every bit—aye, I will go further than that and say if you took the capital itself—you would not be taking more than we have taken from tens of thousands of families in this war.

Why do you not stand up to your duty here and take as much out of wealth as you take out of the blood and flesh of the people of this country?

The poor do not make anything out of war. Wealth does. Wherever money is invested in enterprises that have contributed in any way to war production there have been enormous profits; but tell me where the families of the poor who have given their fathers and their sons have profited by this war.

Senators, just stop a little and think about this business. Who ought to carry the burden of this war? Surely not the millions who were put into the ranks, who have been taken away from production, leaving their families destitute. The corporations of this country earned $10,000,000,000 in the last year. That is the report. Ten billion dollars in net profits, not gross but net, over all their expenses. For over three years before the war they earned an average of over $4,000,000,000 of net profits, and when it comes to taxing them roundly Congress hesitates. But you did not hesitate to take not only the income of the poor family but the capital that is producing the income—the father and the sons—and putting them into the service of the Government. All right, but by the God that is over us, if you want to do justice do the same thing by capital. Take the income, take every dollar of the income except enough to keep the family in comfort. I would leave that much, but I would take every dollar of profit that has been made out of war.

I come back now to the Civil War. I present a table which graphically shows the expenditures for the decade 1860 to 1870.

THE CIVIL WAR.

Jefferson Davis elected President February, 1861.
Lee surrendered April 9, 1865.

Year:	Total of all disbursements.
1860	$85,373,193.05
1861	93,736,609.45
1862	573,067,384.64
1863	908,880,700.84
1864	1,265,418,320.10
1865	1,916,829,660.07
1866	1,063,746,933.16
1867	948,960,202.14
1868	997,081,972.34
1869	479,921,036.83
1870	470,236,423.53

It was not until 1881 that the total disbursements of the Government fell below $400,000,000.

You can not count on the expenditures of this war dropping, as Senators upon the other side have declared. They believe that the expenses will fall. They are mistaken about it; that is all.

In 1867, nearly three years after the real fighting was over, the expenses were $1,948,000 more than they were in 1863, the hard-fought year of the war. In 1868, three years after the war, the expenses were $1,197,000,000, in round numbers, more by nearly $100,000,000 than they were in 1863.

EXPENDITURES WILL CONTINUE TO BE HIGH.

It is folly for us to figure upon the diminution of the expenses contemplated by this bill and by the plan of the Treasury Department. It simply means, Mr. President, that wealth is to escape its share of taxes and that bond issues are to make it up, and the people are to sweat and toil in the years to come to pay the interest on bonds, the principal of the bonds, and the higher cost of living. That is all it means. It is all blocked out here in the figures. I have given you the figures of all the wars we have ever been in, and they all read the same way.

It was not until 1869, five years after the real fighting of the Civil War was over, that the appropriations dropped back to what they were even the first year of the war. In 1869 they were $479,000,000; in 1862 it was $573,000,000; in 1870, $470,000,000, six times as much as before the war began.

You have not figured on anything of that kind in this bill nor anything like it. It is not the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is not contemplated by any of those who are managing the finances of this war.

Mr. President, if I wanted to be mean, if I wanted to try to deduce something from the facts that imputes motives, if I wanted to be partisan, I could say that you wanted to stand in with wealth, that you wanted to curry favor with the big business institutions of the country, that you wanted to let up the taxes on the millionaires in order to finance the future campaign; that you wanted to take it out of the great mass of the people who are not organized, and who have not any wealth nor any power to strike back with. I do not believe anything of the kind. I just think you are going blindly at this business. I will not ascribe any such motive as that to you.

The Secretary of the Treasury came before the Committee on Finance and said: "Cut down this tax." That is a pretty effective proposition; he goes to the country and says that the taxes are to be low; it makes everybody feel pleasant and good, and the committee follows the advice of the Secretary. I do not know whether my Republican brethren on the committee really resented that feature of it. Just how much they wanted to make the reduction I do not know. I know they do not agree with me about the method by which these taxes should be levied. I know they do not support my proposition here to raise more out of wealth by taxation. They did not when the last revenue bill was passed, and I suppose they will not now. That is, certain of them do not. But that is what happened.

All the foregoing figures are taken from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1918, and they are reliable. The different disbursements for the European war, actual and estimated, are shown by the following table. We began the war April 6, we will say, and the following table shows the disbursements prior to our entering the war and during the war. I take every one of these figures from the recent report of the Secretary of the Treasury, brought in person to the Committee on Finance on the 4th day of December, two days after his letter submitting it to Congress.

In the fiscal year ending July 1, 1916, before we entered the war, the total disbursements were $1,040,261,082.73. In the fiscal year ending July 1, 1917, that would include some of the war expenses incurred from April 6, 1917, our total disbursements were $3,046,183,746.19; for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1918, the disbursements were $21,813,356,508.39; for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1919, it was suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury that our disbursements would be $18,000,000,000.

Now, I want to remind members of the Finance Committee that the Secretary of the Treasury did not submit a single figure in support of that statement. He was vague and indefinite about it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not acquainted with the figures that the Senator has just given for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1918, and June 30, 1917. Will the Senator please give them again?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, I will; and I will refer the Senator to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, where he will find them. I know they are different from the figures given by the Senator the other day when he made his speech on the floor. I noticed them at the time, and have looked them up since.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state to the Senator that they are different from the figures I gave.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know that, and you can get both figures from the same report. I can refer you to the index where you will find the discrepancy.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am inclined to think that the discrepancy arises between certain estimates and the actual expenditures. The Secretary of the Treasury certainly gave the actual expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, as a little over $2,000,000,000 and for June 30, 1918, at over $13,000,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will refer the Senator to the report and the page where he can find the table which I have here reproduced. On page 490 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury is a table recapitulating the disbursements by fiscal years, and the figures I quoted are taken from the table headed "Table of all disbursements," and I quoted the figures for the years 1916, 1917, and 1918 appearing there.

The Secretary of the Treasury merely suggests that the total disbursements of the Government for the fiscal year 1918 will be $18,000,000,000. The total disbursements may be much larger than that. However, if our expenditures of other wars mean anything it will be at least five years after the present war terminates before we can hope at least to even approximate a return to normal expenditures, and if the plans of the administration are carried to keep a standing Army of one million and a half men in Europe for perhaps years, which certainly would involve an expenditure of a billion at least, we can look for no substantial decrease in expenditures.

Now, sir, if previous experience means anything it must enable us to see that when the figures for the disbursements of this year of the present war and succeeding years are written out they will show that for at least five years yet to come our disbursements will average from twelve to fifteen billion dollars each year. That is what they will amount to if we rely upon our combined experience in these other wars.

DISBURSEMENTS TO BE PROPORTIONATELY HIGHER.

And the disbursements of the years succeeding the present war will be proportionately much greater because of the changed conditions following this war. The War of 1812, the Mexican War, and the Civil War were domestic wars. Our soldiers either did not leave their own country or progressed but a short way into adjoining enemy territory. They returned home and demobilization was a simple matter, accomplished with comparatively little expense and within a short space of time. There were no foreign lands for us to police after those wars were over. But to-day all this is changed. A vast army of two million or more men are thousands of miles away, scattered all over the continent of Europe, some of them I fear at this very moment in desperate straits in the midst of a Russian winter in Siberia and possibly elsewhere in that country. We have no information when it is the plan of the administration that these men should return to their homes, but we are advised by the War Department that about one million and a quarter men will be kept abroad for some time. We have reason to believe that a large army will be kept in Europe for months—or possibly years. But under the best and most fortunate conditions we know there is no likelihood of the soldiers all being returned to this country and demobilized for a year or more.

It is a very rash man, sir, in the light of these facts and in view of our experience in other wars, who expects our Government expenditures to drop below ten or twelve billion dollars annually at any time within at least the next five years. That means if we raise by taxation during each one of those years no more than this bill proposes to raise there will still be left twenty-five or thirty or more billions for us to borrow. This, Mr. President, is the truly appalling situation that we must face, and it is in the light of this knowledge we should work in framing this bill.

Instead of seeking where we can pare down a little here and there for the benefit of this corporation or that interest, or insert a cushion to take off the jar that comes to a special interest because its taxes are raised a little, we should be trying to see how we can raise the last dollar possible out of the wealth of this country and out of the profits of war in order to meet the expenses of the war.

Whatever may have been the forces which caused the present world war, one result of it must be apparent to every man of intelligence, and that is that the plain citizen has come to realize his power as never before, and consequently will assert his rights as never before. In order to raise the money to pay the expenses we have incurred, and are bound to incur, the Government must reach out and put a heavy hand, through its power of taxation, upon every citizen in the land, and if it be presently discovered that the hand of the Government bears heavily and unjustly upon the masses and touches only lightly the rich—in proportion to their ability to pay—it will produce conditions of discontent and resentment not pleasant to contemplate. Any injustice that is done by us may be long endured, and in framing the legislation to raise these vast and almost inconceivable amounts of money we are directly affecting the lives and fortunes of every one of our people and we can not afford to enact this legislation unless it can be defended upon the ground that it is just as fair to the poor man as it is to the rich in proportion to the ability of each to carry the burden and sacrifice of war. I undertake to say that the Senate bill can not be, and has not been, defended upon that ground.

INDIVIDUAL INCOMES.

The first change of importance which the substitute bill makes in the Senate bill occurs in the tax on individual incomes. The net result of the change I propose is to increase the total amount of the tax collected from that source by $352,510,000.

To accomplish this I propose to amend section 210 by reducing the normal tax in the Senate bill from 12 per cent to 2 per cent and change the rates of taxation upon incomes as shown in the substitute bill. For purposes of clearness I have prepared and ask to have inserted in the RECORD the rate and per cent of the tax upon the incomes of heads of families as shown under the existing law, the committee bill, and the substitute bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the normal tax of the committee bill will raise $114,000,000, while under the substitute it is estimated to produce only $70,000,000. I have reduced the normal income tax in order to relieve the tax upon incomes of people of modest means. I have reduced the income tax proposed by the committee bill, but I make it up on the surtax on the rich. A large portion of this loss in revenue is made by the big decrease in the normal taxes upon the smaller incomes.

While it is true the man of large income under the terms of the substitute bill would pay the normal income tax at the same rate as the man of small incomes the substitute bill does not permit him to escape.

I also present and ask to have inserted in the RECORD a further table showing the surtax rates, and the revenues which will be produced from individual incomes at each step under the substitute bill.

It will be observed that the total revenues produced under the substitute bill from individual incomes is $1,714,510,000 as against $1,432,000,000 under the Senate bill.

I ask, Mr. President, to have incorporated in my remarks the table which I have here, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The surtax of the Senate committee bill, according to the estimate of revenue, will yield in the one-year period $1,018,000,000.

The surtax of the substitute bill, it is estimated, will yield revenue in the same period to the amount of $1,644,510,000.

This is an increase in revenue under the surtax rates of $626,000,000.

Every dollar of this increase comes from incomes in excess of $5,000, and the great bulk of the increase is from incomes in excess of $25,000,000 per year. The rate of the tax on the incomes increases as the incomes increase.

While relieving the small taxpayer, the tax to be collected under both the normal and the surtax sections by the rates of the substitute will exceed the amount of the committee bill by $352,510,000.

Now I will briefly explain in detail the increases which my substitute makes in the tax on individual incomes. Senators will more readily follow what I shall now present if they refer to the first table printed on page 696 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

From a study of that table it will be observed that starting with incomes of $2,500 the tax under the Senate bill is $30; under the substitute $10; and that the substitute carries the same tax for this income as does the existing law. On incomes of $4,000 the tax in the substitute bill and the existing law are the same—$40—while the tax under the Senate bill is $120—three times the amount.

Incomes of $4,500 are taxed under existing law at $60, under the Senate bill at $120, and under the substitute bill at $50.

Incomes of $5,000 are taxed under existing law at $80, under the Senate bill at $150, and under the substitute at $60.

Incomes of $5,500 are taxed under existing law at $105, under the Senate bill at $215, and under the substitute at $95.

Incomes of $6,000 are taxed under existing law at $130, under the Senate bill at $250, and under the substitute at $130, the same as the existing law.

From this point on, however, the tax proposed in the substitute bill at every bracket is substantially greater than that under existing law.

At the bracket on incomes of $25,000 the tax under the substitute bill overtakes and passes the tax under the Senate bill. The tax under the Senate bill on incomes of $25,000 is $3,720, and under the substitute bill $3,935. From this point on the tax under the substitute bill rapidly draws away from that imposed by the Senate bill. At $100,000 the substitute bill imposes a tax of $48,435, and the Senate bill only imposes a tax of $35,030.

The justification for this change seems too plain for argument. Upon no class has this war borne more heavy than the man with a small income, with a family to support out of it. Before the war his income and living expenses were about even. His ambition and hope was to save a little by economy and frugal living, and put by something for his family as a protection against sickness, old age, or death. It is from this class that the war has taken a large toll in the way of actual military service, but even more serious than that is the hardship which it has brought to them in the greatly increased cost of living with no corresponding increase in income. To a man in this position the difference between fifty and a hundred dollars in his income tax is a serious matter. It may well make the difference between actual privation and suffering and a reasonable degree of comfort.

On the other hand, a man with an income of $25,000 or more may be a little inconvenienced by an increase in his income tax, but neither he nor his family are going to suffer any real privation on account of it. Even if the tax should make it necessary for a man with a hundred thousand dollars of income to dispense with a few luxuries, it will not do him or the country any harm, and, as a matter of fact, a large portion of those fortunate individuals who are in the enjoyment of incomes of that character at the present time have in one way or another made a profit out of this war.

There is no war-profit tax for individuals, except as it may reach them under this greatly increased rate of taxation on the larger incomes such as I have provided for in the substitute bill. Under the Senate bill there can be no doubt that hundreds of millions of dollars made by individuals out of this war—middlemen, agents, contractors, and the like—escape all taxation upon profits made out of the war, except as taken as an income tax, and justifies its being levied at a high rate.

CORPORATION TAX—STRIKING OUT $2,000 SPECIFIC EXEMPTION.

I have explained, Mr. President, quite in detail the operation of the rates which are proposed in the income-tax section of the bill. I come now to the corporation tax.

In the tax upon corporations the substitute bill recurs to the rates and form of the bill as it passed the House. Upon the net income of corporations from which dividends are paid or to discharge bonded indebtedness or to buy obligations of the United States the rate is 12 per cent. This is the same rate which all the net income, including the portion used for these purposes, pays under the rates of the pending bill. Upon all the balance of the net income the substitute rate is 18 per cent. This is higher than the rate of the pending bill and would reach net income not distributed for the foregoing purposes.

The substitute strikes out that portion of section 236 that aims to specifically exempt from taxation $2,000 of the income of corporations.

I call the attention of the Senate to that, for I think that is a material consideration which you ought to have in mind in voting for or against the substitute which I propose.

This is the first appearance of such an exemption in a bill proposing to levy a tax upon the incomes of corporations. The first corporation income-tax statute was enacted to apply to corporations with a net income in excess of $5,000 per annum. But the act of 1913 and the acts of 1917 levied a tax upon all corporations and made no distinction or granted no exemption such as is carried in line 10, page 62, of the Senate bill, allowing this exemption of $2,000.

That line means a saving to the corporations and a loss in revenue to the Government of nearly $100,000,000.

In 1916, 341,253 corporations made returns of income to the Treasury. It is estimated that at the present time there are upward of 400,000 corporations in the United States. This provision means that each corporation shall not be required to pay tax upon $2,000 of its income. That means to each corporation a saving of $240. It is not a great amount in the case of any one company, but this "relief" to 400,000 corporations means a loss of $96,000,000 in revenue to the Government.

So far I have heard no sound reason advanced to justify this exemption. Because an exemption of $2,000 is granted to married persons under the individual income-tax provisions is not a reason to justify the granting of such an exemption to a corporation.

Individual exemptions are based upon a very different principle than are the exemptions of corporations. Recent years have emphasized the need of the State to encourage the family relation. The $2,000 individual income free from income tax is made free so there may be assured to the family enough to aid in meeting living expenses.

But when this exemption is granted the law at the same time provides as does this bill at line 24, page 30:

> That in computing the net income no deduction shall in any case be allowed in respect of—> (a) Personal, living, or family expenses.

But the corporation is permitted to make deduction for its living expenses. In the ascertainment of its net income a corporation is permitted to deduct—

> All the ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred during the taxable year * * * including a reasonable allowance for salaries * * * for personal service * * * and including rentals, etc. (Sec. 234, p. 54.)

Rent and payments made for personal service form a large part of the expense of every family. If the individual in addition to his specific exemption were permitted to deduct from his gross income the amounts expended for these items or the expenses incurred to carry the family over the year as the corporation is permitted to deduct the expenses incurred in carrying on its trade or business, there would be little left of any ordinary family income of $3,000 to fall into the class of taxable income.

As the corporation in computing its net income is given these allowances denied to the individual in computing his taxable income, the corporation should not in addition be permitted to escape tax upon $2,000 of its net income.

This is a discrimination that should be wiped out of the bill. It is a trifling matter to even the very small corporations; it is of no consequence to the large companies, and it means a good slice of income to the Government, amounting, as I have said, to $96,000,000 in the aggregate.

WAR-PROFITS TAX.

The next fundamental change my substitute proposes to make in the pending bill relates to the war and excess profits tax. The provisions of the pending bill, commencing at page 83 and dealing with war excess-profits taxes of corporations, are, to say the least, very remarkable. On their face these provisions of the Senate bill seem to bear some relation to an 80 per cent tax on war profits made by corporations. As a matter of fact, however, they impose no such tax.

The chairman of the Finance Committee stated in the course of the debate on Saturday:

> Nobody ever supposed that even the war-profits tax of 80 per cent would in practical operation be more than 70 per cent upon war incomes.

Mr. President, that statement is true, and it is true because of the unreasonable deductions from the net income of corporations permitted before the war-profits tax is levied. Each corporation is permitted to deduct from its net income for the taxable year its war profits; that is, the average profit for the prewar period. If these average profits fall short of 10 per cent of the capital for the prewar period, then the actual prewar profits are increased to 10 per cent of the capital. To this sum is added $3,000 specific exemption.

So, then, the war-profits tax would be levied under the following formula:

Net income minus the average prewar income, but not less than 10 per cent of the invested capital minus $3,000, shall pay a war-profits tax of 80 per cent.

The theoretic maximum under the pending bill is a tax of 80 per cent on 90 per cent of the war profits, less $3,000, or about 70 per cent.

But the general public do not understand this, and when they read that there is a tax rate of 80 per cent on war profits they accept that to mean that after taking out of the net income an amount equal to the prewar profits the remainder is taxed at 80 per cent.

As a matter of fact, while the pending bill contains this rate, there is no 80 per cent tax on war profits.

It is true that under the pending bill the war excess-profits tax is the sum of the amounts levied under the rates of the three brackets. But if the exemption of $3,000 and the 10 per cent of invested capital were eliminated from the credits allowed under the third bracket, and the credit confined to the average of the actual prewar-period income, and the cushion provisions were eliminated, then as to all the corporations reached by this bracket it would be an 80 per cent war-profits tax.

Now, as to the estimate of $5,000,000,000 of war profits and that the tax under the war excess-profits bracket of the pending bill is only 48 per cent of that amount, the Senator from Utah said that the estimate which I made "includes all of the business of the country, some of which does not pay any excess war-profits taxes."

In arriving at that estimate I have taken all the taxes levied under the war excess-profits section of the pending bill—that is, all the taxes paid as excess-profits taxes and all taxes paid as war-profits taxes and credit all these taxes as war-profits taxes. Taking all these taxes together, the result is a tax equal to about 48 per cent of the amount of the war profits. I do not mean that the pending bill levies a war-profits tax of 48 per cent. Far from that. The total of the taxes under the two excess-profits brackets plus the amount of the war-profits bracket will equal 48 per cent of the war profits.

The first year that corporations made income-tax returns to the Federal Government was 1909. The following table shows the corporate net income from 1909 to date:

Corporate net income, 1909 to 1918.

Year:	Net income.
1911	3,503,000,000
1912	4,151,000,000
1913	4,714,000,000
1914	3,940,000,000
1915	5,310,000,000
1916	8,765,900,000
1917 (estimated)	10,500,000,000
1918 (estimated)	10,000,000,000

The estimate of $10,500,000,000 corporate net income for 1917 and $10,000,000,000 for 1918 are made by the Treasury Department and can be safely relied on as not being too high. That the estimate of $5,000,000,000 war profits made by corporations during the taxable year is a reasonable estimate is asserted by the Treasury expert, and also appears from a comparison of the net income of corporations during the war with their prewar net income.

The total net income for the three years 1911, 1912, and 1913 adopted as the prewar years of all corporations was $12,368,000,000. The average annual net income for the three years was, therefore, $4,122,666,000. This, deducted from the $10,000,000,000 net income of corporations for 1918, leaves $5,877,334,000 in excess of the average of all the corporation profits for the three prewar years. Making allowance for the normal net income of new corporations—corporations that were not in existence during any of the prewar period—and for growth of existing corporations it is plain that the war profits must still account for at least $5,000,000,000 of the net income of $10,000,000,000 for 1918.

The suggestion is made that in making the estimate of $5,000,000,000 of war profits for 1918 allowance was not made for earnings of new corporations or new capital invested by old corporations. All adequate allowance was made for this purpose. The Treasury estimated the net income of corporations for the year 1918, and this is the basis of my estimate.

Corporation net income, 1918, Treasury estimate		$10,000,000,000
Average of corporate net income for years 1911, 1912, and 1913		4,122,666,000
Excess of 1918 over prewar income		5,877,334,000
Allowance for earnings upon new capital (estimated)		877,334,000
War profits		5,000,000,000

This allowance of $877,334,000 to cover the earnings of new capital exempted from war-profits taxation is, in my view, reasonable. Capitalized at 8 per cent, the rate allowed by the pending bill to corporations before levying the excess-profits tax under brackets Nos. 1 and 2, it would allow for a return on $10,966,675,000 of new capital.

Capitalized at 10 per cent, it allows for a return on $8,777,334,000 of new capital.

The Treasury expert has stated to me that the average net income return in the prewar period represents a return of about 10 per cent upon the capital. So, depending upon the rate per cent at which this allowance is capitalized, it takes care of an increase of the prewar capital of from 20 to 25 per cent. This, I take it, is ample to cover the growth of the war period.

It is to be remembered also that the above table takes no account of the vast sums made by individuals and partnerships out of the war.

HOW RATES OF PENDING BILL ARE APPLIED.

Now, it is only claimed for the pending bill and the report accompanying it submitted by the majority of the committee that the bill produces $2,400,000,000 in revenues from war excess profits. Obviously, therefore, the Senate bill does not impose an 80 per cent tax upon war profits, or anything approximating that.

An illustration of a typical corporation will show just how the provisions of the Senate bill work out when actually applied.

Upon a corporation having a capital of $100,000, prewar profits of $10,000 and profits for the taxable year of $150,000, the tax under paragraph 301 would be $109,600 and under paragraph 320, $4,608, making a total tax of $114,208, or 76.14 per cent. But when the "cushions" are applied, this tax is reduced and this corporation would pay a war excess-profits tax of only 45½ per cent and a total tax of 51.7 per cent.

Mr. President, I have here a table, in which I work out in detail the calculations under the provision which I am now considering. These I ask to print without reading.

METHOD OF ASSESSING WAR EXCESS PROFITS ILLUSTRATED.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In other words, this is a corporation with $100,000 capital, a prewar average net income of $10,000, and for the taxable year a net income of $150,000.

Under the first bracket of paragraph 301 a tax of 30 per cent is levied upon the net income in excess of the excess-profits credits allowed under section 312. These credits are:

(1) Eight per cent of invested capital for the taxable year. In this instance $8,000; and

(2) A specific exemption of $3,000, making a total credit of $11,000.

This $11,000 is not taxable. There is taxable under bracket No. 1 excess profits in excess of this $11,000, and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital. In other words, the capital is $100,000, and 20 per cent of that is $20,000. The difference between this and the credit of $11,000—$9,000—is the amount taxed under the first bracket. This is taxable at 30 per cent, so the revenue derived under this bracket would amount to $2,700.

Under the second bracket there is taxable all of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the capital and in excess of the deduction—in this case the difference between $20,000 and $150,000—leaving $130,000 taxable at 60 per cent. The tax on this would be $78,000, and the total tax under brackets No. 1 and No. 2, $80,700.

Under bracket No. 3, which carries the 80 per cent clause, a different deduction is made. Under section 311 the war-profits credits allowed is a specific exemption of $3,000, and an amount equal to the prewar period income of the corporations, but in no instance less than 10 per cent of its invested capital. In this instance this deduction would be $10,000, the average prewar profits plus the specific deduction of $3,000 making the total of war credits to be deducted $13,000. Under the terms of bracket No. 3 the profits to be taxed are the total profits of the corporation less the deduction—$150,000 less $13,000, making $137,000 of taxable profits. At 80 per cent this would amount to $109,600. The bracket provides that there shall be levied under it the sum, if any, by which this 80 per cent exceeds the amount of the tax computed under the first and second brackets. The tax computed under the first and second brackets amounted to $80,700. This deducted from $109,600 leaves to be assessed under bracket No. 3 $28,900.

The total tax under brackets 1, 2, and 3 would amount to $109,600, which is the total excess and war profits tax levied upon the corporation.

But besides this war excess-profits tax the corporation is also subject to the corporation income tax under section 230. All of its net income for the year 1918 in excess of the credits provided in section 236 are to be taxed at 12 per cent. Section 236 provides that there shall be a credit allowed:

(1) For the amount of taxes imposed under title 3, which contains section 301, under which the war excess-profits tax is levied, so that while the total profits of the corporation amounted to $150,000, it is subject to the following deductions:

First, the taxes computed under section 301, amounting to $109,600; and, second, a specific deduction of $2,000 (section 236 (c)). In this instance the total deduction amounts to $111,600, which, subtracted from the $150,000 of profits, fixes the amount taxable under section 230, the corporation income-tax section, at $38,400. Taxed at 12 per cent, the revenue would be $4,608.

This added to the tax under the first, second, and third brackets of section 301 would bring the total tax of this corporation to $114,208, which is 76.138 per cent of the profits.

This would leave this corporation after all taxes are paid an income three and one-half times as great as its prewar income. It would give it a net income after deductions for taxes of $35,792 as against its prewar income of $10,000.

If this bill really taxes such a corporation 76 per cent of its profits, while it would still be short of the full measure of the contribution which such a war-profiteering concern should make to the Government, it would approach an 80 per cent war tax.

HOW THE "CUSHION" OPERATES.

However, the bill can not be correctly understood by merely applying these rates. There are other provisions which open the door wide for corporations to escape their just taxes. In the case of this corporation, it would claim exemption under paragraph (e) of section 327 and would be taxed under the provisions of section 328.

Paragraph (e), section 327, provides, where the invested capital is materially disproportionate to the net income of representative corporations engaged in like or similar trade or business, because—

(1) The capital employed, although a material factor, is very small or is in large part borrowed.

The tax is to be determined as provided in section 328 and shall be—

The amount which bears the same ratio to the net income of the taxpayer * * * for the taxable year as the average tax of representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business bears to the average net income * * * for such year.

In this typical case the profits of $150,000 amount to 150 per cent of the capital, while it is assumed the net income of representative corporations engaged in a like or similar business is only 30 per cent.

Then this "cushion" provision would be applied as follows under section 328:

Corporations with a present and prewar capital of $100,000, prewar average annual net income $10,000; net income for the taxable year $150,000.

War excess-profits tax under section 301, $109,600, or 73⅜ per cent.

War excess-profits tax of corporations engaged in like or similar business as computed by the Treasury actuary, 45½ per cent.

This latter percentage would apply, so instead of paying a war excess-profits tax of 73⅜ per cent it would pay 45½ per cent. Instead of paying out of its profits of $150,000 $109,600 war excess-profits taxes it would pay $68,000 and would thus save $41,600, a saving of 41.6 per cent on the capital.

In addition, the corporation would pay taxes under section 230. If taxed on war excess profits under section 328, the taxes assessed under section 230 would be a different amount than if the war excess-profits tax was assessed under section 301. With war excess profits taxed under section 328 the tax under section 230 would be computed as follows:

Taxable profits $150,000 less the taxes assessed under section 328, $68,000, less specific exemption of paragraph (e) section 236, $2,000, a total deduction of $70,000, leaving $80,000 to be taxed at 12 per cent, which would yield revenue of $9,600.

So this corporation would pay under section 328, $68,000, and under section 230, $9,600, a total tax of $77,600.

The tax if levied under sections 301 and 230 would be $114,208.

With the "cushion" operating it would mean a saving on the total tax of $36,608, or 36.6 per cent of the capital.

Under these "cushion" provisions out of its $150,000 of profits this corporation would have left after paying its taxes $72,400, or in excess of seven times its peace-time profits.

The total tax assessed under sections 301 and 230 would be 76.14 per cent of the profits, but after applying the cushions under sections 328 and 230 would be only 51.7 per cent of the profits.

The basis of all income-tax laws of the United States has been to tax large incomes at a higher rate than smaller incomes. Also the basis of our excess-profits tax laws has been to tax large profits at a higher rate than small profits.

The relief provisions in this bill change this basis, and tax large incomes and enormous profits at the same rate as are taxed small incomes and small profits.

The relief provisions of this bill are intended to act so that every taxpayer will have an ample profit or income free from all taxation. No provision has been added to the bill, however, that will similarly take care of the Government's side as to revenue. Instead of the rates being increased they have actually been reduced. If increased, no harm could happen to the taxpayer because of the relief provisions.

Consequently, every relief provision not only protects the taxpayer against a heavy tax but also reduces the revenue to the Government, not only from the very small percentage of cases that the bill is intended to relieve, but it affects the very large percentage of taxpayers who, without these provisions, would pay only an adequate tax. If these relief measures were actually intended to relieve hardship only, the rates of tax would have been increased so as to take care of the revenue situation. But the rates have remained or have been reduced from the rates fixed in the bill as it passed the House.

I have illustrated the workings of one of these "relief" provisions. It is not my purpose to set out in detail all of these provisions, but I shall briefly outline the way in which some of the more important will operate to decrease the taxable profits or reduce the tax rate.

PERSONAL-SERVICE CORPORATIONS.

The first of these "cushion" provisions will be found on page 4 of the bill, lines 20 to 26, in the definition of the term "personal-service corporation." This is defined to mean a corporation the income of which is ascribed primarily to the activities of the principal owners or stockholders who are themselves regularly engaged in the active conduct of the affairs of the corporation, and in which capital is not a material income-producing factor.

That definition must be taken in connection with paragraph 8, page 34, and subdivision (14), page 52, which exempts personal-service corporations from taxation under the income-tax provisions, paragraph 8, page 34, and paragraph 304, page 88, which exempts such corporations from all profits tax. The provision with respect to the taxation of partnerships is made to apply in so far as practicable to such corporations and the stockholders thereof. The provision with respect to partnerships, section 218, is that partners shall be liable for income tax only in their individual capacity, and partnerships as such are not subject to war excess-profits taxes; so that personal-service corporations are thereby relieved from paying war-profits taxes. Many personal-service corporations have made enormous profits out of the war.

This is especially true of engineering corporations. Take, for example, an engineering corporation that has a capital of, say, $50,000 and for the three years prior to the war had an average net income of $100,000, and during this taxable year had an income of $1,000,000. This increased income was made possible for this corporation because it designed and superintended the construction of plants devoted to war production. In this instance the war profits of this concern would be $900,000 due entirely to the war, yet this $900,000 wholly escapes war excess-profits taxes.

EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY.

The second cushion to ease off the taxes will be found on page 7, paragraph (b), which reads as follows:

When property is exchanged for other property, the property received in exchange shall for the purpose of determining gain or loss be treated as the equivalent of cash to the amount of its fair market value, if any; but when in connection with the reorganization, merger, or consolidation of a corporation a person receives in place of stock or securities owned by him new stock or securities of no greater aggregate par or face value, or when a person or persons owning property receive in exchange for such property stock of a corporation formed to take over such property, no gain or loss shall be deemed to occur from the exchange, and the new stock or securities received shall be treated as taking the place of the stock, securities, or property exchanged.

Take, for example, two corporations each with an invested capital of $100,000, for which the stockholders paid in cash. Each of the corporations after some years had accumulated a surplus, so that their invested capital amounted to $200,000. The (a) corporation swallows the (b) corporation. The corporation is reorganized and there is exchanged the stock in the old corporation for stock in the new corporation, and for the purpose of determining loss and gain this old stock of corporation

(a) may be treated as the equivalent of cash to the amount of its fair market value. In other words, the fair market value of this property for which each stockholder paid $100 is now $200, and in this exchange of property each stockholder may receive not $100 worth of stock but $200 worth of stock, and this addition to his income—100 per cent—is not subject to taxation. Under the existing law and without this cushion in the bill this increased value when so distributed would be subject to taxation.

NET LOSSES.

On pages 8 and 9 of the bill will be found the sections covering the net loss cushion. This has been fully discussed on the floor, and permits a man who has made a mistake which resulted in a loss in his business during any taxable year ending after January 1, 1919, to recompute the taxes for the preceding year and then to recoup his loss by deducting the amount out of the taxes for that taxable year, and if his taxes for that taxable year be not sufficient to fully recompense him, then he may have a credit against his taxes for the succeeding year.

In case the loss was made during any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1916, and ending not later than December 31, 1918, such loss shall be allowed as a deduction in computing the net income of the taxpayer for the succeeding taxable year.

In other words, it is saddling onto the Government the mistakes and losses which may occur and which may not be deducted during the taxable year.

SALE OF MINES OR OIL AND GAS WELLS.

(b) In the case of a bona fide sale of mines, oil or gas wells, or any interest therein, where the principal value of the property has been demonstrated by prospecting or exploration and discovery work done by the taxpayer, the portion of the tax imposed by this section attributable to such sale shall not exceed 20 per centum of the selling price of such property or interest.

Applying this, let us assume that a prospector finds a mine or an oil or gas well, and in demonstrating the value of that property, allowing him full compensation for his time and for everything expended for this purpose, his total investment is $50,000.

Assume that he sells this property at $1,000,000. This leaves him a profit of $950,000. Under the terms of the income-tax section and without this cushion his tax would be about $700,000, but the above cushion comes into operation and it limits his tax by saying that the portion of the tax imposed by this section attributable to such sale shall not exceed 20 per cent or $190,000—a loss to the Government and a saving to the taxpayer of $510,000. This is how it operates on the big fellow.

But take the case of a little prospector, who spends $1,000 in discovering and proving a mine or oil or gas well, and assume that he sells his property for $31,000, leaving him a net profit of $30,000. Under the terms of the bill his tax would be $4,930. That being less than 20 per cent of the selling price of his property, this cushion does not operate for his benefit. In other words, this cushion operates to reduce the tax of the big operator from 70 per cent of the selling price to 20 per cent, while it leaves the tax on the little operator at 16.53 per cent.

This is not levying a tax in conformity with the rule that should maintain, that an income tax should be levied according to the ability of the person to pay. It aids the person who is so fortunate as to neither need nor deserve any aid, while the small man receives no benefit whatsoever from the cushion.

DEPLETION AND DEPRECIATION OF IMPROVEMENTS OF MINES, OIL AND GAS WELLS, AND TIMBER.

On pages 28 and 58 is the depletion paragraph, which provides in the case of a mine, oil or gas well, and other natural deposits and timber a reasonable allowance for depletion and for depreciation is made. If any individual or a corporation acquired a mine prior to March 1, 1913, in what is known as a proven tract—that is, where there were other mines developed in the same locality—and there was paid for this $100,000, but on March 1, 1913, the fair market value of the property was $1,000,000, then in computing the depreciation such fair market value and not what was actually paid for the property shall be the basis. If the mine or well was acquired after March 1, 1913, by the taxpayer, then not the cost of such acquirement but the fair market value at any time within 12 months after such acquirement shall be taken as the basis for depletion. So that while the purchase price might have been $100,000, after March 1, 1913, if the fair market value at any time within the succeeding year was $1,000,000, then the depreciation allowed would be based upon the latter figure.

Mines have a limited life. In the Joplin district the zinc mines last for from three to five years. Other properties—coal mines, gas or oil wells—have a longer life; but we will say, for example, that this property has a life of five years. Under this provision the taxpayer would be allowed a depreciation of $200,000 per annum. In other words, he would be allowed to deduct annually for five years from his income upon which the tax is computed twice as much as he paid for his property.

On page 29, line 19, and on page 60, line 5, is a paragraph which permits the taxpayer who has for the first time ascertained the amount of loss sustained during the preceding year and not deducted from the gross income for that year, or whose stock of goods is depreciated materially in value due to any shrinkage from the value of the inventory of the preceding year, to deduct such loss from the net income for such preceding taxable year and to have the taxes for that year redetermined, and any amount found to be due to the taxpayer on the basis of such redetermination is credited or refunded to him. The effect of this is that there may be a large stock of goods bought upon a high market, the market declined and the goods are still on the shelves. They are unsold. The tax for the preceding year can be redetermined and this loss recouped. It makes the Government the insurer of business judgment.

AMORTIZATION OF WAR PRODUCTION PLANTS.

Under the amortization section an individual or a corporation that constructed a building or acquired machinery or other equipment after April 6, 1917, for the purpose of manufacturing or of producing articles to contribute to the prosecution of the war, or who constructed or acquired vessels for the transportation of articles or men for that purpose, are permitted to annually amortize the cost of their plant without limit; that is, they are permitted to deduct from the income of this year any part or even the total cost of buildings, machinery, equipment, vessels—everything. The House limited the amount that might be deducted for any one year under this heading to 25 per cent of the taxpayer's net income. but the Senate committee struck this limitation from the bill and threw the door wide open.

Under the House bill the Secretary could say that there shall not be allowed any deduction under this heading to exceed 25 per cent, but under the Senate bill there is no limitation on the taxpayer, and he may claim a deduction of 25, 50, 75, or 100 per cent of his net income if the cost of the building or machinery equals that amount.

WIDENS THE EXEMPTION OF ASSOCIATIONS.

The existing law very properly provided for exemption from the corporation-tax section of farmers, fruit growers, and like associations organized and operated for the purpose of marketing their products, and which are operated without profit. These associations are mere selling agents for the individual farmers. In the pending bill, page 51, this very just exemption of the existing law is expanded and the door is thrown open and the opportunity given for the evasion of the corporation-tax law. The provision of the pending bill not only applies to such nonprofiteering associations, but it extends the exemption to include associations that act as selling agents not only for their own members and without profit, but which also sell for nonmembers. Where these associations make profit as the agent of a nonmember, such profit is taxable. But the viciousness of this provision is that membership in such organizations can be had for a mere nominal fee, and individuals who would not ordinarily find it advantageous to belong to such organization will under this provision find it a benefit to be a nominal member in such an association. It is problematic how much loss there may be to the Government in revenue, and there is no need of introducing this uncertainty when every legitimate association of this character is exempted under the existing law.

MAKING THE GOVERNMENT CARRY THE COST OF DEFERRED TAX PAYMENTS.

On pages 69 and 70 of the bill, section 250, there is extended the time for the payment of the income tax so that the last payment for the tax of 1918 need not be made until December 15, 1919.

The income which was taxed was of the year 1918. The tax should be due on the 31st day of December, 1918, and should be paid as soon thereafter as the books of the taxpayer can be closed and the return made. The existing law gives the taxpayer until June 15 in order to make certain that all of the taxes would be in the Treasury prior to the end of the fiscal year.

Anticipating a heavy war tax both on incomes and on profits for the year 1918, Treasury certificates were sold, so as to make it easy for the taxpayer. As the taxpayer accumulated his income during 1918, he laid aside a portion to meet the income taxes, and could invest it in Treasury certificates, such certificates bearing interest at from 2 to 4½ per cent, but practically all at 4½ per cent, so that the taxpayer, on the sum he had laid aside for payment of his taxes, could earn income up to the time that he would turn in the certificates, as the certificates are receivable for taxes. But this provision of extending these payments will put a loss of $20,000,000 onto the Government. Instead of collecting the money which these big corporations have laid aside during 1918 to pay their taxes for that year, they will extend their payments until December, and the Government in the meantime will have to issue certificates of indebtedness in anticipation of these payments. On these certificates of indebtedness, the face of which will be about $2,000,000,000, the average interest will be at least 1 per cent, so that it will mean an interest, taking into account the time for which it will run, charge of $20,000,000, which will amount to a bonus to the taxpayer. The little taxpayer will pay his taxes in cash, without taking advantage of these extension provisions, and it is only the concerns with big amounts involved that will be benefited.

RELIEF FOR SMALL CORPORATIONS.

The House bill and the pending bill contain provisions excepting certain corporations from the rates of taxation provided under the brackets of the war excess-profits tax. In discussing some of the "cushion" provisions I called attention to a few of these, and I will not again cover that ground.

The House bill would tax a corporation with an invested capital of not more than $25,000, 35 per cent of its net income in excess of $3,000. This was the same rate it applied to other corporations by the first excess-profits bracket, but in the case of other corporations the rate is limited to apply to profits not in excess of 15 per cent of the capital plus that $3,000 exemption.

In the case of corporations with a capital of more than $25,000, but not more than $50,000, the rate of taxation as fixed by the House bill is 40 per cent of the net income, less a specific deduction of $3,000. Under the terms of the House bill, with a specific exemption of $3,000, plus 8 per cent earning allowed upon the capital, there seems to be no reason why corporations of this class should not take the same rates as other corporations.

The pending bill provides that the war excess-profits tax on corporations shall in no case be more than 30 per cent of the net income in excess of $20,000. This is a cushion unnecessary, unjustifiable, because it permits corporations to retain inordinately large profits, though made out of war, and it is stricken from the substitute bill.

The substitute bill restores the House section which limits the tax which may be levied on personal service corporations to 20 per cent of its net income, but makes an exception in that it shall not apply to a corporation with a capital of more than $100,000, 50 per cent of the gross income of which consists of gains or profits derived from purchase, sale, or commissions from Government contracts. In such case, under the provision of the House bill, these corporations would be taxed on their profits as are other corporations.

The pending bill strikes out the House limitation and would also write into law a rule dividing the income of a corporation partly derived from capital and partly derived from personal service, and the tax rate is computed on that portion of the income earned by capital provided 30 per cent of the income is derived from personal service. Then the rate based on a part is applied to the whole income. This is a cushion which will permit many contracting corporations that have made large profits out of Government contracts to escape payment of just war excess profits at the same rate as other corporations that have made such profits.

The substitute bill recurs to the language of the House bill with its specific limitation, as this will afford all the "relief" that any personal-service corporation should be entitled to, while at the same time it will protect the Government in the revenues which it should justly have out of war contracts. In connection with the consideration of this item it should be borne in mind that the Government was compelled to pay high prices on these contracts. It accepted these high prices because in the first place it desired the work to be done quickly and it did not have time to haggle as to prices, and in the second place because, as it was stated and as it appeared in the public press over and over again, the Government counted upon getting back a large share of these excessive prices through the means of a stiff and uncompromising war tax.

CHANGES MADE BY THE SUBSTITUTE BILL.

The substitute bill follows the general form of the House bill up to the tax on beverages. It restores the House rates on estate taxes and a striking out of the inheritance tax as it has been written in by the Senate committee.

The tax on transportation and other facilities, telephone and telegraph messages as contained in the House bill and in the pending bill, are not in the substitute bill.

The tax on insurance in the substitute bill follows the language and rates of the House bill.

The tax on beverages and on tobacco and cigars is the same in the substitute bill and in the pending bill.

The tax on admissions and dues follows the language and rates of the pending bill.

The excise taxes carried under Title IX of the pending bill are included in the substitute bill, but in addition thereto the substitute bill restores the tax upon luxuries as this tax passed the House.

The special taxes under Title X of the pending bill are retained in the substitute bill, as are also the stamp taxes of Title XI.

The tax on employment of child labor is included in the substitute bill, as are also the general administrative provisions of Title XIII.

The general provisions of Title XIV are included in the substitute bill, with the exception that there is stricken therefrom the amendment to section 1101, which would repeal the existing law with respect to fourth-class mail matter.

The foregoing is a brief summary of the differences between the pending bill and the substitute. The result of these changes is to take some of the burden off the men of small incomes and place it where it properly belongs—on the larger incomes.

The substitute bill increases materially the amount of revenue which will be collected under the war excess-profits tax. It is estimated that the rates of the pending bill will produce $2,400,000,000 of war excess-profits revenue, while by the substitute bill there will be raised under this heading at least $3,200,000,000, an increase of $800,000,000.

Every dollar of this revenue will be taken from concerns that have been piling up abnormally high profits, whether these profits are what may be strictly termed war profits or merely the excess profits, over a reasonable return on business.

The substitute bill, by restoring the House provisions with respect to estate taxes, will be capable of producing an estimated revenue of $110,000,000 under this head—an increase of $88,000,000.

The substitute bill, under the heading of special taxes, is estimated to produce $262,805,000, as against $77,805,000, than the rates of the Senate bill under this heading would produce. The reason of this is that there are restored to the bill all of the luxury taxes that were eliminated by the Senate committee. Since I dictated that paragraph I believe the Senate has incorporated the luxury tax in the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. And reduced the amount to 10 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; and has cut the amount in two, the amount that would be secured under the House rates; but I have put it into this substitute at the full amount of 20 per cent. By placing these taxes back in the bill a gain in revenue will be made amounting to $185,000,000.

It is from these items alone, the income tax, war excess-profits tax, estate tax, and luxury taxes, that the substitute bill increases in revenue are derived.

By eliminating the tax upon freight bills, passenger tickets, express and parcel-post packages, telegraph and telephone messages, as will be done if the substitute bill is adopted, there would be a loss in revenue upon this one head of $219,000,000.

But when all the changes are made by the substitute—and every change it proposes is for the purpose of placing the tax where it belongs, on wealth and luxuries that can well afford to bear the tax, and by taking a little off the poor—the total increase in revenue under the substitute bill would be $1,234,510,000.

I submit and ask to have printed in the RECORD a table showing the estimated revenue for the 12-month period under the pending bill and the substitute. These estimates were prepared by the Treasury expert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WAR EXCESS-PROFITS TAX OF SUBSTITUTE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The computations presented have been submitted to the Treasury expert—in fact, the estimates were prepared by him. I am willing that these estimates should stand as the measure of the revenue-producing power of the substitute bill.

At the same time, in fairness to the Senate, I must express the belief that the revenue that would be derived under the war-profits bracket would be larger than the estimate.

My reasons for this belief are the following:

The estimated revenue under the war excess-profits tax as it passed the House was $3,200,000,000. The substitute bill has practically the House bill rates, but does not permit a corporation taxed under the war-profits method a specific exemption of $3,000, as does the House bill.

It appears to me that the striking out of this exemption must result in a large increase in the revenue that would be derived from war profits.

The 1916 statistics of income, the latest available, show there were 341,253 corporations that made returns of taxable income. This number has greatly increased since that time. It is estimated that this increase is almost 25 per cent, and that there are now about 400,000 corporations in the United States.

Assuming that of these 250,000, or little more than half, would pay a tax under the war-profits bracket, it would mean that 250,000 corporations would each receive under the substitute bill a deduction less by $3,000 than under the Senate or the House bill. In other words, the rates of the substitute bill would apply to $750,000,000 more profits than are taxed under the pending or the House bill.

Seven hundred and fifty million dollars of profits additional to the profits taxed under the war-profits bracket at the rate of 80 per cent would yield additional revenue of $600,000,000.

This $600,000,000 added to the estimated $3,200,000,000 would bring the total yield of revenue under the war excess-profits tax to $3,800,000,000.

That would amount to a war-profits tax of 76 per cent on the estimate of $5,000,000,000 of war profits, and would make the substitute bill produce revenue of $1,734,510,000 in excess of the revenue estimated to be derived under the pending bill.

As I said, I have only endeavored to indicate in a brief way how these relief provisions will operate. Their effect upon the revenues of the Government is clearly indicated by the estimate of the amount of war excess profits to be collected under the pending bill.

In the substitute bill, without making too many changes, I have endeavored to save, and the provisions of the substitute bill will save, to the Government revenue to an amount of from $800,000,000 to $1,400,000,000 out of the tax on war excess profits alone.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to present the more objectionable provisions of the pending bill as I view them and to remedy in some measure its more serious defects by the substitute bill which I have submitted to the consideration of the Senate.

EVERY DOLLAR OF WAR PROFITS SHOULD BE TAKEN.

I would not have it understood that I regard the substitute bill as the best measure that might be drawn to meet present requirements. Far from it. A just measure would allow no man or corporation to retain a dollar of profits made directly out of this war.

Thousands of letters are coming to us daily from the families of soldiers who are being supported by charity because the Government has failed to pay to these dependent ones the insurance and allotments to which they are entitled.

The suffering resulting is appalling. I make reference to it in this connection solely to remind Senators how near the limit of destitution and suffering a great mass of people in this country are actually living.

When a family so situated gives up the father and the sons to the service of the Government, they give everything. They give all their income when they give the power that produces that income. If the rich gave all of their income and loaned the Government all of their capital, they would give no more to support the war than the hundreds of thousands whose fathers and brothers were taken for this war service.

I would take every dollar of war profits, leaving business its enormous prewar profits and its capital untouched.

I would take all of the incomes over enough to enable the owner of the income to support his family in comfort.

But, sir, I know that such a bill would receive little support in this body.

I have therefore offered a substitute bill that is far short of the requirements that justice demands.

I desire a record vote whenever the Senate is ready to pass upon the adoption or rejection of my substitute.

Mr. President, in view of the unexpected progress made with the consideration of this bill since it was reported to the Senate it appeared that all committee amendments might be disposed of and that we might reach the parliamentary situation where I could present my substitute bill for argument and secure a vote upon it during Saturday's session. As I could avail myself of computations already made by the Treasury experts by adopting the form of the pending bill with respect to the tax upon excess and war profits, and thus expedite the preparation of my substitute bill, I prepared my substitute on that basis.

While not in conformity with my idea of a properly drafted war-revenue bill, I took that course under the circumstances and made such changes in the pending bill as would levy a higher rate of taxation upon excess profits and would bring under the war-profits bracket the actual war profits, without any deduction made with respect to a percentage of the capital or any specific deduction.

As the bill was not disposed of in its consideration before the Senate in Committee of the Whole Saturday night, I have had time to work out a substitute plan for a flat 80 per cent war-profits tax.

That is a variation from the printed substitute, and I am now calling attention to it.

As this flat tax on war profits takes no account of the so-called excess profits, I have recurred to the provision of the House bill taxing the net income of corporations. Under this provision such portion of the net income as is used to pay dividends, the discharge of bonds or other interest-bearing obligations, and any amount expended to purchase obligations of the United States will be taxed at 12 per cent, and all the net income in excess of amounts thus expended would be taxed at 18 per cent.

The result of these changes would be to bring a very substantial increase in the revenue that would be derived under the bill.

It is true that under this plan the profits of a great number of concerns that made exceptionally large earnings in the prewar period but had no increase in earnings during the taxable year would not be subject to quite as high a rate of taxation as would those same corporations if taxed under the provisions of the pending bill or the provisions of the House bill. This is because the substitute as framed makes no provision for the taxation of excess profits and is based wholly upon the idea that the profits that should bear the high rate of taxation for war purposes are the profits that are made out of war.

This conforms to the fundamental idea of a war-profits tax. It will bear equally upon the large and the small corporations. It will touch no corporation that did not make profits out of war. It is ascertained by subtracting the average net income of the corporation for the prewar period from the net income of the taxable year, and taxing the difference at the rate of 80 per cent. It is a tax easy to administer. It will take no toll except that which should be taken. It would do no harm if it was placed as high as 90 per cent or 100 per cent, because the corporation would be left an amount equal to its peace-time profit.

I will say, Mr. President, as my conception of fair taxation, that no dollar of profit should be permitted to accrue to any man or to any corporation out of this war.

As for corporations that did not exist in the prewar period, their war profits are to be determined by comparison with the war profits of representative corporations doing a like business. As to corporations that have added or withdrawn new capital, they are permitted a deduction plus or minus 10 per cent of the capital withdrawn or added. Under the determination with respect to the war profits of 1918 and levying an 80 per cent tax on same, this substitute would therefore yield 80 per cent of $5,000,000,000 of war profits, or $4,000,000,000 of revenue.

Under the excess and war profits bracket of the pending bill it is estimated that the revenue will amount to $2,400,000,000; with the change which I would make there would be an increase in revenue which will amount to $1,400,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to break into the Senator's line of thought, but he says that there should be no war profits, and he takes 80 per cent of war profits and there is then virtually 20 per cent left of the war profits.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In saying that there should be no war profits I am speaking my personal view. In presenting a bill which takes only 80 per cent, I am doing the best I can with the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator's substitute, then, does not take all the war profits?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; it takes 80 per cent of the war profits, and takes it as a flat tax.

Mr. President, to effect the necessary changes I have had to make a few corrections in the print of the amendment in the form of a substitute which Senators have before them. If any Senator desires to mark the changes into his copy, I will submit them to the Senate and Senators will see just what changes I have made in the printed amendment which is upon their desks. The first of these changes occurs at the bottom of page 31. Instead of the language beginning with line 22, paragraph (a), I have recurred to the language in the House bill, which will be found on the copy of the pending bill beginning at line 23, page 47. I have restored the matter there stricken through down to and including line 8, on page 48.

I will read into the RECORD, Mr. President, the change made by the substitute bill. At page 31, after line 21, I have added the following:

In case of a domestic corporation, 18 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236: Provided, That the rate shall be 12 per cent upon so much of this amount as does not exceed the sum of (1) the amount of dividends paid during the taxable year plus (2) the amount paid during the taxable year out of earnings or profits in discharge of bonds; and other interest-bearing obligations outstanding prior to the beginning of the taxable year plus (3) the amount paid during the taxable year in the purchase of obligations of the United States issued after September 1, 1915.

In section 301, page 54 of the substitute bill, in lines 16 and 17, I have stricken out the matter which occurs in parentheses; in line 19, all after the words "equal to," and the balance of page 54 and page 55, down to and including the word "which," on line 9; also all after the parenthesis in line 11 down to and including line 19; on page 56, line 9, after the word "be," inserting the words "10 per cent"; on page 57 strike out lines 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11; on page 62, in line 21, strike out all after the word "capital" where it occurs in the center of the line; also lines 22 and 23 down to and including the words "trade or business," in line 24.

With these changes the language of the substitute bill as I introduced it on December 19, and as I offer it now, are identical, so that Senators may very easily follow these changes and will appreciate that, while I make a change in the corporation tax and in the war excess-profits tax, the body of the substitute bill remains as it was introduced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair]. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered as a substitute by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon that I ask for a record vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. NEW (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY]. Transferring that pair to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], I vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). My general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] does not apply to this proposal. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING. Announcing my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence on account of illness of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment, in the nature of a substitute, was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this morning a motion which I made to strike out three lines on page 123 was accepted by the committee. My attention has been called to the identical language on page 128, beginning on line 7 and ending with line 9. I ask that that may also be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 128, line 7, it is proposed to strike out: "and to the extent of the excess over $25,000 of the amount receivable by any beneficiary as insurance under policies taken out by the decedent upon his own life."

Mr. SIMMONS. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I send to the desk the following amendment. I have submitted it to the chairman of the committee and it has received some investigation. I think he will accept the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 278, after line 7, insert:

SEC. 1407. That it shall be the duty of every individual partnership, and corporation which, since the 6th day of April, 1917, has entered into any contract, undertaking, agreement, or transaction with the United States, or with any agency, officer, or commission of the United States, or with any other person, partnership, or corporation having contract relations with the United States, for the performance of any work or for the supplying of any materials or property for the use of or for the account of the United States to file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and with the Attorney General, within 60 days after the passage of this act, a true and correct copy of every such contract, undertaking, agreement, or transaction, together with a true, accurate, and complete statement of all work and labor performed and materials and property supplied, and an account of all moneys or other things of value received, expenses incurred, and profits made and realized from such contract, undertaking, agreement, or transaction.

SEC. 1408. That in cases where the work to be performed or the materials to be supplied shall not have been completed within 60 days after the passage of this act, a further and supplementary statement covering the same matters and to the same effect as hereinbefore prescribed shall be filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and with the Attorney General within 60 days after the completion of such contract, undertaking, agreement, or transaction.

SEC. 1409. That during the pendency of the present state of war every individual, partnership, and corporation, which shall hereafter enter into any contract, undertaking, agreement, or transaction with the United States, or with any agency, officer, or commission of the United States, or with any other person, partnership, or corporation having contract relations with the United States, for the performance of any work and for the supplying of any materials or property for the use of or for the account of the United States, shall immediately file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and with the Attorney General a true, correct, and complete copy of every such contract, undertaking, agreement, or transaction, and shall within 60 days after the completion of such contract, undertaking, agreement, or transaction file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and with the Attorney General the statement of work, receipts, expenditures, and profits hereinbefore prescribed.

SEC. 1410. That if such contract, undertaking, agreement, or transaction requires the performance of work or the supplying of materials or property for a period extending beyond one year, then the statement hereinbefore prescribed shall be filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and with the Attorney General on or before the 1st day of January in each and every year during the continuance of such contract, undertaking, agreement, or transaction, and upon the completion of such contract, undertaking, agreement, or transaction the statement of work, receipts, expenditures, and profits, hereinbefore prescribed, shall likewise be filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Attorney General.

SEC. 1411. That the statement hereinbefore prescribed to be filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Attorney General shall in every case be duly verified by oath by the individual or on behalf of the partnership or corporation making the same, and in the case of a partnership said statement shall be verified by one of the members of such partnership, and in the case of a corporation by the president or the manager of such corporation.

SEC. 1412. That a failure to file the statement referred to in sections 1407 to 1411, inclusive, within the time herein provided shall constitute a misdemeanor, and every person so offending shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 1413. SEC. 1414. That all persons employed in the civil, military, and naval establishments of the United States whose services are personal and whose duties, offices, and functions are prescribed by law shall be excluded from the operation of the provision of sections 1407 to 1413, inclusive.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have examined that amendment very closely, and members of the committee have also done likewise, and I will accept it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I simply want to suggest in relation to the amendment for the consideration of the conference committee, there are thousands of people, no doubt, who have had relations with the Government of a contractual nature since the war broke out, who will not know anything about the passage of the bill. The amendment is in a revenue act. It makes a penal offense for all people who neglect for a period of 60 days after the passage of the bill filing copies of their contracts with the internal-revenue collector. I suggest that if adopted—and I am not opposing it at all—the conference committee should provide that the parties having the contracts should in some way be notified by the Government that this is required of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator understand that the conferees would have authority to make changes in this provision?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope so. At any rate if they can not do it they can not; but I suggest if it is possible they should do so, because there are many people who are not used to dealing with the Government and have made contracts of a small nature who will never know about this measure, and they may be the victims of blackmail and serious oppression unless they are notified, and they should be notified.

Mr. SIMMONS. The purpose of the amendment is undoubtedly good.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POMERENE. I reserved the other day the right to have a separate vote in the Senate on the amendment relating to the zone system, to wit, section 1101 of the bill. I ask that that matter may be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, all the other amendments to the bill that have been agreed to in Committee of the Whole will be concurred in. They are concurrred in. The question now is on concurring in the amendment reserved by the Senator from Ohio, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 277, insert section 1101 in the following words:

SEC. 1101. That on and after July 1, 1919, the rates of postage on publications entered as second-class matter (including sample copies to the extent of 10 per cent of the weight of copies mailed to subscribers during the calendar year) when sent by the publisher thereof from the post office of publication or other post office, or when sent by a news agent to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agents for the purpose of sale, shall be 1 cent per pound or fraction thereof for delivery within the first and second zones applicable to fourth-class matter, and 1½ cents per pound or fraction thereof for delivery within any other zone.

(c) This section shall take effect July 1, 1919.

Mr. POMERENE. This is the amendment repealing the present zone system as applied to second-class mail. I think Senators are fully familiar with what is involved, and I do not care to occupy the time of the Senate to say anything further upon it. I ask for the yeas and nays upon concurring in the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I feel that I ought to make a correction in the statement that I made on the floor of the Senate the other day when we had the zone system under consideration. It will take me only a minute. The Senate was led to believe, and I was also led to believe and made the statement, that Mr. Penton was publisher of the Iron Age, a magazine published in New York, and I took it for granted when the statement was made that Mr. Penton was the publisher of that magazine. A letter was read in the Senate the other day when we had this question up by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] stating that he, of course, very much preferred to have an increase in the second-class postage rates rather than have the first-class postage raised from 1 cent to 3 cents. The magazine was pointed to as a horrible example of the cost of second-class mail matter to the Government of the United States.

My attention has been called to the fact that Mr. Penton is not the publisher of the magazine, has nothing whatever to do with it, but does publish a little magazine in Cleveland, Ohio, whose circulation is in the iron industry around Cleveland, and it hardly goes out of the first zone. Of course, under the proposition he would prefer very greatly to have the rate provided in the present law apply to his magazine rather than to have it apply to first-class mail matter.

I have a copy of the magazine before me. I notice there are 43 pages of reading matter with certain insertions in that reading matter and 189 pages of advertisements, and this is not the Christmas edition.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator the name of that magazine?

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that the magazine is the Iron Trade Review, published at Cleveland, Ohio. This is the issue of December 19, 1918. I felt that I should make that correction.

Mr. POMERENE. It is true that a mistake was made in saying that he was connected with the Iron Age, but the Senate still has not investigated the subject sufficiently to have the facts. The Trade Review, to which the Senator referred, is one of the publications. Mr. Penton has either four or five publications. The statement that it is limited in its circulation to a few iron people in and about Cleveland is wholly gratuitous on the part of the Senator from Utah. It is not the fact. It has a very wide circulation throughout the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I make the statement I do, in relation to where it is circulated, from men who have sent to me the information; and if the Senator wants to know who they are I can tell him exactly who they are.

Mr. POMERENE. It is not necessary to tell me who they are. I know Mr. Penton, and I know he is one of the reliable men of this country, and he is not a Democrat, but he is a Republican who believes in paying his way without getting his hand in the public till.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in what is known as the zone postal amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the Chair state what the amendment is.

The SECRETARY. On page 276, line 22, insert section 1402.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last vote I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). As heretofore announced I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair that I announced on the last vote and vote "nay."

Mr. NEW (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as on the previous vote of to-day I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY (after having voted in the negative). I voted under a misapprehension. I change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

I am informed that the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], with whom I am paired, would vote as I do, and therefore I do not need to make a transfer.

Mr. STERLING. I announce my pair as on the previous vote, and I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the affirmative). I omitted to state that I made the same transfer of my pair on this vote that I did on the previous one.

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Borah	Hitchcock	New	Swanson
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Penrose	Underwood

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary be authorized to adjust the numbers of sections and subsections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPENCER. I offer the following amendment to the bill in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 197, line 2, strike out the figure "10" and substitute in lieu thereof the figure "5."

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Missouri reserved that amendment.

Mr. SPENCER. I did not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. I will make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, nothing except a real sincere belief that there is an existing inequality could move me at this time to take a single moment. The Senate has agreed to the reduction of the tax upon jewelry from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. Every article of jewelry——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, at the request of a number of Senators on the committee I will accept the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I object. My objection is based upon the fact that representatives of the fur industry appeared before the committee and expressed themselves dissatisfied with the rate that the committee reported in the bill. If we are going to tax pantaloons and silk stockings, and so forth, 10 per cent as luxuries, we should also place a similar tax on furs as luxuries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Confusion has arisen by reason of the fact that all the Senate committee amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in, and in order to have this amendment adopted the Senator from Missouri will have to ask for a reconsideration of the vote. It grew out of inadvertence I know on his part.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the amendment be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it will be reconsidered. The question now is upon the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 197, line 2, strike out the figure "10" and substitute in lieu thereof the figure "5," so as to read:

(18) Articles made out of any fur, or articles of which fur is the component material of chief value, 10 per cent.

The amendment to the amendment proposes to strike out "10" and insert "5," so as to read 5 per cent.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not know that I particularly care to discuss this amendment, but I have occupied no time in the discussion of this measure, and I simply wish to say that I agree with what the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] well said to-day, that the action of the Committee on Finance is an indorsement of the 17 Members who fought for an increased rate on excess profits last year. I did take some time last year to explain my position as to the rates on excess war profits. I then stated that no man who was known to be a financier even in a small way would carry on his business in the manner that we were proposing to conduct the business of the Government. I restate now that no man who is worth a million dollars would borrow and mortgage his plant for two-thirds of that sum, as we are now proposing to do only on a vastly greater scale in the case of the Government. He would realize that that would reduce the value of his securities the same as a similar procedure would depreciate the value of the bonds of the Government.

Mr. President, those of us who stated last year that we believed that the rates then imposed were insufficient were characterized as disloyal and pro-German. The chairman of the committee acknowledged here on the floor in making his excellent speech the other day that unless this bill were passed before the end of this year the Government would lose $2,000,000,000 in revenue. The rates imposed in this bill are not any more excessive than the rates proposed by the minority of 17 Senators last year; and if we are to lose $2,000,000,000 in the event this new bill is not enacted during this year, then we have reason to suppose that we would have collected more than $2,000,000,000 if the amendment proposed by the Senator from California and supported by the other 16 Members of the Senate had been agreed to a year ago. So the Senator from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, has also indorsed the position which we took a year ago, although at that time he made the statement—I think I recollect it distinctly—that if the increased rates proposed by us then were incorporated in the bill it would disturb business. After the chairman made that statement the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Finance and the rates nearly doubled.

I simply wanted to say this much to make plain the fact that the Members of the Senate to whom I have referred—17 in number, I believe—who then said that from an economic standpoint it was necessary to increase these rates, have been indorsed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, do I understand that the chairman of the committee has accepted the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] to the committee amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did accept the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Other members of the committee do not accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask for a division.

The question being put, on a division the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees upon the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the bill be reprinted, with the Senate amendments numbered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that motion would only carry about 1,682 copies, to be distributed all over the United States. I ask that an order be made for the printing of the bill as passed by the Senate, with the amendments numbered, the number of copies that can be printed under the law within the $500 limitation. I can not now figure as to the exact number, but, under the law, we are authorized to print $500 worth; and whatever number may be printed within that cost I move be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The order was reduced to writing and was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate as many copies of the revenue bill (H. R. 12863) as may be within the $500 limitation as is prescribed by law, as passed by the Senate, showing the amendments of the Senate numbered.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. During the last session, in October last, the Senate voted upon the woman-suffrage joint resolution. It failed by a very small vote, and on reconsideration, was placed on the calendar. There are several Senators who have entered the Senate since that time, so that there is now a full membership of the Senate, and it seems to me that the joint resolution could be disposed of without any particular discussion and without taking very much time. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider that joint resolution at 2 o'clock on January the 10th.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I feel compelled to object to that request, because we have very much more important business coming before us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS FOR PEACE.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, is the Senator from North Carolina about to move an adjournment?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I was going to move an executive session.

Mr. LEWIS. Previous to that may I be permitted to make an announcement?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I merely desire to give notice, then, that on the next legislative day of our assembly I shall address the Senate upon the peace terms proposed by the United States through the President, replying to the criticisms of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate adjourn until Thursday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, December 26, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 23, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, let Thy blessing, like the manna from heaven, fall into the hearts of all Thy children and bring them in harmony with Thee.

May the memories of the past, childhood, youth, with all their hallowed associations, fill our hearts with the spirit of the season, that the Christ life may be our life; who taught us that it is more blessed to give than to receive; that we may help the needy; strengthen the weak by giving of our substance; cheer the lonely by our presence; comfort the sorrowing by kind words and loving smiles.

God grant that the Christ spirit may reign over the earth now and evermore, that the good that is in man may drive out the evil and bring into the world that peace for which all true men pray. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, December 21, 1918, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5102. An act to authorize the change of name of the steamer Charlotte Graveraet Breitung to T. K. Maher.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12916. An act to provide for the temporary promotion of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps serving with the Army; and

H. R. 12945. An act providing for the purchase of uniforms, accouterments, and equipment by officers of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, and midshipmen at the Naval Academy from the Government at cost.

MINING CLAIMS IN ALASKA.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 372) to amend Senate joint resolution 78, approved October 5, 1917, entitled "Joint resolution to suspend requirements of the annual assessment work on mining claims during the years 1917 and 1918."

Be it resolved, etc., That the provisions of Senate joint resolution approved October 5, 1917, be amended so as to provide that the time for filing notices to hold said mining claims in the Territory of Alaska under the said resolution be, and the same is hereby, extended to the 1st day of April, 1919.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I will state that the word comes to me through the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. SULZER] that at this time there is, and for some time back there has been, a very great prevalence of influenza; that the mails have been stopped and that all travel practically has ceased in the Territory, at least in some parts of it; and that these people who were to file their claims by the 1st of January, 1919, do not now have the opportunity to do so. This resolution provides that these people may file their claims up to the 1st of April, 1919. It simply extends the time for filing these notices by three months.

Mr. MANN. What are the claims?

Mr. FOSTER. They are in Alaska. They apply only to Alaska.

Mr. MANN. What kind of claims are they?

Mr. FOSTER. Mining claims. Senate joint resolution 78 provided that the assessment work might be omitted for the years 1917 and 1918, but they must file a notice with the recorder where the mining claim is located in order to get the benefits of this law. This will expire on the 1st day of January, 1919.

Mr. MANN. If, as the gentleman says, this condition has existed for some time, why have they waited until this date and then come in without a bill having been introduced?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I will state this: I do not know how long it has existed, but, as I understand, it has been some little time since this disease has existed; but I suppose that in the hope that they might be able to file these claims and get them to the office in time they did not ask Congress to give this relief.

Mr. MANN. Of course they have not discovered the fact in the last 48 hours?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; they have not discovered that. But I will state that Mr. O'Neill, the United States commissioner at Nome, has telegraphed to the Delegate that it is very urgent that this relief be granted to these people. I will state that there is no other relief granted to them except the right to file these notices until 90 days from now.

Mr. MANN. If this is not granted, what happens?

Mr. FOSTER. If they are unable to file their notices by the 1st day of January, somebody may come along and take their claims.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman from Illinois consulted with other members of the Committee on Mines and Mining?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not had the opportunity of consulting with them except in a general way, and only a few of them at that. I have not found any objection. So far as I know, there is no objection to granting these people this relief of 90 days for filing their notices.

Mr. MANN. I shall not take the responsibility of objecting, but it is very unusual to bring a matter of this kind up when nobody has been consulted on this side of the House, after almost everybody was given assurance that he might go home for the holidays. I know that my colleague is not going to try to take advantage of them.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not. I agree with my colleague on that point. But it has only come to my knowledge in the last few days. It is urgent; and if it is to be done, it ought to be done now.

Mr. MANN. It is negligence on the part of somebody.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman knows that some men leave things go until the last minute.

Mr. MANN. That is very unsafe in dealing with Congress.

Mr. FOSTER. Still, it is on account of sickness, and nobody can be hurt in this matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

DEPORTATION OF ALIENS WHO WITHDREW THEIR FIRST PAPERS.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes, and during that time to present a resolution adopted by the Elks Lodge of Seattle, of which 20 per cent went to the front. The resolution is on the question of the deportation of aliens who have withdrawn their first papers.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman offering a resolution or asking that it be read?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. The Clerk, without objection, will read this resolution as part of the gentleman's remarks.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there was a law passed by the Congress of these United States in July, 1918, known as an amendment to selective-service act, giving persons within the draft age who had taken out first papers for American citizenship the privilege of turning in said first papers to their local exemption board and thereby become exempt from service; and

Whereas thousands of men within draft age who had been in this country for many years and had signified their intention to become citizens took advantage of this law and thereby became exempted from military service, or were discharged from military service by reason thereof, and have taken lucrative positions in the mills, shipyards, and factories; and

Whereas in the great world war for democracy the rank and file of the best of our American manhood have suffered and sacrificed themselves in order to uphold the principles upon which this country was founded and for which they were willing to give up their life's blood if necessary to preserve; and

Whereas Seattle Lodge, No. 92, points with everlasting pride to the fact that over one-fifth of its membership left their positions, vocations, and business, exemplifying the true spirit of Americanism and of Elkdom, many of them shedding their life's blood for the common cause; and

Whereas these counterfeit, would-be Americans, who are, in our opinion, neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, would contaminate the 100 per cent true American soldiers and sailors who will shortly return to again engage in the gainful porsuits of life: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, Seattle Lodge, No. 92, B. P. O. E., numbering 5,000 true, red-blooded Americans, do ask the Congress of these United States to immediately enact a law to send these aliens who withdrew their first papers back to the country from whence they came, for we want them not, neither do we need them; for the country which we live in and are willing to fight for is good enough for us, and the country which they lived in, prospered in, yet were unwilling to fight for is too good for them to remain in. Be it further Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Brother JOHN F. MILLER, to present before Congress, and a copy be printed in the Elkogram, our official paper.

Introduced by John J. Sullivan, sergeant, United States Army.

Indorsed by the war activities committee of Seattle Lodge, No. 92, B. P. O. E.

Presented to this lodge for action.

(Signed) JOHN J. SULLIVAN,
Sergeant, United States Army.

[Applause.]

AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR RELIEF IN THE NEAR EAST.

Mr. MONTAGUE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of two motions—one to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of Senate bill 4785, and the other to take that bill, which is now upon the Speaker's table, and consider it in lieu of House bill 12635. The Senate bill is a bill to incorporate the American Committee for Relief in the Near East, the purposes of which I explained a few days since. I do not desire to take time now unless some gentleman wishes to ask me a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of Senate bill 4785 and for the present consideration of the same. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Is the Senate bill identical with the House bill 12635, which is reported from the House Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is identical. It has the unanimous report of the House committee and it passed the Senate on the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did the gentleman who objected the other day withdraw his objection?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have a letter from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] withdrawing his objection to the bill. He had telegraphic correspondence with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. WEBB, who is away in North Carolina. His objection has been withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMALL. Reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman from Virginia as to the probable length of time to be occupied in the consideration of this bill?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentlemen had not interrupted, I hoped it would be over by this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12635) to incorporate the American Committee for Relief in the Near East.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following persons, namely, James L. Barton, Samuel T. Dutton, Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, Edwin M. Bulkley, Alexander J. Hemphill, Charles R. Crane, William Howard Taft, Charles Evans Hughes, Elihu Root, Harry Pratt Judson, Charles E. Beury, Arthur J. Brown, John B. Calvert, William I. Chamberlain, William T. Ellis, James Cardinal Gibbons, Jerome D. Greene, David H. Greer, Harold A. Hatch, William I. Haven, Myron T. Herrick, Hamilton Holt, Frank W. Jackson, Arthur Curtiss James, Frederick Lynch, Vance C. McCormick, Charles S. Macfarland, Henry B. F. Macfarland, William B. Millar, John R. Mott, Frank Mason North, George A. Plimpton, Philip Rhinelander, William Jay Schieffelin, George T. Scott, Albert Shaw, William Sloane, Edward Lincoln Smith, Robert Eliot Speer, James M. Speers, Oscar S. Straus, Charles V. Vickrey, Harry A. Wheeler, Stanley White, Ray Lyman Wilbur, Talcott Williams, and Stephen S. Wise, their associates and successors duly chosen, are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia by the name of the American Committee for Relief in the Near East, and by that name shall be known and have perpetual succession, with the powers, limitations, and restrictions herein contained.

SEC. 2. That the object for which said corporation is incorporated shall be: To provide relief, and to assist in the repatriation, rehabilitation, and reestablishment of suffering and dependent people of the Near East and adjacent areas; to provide for the care of orphans and widows, and to conduct any industrial enterprises or operations of a philanthropic character which may, in the judgment of the corporation, be necessary to promote the social, economic, and industrial welfare of those who have been rendered destitute or dependent, directly or indirectly, by the vicissitudes of war, the cruelties of men, or other causes beyond their control.

SEC. 3. That the direction and management of the affairs of the corporation, and the control of its property and funds, shall be vested in a board of trustees, to be composed of the following individuals: James L. Barton, Samuel T. Dutton, Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, Edwin M. Bulkley, Alexander J. Hemphill, Charles R. Crane, William Howard Taft, Charles Evans Hughes, Elihu Root, Harry Pratt Judson, Charles E. Beury, Arthur J. Brown, John B. Calvert, William I. Chamberlain, William T. Ellis, James Cardinal Gibbons, Jerome D.

Greene, David H. Greer, Harold A. Hatch, William I. Haven, Myron T. Herrick, Hamilton Holt, Frank W. Jackson, Arthur Curtiss James, Frederick Lynch, Vance C. McCormick, Charles S. Macfarland, Henry B. F. Macfarland, William B. Millar, John R. Mott, Frank Mason North, George A. Plimpton, Philip Rhinelander, William Jay Schieffelin, George T. Scott, Albert Shaw, William Sloane, Edward Lincoln Smith, Robert Eliot Speer, James M. Speers, Oscar S. Straus, Charles V. Vickrey, Harry A. Wheeler, Stanley White, Ray Lyman Wilbur, Talcott Williams, and Stephen S. Wise, who shall constitute the first board of trustees and constitute the members of the corporation. Vacancies occurring by death, resignation, or otherwise shall be filled by the remaining trustees in such manner as the by-laws shall prescribe, and the persons so elected shall thereupon become trustees and also members of the corporation.

SEC. 4. That the principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but offices may be maintained and meetings of the corporation or of the trustees and committees may be held in other places, such as the by-laws may from time to time fix.

SEC. 5. That the said trustees shall be entitled to take, hold, and administer any securities, funds, or property which may be transferred to them for the purposes and objects hereinbefore enumerated by the existing and unincorporated American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, and such other funds or property as may at any time be given, devised, or bequeathed to them, or to such corporation for the purposes of the trust; with full power from time to time to adopt a common seal, to appoint officers, whether members of the board of trustees or otherwise, and such employees as may be deemed necessary for carrying on the business of the corporation, and at such salaries or with such remuneration as they may think proper; and full power to adopt by-laws and such rules or regulations as may be necessary to secure the safe and convenient transaction of the business of the corporation.

SEC. 6. That as soon as may be possible after the passage of this act a meeting of the trustees hereinbefore named shall be called by Samuel T. Dutton, Cleveland H. Dodge, Henry Morgenthau, Edwin M. Bulkley, Alexander J. Hemphill, William B. Millar, George T. Scott, James L. Barton, and Charles V. Vickrey, or any six of them, at the Borough of Manhattan, in the city of New York, by notice served in person or by mail, addressed to each trustee at his place of residence; and the said trustees named herein, or a majority thereof, being assembled, shall organize and proceed to adopt by-laws, to elect officers, and generally to organize the said corporation.

SEC. 7. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield? The gentleman has the floor, I believe. I should like to have the gentleman explain the language in section 2, beginning in line 15—to provide relief and to assist in the repatriation, rehabilitation, and reestablishment of suffering and dependent people of the Near East and adjacent areas.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That means exactly what it says. There are thousands of people there who are suffering for food and from disease. The starvation is most extensive; suffering and deaths have occurred and are now occurring in a manner perhaps unparalleled in the history of the world. The purpose is to give these people some assistance. They have been driven from one country into another, and it is necessary to secure means by which they can be transported back to their original homes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I believe the gentleman explained to us when the matter was up the other day that the expression beginning in line 18 "and to conduct any industrial enterprises or operations of a philanthropic character" did not mean that this corporation was to conduct industrial enterprises in the United States.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; the gentleman will see that the power to conduct industrial enterprises is qualified by the clause "such industrial enterprises as may be necessary to promote the social, economic, and industrial welfare of those who have been rendered destitute," and so forth.

I will say that this provision is to enable instruction to be given to many young people in the manual and mechanical trades. It is purposed to keep them self-sustaining economic units, to train them to work.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is to be conducted, not in this country but in other countries?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think the operations of the corporation relate to this country at all except the solicitation of funds and establishment of offices here.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, as to section 5—that the said trustees shall be entitled to take, hold, and administer any securities, funds, or property which may be transferred to them for the purposes and objects hereinbefore enumerated.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Of course, the gentleman realizes that this authority is to enable the trustees to solicit funds and transfer securities into money; they must have that authority in order to administer the charity or philanthropy for which the corporation is endowed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman would construe that provision in section 5 in the light of the language used in section 2?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Undoubtedly I would.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There has been much opposition lately to national incorporations and a recent investigation in regard to one of them. I think Congress itself has become disposed to go slow with respect to these corporations, to work here, there, and everywhere. I want to ask the gentleman where the funds of this association are to be raised?

Mr. MONTAGUE. With most earnest apology to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], I will answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a moment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am asking the question because we have a great deal of distress in the United States just now; a large amount of suffering in the families of soldiers in France, particularly as to parents, wives, and dependent children. These, as much as the foreign people referred to here, deserve our attention.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am unable to answer all of the gentleman's last remark. As to why some gentlemen wish to give charity to one object instead of to another is a matter which pertains to the liberty of the citizen, and I do not think we can abridge it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is a request for unanimous consent. May I ask the gentleman several questions before unanimous consent is granted.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We are considering the bill under unanimous consent. Unanimous consent has been granted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I ask the gentleman that I may be permitted to put some questions in his time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; perhaps I can answer the two gentlemen at the same time.

Mr. CRAMTON. In section 2, if I may call the gentleman's attention, the objects of the corporation seem to be of two kinds. First, the relief for dependent people in the Near East and adjacent areas, and, second, the balance of section 2, which does not relate to any place but seems to refer to relief to be given to those who are suffering from war anywhere. In other words, there is no power of the Red Cross, no power of any other philanthropic organization for the relief of destitution or dependency or misfortune that would not be within the scope of this organization. Was that the intention?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It was not the intention, but there can be no conflict in the charities. Two lights burning in the darkness do not interfere with each other.

Mr. CRAMTON. No; but when the gentleman joins with that wide power of philanthropic action, so broad it not only provides for operations of a philanthropic character for "those who have been rendered destitute or dependent, directly or indirectly, by the vicissitudes of war, the cruelties of men, or other causes beyond their control," but there is no place limited for these industrial operations.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Those industrial operations, as I said in response to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], must be necessarily of a philanthropic character. They must all tend to the consummation of the philanthropic purposes authorized by this bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, yes; if that be so; but I am not so positive that it is so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I say also to the gentleman that it is confined wholly to the Near East?

Mr. CRAMTON. Even if they be of a philanthropic character—a term which is very elastic—it is not necessary that they be confined to the Near East.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This bill confines its powers to Syria, Armenia, and adjacent territory. It is in that particular section of the country that has been under the Ottoman oppression, an oppression unparalleled in the history of the world.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the terms of the bill do not so confine it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I beg most diffidently to disagree with the gentleman. The terms of the bill must be taken with the purposes of the bill. They must be construed with respect to the end to which the power is directed and which is to be exercised.

Mr. ROBBINS. Would not the "Near East" cover Roumania, where there has been quite as much suffering as in Armenia or Asia Minor? There was an attempt on the part of Bulgaria to exterminate the Roumanian Nation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I doubt whether that is the Near East as it is historically understood.

Mr. ROBBINS. Are these funds to be derived entirely from voluntary charitable contributions, or is this society to come here and ask Congress to help carry on this work?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Entirely from voluntary contributions. I have no idea that they will come to Congress, although there is no provision in the bill that prohibits citizens from coming to Congress to ask what they choose. I imagine that of all the charities solicited in recent years in America none will be freer from a purpose to entangle Congress or the Government than this. This incorporation would never have been asked but for this reason: The temper of the eastern mind is such that in order to facilitate banking operations and communication with Government officials it is necessary that there be some impress of the Government on the undertaking itself. This Government itself is loaning millions and millions of dollars to other countries. Why not permit these philanthropic gentlemen, who are of every religious denomination and almost every creed in America, to have this technical impress of the Government, in order to administer with more facility and efficiency the funds that may be collected by voluntary subscription? There will be no overhead charges, and the work so far has been administered by agencies already in existence.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is true, and it is very commendable and entirely a competent reason for asking for this incorporation, but it is covering the same ground that the American Red Cross covers now. Not so long ago we incorporated a society known as the German-American Alliance, and when the war broke out and investigation was had it was found that that society was distributing by every means possible throughout this country German propaganda in direct contravention to the aims of our people and our Nation in the war. The charter was promptly revoked. I do not say that this society is to be incorporated for any such purpose, but here is a society that can perpetuate itself indefinitely under a charter that has no limitation as to time, without restrictions as to place, except that it refers to the "Near East." This corporation can organize industries and carry them on and can administer charity, or can come to Congress and ask for appropriations of money to prosecute its work. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be some limitation as to time or place of an incorporation that is going to duplicate the work of the Red Cross and other charitable organizations already incorporated and in existence? These are some of the provisions of this act that give me very great concern. I should like to understand this proposed corporation better before supporting this bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is not duplicating the work of the Red Cross, because the Red Cross has been unable to do this work. It has no means adequate to meet it. It is not operating in this field; it is not covering the distress that is now crying aloud in that country, and it is only too eager for this committee to do this work in the Near East.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I think perhaps gentlemen do not quite understand the purpose of this organization.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment at that point? I asked the gentleman from Virginia a question, and there were other questions that I had in mind. That question has not been answered. May I have time for discussion before the debate closes?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter involving the highest use of sovereign power. I think the Members should hear it thoroughly and know exactly what we are doing. I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 24, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Heavenly Father, pour out upon these, Thy servants, abundantly of Thy substance, to uphold, sustain, and guide them through the Congressional duties of this day; that they may be worthy in Thy sight of the trust reposed in them, by the people who have called them to do their work; and Thine be the praise through Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment, joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 372) to amend Senate Joint Resolution No. 78, approved October 5, 1917, entitled Joint Resolution to suspend requirements of the annual assessment work on mining claims during the year 1917 and 1918.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 372. Joint resolution to amend Senate joint resolution numbered 78, approved October 5, 1917, entitled, "Joint resolution to suspend requirements of the annual assessment work on mining claims during the years 1917 and 1918."

The Speaker announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4924. An act to amend section 336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the annual report on the statistics of commerce and navigation of the United States with foreign countries.

S. 3299. An act authorizing the President to reappoint Maj. Chalmers G. Hall, retired, to the active list of the Army.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—ADJOURNMENTS OVER.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday, and that when it adjourns on Friday it adjourn to meet on Monday following, and that when we adjourn on that Monday we adjourn to meet Thursday, January 2.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet next Friday, and that when it adjourns on Friday it adjourn to meet Monday thereafter, and when it adjourns Monday it adjourn to meet on Thursday thereafter.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to add another item: With the understanding that no business shall be transacted except the filing of reports by committees of the House and sending the revenue bill to conference.

Mr. MADDEN. I object to the revenue bill going to conference until we have a definite understanding about what is in it and have an opportunity to read it. It may be that we may want an independent vote on some of the items.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not asking to have it sent to conference.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am not asking that now.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, I suppose, means by filing reports that the Committee on Appropriations will have the opportunity to report bills.

Mr. KITCHIN. I mean these reports that will be required to be presented to the full House.

Mr. MANN. As to the revenue bill, does the gentleman know when that is likely to be over, whether it is likely to be over from the Senate to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it will not come over to-day. I have inquired about that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will expect it, then, probably, on Friday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. My intention then is to ask unanimous consent to send the bill to conference on Friday.

Mr. MANN. I asked the gentleman that question so that Members may know on what day the gentleman will probably make his request.

Mr. SIMS. Before the revenue bill is sent to conference we will have to disagree to the Senate amendments. Suppose we want to concur in some of the Senate amendments?

Mr. MANN. The request, of course, will be by unanimous consent. An objection would carry it over until after New Year's Day.

Mr. SIMS. An objection would send it to the committee.

Mr. MANN. In any event it will be after New Year's. It could not be called up for action in the House under the request of the gentleman, but by unanimous consent on Thursday, after New Year's Day.

Mr. KITCHIN. It will only be done if there is a full House.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if there is a certainty when that conference report comes up that there will be an opportunity for the House to vote upon the child labor amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. If there is a person in the House who demands it, of course I imagine that the gentleman could object to it going to conference unless I should agree that it would not be brought back to the House without giving the House an opportunity to have that right.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the object of adjourning over from Monday to Thursday of next week? The Members will all be back, will they not?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is based on the idea that the Senate will not transact business until then and the appropriation bills will not be ready.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina makes an addendum to his unanimous consent request, that no business will be transacted pending these three-day recesses, except that committees will be permitted to file reports, such committees as make direct reports from the floor. Is there objection?

Mr. McFADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that I want to ask uanimous consent for five minutes' time.

Mr. KITCHIN. My request is that when we adjourn to-day it shall be to meet on certain days, and that nothing will be transacted on those days. That does not shut off anybody this morning from asking unanimous consent for anything.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was not in the Chamber when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] made his request. Was there included in the motion, or request, any reference to the conference report on the revenue bill?

The SPEAKER. There was some talk about it on the floor, but there was not any request made about it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The request was that no business should be transacted except the filing of reports of committees of the House and taking up the question of sending the revenue bill to conference.

Mr. MANN. And the right to ask unanimous consent to send it to conference.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will have to do that at the time, but no other unanimous consent request will be considered on those days except that and the filing of reports—the business connected with the filing of reports.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When that conference report comes up I hope an opportunity will be afforded to the House to vote upon the child-labor amendment.

The SPEAKER. That request has not come over yet. The Chair will see that the agreement is carried out.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, if I have the floor——

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption for one moment?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know upon what subject the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to speak.

Mr. McFADDEN. On the subject of the proposed investigation of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance.

Mr. WINGO. I think the gentleman had better wait, others wish to be heard—better wait until after Christmas, then——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. I object, for the present.

Mr. McFADDEN. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Arkansas withdraws the point of no quorum.

Mr. BAER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and two Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a short statement.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, if the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his point of no quorum, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. It is too late; it can not be done. There are 102 Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, pending the announcement of the call I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not ask unanimous consent but he can go on and make his statement.

Mr. SMALL. I want to say that if this roll call shall develop that there is no quorum present I will move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the river and harbor bill, on January 2, which I assume will be the earliest date that I can do that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that there will be no quorum present on that date.

Mr. SMALL. I will make the motion at that time and I do not think there will be any objection.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 185 Members have answered to their names, not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.), the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Friday, December 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to as follows:

Doc. No. 1614); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Department of Commerce for the reclamation of waste materials, fiscal year 1920 (H. SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 26, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee in the name of the Prince of Peace. We come to worship Thee under the sense of our infinite debt of gratitude for Thine unspeakable gift. We bless Thee that at last the world has laid down its arms for the profound peace that for once in the centuries has wrapped the life of the world. We thank Thee that not only have men come to recognize the rights of men, but that there are supreme in the world to-day the ideals of Jesus, the Prince of Peace. We bless Thee that those who make peace are being guided by the spirit of Christ, and we pray that there shall not only be established a peace of righteousness and justice, but one of personal devotion to Him that leads the world to peace and to God.

Grant us Thy blessing to-day. Guide us in the discharge of the duties that are upon us, that with unity of purpose and with personal devotion to the Savior of men we may so perform our duties as that there may be established now and forever the reign of the Prince of Peace among men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 203) requesting the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the International Peace Conference to present to the said conference the right of Ireland to freedom, independence, and self-determination was read twice by its title and referred to the Committiee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United State of America representing the United States at the International Peace Conference soon to assemble at Versailles, be, and are hereby, requested to present to and to urge upon the said International Peace Conference the right to freedom, independence, and self-determination of Ireland, predicated upon the principle laid down by the President in his plea for an international league that "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONFERENCE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday of next week, the 3d of January, I shall address the Senate upon some of the problems which the peace congress will soon encounter.

RIGHTS OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that Congress will not be engaged in legislation until after the holidays, I will take occasion to make some observations so as not to interfere with legislative work next week. I give notice, therefore, that when the Senate convenes on Monday next, and with its permission, I shall make some remarks with reference to our returning soldiers and to those at home in the cantonments and other places, and also as to the treatment which they are entitled to receive at the hands of the Government.

HOUSING SITUATION AT SEATTLE, WASH.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have here an address in the nature of a report from the chairman of the United States Fair Rentals Commission in Seattle, Wash., acting under the Emergency Fleet Corporation. This report or address gives some very interesting information as to the proceedings of the commission and the manner in which it carried on its work. There are, I think, some very valuable suggestions in it as to how we can best meet the housing and rental situation in our cities, especially if we should be confronted with a situation in the future such as we have had in the past. This commission deals only with the shipping employees and their relations with the landlords of Seattle. In a letter to me, of which I simply desire to read a paragraph, the writer says:

This rental court of ours is unique, in that the court is an investigator, a prosecutor, defender, and judge, also sheriff. It has original and appellate jurisdiction, and is the court of last resort. It has fixed rentals, turned on the gas, the heat, fixed leaky roofs and toilets, put extra covers on shivering tenants, repaired the front porch, listened to all kinds of domestic difficulties, as well as those of landlord and tenant, and indirectly passed upon the desirability of tenants. It has saved to the tenants thousands of dollars, and, of course, it has likewise deprived the grasping landlords of the same thousands.

Mr. President, I ask that this report or address be referred to the Committee on Printing for its consideration as to whether or not, in the judgment of the committee, it is of sufficient importance to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

AFFAIRS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, a letter which is similar to others to which I have called the attention of the Senate relative to our soldiers in Russia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., December 21, 1918.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I take the liberty of calling your attention to the way and in the manner the soldiers' mail is handled; also, secondly, why our boys are not returned from Russia, and beg of you to use all the power at hand as a United States Senator to force an investigation about these two points. I know a little myself about the rules and regulations of United States mail, having read the Postal Guide many times. I was postmaster at Columbia, Tuscola County, Mich., under Postmaster General Payne, when the office was discontinued on account of rural delivery from Unionville office. I have been clerk in the Colling post office, also mail carrier over eight years. I know the way our soldiers' mail is handled is strictly against the rules and regulations of the United States Post Office Department and is rotten. I can prove this to be the fact. I have two sons—Walter R., in Company D, One hundred and second Engineers, in France, and Arthur A., in machine-gun company, Three hundred and thirty-ninth Infantry, Eighty-fifth Division, in north Russia. I will only here mention about Arthur's mail, as that is the most rotten of all. He received his mail as long as he was at Camp Custer nearly as regular as could be expected under the circumstances. When he left Camp Custer for overseas they were at Camp Mills, Long Island, several days in July waiting for a ship. I addressed a letter to him at that place with my return on the envelope, but they left for overseas before the letter reached there. They sent the letter back to me, after holding it over 100 days, written across it in red ink "Deceased," instead of forwarding it to him to London. He wrote from London twice. I wrote to him at London. They returned that letter, after holding it over 100 days, without forwarding it to Russia, also writing across it "Deceased." He wrote a letter on the ship going from London to Russia and twice from Russia; the last letter is dated September 24. He had not received any mail from anyone up to that date since he left Camp Custer last July. I have written four times to him to Russia, also other relatives and many of his young friends. I kept both returned envelopes marked "Deceased."

I am, yours, very respectfully,

J. H. FRANK,
998 Milwaukee Avenue, East Detroit, Mich.

DISCHARGE OF AMERICAN SOLDIERS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I read in this morning's Washington Post an article by Col. Roosevelt relative to the discharge of our soldiers which so accords with my own sentiments, and I think with the sentiments of the people of the United States generally, that I desire to have it inserted in the RECORD, in order that it may be given as wide a circulation, at least, as congressional work and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD can give it. I do not care to have it read, for I understand that probably every Senator here has already read it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to the insertion in the RECORD of the article referred to by the Senator from Michigan, but I am not prepared to concede that it represents the sentiments of the majority of the American people.

Mr. Roosevelt was inconsolable until our troops were sent to France, and he is now inconsolable because they are not immediately returned, nothwithstanding the fact that a state of war still exists.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the printing of the article referred to? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

THEODORE ROOSEVELT SAYS ARMY SHOULD NOT HOLD MEN IN PEACE—BRING SOLDIERS HOME WHEN JOB IS FINISHED, HE URGES—NO EXCUSE FOR OVER THREE DAYS' DELAY IN PAYING TROOPS, HE DECLARES.

KANSAS CITY, MO., December 25.

The current issue of the Kansas City Star prints the following:

"A SQUARE DEAL FOR THE MAN AT THE FRONT.

[By Theodore Roosevelt.]

"We should show our respect for the men at the front by more than mere adulation. They are the Americans who have done most and suffered most for this country. It was announced in the press that in many cases they and the families they have left behind have not for months received their full pay. This is an outrage. All civil officials are paid. The Secretary of War is paid, and he ought not to touch a dollar of his salary and no high official should touch a dollar of his salary until the enlisted men and junior officers are paid every cent that is owing to them. And this payment should be prompt. There is literally no excuse for even so much as three days' delay in the payment.

"HAVE MADE SACRIFICES.

"Moreover, these men, at great cost to themselves, in paying everything, including in 50,000 or 60,000 cases their lives, have gone to the front at a wage from one-half to one-fifth as great as that their companions who stayed behind have received during the same period. They enlisted to do a specific job. They made the sacrifice in order to do that job. We on our side should see that just as soon as the job is done the men are taken home, allowed to leave the Army, and begin earning their livelihood and take care of the wives and children that married ones among them have left behind.

"Recently in the public press there have appeared various articles and chatty statements from the State, War, and Navy Departments that our men might be kept in Europe to do general police work and might not be brought back here until the summer of 1920. There are three types of soldiers on the other side—there are the Regular Army men, who have entered the Regular Army as a profession and to whom it is a matter of indifference whether they stay in Europe, come back here, go to the Philippines, or do anything else.

"NO THOUGHT OF POLICE WORK.

"That is a small proportion of our forces on the other side; the bulk are divided between volunteers, who enlisted in the National Guard or sometimes in the Regular regiments to fight this war through, and the drafted men, who were put into the Army under a law designed to meet this war, and this war only. Not one in ten of the volunteers would have dreamed of volunteering to do police work in European squabbles. Not 10 Congressmen would have voted for the draft law if it was to force selective men to do police duty after the war was over. All these men went in to fight this war through to a finish and then to come home.

"It is not a square deal to follow any other course as regards them. The minute that peace comes every American soldier on the other side should be brought home as speedily as possible, save, of course, the Regulars, who make the Regular Army their life profession, and any other man who chose to volunteer to go over or who can with entire propriety be used for gathering up the loose ends.

"GIVE HIM SQUARE DEAL.

"The American fighting man at the front has given this country a square deal during the war. Now let the country give him a square deal by letting him get out of the Army and go to his home as soon as the war is finished. The Red Cross has done wonderful work in taking care of the dependents of these men pending settlement by the Government, but the Government should not be content to rely on any outside organization to make up its own shortcomings."

PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS TO SOLDIERS IN FRANCE.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD the address of the President of the United States delivered to the soldiers in France, which is printed in the Washington Post of this morning.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Gen. Pershing and fellow comrades, I wish that I could give to each one of you the message that I know you are longing to receive from those at home who love you. I can not do that, but I can tell you how everyone has put his heart into it. So you have done your duty, and something more. You have done your duty, and you have done it with a spirit which gave it distinction and glory.

"And now we are to hail the fruits of everything. You conquered, when you came over, what you came over for, and you have done what it was appointed for you to do. I know what you expected of me. Some time ago a gentleman from one of the countries with which we are associated was discussing with me the moral aspects of this war, and I said that if we did not insist upon the high purpose which we have accomplished the end would not be justified.

HIGH PURPOSE ACCOMPLISHED.

"Everybody at home is proud of you and has followed every movement of this great Army with confidence and affection.

"The whole people of the United States are now waiting to welcome you home with an acclaim which probably has never greeted any other army, because our country is like this country, we have been so proud of the stand taken—of the purpose—for which this war was entered by the United States.

"You knew what we expected of you, and you did it. I know what you and the people at home expected of me, and I am happy to say, my fellow countrymen, that I did not find in the hearts of the great leaders with whom it is my privilege now to cooperate any difference of principles or of fundamental purpose.

"It happened that it was the privilege of America to present the chart for peace, and now the process of settlement has been rendered comparatively simple by the fact that all the nations concerned have accepted that chart, and the application of the principles laid down there will be their application.

READY TO MAKE GOOD.

"The world will now know that the nations that fought this war, as well as the soldiers who represented them, are ready to make good, make good not only in the assertion of their own interests, but make good in the establishment of peace upon the permanent foundation of right and of justice.

"Because this is not a war in which the soldiers of the free nations have obeyed masters. You have commanders, but you have no masters. Your very commanders represent you in representing the Nation, of which you constitute so distinguished a part.

"And everybody concerned in the settlement knows that it must be a people's peace, and that nothing must be done in the settlement of the issues of the war which is not as handsome as the great achievements of the armies of the United States and the allies.

ONLY ONE REGRET FELT.

"It is difficult, very difficult, men, in any normal speech like this to show you my real heart. You men probably do not realize with what anxious attention and care we have followed every step you have advanced, and how proud we are that every step was in advance, and not retreat; that every time you set your face any direction, you kept your face in that direction.

"A thrill has gone through my heart, and it has gone through the hearts of every American, with almost every gun that was fired and every stroke that was struck in the gallant fighting that you have done, and there has been only one regret in America, and that was the regret that every man there felt that he was not here in France, too.

HAVE DESERVED TRUST.

"It has been a hard thing to perform the tasks in the United States; it has been a hard thing to take part in directing what you did without coming over and helping you to do it. It has taken a lot of moral courage to stay at home. But we are proud to back you up everywhere that it was possible to back you up. And now I am happy to find what splendid names you have made for yourselves among the civilian population of France as well as among your comrades in the armies of the French, and it is a fine testimony to you men that these people like you and love you and trust you, and the finest part of it all is that you deserve their trust.

"I feel a comradeship with you to-day which is delightful as I look down upon these undisturbed fields and think of the terrible scenes through which you have gone and realize how the quiet of peace, the tranquillity of settled hopes has descended upon us. And while it is hard far away from home confidently to bid you a merry Christmas, I can, I think, confidently promise you a happy New Year, and I can from the bottom of my heart say 'God bless you.'"

FREEDOM OF IRELAND.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a petition for self-determination for Ireland and an address to the President of the United States from the people of Ireland.

There being no objection, the petition and address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PETITION FOR SELF-DETERMINATION FOR IRELAND.

No people must be forced under a sovereignty under which it does not wish to live.—President Wilson.

To the President and Congress of the United States of America:

1. We, the undersigned citizens of the United States, differing in race, religion, and domestic politics, are one in the belief that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." This basic principle of American liberty is nobly championed by our great President. To win self-determination for all peoples this justice-loving Republic entered the world war.

2. The Irish nation is one of the oldest in Europe. Its contribution to civilization in the centuries of its independence is highly esteemed by all who read history.

Ireland never surrendered her national rights. The act of union, so called, was passed by a Parliament corrupted by England, in which less than one-fifth of the people of Ireland were represented. Two years before this "union," in 1798, and three years after it, under Robert Emmet, Ireland fought for her national independence, as she did in every century since the English invasion.

The net results of British domination in Ireland are destruction of industries, poverty, and depopulation.

In the last 70 years Ireland's population has been cut in half while England's has almost trebled.

3. Irishmen played a large part in freeing America from foreign rule and in the development of the Republic. In the present conflict over half a million Americans of Irish blood served in our Army and Navy. It is estimated that an equal number of men, born in Ireland (most of them exiled by bad economic conditions at home), enlisted throughout the world. From the Provost Marshal General's report it appears that a larger percentage of alien cobelligerents of Irish than of any other nationality waived exemption in the United States. For example: Ireland, 30.4; England, 22.5. When to these we add the combatants of Irish descent, recruited throughout the British Empire, we approximate a million and a half fighters of Irish blood. These men offered their lives for world freedom, confident that such a freedom would include the mother land of their race. No race now being freed has done more for world liberty in this war than the Irish race.

4. At this supreme moment, when the wrongs of centuries are being righted, a military despotism keeps the voice of Ireland from the ears of the free nations. Irish jails are filled with the best citizens. Many leaders of the people and elected representatives are deported to England and imprisoned without trial or even legal accusation.

5. In the face of these autocratic conditions a conference which met in the Mansion House, Dublin, and had delegates from 80 per cent of the elected representatives of Ireland, unanimously addressed President Wilson June 11, 1918, and urged self-determination for Ireland as "A sovereign principle between a nation that has never abandoned her independent rights and an adjacent nation that has persistently sought to strangle them."

Of the national councils of oppressed peoples that have appealed to our President, none was more clearly representative of the will of its nation than the Mansion House conference, appealing for the Irish nation. Our patriots could muster no such proportion for independence in 1776. Democracy is majority rule. In no nation is unanimity found, yet England maintains for her own purposes the will of 20 per cent as against the will of 80 per cent of the Irish people.

6. England, despite her professed acceptance of the President's principles, has (by Parliament vote Nov. 5, 1918) refused Ireland self-determination.

7. Deeming this an opportune time, as American arms are victorious, we confidently petition the President and Congress to exercise the unique power for justice of the United States to secure for Ireland, equally with Finland, Poland, Bohemia, and Belgium, that self-determination which President Wilson has demanded for all peoples, the form of government to be decided by adult suffrage of the people of Ireland, and representation at the peace conference and in the league of nations.

Let history record that America secured for Ireland that justice which the sons of both nations freely bled to win for all peoples.

Signed by numerous American citizens.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE PEOPLE OF IRELAND.

[It was John Mitchell who said that England won her greatest victory over Ireland when she got control of the ear of the world. She has control of the ear of the world still and, now as always, pours into it whatever poison she can against the Irish people, whom she evidently purposes to destroy. She is constantly ringing the changes upon the atrocities committed against other small nations while very careful to cover up the worse atrocities committed by herself against the small nation that lies at her door. Whatever happens in Ireland will, if England can possibly help it, remain a sealed book, and unless the Irish people everywhere do their duty the real facts relating to Ireland will not be made known.

When it was sought to have a delegation representative of every phase of Irish life come to Washington to present the address adopted by the Mansion House conference to President Wilson England stepped in and prohibited the delegation from coming. The address then had to be presented through the American ambassador at London. The Associated Press and the United Press were careful not to publish this vitally important document, though they printed in full the appeal sent to President Wilson by Sir Edward Carson and his Orange confrères.

Referring to this address from the people of Ireland, the London Nation said: "No such bitter indictment of British policy has been framed for over a hundred years, and no British minister since Castlereagh has come nearer than Mr. George to deserving it. * * * The country which stands for an independent Bohemia governs Ireland by military law."

The address in full is as follows. You do your duty by giving it wide publicity]:

NOTE BY AMERICAN COMMITTEE.

"To the President of the United States:

"SIR: When a century and a half ago the American Colonies dared to assert the ancient principle that the subject should not be taxed without the consent of his representatives England strove to crush them. To-day England threatens to crush the people of Ireland if they do not accept a tax, not in money but in blood, against the protest of their representatives.

"During the American Revolution the champions of your liberties appealed to the Irish Parliament against British aggression and asked for a sympathetic judgment on their action. What the verdict was history records. To-day it is our turn to appeal to the people of America. We seek no more fitting prelude to that appeal than the terms in which your forefathers greeted ours:

"'We are desirous of possessing the good opinion of the virtuous and humane. We are peculiarly desirous of furnishing you with the true state of our motives and objects, the better to enable you to judge of our conduct with accuracy and determine the merits of the controversy with impartiality and precision.'

"If the Irish race had been conscriptable by England in the war against the United Colonies, is it certain that your Republic would to-day flourish in the enjoyment of its noble Constitution?

"Since then the Irish Parliament has been destroyed by methods described by the greatest of British statesmen as those of 'blackguardism and baseness.' Ireland deprived of its protection and overborne by more than six to one in the British lower house, and by more than a hundred to one in the upper house, is summoned by England to submit to a hitherto unheard of decree against her liberties.

"In the fourth year of a war, ostensibly begun for the defense of small nations, a law conscripting the manhood of Ireland has been passed in defiance of the wishes of our people. The British Parliament which enacted it had long outrun its course, being in the eighth year of an existence constitutionally limited to five. To warrant the coercive statute no recourse was had to the electorate of Britain, much less to that of Ireland. Yet the measure was forced through within a week, despite the votes of Irish representatives, and under a system of closure never applied to the debates which established conscription for Great Britain on a milder basis.

"CONSCRIPTION RAISES A SOVEREIGN PRINCIPLE.

"To repel the calumnies invented to becloud our action we venture to address the successors of the belligerents who once appealed to Ireland.

"The feelings which inspire America deeply concern our race; so, in the forefront of our remonstrance, we feel bound to set forth that this conscription act involves for Irishmen questions far larger than any affecting mere internal politics. They raise a sovereign principle between a nation that has never abandoned her independent rights and an adjacent nation that has persistently sought to strangle them.

"Were Ireland to surrender that principle she must submit to usurped power, condone the fraudulent prostration of her parliament in 1800, and abandon all claim to distinct nationality. Deep-seated and far-reaching are the problems remorsely aroused by the unthinking and violent courses taken at Westminster.

"Thus the sudden and unlooked-for departure of British politicians from their past military procedure toward this island provokes acutely the fundamental issue of self-determination. That issue will decide whether our whole economic, social, and political life must lie at the uncontrolled disposition of another race whose title to legislate for us rests on force and fraud alone.

"IRELAND IS AN ANCIENT NATION.

"Ireland is a nation more ancient than England, and is one of the oldest in Christendom. Its geographical boundaries are clearly defined. It cherishes its own traditions, history, language, music, and culture. It throbs with a national consciousness sharpened not only by religious persecution but by the violation of its territorial, juristic, and legislative rights. The authority of which its invaders boasted rests solely on an alleged papal bull. The symbols of attempted conquest are roofless castles, ruined abbeys, and confiscated cathedrals.

"The title of King of Ireland was first conferred on the English monarch by a statute of the parliament held in Ireland in 1542, when only four of our counties lay under English sway. That title originated in no English enactment. Neither did the Irish parliament so originate. Every military aid granted by that parliament to English kings was purely voluntary.

"Even when the penal code denied representation to the majority of the Irish population military service was never enforced against them.

"For generations England claimed control over both legislative and judicial functions in Ireland, but in 1783 these pretensions were altogether renounced and the sovereignty of the Irish legislature was solemnly recognized. A memorable British statute declared it 'established and ascertained forever, and shall at no time hereafter be questioned or questionable.'

"For this the spirit evoked by the successful revolt of the United States of America is to be thanked, and Ireland won no mean return for the sympathy invited by your Congress. Yet scarcely had George III signed his royal assent to that 'scrap of paper' when his ministers began to debauch the Irish parliament. No Catholic had for over a century been allowed to sit within its walls, and only a handful of the population enjoyed the franchise. In 1800, by shameless bribery, a majority of corrupt colonists was procured to embrace the London subjugation and vote away the existence of their legislature for pensions, pelf, and titles.

"The authors of the act of union, however, sought to soften its shackles by limiting the future jurisdiction of the British Parliament. Imposed on 'a reluctant and protesting nation,' it was tempered by articles guaranteeing Ireland against the coarser and more obvious forms of injustice.

"To guard against undue taxation, 'exemptions and abatements' were stipulated for; but the 'predominant partner' has long since dishonored that part of the contract, and the weaker side has no power to enforce it. No military burdens were provided for, although Britain framed the terms of the treaty to her own liking. That an obligation to yield enforced service was thereby undertaken has never hitherto been asserted.

"We therefore can not neglect to support this protest by citing a main proviso of the treaty of union. Before the destruction of the Irish Parliament no standing army or navy was raised, nor was any contribution made, except by way of gift, to the British Army or Navy. No Irish law for the levying of drafts existed; and such a proposal was deemed unconstitutional. Hence the eighth article of the treaty provides that—

"'All laws in force at the time of the union shall remain as now by law established, subject only to such alterations and regulations from time to time as circumstances may appear to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to require.'

"Where there was no law establishing military service for Ireland, what 'alteration or regulation' respecting such a law can legally bind? Can an enactment such as conscription, affecting the legal and moral rights of an entire people, be described as an 'alteration' or 'regulation' springing from a preexisting law?

"Is the treaty to be construed as Britain pleases, and always to the prejudice of the weaker side?

"IRISHMEN DENIED THE RIGHT TO BEAR ARMS.

"British military statecraft has hitherto rigidly held by a separate tradition for Ireland. The territorial military system, created in 1907 for Great Britain, was not set up in Ireland. The Irish Militia was then actually disbanded, and the war office insisted that no territorial force to replace it should be embodied. Stranger still, the volunteer acts (naval and military) from 1804 to 1900 (some 20 in all) were never extended to Ireland. In 1880, when a conservative House of Commons agreed to tolerate volunteering, the measure was thrown out by the House of Lords on the plea that Irishmen must not be allowed to learn the use of arms.

"For, despite the Bill of Rights, the privilege of free citizens to bear arms in self-defense has been refused to us. The Constitution of America affirms that right as appertaining to the common people, but the men of Ireland are forbidden to bear arms in their own defense. Where, then, lies the basis of the claim that they can be forced to take them up for the defense of others?

"It will suffice to present such considerations in outline without disinterring the details of the past misgovernment of our country. Mr. Gladstone avowed that these were marked by 'every horror and every shame that could disgrace the relations between a strong country and a weak one.'

"After an orgie of martial law, the Scottish general, Abercromby, commander in chief in Ireland, wrote: 'Every crime, every cruelty that could be committed by Cossacks of Calmucks, has been transacted here. * * * The abuses of all kinds I found can scarcely be believed or enumerated.' Lord Holland records that many people 'were sold at so much a head to the Prussians.'

"We shall therefore pass by the story of the destruction of our manufactures, of artificial famines, of the fomentation of uprisings, of a hundred coercion acts, culminating in the perpetual act of repression, obtained by forgery, which graced Queen Victoria's jubilee year in 1887. In our island the suspension of the habeas corpus act, the repression of free speech, gibbetings, shootings, and bayonetings are commonplace events. The effects of forced emigration and famine American generosity has softened; and we do not seek a verdict on the general merits of a system which enjoys the commendation of no foreigner except Albert, prince consort, who declared that the Irish 'were no more worthy of sympathy than the Poles.'

"IRELAND'S APPALLING DECAY.

"It is known to you how our population shrank to its present fallen state. Grants of money for emigration, 'especially of families,' were provided even by the land act of 1881. Previous poor-law acts had stimulated this 'remedy.' So late as 1891 a 'congested district' board was empowered to 'aid emigration,' although millions of Irishmen had in the nineteenth century been evicted from their homes or driven abroad.

"Seventy years ago our population stood at 8,000,000, and, in the normal ratio of increase, it should to-day amount to 16,000,000. Instead it has dwindled to four and a half millions; and it is from this residuum that our manhood between the ages of 18 and 51 is to be delivered up in such measure as the strategists of the English war cabinet may demand.

"To-day, as in the days of George Washington, nearly half the American forces have been furnished from the descendants of our banished race. If England could not during your revolution regard that enrollment with satisfaction, might she not set something now to Ireland's credit from the racial composition of your Army and Navy? No other small nation has been so bereft by law of her children, but in vain for Ireland has the bread of exile been thrown upon the waters.

"Yet while self-determination is refused, we are required by law to bleed to 'make the world safe for democracy'—in every country except our own. Surely this can not be the meaning of America's message to mankind glowing from the pen of her illustrious President.

"In the 750 years during which a stranger sway has blighted Ireland her people have never had occasion to welcome an unselfish or generous deed at the hands of their rulers. Every so-called 'concession' was but the loosening of a fetter. Every benefit sprang from a manipulation of our own money by a foreign treasury, denying us an honest audit of accounts. None was yielded as an act of grace. All were the offspring of constraint, tumult, or political necessity. Reason and argument fell on deaf ears.

"To England the union has brought enhanced wealth, population, power, and importance; to Ireland increased taxation, stunted industries, swollen emigration, and callous officialism.

"Possessing in this land neither moral nor intellectual preeminence, nor any prestige derived from past merit or present esteem, the British Executive claims to restrain our liberties, control our fortunes, and exercise over our people the power of life and death.

"To obstruct the recent home-rule bill it allowed its favorites to defy its parliament without punishment, to import arms from suspect regions with impunity, to threaten 'to break every law' to effectuate their designs, to infect the army with mutiny, and set up a rival executive backed by military array to enforce the rule of a caste against the vast majority of the people. The highest offices of State became the guerdon of the organizers of rebellion, boastful of aid from Germany. To-day they are the pillars of the constitution and the chief instruments of law. The only laurels lacking to the leaders of the mutineers are those transplanted from the field of battle!

"Are we to fight to maintain a system so repugnant, and must Irishmen be content to remain slaves themselves after freedom for distant lands has been purchased by their blood?

"Heretofore in every clime, whenever the weak called for a defender, wherever the flag of liberty was unfurled, that blood freely flowed. Profiting by Irish sympathy with righteous causes, Britain, at the outbreak of the war, attracted to her armies tens of thousands of our youth ere even the Western Hemisphere had awakened to the wail of 'small nations.'

"Irishmen in their chivalrous eagerness laid themselves open to the reproach from some of their brethren of forgetting the woes of their own land, which had suffered from its rulers at one time or another almost every inhumanity for which Germany is impeached. It was hard to bear the taunt that the army they were joining was that which held Ireland in subjection; but fresh bitterness has been added to such reproaches by what has since taken place.

"IRELAND'S REWARD FOR HER SACRIFICE.

"Nevertheless, in the face of persistent discouragements, Irish chivalry remained ardent and aflame in the first years of the war. Tens of thousands of the children of the Gael have perished in the conflict. Their bones bleach upon the soil of Flanders or moulder beneath the waves of Suvla Bay. The slopes of Gallipoli, the sands of Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Juda afford them sepulture. Mons and Ypres provide their monuments. Wherever the battle line extends, from the English Channel to the Persian Gulf, their ghostly voices whisper a response to the roll call of the guardian spirits of liberty. What is their reward?

"The spot on earth they loved best, the land to which they owed their first duty and which they hoped their sacrifices might help to freedom lies unredeemed under an age-long thraldom. So, too, would it forever lie were every man and every youth within the shores of Ireland to immolate himself in England's service, unless the clamor of a dominant caste be rebuked and stilled.

"Yet proof after proof accumulates that British cabinets continue to be toward our country as conscienceless as ever. They deceive friendly nations throughout the world as to their Irish policy, while withholding from us even the act of home rule, which in 1914 was placed on the statute book. The recent 'convention' which they composed to initiate reform was brought to confusion by a letter from the prime minister diminishing his original engagements.

"Such insincere maneuvers have left an indelible sense of wrong rankling in the heart of Ireland.

"Capitulations are observed with French Canadians, with the Maltese, with Hindoos, with the Mohammedan Arabs of the African Boers, but never has the word of England in any capital case been kept toward the 'sister' island.

"The Parliaments of Australia and of South Africa, both of which (unlike our ancient legislature) were founded by British enactments, refused to adopt conscription. This was well known when the law against Ireland was resolved on. For opposing the application of that law to Irishmen, and while this appeal to you, sir, was being penned, members of our conference have been arrested and deported without trial. It was even sought to poison the wells of American sympathy by leveling against them and others an allegation which its authors have failed to submit to the investigation of any tribunal.

"To overlay malpractice by imputing to its victims perverse or criminal conduct is the stale but never failing device of tyranny.

"IRELAND'S FIGHT THE SAME AS AMERICA'S.

"A claim has also been put forward by the British foreign office to prevent you, Mr. President, as the head of the great allied Republic, from acquiring first-hand information of the reasons why Ireland has rejected and will resist conscription, except in so far as the military governor of Ireland, Field Marshal Lord French, may be pleased to allow you to peruse his version of our opinions.

"America's present conflict with Germany obstructs no argument that we advance. 'Liberty and ordered peace' we, too, strive for, and confidently do we look to you, sir, and to America—whose freedom Irishmen risked something to establish—to lend ear and weight to the prayer that another unprovoked wrong against the defenseless may not stain this sorry century.

"We know that America entered the war because her rights as a neutral, in respect of ocean navigation, were interfered with, and only then. Yet America in her strength had a guarantee that in victory she would not be cheated of that for which she joined in the struggle. Ireland, having no such strength, has no such guarantee, and experience has taught us that justice (much less gratitude) is not to be wrung from a hostile Government. What Ireland is to give a free Ireland must determine.

"We are sadly aware, from recent proclamations and deportations, of the efforts of British authorities to inflame prejudice against our country. We, therefore, crave allowance briefly to notice the insinuation that the Irish coasts, with native connivance, could be made a base for the destruction of American shipping. An official statement asserts that:

"'An important feature in every plan was the establishment of submarine bases in Ireland to menace the shipping of all nations.'

"On this it is enough to say that every creek, inlet, or estuary that indents our shores, and every harbor, mole, or jetty, is watchfully patrolled by British authority. Moreover, Irish vessels, with their cargoes, crews, and passengers, have suffered in this war proportionately to those of Britain.

"Another State paper palliates the deportations by blazoning the descent of a solitary invader upon a remote island on April 12, heralded by mysterious warnings from the Admiralty to the Irish command. No discussion is permitted of the tryst of this British soldier with the local coast guards or his speedy bent toward a police barrack and his subsequent confidences with the London authorities.

"Only one instance exists in history of a project to profane our coasts by making them a base to launch attacks on international shipping. That plot was framed not by native wickedness, but by an English viceroy, and the proofs are piled up under his hand in British state papers. For huge bribes were proffered by Lord Falkland, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to both the royal secretary and the Prince of Wales to obtain consent for the use of Irish harbors to convenience Turkish and Algerine pirates in raiding seagoing commerce.

"The plot is old, but the plea of 'increasing his majesty's revenues' by which it was commended is everlasting. Nor will age lessen its significance for the citizens of that Republic which, amidst the tremors and greed of European diplomacy, extirpated the traffic of Algerine corsairs 90 years ago. British experts cherish Lord Falkland's fame as the sire of their most knightly cavalier, and in their eyes its luster shines undimmed, though His Excellency, foiled of marine booty, enriched himself by seizing the lands of his untried prisoners in Dublin Castle.

"ENGLAND'S SLANDERS.

"Moving are other retrospects evoked by the present outbreak of malignity against our nation. The slanders of the hour recall those let loose to cloak previous deportations in days of panic less ignoble. Then it was the primate of all Ireland, Archbishop Oliver Plunkett, who was dragged to London and arraigned for high treason. Poignant memories quicken at every incident which accompanied his degradation before the lord chief justice of England.

"A troop of witnesses was suborned to swear that his grace 'endeavored and compassed the King's death,' sought to 'levy war in Ireland and introduce a foreign power,' and conspired 'to take a view of all the several ports and places in Ireland where it would be convenient to land from France.' An open trial, indeed, was not denied him, but with hasty rites he was branded a base and false traitor and doomed to be hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn. That desperate felon, after prolonged investigations by the Holy See, has lately been declared a martyr worthy of universal veneration.

"The fathers of the American Revolution were likewise pursued in turn by the venom of governments. Could they have been snatched from their homes and haled to London what fate would have befallen them? There your noblest patriots might also have perished amidst scenes of shame and their effigies would now bedeck a British chamber or horrors. Nor would death itself have shielded their reputations from the hatchments of dishonor. For the greatest of Englishmen reviled even the sacred name of Joan of Arc, the stainless maid of France, to belittle a fallen foe and spice a ribald stage play.

"It is hardly 30 years since every Irish leader was made the victim of a special statute of proscription and was cited to answer vague charges before London judges. During 1888 and 1889 a malignant and unprecedented inquisition was maintained to vilify them, backed by all the resources of British power. No war then raged to breed alarms, yet no weapon that perjury or forgery could fashion was left unemployed to destroy the characters of more than 80 national representatives, some of whom survive to join in this address. That plot came to an end amidst the confusion of their persecutors, but fresh accusations may as easily be contrived and buttressed by the enginery of state.

"HOPE IN PRESIDENT WILSON.

"In every generation the Irish Nation is challenged to plead to a new indictment, and to the present summons answer is made before no narrow forum, but to the tribunal of the world. So answering, we commit our cause, as did America, to 'the virtuous and humane,' and also more humbly to the providence of God.

"Well assured are we that you, Mr. President, whose exhortations have inspired the small nations of the world with fortitude to defend to the last their liberties against oppressors, will not be found among those who would condemn Ireland for a determination which is irrevocable, to continue steadfastly in the course mapped out for her, no matter what the odds, by an unexampled unity of national judgment and national right.

"Given at the Mansion House, Dublin, this 11th day of June, 1918.

"LAURENCE O'NEILL.

"Lord mayor of Dublin, chairman of a conference of representative Irishmen whose names stand hereunder:

"Joseph Devlin; John Dillon; Michael Egan; Thomas Johnson; William O'Brien (Labor); T. M. Healy; William O'Brien; Thomas Kelly, John MacNeill, acting in the place of E. De Valera; and A. Griffith, deported May 18, 1918, to separate prisons in England, without trial or accusation—communication with whom has been cut off."

LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have substituted for House bill 79 Senate bill 4554, and to have the House bill considered at once. Senate bill 4554 was reported from the Committee on Public Lands on May 23, and it passed the Senate without any objection. It is a bill to extend the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act of March 28, 1917, relating to the sale of isolated tracts of the public domain to the State of Minnesota, and to make it applicable to the land ceded by the Chippewa Indians. The Committee on Public Lands considered the bill, reported it to the Senate, and it was passed by the Senate.

In the other House a like bill was introduced and reported by the committee, and was passed on October 2. Instead of passing the Senate bill the House passed a separate bill for the same object. I ask to have the House bill substituted for the Senate bill, and then that the House bill may be considered and passed at this time.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if this bill has been before the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think it has been before the Committee on Indian Affairs, but the Secretary of the Interior considered the whole subject and asked both the Senate and the House to pass the bill, and his report is in the RECORD.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understood the Senator, this bill has reference to some ceded Indian lands. Am I right about that?

Mr. KELLOGG. It has reference to the sale of certain ceded Chippewa Indian lands in the State of Minnesota. It simply makes applicable to those lands the provisions of the statute for the sale of isolated tracts of land, as recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, who has charge of Indian affairs.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that that has been a mooted question for some time, and I think it is of very great importance. While I do not wish to delay the matter, I should like to have an opportunity to look the bill over before it is called up for passage.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to that whatever. I think the Senator will find, however, that it has been approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and that there is no objection to it.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator that there have been many measures approved by the commissioner which were not approved by the Indians.

Mr. KELLOGG. This bill does not provide for the sale of lands generally; it simply provides for the sale of certain isolated tracts of land, provision for the sale of the Chippewa lands having been made long ago.

Mr. GRONNA. Nevertheless, it does indirectly affect some of the old tracts of ceded Indian lands.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; it does.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I dislike to object to the request of the Senator from Minnesota, but there was an understanding on the part of most Senators, at least—I do not know whether the Senator from Minnesota understood it or not—amounting more or less to an agreement, that no legislative action of any kind should be taken until the 2d of January. I do not know what effect would be had by substituting the House bill for the Senate bill, but I was informed that such an agreement as that to which I have referred was made, and I told some Senators that I would be here to see that it was executed, unless there was a quorum present. I feel that I ought, therefore, to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the understanding referred to, and I am sure he will not insist that action be taken upon the bill to-day.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly not. I was not, however, aware of the agreement referred to.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS FOR PEACE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to ask to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, a portion of an editorial appearing in the Christian Register of December 19, 1918, dealing with the subject of the league of nations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

(3) To further in all ways we can the league of the nations—that is the duty supreme of this hour. Never before in history has there been such an opportunity to organize peace as this Christmas has brought. We have wished peace and dreamed it and carolled it and preached it and prophesied it for hundreds of years; to-day it is ours for the organizing. But the all-essential prerequisite of organized peace is the league of the nations—in some form or other, the league of the nations. Such peace never will come until the league comes, and when it comes it will be based on the league. There are but two alternatives possible—competitive armament looking to new war possibilities or cooperative disarmament predicated on a league of the nations. The former means return to the old prewar perils and anarchies; the latter means advance toward new world stabilities. The only way in which to collect full indemnity for the dire costs of the war is in terms of the juster, happier new-world life to be secured by an international league, and it will be our fault if we fail to collect it. The difficulties in forming the league may be immense; they can not be as great as the disaster of not forming it. Nor are they so immense as they seem if the three greater powers now in friendly alliance, with five or six smaller ones glad to accede, lay self aside and will to have it. That it will be at once a perfect instrument of peace, with "guns never more," we are not to expect. Is any good instrument perfected as yet? Is democracy? Yet those men who spent the four summer months of 1787 in Philadelphia framing the Constitution of the United States did something that, in spite of the danger-breeding "compromises" left in it, pushed the world onward a long way toward organized liberty. The men assembling in Paris to-day to organize the world peace are better equipped for their task than the fathers for theirs, know better what is needed than they did, and, if backed by public opinion at home, are at least as likely to achieve a success. "If backed by public opinion at home"—it is our part to form this public opinion and back their highest and bravest endeavor. If we solidly believe in the league, what probable need for compulsory military training in our schools? What need of the new three years' expansion of our Navy, for which Secretary Daniels is pressing? What need of Britannia's ruling the waves with old-time supremacy lest Britons should ever be slaves? The league's success will preclude the necessity of these things. Why not transfer all our wisdom and energy to making the league and wait a bit? It is said that some chambers of commerce are cold to the plan. If that be true, let them hear from the unchambered people in unmistakable words. Are there papers trying to thwart it? Confront them and shame them in conventions and mass meetings. Whoso is cold to the idea of the league loves not his race, nor his country, nor his own children who are to live on the earth after him, nor even himself. Whoso opposes the idea is either carelessly or deliberately voting "more guns."

WAR EXPENDITURES—THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Taking up another matter, Mr. President, I wish also to have inserted in the RECORD a short editorial from the Tampa Morning Tribune of December 21, 1918, entitled "Where the Money Went." If that is done, I propose——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. What is the title of the article?

Mr. FLETCHER. "Where the Money Went."

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It relates to what subject matter?

Mr. FLETCHER. It relates to the claim or charge that has been made in some instances that there has been favoritism to the South shown by the Government in the matter of governmental activities; and this editorial, as it will appear, undertakes to show that, with reference to expenditures made by the Quartermaster's Department, only about 7 per cent of those expenditures have gone to that portion of the country commonly called "the South."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator does not believe that that is correct, does he?

Mr. FLETCHER. I presume that that is correct. I have no information to the contrary.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure that, if the Senator will take the figures of the various departments, he will find that the editorial is not correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. The editorial will speak for itself; and I think the figures given in the editorial are taken from the department reports; it only has reference to the Quartermaster's Department. I undertake to say that, if we would consider all the expenditures made by all of the departments, a much less per cent of those expenditures will be found to have been made in the South. For instance, as to the report of the Ordnance Department, which shows contracts to an amount approximating $10,000,000,000, I am quite sure that of those contracts not over 5 per cent went to the South; and I am also sure of another thing, and that is that one concern in the State of Pennsylvania has more Government contracts than have been awarded to all of the South for all purposes. I have before me now the report of the United States Shipping Board, recently submitted to Congress, which deals with the matter of housing projects, and according to that report, for illustration, the commitments are: Newport News, Va., $4,850,000; Sparrows Point, Md., $4,500,000; Jacksonville, Fla., $650,000; Savannah, Ga., $350,000; Quantico, Va., $30,000; making a total of $10,385,000 committed to expenditures on these housing projects in the South. From and including the State of Maryland, embracing the entire Atlantic coast south of Baltimore and also the Gulf coast, the total is $10,385,000.

The report further shows that these other commitments are as follows: Hog Island, Pa., $10,031,000; Chester, Pa., $6,560,000; Bristol, Pa., $5,210,000; Essington, Pa., $1,220,000; Cornwall Heights, Pa., $8,800.

Making a total for Pennsylvania alone of $23,029,800, or more than twice the amount of the appropriations covering the whole South, including the Atlantic coast from Baltimore to Key West and the entire Gulf coast combined, placed in the one State of Pennsylvania.

The other housing commitments under the appropriation of $75,000,000, of which commitments have been made amounting to $58,635,300, as shown by the report, are as follows: Camden, N. J. (New York Shipbuilding Co.), $10,870,000; Gloucester, N. J., $2,470,000.

A total in New Jersey of $13,340,000, or $3,000,000 more in the State of New Jersey than in all the States south of Delaware.

The others are as follows: Portsmouth, N. H., $1,900,000; Lorain, Ohio, $1,260,000; Bath, Me., $750,000; Wilmington, Del., $3,000,000; Port Jefferson, Long Island, $300,000; Vancouver, Wash., $850,000; Wyandotte, Mich., $385,000; Manitowoc, Wis., $500,000; Groton, Conn., $1,200,000; Newburgh, N. Y., $900,000; Clyde, Cal., $750,000.

The housing at Groton, N. Y., is to accommodate 336 men, at a cost of $1,380,000, whereas the housing at Jacksonville, Fla., for instance, is to accommodate 316 men, at a cost of $747,500—a little over one-half as much. The housing at Bristol, Pa., is to cost $5,991,500 and accommodates only 650 men.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. What did these 336 men do who had to be accommodated in New York by $1,380,000 worth of housing?

Mr. FLETCHER. They work in shipyards.

Mr. KIRBY. Three hundred and thirty-six men are all that are accommodated?

Mr. FLETCHER. Three hundred and thirty-six men working in shipyards.

Mr. KIRBY. Do they board them at the Waldorf-Astoria, or something like that?

Mr. FLETCHER. This appropriation of $75,000,000 was to provide houses to accommodate the workmen in the shipyards wherever needed, in order that the building of ships might go forward. In some places labor could be had, but there was no place to put the workers, and houses had to be built for them to live in.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The number of men and the amount of money expended for houses seem to me to be altogether disproportionate. The cost per man must be ten or twelve thousand dollars.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course it means that the houses are much more expensive at Bristol, Pa., for instance, than they are in Jacksonville, Fla.

Mr. THOMAS. Why do they need such palatial structures for the accommodation of these men at Government expense?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is a fair question.

Mr. THOMAS. They should be comfortably sheltered, of course; but it seems to me that that is an exhibition of luxurious extravagance which no conditions would justify, when it is considered that the cost comes from the public purse.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course I am not now attempting to go into details with reference to these plans, purposes, and means. I am simply citing these figures by way of comparison, to show that the activities of the Government and these large expenditures for the Government are not going to the South.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will.

Mr. KING. It is not quite germane to what the Senator is inviting attention to, but I was curious to know whether or not, in view of the changed conditions, there was any interruption in the building program or whether the Emergency Fleet Corporation was still expending these large sums for the purpose of carrying out these projects?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think they have discontinued the new projects. They are simply going on with the contracts to which they are already committed in these instances. I think perhaps they have reduced or limited construction in some of these cases; but out of the total appropriation of $75,000,000 their commitments amount to $58,635,300, as shown by the report.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, my information was that in the case of a number of those commitments only a very small amount had been expended—less than 25 per cent in some instances, and considerably less than 50 per cent, between that and 25 per cent, in other instances—and I was wondering whether, in those cases where the amount expended on the project was inconsiderable, the purpose was to continue and complete the project?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think the purpose is to continue where the amount expended is comparatively small; but in all the instances named in the report I think the projects are pretty well completed. For instance, the project at Bristol, Pa., is practically finished. That is to cost $5,991,500. This project will accommodate a little over twice as many men as the Jacksonville project, but will cost nine times as much. Out of the entire appropriation for this housing purpose not a dollar is expended on the entire Gulf coast, from Key West to the Rio Grande.

I simply mention that by way of further corroborating the statement in the editorial that it is wholly unwarranted to claim that the expenditures for governmental activities have been made in a discriminatory way in favor of the South; and for the present that is all I desire to say on that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing in the RECORD the editorial referred to by the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Tampa Morning Tribune, Dec. 21, 1918.]

WHERE THE MONEY WENT.

Now that the war is over and the need for camps gone, and they are being demolished, it is interesting to see just how the money spent for their building and maintenance was divided over the country.

We have heard so much from certain rabid Republican sources about the "little handful of Southern Congressmen and Senators" grabbing off all the good things in the way of war activities that we are pleased to find one southern paper which comes forth with a table showing "where the money went."

Under the above heading the Mobile Register tells us:

"Many of the training camps were located in the South for climatic reasons, but there were not wanting critics to complain that the South was unduly favored—'all that money being spent in the South!' The South, however, got but a taste of the money, as is shown by the reports of the Quartermaster General's office. The purchases for the Government in the period July 26, 1918, to October 26, 1918, can be taken for illustration. For the eastern division, as far as and including Maryland, the total is $232,000,000; for the Western States, $201,000,000; for the Southern States, $35,000,000; and for the Mountain and Pacific States, $12,000,000. This gives the lion's share, or 47 per cent, to the East and 41 per cent to the West. The South's portion, a little over 7 per cent. This should dispose of the charge that the South has been unduly favored."

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire at this time to take up another subject; I ask to have printed in the RECORD a communication from the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, together with resolutions of that board, on the subject of suggested amendments to the navigation laws of the United States, and particularly with reference to certain amendments proposed to the seamen's act, and on that subject I desire to submit a few observations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION,
New York, December 17, 1918.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Senate Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to transmit herewith attested copy of resolution and report relating to suggested amendments of the La Follette or so-called seamen's act, which resolution and report were unanimously adopted by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation at its meeting on Wednesday last.

This board hopes that the amendments suggested will have your approval and support, because under the existing provisions of the law the large expenditures of the Government for the building of merchant ships will not alone suffice to establish our merchant marine on the ocean in the foreign trade, but will prove futile and a serious loss to the Government as well if we fail to embrace the opportunity which now is offered to the United States to greatly enlarge our overseas commerce in American bottoms.

Very respectfully,

FRANK S. GARDNER,
Secretary.

THE NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION,
New York City.

At the monthly meeting of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation held this day, Wednesday, December 11, 1918, Hon. Frank C. Munson, chairman of the committee on maritime affairs, submitted and read the following preamble and resolution, which, with the report submitted November 13, 1918, and hereto attached, were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas there are certain objectionable features in the so-called seamen's law now in force, as set forth in the report hereto attached, which are detrimental to the development of the American merchant marine, and that so long as this law continues in force it will tend to handicap and prevent the proper development of the American merchant marine: Be it hereby

"Resolved, That the New York Board of Trade and Transportation recommends to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce and the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries that the objectionable features in this old law be repealed at the earliest possible date in the interests of the great merchant marine which is now being built."

LA FOLLETTE SEAMEN'S ACT.

[Report by Hon. Frank C. Munson, chairman of the committee on maritime affairs. Submitted Nov. 13, 1918. Ordered printed and referred to the meeting of the board to be held Dec. 11, 1918, for consideration.]

To the NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION:

The following are clauses in the La Follette seamen's act which should be modified or repealed:

The clause stating that 75 per cent of the crew in each department shall understand any order the officers may give. This prevents American ships from carrying 75 per cent foreigners who do not understand the English language. It is intended to prevent the carrying of Chinese on American ships to meet the competition of the Japanese, but it gives them carte blanche to carry Japanese crews with Japanese officers, hence the reason that the Japanese to-day have full control of the commerce of the Pacific Ocean.

Another clause provides that 50 per cent of the crew, exclusive of officers and apprentices, shall be able seamen. This part of the law was so impossible and unreasonable, because they could not be obtained, that no notice has been taken of it during war time. With peace now, however, it will be enforced, thereby tying up part of our new merchant marine.

The collector of customs may, on his own motion, and shall upon the sworn information of any reputable citizen deny clearance and hold the ship until an investigation is made. So any water-front sorehead can hold up any ship. This was so drastic and vicious that it also has not been enforced, but it is the law nevertheless.

The clause providing that the seamen can demand and receive half of the wages he has earned (note the word "earned," not due, as it should be) at every port the ship goes to, and every five days he can make another demand. The police records of various ports where American ships have gone bear ample proof of this bad law. The intention of this clause was to allow the men to draw their wages and desert, but it does not always work that way, although it causes serious delay to the ship at almost every port. Cases have arisen of boats running to Mexico and other foreign ports where parts of crews have been paid and deserted and impossible to get fire-room crew, with the result that ships have had to wait in port for crew to be brought by some other ship. This should be repealed with least possible delay.

There is also a clause providing that the sailors shall be divided into two watches. On many ships a big crew is carried and enough men to navigate the ship are put on watch and watch. The balance of the crew sleep all night and work all day, the object being to get the day crew to keep up the ship in good condition. If this section was enforced, we would have to keep a smaller crew and let the keeping up of the ship go, as men can not do any work at night except what is necessary to navigate the ship.

One of the absurdities of the bill was that a cargo steamer 410 feet long, carrying a crew of about 36, had to have 12 sets of davits and 9 lifeboats. On inquiry of the Government if they intended to enforce it, they said no.

The clauses in the bill providing for greater safety of life at sea and having better accommodations for the crew should be retained. The American ships built recently have excellent accommodations and leave nothing more to be desired, and the food served to American crews is much better than those of any other nation; in fact, it is as good as we have in our homes.

FRANK C. MUNSON,
Chairman Committee on Maritime Affairs.

A true copy.

FRANK S. GARDNER, Secretary.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, judging by letters which are coming in and resolutions by chambers of commerce and boards of trade and contributions by shipowners and other writers to periodicals and newspapers there seems to be a movement on foot the purpose of which is to accomplish the repeal of certain provisions of the seamen's act, or certain amendments to that act. The complaint is particularly emphasized with reference to section 13 of the seamen's law. I am quite sure that to a very considerable extent there is no sufficient ground for these criticisms of the act and no justification for many of the claims that are made that the act is burdensome to American shipping.

In the first place, the act was approved March 4, 1915. It never went into effect as to foreign shipping until August, 1916, and some of its provisions have never been put into operation at all. There were three cases involving the constitutionality of the act, or at least certain provisions of the act, which until last Monday rested in the Supreme Court of the United States. There were cases brought that raised questions as to the very provisions of the act about which complaint is made, and it is difficult to see how that act could deter private enterprise, private initiative, from building up an American mercantile marine before the act was ever put into operation. The Supreme Court of the United States on last Monday handed down decisions—I called to get a copy of the opinion, but it will not be printed until Friday or Saturday—the effect of which is to sustain the constitutionality of the law, so that now the law can be put into force and effect in all its material provisions; and I do not believe it will be found to do what the gentlemen who advocate its repeal or its amendment apprehend. It will be found to accomplish, as it has already accomplished in so far as it has been put in force, what the advocates of the measure originally claimed it would accomplish, and that is, the equalization of the cost of operation of American ships and foreign ships coming into our ports. This is especially true in so far as it affects the wages paid to officers and crews on the ships; and the effect will be to raise the standard of other countries to our standard, rather than, as has heretofore been the policy, to lower our standard of wages paid to officers and crews on American ships to the lowest standard of the ports to which those ships might go.

The essentials of sea power are quite important. It will be conceded, of course, that we should build up an American mercantile marine. It will be admitted that we ought now to establish our status on the seas. It will be conceded that we should not lose this great opportunity to take our place as a respectable sea power and maritime nation among all the nations of the world.

Sea power involves, of course, what is commonly referred to as naval power. We ordinarily employ those words when we have in mind a State having a considerable navy and an inconsequential army. In the same way, we use the term "military power" when we think of a State with a considerable army but only a relatively small navy.

I do not intend to discuss that phase of or factor in sea power which is defined as "naval power." I speak of that sea power which is commercial in character, but none the less vital to our well-being, and which in some respects may be regarded as auxiliary to the navy. I have particular reference to that part of our sea power which produces revenue, rather than to that part which consumes revenue.

Capt. Mahan, in his admirable work, describes sea power in its broad sense, as including "not only the military strength afloat that rules the sea, or any part of it, by force of arms, but also the peaceful commerce and shipping from which alone a military fleet naturally and healthfully springs, and on which it securely rests."

I do not care whether you consider it as the foundation or the consummation of naval strength, in its technical sense; it is this element of sea power in its broad sense, a merchant marine, to which I invite your attention.

Generally, let me say at the outset that the supremacy of no nation in the future will depend upon its military strength, its big army. Germany had that. Nor will it depend upon its naval strength, its big navy. England had that; but that alone did not save her. Rather will that supremacy rest largely upon commercial strength. This has been true in great degree heretofore, but it will be more wholly true hereafter. That commercial strength will depend largely upon command of transportation.

That nation which produces a surplus of the prime necessities of life which other nations must have is in a position approaching supreme power. Especially and more fully is that true if such a nation owns and operates the carriers whereby it may take that surplus at will to the markets of the world and bring back the raw materials or the useful commodities it may want. There is no nation on earth which is so favored by nature and by development in this regard as America. No other nation can approach her in these respects if she but put to fruitful use her resources and take advantage of her opportunities.

Fallacies: There are certain fallacies which must be discarded forever.

The first is that we could more profitably turn our attention to internal development than to enterprises involving the use of the seas, and could safely rely upon others to furnish our overseas carriers. Not only is it unsound in policy, but it was a mistake in fact to assume that it was cheaper for us to have our exports and imports transported in foreign bottoms than in the ships of our own citizens.

On account of certain conditions, which I will mention later, it cost somewhat less to operate vessels under foreign flags than under our own. Hence, the deep-rooted notion that we had better hire foreign vessels to carry our goods than to build and use our own.

Plainly shortsighted and unpatriotic, this idea was unsound from a practical, business standpoint. Who ever heard of one merchant relying upon a competitor in trade for the delivery of his goods?

We had all the raw material and facilities for building any kind of ship required. We had the ports, harbors, and terminals. We could more than offset the lower wages of the foreigners by the greater efficiency of Americans. We had the coal, oil, and every means of equipment.

In July, 1914, our people began to realize what some of us had been telling them would sooner or later strike them in the face, namely, their utter dependence upon foreign carriers. Our experiences when German ships were out of commission, British ships commandeered for war purposes, and French and Italian ships unavailable, when freight rates advanced 1,000 per cent, and every industry of the country was made to suffer, should be sufficient to convince any reasonable mind that we can not afford to rely upon foreign ships but must have ships of our own.

The next fallacy is that a direct subsidy is necessary to the building up of an American merchant marine. It is not true that all other maritime nations have been compelled to subsidize their merchant shipping. It is well known that during the past four years vast fortunes have been made by the operation of ships. Excessive rates, unprecedented exactions, made that possible; but in ordinary times and under normal conditions the business was most attractive and profitable without any subsidy. There is no occasion for any subsidy unless the Government undertakes to establish new routes, pioneer in new and expensive ventures which can only compensate for the outlay after the trade is built up, open up new lanes, or form the new connections, depending upon the future for returns. In such instances the Government would be obliged to make allowances—probably furnish ships without charge or something of that sort.

A third fallacy is that our navigation laws hamper and hinder the operation under American registry.

This is an old fiction, brought forth on every occasion to do service for some particular, selfish purpose. When challenged to point out the objectionable laws, the critics usually fall back upon the seamen's act of March 4, 1915.

To be sure, we had no mercantile marine of consequence for the past 50 years, and it is quite difficult to understand how this act has interfered. It would be more to the point to state some law that had been operating all these barren years. This act, it is claimed, is burdensome on the American shipowner because it will mean greater operating expenses than vessels under other flags will have to bear. Just the reverse is true. When enforced it will equalize the cost of operation of American vessels with the vessels of other countries using our ports.

I will refer to that in detail later.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Replying to the suggestion just made by the Senator, Mr. Dollar and other men engaged in shipping on the Pacific coast have repeatedly stated, as I understand, that the seamen's act of March 4, 1915, resulted in driving from the Pacific coast practically all American shipping and compelled the sale to Japanese concerns of at least one, and perhaps more, of the shipping lines that were operated upon the Pacific. What does the Senator say with respect to those contentions?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am somewhat familiar with the position taken by Capt. Dollar. I know Capt. Dollar personally, and have a great deal of respect for him. He is very well advertised as one of the great shipowners of the country, and from the accounts published regarding Capt. Dollar in the magazines and newspapers, one would imagine he owned perhaps the greatest fleet flying the American flag. The fact is, according to my information, that Capt. Dollar owns seven boats, and that the total tonnage of the whole Dollar Line is about 23,000 tons—about one good-sized ship.

In answer to the contention suggested by the Senator, I must say that it is utterly absurd to claim that the seamen's act drove the American flag off of the Pacific, because the act has not been in force with respect to the matters that are objected to in it.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me further, the claim was made, as I remember, that in anticipation of the enforcement of the act many, or at least some, of the ships were sold and some lines went out of business entirely.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the ships were sold because they brought extraordinarily high prices. It was good business to sell them at that time, and it was good business to get others back in their place as soon as possible afterwards, because of the high freight rates; but the claim can not be sustained that the seamen's act proved disastrous to American shipping either on the Pacific or on the Atlantic. The fact is that some of the ships that were sold on the Pacific at enormous prices and at tremendous profit to the owners came right around to the Atlantic and were operated on the Atlantic from this side across the Atlantic, because that was a more profitable field, under the same law precisely that they were operating under on the Pacific. So that is an absurd contention. The act, as I have said before, never went into effect under its very provisions as to foreign ships until July, 1916, and in the matters that are complained of the act has not been in operation at all. The constitutionality of those provisions has been in question, and not until last Monday was that matter settled by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator said that ships were brought around from the Pacific coast to be operated in the Atlantic sea service. Was not the condition on the Atlantic entirely different? There ships were in great demand to be used in the war zone.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. CALDER. While on the Pacific Ocean there was no risk of loss of ships, and there, of course, an entirely different situation prevailed. On the Atlantic coast ships sold for extraordinary prices, but were operated at a profit.

Mr. FLETCHER. They were brought to the Atlantic and engaged in the trans-Atlantic business in a dangerous zone, as the Senator has said, but because the rates were so high that business was more profitable. The ships were operated upon the Atlantic under precisely the same law under which they were operated on the Pacific. My point is, I insist, they were not taken off the Pacific by reason of the seamen's act.

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator will permit me further, I will say that is correct, of course; but during the past two years on the Atlantic coast it made no difference what it cost to operate vessels; they could be operated at a profit——

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. CALDER. Regardless of the seamen's act, because the freight rates were so high. So that the seamen's act did not have any effect on the operation of ships during the continuance of the war.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is correct about that. For that reason I say that the contention is absurd that the seamen's act has driven the ships off the Pacific. I will mention the seamen's act a little more extensively a little later on.

ESSENTIAL.

First. Of course, the first essential to a creditable sea power is ships flying our flag. I take it if we have learned anything from the war, now about over, it is the fact that we must have an American mercantile marine sufficient to carry at least a major per cent of our foreign commerce.

The reasons need not be discussed. There is no need for argument. I assume there is practically unanimity of thought to that effect. There may be a difference of opinion as to how this is to be accomplished. Some contend that private enterprise should both build and operate the ships. Others contend that the Government should build and operate along with and not in a way to discourage private enterprise. Still others insist the Government should build, own, and operate the ocean-going boats engaged in foreign trade, flying our flag, without regard to individual or private interests.

The situation is that for 50 years we waited for private enterprise, and it failed. In 1914 officials of the administration, in and out of Congress, considered that it would be folly to wait longer and caused to be introduced a bill creating a Shipping Board and appropriating $50,000,000 with which to begin the building of an American mercantile marine. This measure was opposed more vigorously than any other proposed, in the Senate at any rate, within a quarter of a century. It was fought with such determination and united forces by our Republican friends that a vote was prevented on it, although it was kept before the Senate almost to the day of final adjournment, March, 1915.

Early after the assembling of the next Congress a similar bill was introduced, and by that time the war had brought an awakening throughout the country, and it was perfectly plain that our commerce was being paralyzed, and we were in the humiliating position of having to beg for ships, and there were none to be had. Accordingly the bill passed Congress, was approved September 7, 1916, and without that legislation we could not have won this war when it was won.

We could not have moved our troops and supplies across the ocean. We could not have borne the freight rates charged against our products. We would have had no ships of any consequence now.

We are getting the ships—four or five cargo carriers each days—and we are operating ships procured and constructed in pursuance of that legislation. We will be able to bring our boys home. We are able to carry food to starving peoples throughout the world in our ships. We are taking our place as a maritime Nation and are in position to maintain a respectable status as such.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator has referred to the failure of Congress to act in 1914, and has stated that it did act in 1915. Of course the Senator recognizes that there was a very material difference between the bill submitted to the Senate in 1914 and 1915, and that the 1914 bill might have passed if the majority had been willing to accept an amendment that the German ships should not be purchased as a result of that legislation. As a matter of fact, we obtained the German ships somewhat later and at a lower price than it was the purpose to pay for them; so that there seems to have been ample reason on that ground alone to have opposed the bill of 1914.

Mr. FLETCHER. I remember perfectly the amendment offered to the bill of 1914 prohibiting the Shipping Board from acquiring German ships, and the point being made that that might bring us into antagonisms which would result possibly in serious trouble; but I feel quite sure that that amendment, if it had been adopted, would not have caused those who were opposed to the bill then to favor it. I think there would have been other amendments, and there were other grounds of opposition to the bill. The fact is that all the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, I think—my recollection is every one of them—voted against the bill of 1915, except possibly one or two.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, of course, the Senator is quite right in saying that there were other grounds for opposing the bill. One of the objections was the Government ownership and operation of ships. Many Senators still oppose that policy; and as the Government is building a large fleet, perhaps the Senator from Florida can inform the Senate now what disposition is to be made of that fleet when it is constructed or as the ships are constructed. Are they to be chartered or sold or operated by the Government? What is to be done with them? We have a very large appropriation available for building ships; we are going on building them evidently without any let or hindrance, and I think it is of importance to know what our policy is to be so that we may determine whether it is desirable to cancel the authority which now exists to construct large additional tonnage.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, going back a little bit further, I had not quite finished my answer to the first question when the Senator interrupted again. With reference to the German ships I said at the time that discussion was in progress that we could not buy any German ships if we wanted to. I opposed the putting of such a restriction in the bill because I did not feel that it was wise to limit the board in respect to purchasing at all; but I was thoroughly convinced from my own information that we could not have bought the German ships if we had wanted to, and that was fully established by the appearance here of the representative of the German ships before a special committee of the Senate, of which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was the chairman, who came here and stated that they had been forbidden to enter into any negotiations looking to the sale of those ships. They could not have sold them; they would not have sold them; and we could not have bought them. So that was not a dangerous feature of the bill of 1914 at all.

Now, with reference to what is going to happen in the future, I would not venture at this time to offer any matured advice upon that question. It is largely a matter of development, it seems to me. We will have to get a little more information; we will have to get a little more data as to what we are able to do in this country, what we have done, what we have ahead of us, and what other countries are doing before we can determine upon a definite policy of a permanent nature for the future, it seems to me.

I have not myself, I will say to the Senator, made up my mind about what would be the wise course to pursue with reference to the operation of these ships or their handling. Of course, the Senator realizes that under the shipping act as it stands now the Shipping Board must dispose of all of the ships within a period of five years after the declaration of peace. That is the present law. Whether we will change or modify that law in the future, or whether we will stand by it, or what other law we will enact as bearing upon that question will be a matter upon which we will have to have more data before we can, I think, take a decided, positive stand.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I think there is ample reason for criticism for failure to know what you are going to do before you begin to leap. No private enterprise would be undertaken which involved the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars without a pretty clear conception of what was going to be done with the product of that expenditure. I think the Government should have been for months, for years for that matter, considering what it was going to do after the war was over not only in connection with shipping and the ownership and construction of ships but with everything else that has relation to this war. While I am not going to discuss what should be done at this time, I did not know but possibly the chairman of the Committee on Commerce might have some definite ideas. I do think that we should know what is going to be done with the ships that are being constructed in this wholesale way.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will permit me a suggestion at this point, I desire to make a statement in line with the suggestion which has been made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] which, it seems to me, embodies an additional reason for knowing just what we are going to do with the ships that are now being constructed. We all understand that ships are being constructed at the enormous cost of from $180 to $225 and upward per ton. If those ships are going to be disposed of in the near future it does seem to me an unwarranted waste of money to construct ships now at that cost and then to sell them in the markets of the world at a price which will be fixed by the law of supply and demand, which, if we are to judge by the prices which England is paying now—about $140 per ton—will involve a great loss of public funds.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Mississippi has made that suggestion. I made some inquiries not long ago of the Shipping Board as to what the average cost of wooden and steel ships had been. Of course, we know that it has been very high, and in some cases as high as the Senator from Mississippi has stated, and it is costing now in the neighborhood of $175 to $180 a ton for the construction of steel ships; and yet there is a corporation in this country which has recently offered to take a contract to build ships of the same character for the French Government at $115 a ton, and a very large tonnage at that. Now, of course, it goes without saying that we can not operate ships that cost $180 a ton——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Two hundred and twenty dollars a ton, I think, in the case of the Hog Island contract.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, I am speaking well within bounds when I say that we can not operate ships that cost $180 a ton, either by Government operation or by private operation, in competition with ships that cost $115 a ton, other things being equal; and we are going to have these hundreds of millions of dollars invested in ships at a very high cost, which we have either got to operate at a loss or we have got to charge off a couple of hundred millions of dollars when we commence their operation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, of course I hope the Senator has his information in satisfactory shape, so that he can speak accurately with regard to this offer to build for the French Government at $115 a ton. It is a little extraordinary if that offer has been made, because I know it is costing the Emergency Fleet Corporation more than that. The lowest figure that I know of where they have let contracts—lump-sum contracts, as they call them—for 9,000-ton steel ships is about $160 a ton. I do not know that they have made any for less than that; and if now they can be built for $115 it is rather interesting, because it indicates that our prices are high; and yet I have not known of any yards that are willing to bid less than $160 a ton for those steel ships.

The Senator is quite right about the difficulties we will have to meet.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield further to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. May I just say that my information came from one of the important officers connected with the corporation that had made this offer; and he told me that they intended to build these ships on the Pacific coast, where the building under the direction of the Emergency Fleet Corporation had practically ceased, and there were 25,000 or 30,000 men out of employment, especially in the States of Oregon and Washington. Of course I would not have made that statement without having my authority from a very good source.

Mr. FLETCHER. I realize that; and I think there may be other features connected with that contract which somewhat offset some of the difficulties we are laboring under in connection with our own contracts. For instance, it may be that these people will have their own time in which to complete these ships. Of course, it is very different where ships are required to be built at once, built speedily, which was the situation that the Shipping Board had to meet from its very inception. The cry was "Ships, ships, ships, now!" We could not wait, and we were obliged to limit to the very lowest possible time the time in which these ships had to be built by every yard in the country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FLETCHER. In just one minute. We had to disregard any economic considerations. Speed was the prime factor in every one of these contracts. Of course if you undertake to build a house that you have six months to build you can build that house at quite a different figure than you would have to charge if you had only six weeks in which to build it; and that was the situation with reference to the Shipping Board. It had to have the ships immediately. The demand was for ships speedily and without regard to the ordinary elements that would enter into a business contract where, for instance, a man had an opportunity to extend that contract over a period of years instead of over a period of months.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I realize fully the force of what the Senator has said; but is it not true that many of these ships are but started and have not made substantial progress? Ought not these contracts now to be so modified that the requirement of great speed, producing excessive cost, should cease to apply to them, and that they should be built upon a practical business basis of cost that will enable them to compete with the vessels of the world without a great write-off by the Government?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for just a moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course, I had not intended to criticize the Emergency Fleet Corporation for what has been done up to this time. I recognize, of course, that it was necessary to do things hastily and to pay the price. Perhaps they are to be criticized, but I do not know whether they are or not. I am talking about the future; and it does seem to me that we ought to have some definite idea of what the future is going to bring to us and how we are going to expend this money.

Mr. VARDAMAN. We ought to stop it.

Mr. FLETCHER. First, with reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, there are certain economies now being put into effect by the Shipping Board; certain contracts are being canceled and certain contracts are being modified to meet new conditions. Among the things they have done is to discontinue the allowance for extra time, which was very expensive, and the allowance for Sunday work, which was very expensive. They have eliminated those features in their engagements with the workers in the yards. One builder, for instance, estimates that his additional cost for extra time amounted to $100,000 per hull. That has been eliminated by the Shipping Board, so that hereafter the work will go on in the ordinary way, without this rush and extra expense.

With regard to what the Senator suggests about our policy, of course we know what the law is. At present we are operating under the law. We will have to continue to operate under that law until we conclude to change it in some respects. In other words, we know that the Shipping Board is authorized to make the contracts that have been made. We know about what it has accomplished. In the report filed here, which I hold in my hand, on page 179, the condensed summary of results in ship production as of November 15, 1918, is given. The keels laid amount to a dead-weight tonnage of 7,942,463; the hulls launched amount in dead-weight tonnage to 4,198,211; ships delivered—that means ships that are fully outfitted with all machinery, passed upon by the classification societies, accepted, and actually put into service—amount to 2,828,781 dead-weight tons. That has been accomplished so far; and there are contracts already entered into reaching up, as I recall, to somewhere between eight and eleven million dead-weight tons, all told.

We must understand, of course, that even though it does cost a great deal now to build ships, even though it costs a great deal more now than it did before the war to build ships—and that is a fact which we are bound to recognize, for before the war these ships that are now costing us $160 and more a ton could have been built for $50 or $60 a ton—still the necessity is here. It is almost as acute from a commercial standpoint as it was acute both for commercial reasons and from a military standpoint a few months ago.

The total world tonnage in 1914 was about 48,000,000 tons. Of that the United Kingdom owned about 28,000,000 tons. The destruction of allied and neutral shipping during the war amounted to something like 21,000,000 tons altogether; so that we have got to supply this loss. Great Britain's greatest accomplishment in the line of shipbuilding during the war was, in the past year, when she built something like 1,700,000 tons. She expects or hopes to build 2,000,000 tons a year. That is about her calculation. France is doing her level best to summon all her resources and put herself in a position to contract for 3,000,000 tons a year. That is only 5,000,000 tons of shipbuilding by those great maritime powers. If we can build 6,000,000 tons a year, we will not for a year hence have more than half restored the tonnage sunk by the submarines; and there undoubtedly is need for the shipping now. There will be need for it until we restore the world tonnage as it existed before the war, and we will have to increase that tonnage very materially to meet the needs of commerce.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator, if he will permit me, this question: I agree with him that tonnage is very much needed, and I commend the spirit of both England, France, and the United States in the effort that is being put forth to supply it. But may I ask the Senator the difference between the price which France and England are paying and the price which we are paying in the United States?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know exactly what they are paying. I think that will depend very largely on the time the contracts are to run.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Somebody testified before the Commerce Committee, if the Senator will pardon me, that England is paying about $145 a ton, while the United States, in some instances, is paying as high as $225 a ton.

Mr. FLETCHER. That, of course, is under present contracts. My information is ships are costing England about $175 per ton. Of course, we expect to get that price down. Those contracts were made, as I say, when we had to have the ships, and had to have them within a limited time, and concentrate upon ships, no matter what the cost was; but my understanding is that our yards in this country are seeking contracts and are willing to take contracts, and France and Italy and other countries are willing to make contracts at about what we are paying in this country for those ships.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHELAN. Is the Senator in a position to tell us at this point what the condition of the agreement is between the United States and the International Mercantile Marine Corporation for the acquisition of that fleet?

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not say definitely what the situation is at present. I know that negotiations have been on, and I think they are still on; and so far as I am informed it is the purpose to acquire that fleet, if it can be accomplished. It is a very great fleet, a very important fleet, and would supply us with something over a million tons of first-class shipping at a cost much less than ships are costing us now.

Mr. PHELAN. I understand that the ships are really owned by Americans, inasmuch as they own the stock of the International Mercantile Marine Corporation.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is quite true, as I understand the situation. The International Mercantile Marine Corporation owns the stock of the corporations that have the title to the ships. Those are British corporations.

Mr. PHELAN. But the stock is actually owned by American citizens?

Mr. FLETCHER. By the International Mercantile Marine Corporation, which is an American corporation, incorporated under the laws of New Jersey.

Mr. PHELAN. Construction in the yards of this country for foreign account is now permitted, is it not, certainly in so far as wooden and concrete ships are concerned? But as to steel ships, must not they, if constructed for order other than that of the Government, be under the American flag and registered under that flag?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have heard of no change in that requirement. Certainly no contracts can be made to build for foreign account without the approval of the Shipping Board, under the law; and I do not know that they are permitting contracts for foreign account, except where they are not using the yards themselves and have no need for the particular ships that the yards are equipped to build, such as wooden and concrete ships.

Mr. PHELAN. I saw the statement made unofficially that steel ships could not be constructed for private account unless they sailed under the American flag.

Mr. FLETCHER. That has been the policy heretofore, and, so far as I know, it obtains yet. Certainly they can not be built for foreign account without the consent of the Shipping Board.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say, with reference to that matter, that a few days ago the Senate passed a resolution inquiring of the Shipping Board what its policy is in that respect. I understand that it has not yet removed the ban against the making of contracts for steel ships in this country for foreign account without the permit of the board. What I wanted to call the Senator's attention to, however, was this:

As I understood when the Senator was interrupted, he was calling attention to the attitude of those who opposed the ship-purchase bill in 1914, and also pointing out what wonderful things had been accomplished under the act of 1915 by the Shipping Board in the building of ships. I am not going to pay any attention to the matter with reference to the ship-purchase bill of 1914. I am perfectly satisfied with my record with reference to that measure, so far as that is concerned, and with what I did to prevent the passage of the bill. With reference to the act of 1915, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact, as I understand it to be a fact, that the large tonnage of ships to which he has referred has not been constructed under that act at all. It has not been constructed by the Shipping Board. It has been constructed under the emergency act, passed after we got into the war, providing for an appropriation of millions and hundreds of millions of dollars, under which the Emergency Fleet Corporation was organized. The Emergency Fleet Corporation has built those ships and has let those contracts, and the Shipping Board, as a board, has had practically nothing to do with it. So that the act of 1915 has not resulted in the building up of any merchant marine.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is mistaken in this respect: The act of 1915 provides for the formation of the Emergency Fleet Corportion. In the very body of the act it provides for that corporation an appropriation of $50,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think the Senator will find himself mistaken about that. It provides for the organization of a corporation, as he says, with a capital stock of $50,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But the Emergency Fleet Corporation was a separate corporation, organized by the designation of the President. We gave the President authority to determine the agencies that he should use in the expenditure of the tremendous sum of money, which was not $50,000,000, but, in the first instance, $750,000,000, and it was afterwards increased, I think, until it amounts now to over $3,000,000,000. Under that authority the Emergency Fleet Corporation was organized, and not the permanent corporation that was contemplated by the act of 1915.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have always understood—and I think it is true beyond any doubt—that the procedure was under the act known as the shipping act, the act of 1915, to form a corporation; it was the authority given in that act to form a corporation with a capital stock of $50,000,000 that was exercised when the Shipping Board created the Emergency Fleet Corporation. That is the corporation formed in pursuance of that act and contemplated by that act. The capital stock was $50,000,000 and the corporation is controlled precisely as that act points out. The members of the Shipping Board are trustees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation and operate the Fleet Corporation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But even granting that, what would that board have accomplished with $50,000,000? It would not have accomplished anything.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was laying the foundation and making a beginning. Further appropriations were of course necessary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The ships that have actually been built were constructed under the emergency appropriation made by Congress and not under the shipping act.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. The appropriations have been made by various acts, amounting altogether to something like $3,000,000,000. That has been done in the appropriation acts; but the corporation which has built the ships is the corporation provided for in the shipping act, formed in pursuance of the shipping act, operated in pursuance of the shipping act, and having the powers expressed in the shipping act.

Of course, having started in this enterprise so late, we have been hurried and driven to sacrifice economy to speed. There have been some mistakes, numerous delays, unavoidable confusion, and the ships have cost us a great deal more than they would have cost under normal conditions. The call was for ships in the quickest possible time, out of any material that might serve the present need, without regard to strict business methods observed in ordinary times.

We have yards of all sizes, built and expanded, on the Atlantic, Gulf, Pacific, and Great Lakes—sufficient to build for all the nations of the earth. The Government has expended approximately a hundred million dollars on three yards, one of which has 50 ways, all equipped, on a water frontage of more than a mile, comprising 846 acres, the land costing $1,706,000 alone—the largest shipyard in the world—now in full operation. It will have a capacity of 600 ships annually, 4,500,000 dead-weight tons. There have been criticisms of Hog Island, but what has been accomplished there is little short of marvelous, the time taken to make the development considered. The contractors, the agents of the Government there, have trained men, organized their forces, strained every nerve to produce results, and in spite of difficulties which were discouraging they claim they are succeeding in admirable fashion. Wherever the yards have proven efficient, they will be kept busy. Our capacity now is more than twice that of England and as great as that of the rest of the world combined. We can put out each year 6,000,000 tons of shipping. With shipping must come classification and insurance and other financial operations.

We purpose to continue to build ships not only until the world shortage, brought about by submarine ravages and other causes, of more than 21,000,000 tons shall have been restored, but the prewar supply must be greatly increased.

The shipbuilding industry has become one of first importance in the United States. The farmers, manufacturers, merchants, bankers, and all others engaged in industries and trade and business have come to realize what it means to have our own ships and our proper place on the ocean.

They rightly will not countenance any policy that does not mean an increase and strengthening of America's sea power. Congress should make every appropriation required to complete the present shipbuilding program and enlarge it to our full capacity.

All our resources—men and materials—available under conditions when due and proper economies are practiced and when there is no occasion for the haste that makes waste should be utilized in the building of ships. Of course, a careful study should be made so as to determine the character of vessel which should be built in every case. If I had my way, I would spread out a map of the world and study carefully every port in every country and ascertain what products and commodities and business could be counted on to move, if given the facilities, to and from such ports, and to what extent the United States may be interested, and whenever possible I would send vessels flying our flag into those ports and connect them with the ports of this country.

I would utilize our consular agents, our commercial agents, and every other means for developing trade and establishing friendly relations. We are a great creditor Nation now, and it will be necessary to take the goods of other countries liberally in exchange for our own. We paid England before the war about $300,000,000 per annum as interest on what we owed her. England now pays us about $200,000,000 a year as interest on what she owes us. Our loans to foreign countries amount to more than $8,000,000,000. We should facilitate liquidation in commodities as far as possible.

Second. The next essential to "sea power" after acquiring the ships is to have the men to navigate them.

SEAMEN'S ACT.

It is this essential that I desire particularly to speak about. It was to secure this essential as well as to make reasonable provision for safety of life at sea that what is known as the seamen's act was passed and approved March 4, 1915. Its enforcement will practically equalize the cost of operation on all vessels using our ports, whether flying our own flag or any other, because equal wages, equal crews, and equal equipment will bring about equal cost. This act has been either greatly misunderstood or deliberately and grossly misrepresented. I can well understand how foreign shipowners do not think much of this act. American shipowners in the past were closely connected with European shipowners and they clamored for a subsidy. Instead of a subsidy we offer this law and under it America can have a merchant marine without paying any subsidy of any kind.

Let us be frank about it. The law requires the local inspectors to take into account the statutory requirements as to manning lifeboats and a certain per cent of the deck's crew must have the rating of able seamen, but there is no law fixing definitely the number of seamen that shall be carried on vessels of the United States. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations respecting the number of ordinary seamen, boys for training, the rating and number of men in the engine room. No such general rule, however, has been promulgated.

Prior to the passage of this act the difference between the wages paid to seamen hired in ports of the United States and other ports were about as follows:

Seamen's wages in New York were about 20 per cent higher than wages paid at Liverpool; about 22.5 per cent higher than in North Sea or Atlantic ports on the Continent of Europe; about 30 per cent higher than the wages paid in the ports of the inner Mediterranean or Baltic; about 400 per cent higher than the wages paid in India or China; about 300 per cent higher than the wages paid in the ports of Japan.

Vessels capable of hiring their seamen in low-wage ports and compelling them to remain with the vessel in high-wage ports had, of course, a great advantage over any other vessels not so advantageously situated.

This was recognized by Congress when, on June 26, 1884, a law was enacted allowing American vessels to discharge their higher priced men in low-wage ports and to keep them by the vessel, by fear of imprisonment, in high-wage ports. The attempt failed, however, because the Americans quit the sea entirely and we could not get men even to become officers.

On March 4, 1915, Congress, disregarding the protests from foreign countries, enacted the so-called seamen's act. The purpose of this act was to equalize the wage cost that so far had resisted all efforts. The further purpose was to induce the American to again seek the sea.

It was contended and finally believed that if the seaman was made a free man, with the right to quit the vessel in any safe port and the further right to demand and receive part of his earned wages, the seaman would seek the higher wages by quitting the vessel paying the low wage and thereby compelling the low-wage vessel to pay the wages out of the port.

The law became operative as to foreign vessels in July, 1916, and in August, 1916, the equalization began. It has continued ever since in spite of the war and in spite of the fact that several provisions of the law have not been permitted to function. This is no longer open to question. The Shipping Board has the evidence, which is not only undisputed by foreign consuls, but the act is claimed as the reason for a condition which they very much resent and against which they never cease to protest.

With his European competitor the American shipowner is on an equality for the first time in about 60 years. The equalization does not stop in American ports. Great Britain in February last made the wages of seamen out of British ports the same as the wages paid to seamen out of Atlantic American ports. This was done because it was cheaper to pay American wages from British ports and keep the men on board in American ports than to pay less, to lose the men, cause possible delay, and to pay the American wages and the crimp's fees in ports of the United States. Let the act stand. See that it is properly enforced on American vessels and the foreign vessels being placed on absolute equality with the American vessels will pay the same wages and will have no just grounds for complaint.

OTHER LAWS.

The general cost of operation of vessels in the same trade prior to the passage of the seamen's act was practically the same except as to the wage cost. All supplies were bought where they could be bought the cheapest. The American vessel paid higher wages to officers and seamen. While this difference in wages was really only a small per cent of operating expense, we bring about equalization, overcome the objection, always greatly magnified, by raising the wages of all maritime nations to the American standard instead of following the old policy of lowering wages to foreign standards and causing our men to abandon the sea.

When it comes to consider that great question, "the freedom of the seas," it will be well to keep these matters in mind. They are likely to be quite as important as questions of the extent of territorial waters, legitimate blockade, and other international outstanding conventions. I would not be understood as intimating that antagonisms may arise or that there is danger of selfish interests dominating in the council of nations. It is fair to state that England does not, so far as I am advised, dispute the principle of equal opportunity of all nations to navigate the seas fully and the equal right of all nations to extend their commerce into all parts of the world. It is quite true that England's policy has tended toward liberality in this regard. She allows vessels of foreign registry to compete with her own in her coastwise trade. Most nations, including our own, confine this privilege to vessels of their own registry, respectively.

Aside from certain provisions of the seamen's act on this point, our laws are substantially like those of England, Germany, Norway, and Japan.

It is a fact that our laws are not as strict as those laws nor are they as burdensome. For instance, England, Germany, Japan, and Norway have a load line; we have none. They can not carry deck loads at any time beyond a certain height, which in the winter is very much reduced. We have no such regulations. Those nations have their seamen included in their workmen's compensation laws. Our seamen are excluded. In those nations the vessels must pay for hospital for sick seamen. Here this is taken from the taxes paid by the general public, except there is a small amount paid by the vessel owners, which is taken from the deserting seamen; but that is not sufficient to support the hospital. In those countries the vessels or their owners have a very considerable liability to passengers or their heirs in cases of disaster. Our vessels and owners have none.

On November 16 last the Admiralty Board of Great Britain, thanking the mercantile marine and the fishing industry for their incomparable services during the war, said that "without the loyal cooperation of the former"—that is, the mercantile marine—"with the navy and its indomitable courage, the enemy's submarine must have entirely attained its object."

The board also said, as reported in the dispatches, that "aboard all ships, from the largest dreadnaughts to the smallest patrol boat, there were found officers and men of the mercantile navy combining with those of the Royal Navy in fighting the enemy and defeating his nefarious methods of warfare." "In the interest of the Empire," the statement concludes, "the close connection between the merchantmen and the Royal Navy must prove a lasting one."

The navy or naval reserves have nothing to do with the operation of the merchant vessels in Great Britain; on the contrary, the officers and crews of the merchant vessels came to the assistance of the Royal Navy.

It is to the building up of this competent and efficient force of American seamen, unsurpassed in any country, that we must bend our most earnest endeavors. Then, indeed, the hour for an adequate American mercantile marine will have struck.

We can never succeed in establishing a creditable mercantile marine under our flag unless we arrange to furnish the men to sail the ships.

We can do that readily when we assure the men fair treatment, wholesome and healthful surroundings, reasonable compensation for services, and certain advancement for faithful and efficient performance of duties.

The American boy for many years past has found nothing to invite, but everything to discourage, him when he looked toward the sea. He has been driven to other occupations, even when his taste and yearning urged him to "do business on the great waters."

The sea power of any nation depends mainly upon the number of trained seamen that nation can furnish. It is the part of wisdom to foster in every way the development of seamanship and make attractive to those who turn to it as a permanent occupation the life of a mariner.

Before the days of Solomon the merchants of Tyre were operating ships and extending the trade to the then known regions. Their supremacy on the seas passed, after supporting dynasties and building cities, by the use of ships, to Greece; then to Italy; then to Portugal; then to Spain; then to Holland; then to England; and finally to the United States in the days of the Baltimore clippers.

We threw away the proud title of "The Mistress of the Seas." We deliberately allowed this country to become a "beggar of ships," and, with our commerce paralyzed, a "fettered and embargoed trafficker," we changed the word "mistress" to "vassal." I do not think we will be guilty of such folly again. We adopted the policy of neglecting our seamen, finding crews wherever they could be had for the least money, taking the foreigner stranded on our shores, picking up the derelicts, treating them outrageously, until the word "sailor" became a by-word and a reproach. Until the act of December 21, 1898, seamen could be imprisoned for leaving an American vessel in an American port and held against their will to service. Until the seaman's act, which became effective as to foreign vessels in August, 1916, under treaties denounced by that act, seamen on foreign vessels could be arrested and imprisoned by our courts for leaving their vessel. It was not until that act went into full effect that all seamen were set free in this country.

By act of Congress approved June 26, 1884, American shipowners were permitted to discharge a crew hired in an American port, employ another crew in the port in which his competitor hired his, come to the United States and go back to a foreign port without reshipping in the United States and thus escape the American wage rate. The crimping system was in full play, and the seaman was robbed. The forecastle, where he lived with men of all races, speaking languages he could not understand, inadequate as to space and ventilation, was a foul, disease-breeding place.

The wages were based on the lowest paid in any port he touched, and left him nothing for his family.

There was no prospect in such a life. No wonder the American left the sea. We can well understand why more than 60 per cent of the officers and men in our merchant marine in 1915 were not citizens of the United States.

It was not until March 14, 1897, that Congress passed a law requiring that the forecastle must be improved. Every maritime nation had long since required the same thing.

The seaman's act of March 4, 1915, was the first emphatic declaration by Congress that the rights and interests of our seamen should have recognition and be maintained. The old policy drove Americans off the ocean. It knocked our sea legs from under us.

The new policy is to call our men back and say to them, "You shall be treated as decent citizens; you are invited not only to a legitimate but an absolutely essential occupation, where your rights must be respected; you shall be assured of good living conditions, space in the forecastle shall be increased from 72 cubic feet per man to 120 cubic feet, with further provisions for health, cleanliness, and comfort; the crimping system is abolished; advance wages and allotments, by which seamen suffered great wrongs are prohibited; you are free men and can have one-half of the wages earned and not paid in ports of call, thus enabling you to protect your liberty."

A new day has dawned for American shipping, and greater opportunities than ever before have come to American boys on the sea and those old "salts" who cling to the life will rejoice to see it brighten, and all must realize that the officers and men in the American merchant marine are rendering unsurpassed service to their country.

Human life and property are in the hands of these men. The prosperity and even the safety of this country rests with them. They must know what to do in case of storm and danger. There is no mercy in the angry elements. There must be discipline without cruelty, control without tyranny, coolness without indifference, courage without recklessness.

I recall that when the Titanic was sunk the wireless operator who survived testified that he remained at his station until the sea washed him away as the ship went down by the bow.

I asked him at the hearing why he did not get into a lifeboat or jump to some raft before then. He replied that the captain had told him to take his position by his apparatus and endeavor to send out distress calls as long as he could, and receiving no further orders he remained there until the ship went down. That is the kind of stuff the seafaring man, to succeed, must be made of.

We require officers, firemen, cooks, stewards, and other men, and at least 24,000 able seamen and 16,000 ordinary seamen, to man new vessels. We already have many of these. We have the material for all, and we are bound to have sea power to an extent never before enjoyed, and as a basis for that we must have trained and capable seamen from our own population.

American shipping has always heretofore been protected—absolutely protected—by prohibition. I understand "protection" means securing the home market. The importation of ships has been forbidden, and the use of foreign ships in the "home market" has been prohibited, and our coastwise trade has been reserved for home-built ships for nearly 100 years.

BOUNTIES.

In colonial times Virginia gave a subsidy of tobacco to induce her people to build ships, and they built one ship.

Massachusetts gave a bounty on Massachusetts oil—the fisheries were depressed, not helped.

Rhode Island paid a bounty on oil. Her sailors continued to favor the slave trade.

The effect of subsidies on the Collins Line was disastrous to shipping.

British shipping in the trade to the northern ports of America was not increased but restricted by the subsidy to the Cunard Co.

We tried subsidies after the Civil War—lines from New York to Rio, San Francisco to China, Japan, and Hawaii. It brought the beneficiaries into politics and helped not at all to build up a merchant marine.

In 1891 we passed a subsidy (mail) law. It brought in four ships, which never increased. The greatest commerce carrier is the tramp, which was never subsidized by any country.

The report of the Merchant Marine Commission says:

> The statistics of loss of ships at sea afford matter for reflection. They show * * * that out of every 100 American seagoing steamships over 100 tons, for the past 7 years, on the average 2.24 have been lost each year; that out of every 100 foreign seagoing steamers over 100 tons, for the same period, on the average 1.98 have been lost each year.

Mr. Spears, in his admirable work on "The Story of the American Merchant Marine," shows that "when American ships were supreme they were insured at a less rate than those of any other nation, and the insurance was placed, to a large extent, in England." That when "the American sailor of the sail was able to handle his ship better than any other he paid lower premiums to the underwriters. That the higher per cent of losses means higher cost of insurance, and the cause is since the steamer era our sailor is less efficient in his work than our old-time sailor and less efficient, too, than the foreign steamship sailor of to-day. The superior intrinsic efficiency of the American sailor gave supremacy to the American flag." We must have our nautical units (seamen) as efficient for this modern day as was our ship of the sail in the days long past. We can accomplish this by having efficient men to man our vessels. There is no difficulty in the way of building the ships.

Our day has come to make the "Starred Banner the talisman of a world commerce."

Mr. President, I had some correspondence with Mr. Tucker, of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, on this subject, in which he submitted a communication from Mr. Sproule of that board of trade, raising the same questions that are discussed in the resolution which I submitted at the beginning of my remarks. I wrote him recently, under date of the 18th instant; and inasmuch as that letter applies more specifically to some of the matters covered by the resolutions from the New York Chamber of Commerce, I ask that it be printed in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
Philadelphia, December 24, 1918.

HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I take this occasion to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 18th instant, and in compliance with the request therein I have had the Evening Public Ledger publish same, and I inclose you herewith a cutting from the paper of the 24th instant.

There are one or two points in your letter which I will take the liberty of answering at a little later date, but the holiday duties prevent my doing so at this time.

Wishing you the compliments of the season, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

W. R. TUCKER, Secretary.

FLETCHER ARGUES AGAINST SUBSIDY—FLORIDA SENATOR TAKES EXCEPTION TO SECRETARY SPROULE'S CHARGES—DEFENDS SHIPPING LAWS—COST OF OPERATING SHIPS UNDER AMERICAN REGISTRY NECESSARILY HIGH, HE SAYS.

Defending the shipping laws of the United States, Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, of Florida, chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, in a letter to William R. Tucker, secretary and assistant treasurer of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, takes exceptions to published statements of George F. Sproule and argues against subsidies for the American merchant marine.

Senator FLETCHER denies that the cost of operating ships under American registry must necessarily be abnormally high, and says that when subsidies have been tried in this country they failed to bring about the development expected. His letter follows:

"Your favor of December 6, inclosing article by George F. Sproule, should have been answered before, but I have been so terribly driven that I have not had a moment's time to give to it.

"In an endeavor to sustain his contention that our laws are such 'that no man can own and operate a ship profitably under the American flag,' Mr. Sproule asks, 'Have England, Germany, Norway, and Japan laws compelling the master of a ship to give to the seaman one-half his wages every five days while in port?' Neither has the United States. Section 4 of the seaman's act provides:

"'Every seaman on a vessel of the United States shall be entitled to receive on demand from the master of the vessel to which he belongs one-half part of the wages which he shall have then earned at every port where such vessel, after the voyage has been commenced, shall load or deliver cargo before the voyage is ended, and all stipulations in the contract to the contrary shall be void: Provided, That such a demand shall not be made before the expiration of, nor oftener than once in the five days.'

"Even if the law provided for paying seamen one-half their wages every five days while in port, I fail to see how that would increase the cost of operation or otherwise work to the disadvantage of American shipping.

AMERICAN SAILOR WELL FED.

"Mr. Sproule asks, 'Is the standard of food on the ships of any of these nations comparable with that on American ships?'

"I answer that, generally speaking, it is. My information is that American ships do not feed any better than the ships of other maritime nations. He does not suggest in what respect the American standard of food is too luxurious. My opinion is we get the best men and the best service out of them by feeding them well without regard to a fixed minimum standard on which we could get by.

"He asks, 'Do any of these countries compel the production of certificates of competency for able-bodied seamen; at least, other than service such as indicated by the "discharge book"?'

"My answer is: Where life and property so vitally depend on the competency of seamen no one should want incompetent men employed as able-bodied seamen. If the standards of other nations are as lax as claimed, should not the United States be its own judge of their competency? No one can justly charge that the United States local inspectors are unfair in the matter of issuing certificates of competency to men who are properly qualified.

"He asks, 'Do any of these countries require that 55 per cent of the deck department, exclusive of officers, shall be certified sailors?'

"I submit that there is nothing wrong in requiring that only a little more than half of the deck department shall be competent sailors.

"He then inquires, 'Do any of these nations, excepting perhaps Japan, require the carrying of so large a crew as American ships?'

"Our law does not fix the number of the crew, and besides I do not believe the United States should be behind Japan in the requirement of adequate crews to fully man her merchant ships.

RIGHT TO COMPENSATION LAW.

"I want to say further, in reference to other points raised by Mr. Sproule, that giving a seaman the right to sue for injuries is quite a different thing from including seamen under the provisions of the compensation law. I believe they should be so included, but the fact they are not is unquestionably a monetary advantage to American shipowners. The fact that American shipowners do not have to pay hospital dues for sick seamen is another advantage which is not counterbalanced by the retention of wages due to seamen who desert.

"I still insist that the increase in wages of American officers and crews constitute only a small percentage of the gross operating expenses of a vessel. For confirmation of this I would refer to the report of the special shipping committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce, which was presented to that body on January 7, 1915. This committee consisted of five men, three of whom were practical shipping men and the other two were men who have given much attention to shipping matters. They were Mr. Irving T. Bush, president of the Bush Terminals, chairman; George B. Dearborn, president of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co.; and Commodore Jacob W. Miller, formerly of the New England Navigation Co., and more recently the active head of the Cape Cod Canal Co. The other two members were W. H. Douglas, who later acted as chairman of the shipping committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and J. T. Gwathmey. This committee reported that after careful investigation they had found that the total difference in the cost of operating American steamships as compared with foreign steamships in the same trade in normal times was 'even less than 50 per cent,' and that 'subsidies were unnecessary.' The report further stated, in substance, that the false claims of subsidists have destroyed the confidence of American investors in shipping investments, and the committee outlined a plan whereby that confidence might be restored by the Government guaranteeing bonds of steamship companies. They said, 'If credit machinery be created to enable steamship men to finance American shipping enterprises, a substantial tonnage of freight vessels would be assured without the aid of subsidy.'

STATUS OF "ADMIRAL" BOATS.

"By the operation of the seamen's act the difference in wages between American and foreign ships will be greatly reduced, if not entirely wiped out, thereby cutting down to almost nothing the 'even less than 50 per cent' difference in cost of operation that the committee reported as against American ships.

"Regarding the instance cited by Mr. Sproule of the 'Admiral' boats, these vessels were chartered by the United Fruit Co., and not owned by them, as would be inferred from his statement. I believe he is in error that there was a difference of 50 per cent in the cost of operating these vessels as compared with the vessels that replaced them. These 'Admiral' boats were transferred to the Pacific coast, where they have been operated by the same interests that owned them when they were chartered to the United Fruit Co., and they have proven very profitable in the Pacific coast trade.

"The statement 'Your seafaring man does not mix sentiment with business; he looks at things from a dollar-and-cent angle,' would seem to be quite true, and applies to Americans who were ready to replace ships under their country's flag by British vessels even when the difference in cost of operation is 'less than 5 per cent.'

"Regarding the steamers Shawmut and Tremont, these vessels are now owned by the Panama Steamship Co. and are named the Ancon and the Cristobal. They have never gone from under the American flag, and I expect the only reason their original owners did not make a success of them was by reason of bad management. The original investors may have been victims of 'high finance,' because the Government paid a good price for them when it bought them.

"Regarding the cost of building ships in American shipyards, the record will show that at the outbreak of the war in 1914 cargo steamers were being built in Great Britain for $35 a dead-weight ton and in the United States for about $45 a dead-weight ton. This would give a difference of less than 30 per cent. It is evident that with an increase of shipbuilding in the United States and up-to-date facilities and equipment the difference of about 30 per cent in construction costs between that of Great Britain and that of the United States would or should be greatly reduced, if not entirely wiped out. This is admitted in the report of the New York Chamber of Commerce committee.

"It is in the testimony before the Commerce Committee that the New York Shipbuilding Corporation was building merchant ships in its yards for $60 to $78 a ton. The higher price was for tankers, which cost $15 to $20 a ton more than ordinary cargo steamers. These were the prices after the European war had been in progress three years, causing great increases in the cost of labor and material.

QUESTIONS FRENCH SUBSIDY.

"Mr. Sproule cites the French Government's subsidies to its shipping in support of his contention for American subsidies. He might have stated how much of a merchant marine France has as a result of her very liberal subsidies to French shipping. He does not undertake to say what subsidies Great Britain gives her shipping, excluding the special case of the subsidy that was granted to the Cunard Line in connection with the Mauretania and the Lusitania. The subsidy to the Cunard Line never increased British shipping one particle to and from our North Atlantic coast. Why has Great Britain by far the greatest merchant marine in the world, notwithstanding it costs more to operate British ships than the ships of any other country in the world except the United States? British shipowners are enterprising and patriotic, and they are not inclined to swap their flag because of a slight saving of a small per cent of operating expense. They are perfectly willing to pay somewhat higher operating expenses under their flag and are quite content with the 30 to 100 per cent annual net profits, which the London Stock Exchange Yearbook for 1914 shows it was not unusual for steamship companies to earn before the war.

"If there have been instances of failure of American ships to operate profitably, I am quite sure it is due to other reasons than alleged disadvantages under which American ships are said to labor. The tramp is the ideal cargo carrier, and no country ever subsidized the tramp. We tried subsidies after the Civil War—lines from New York to Rio, from San Francisco to Japan and China and Hawaii. It brought the beneficiaries into politics and helped not at all to build up a merchant marine. In 1891 we passed a subvention or subsidy mail law, whereby we brought under our flag four ships. That number was never increased. The effect of subsidies on the Collins Lines was disastrous to shipping. We tried bounties in colonial times. Virginia gave a subsidy on tobacco to induce her people to build ships, and they built one ship. Massachusetts gave a bounty on Massachusetts oil. The fisheries were depressed—not helped. Rhode Island paid a bounty on oil. Her sailors continued to favor the slave trade.

"Yours, very truly, DUNCAN U. FLETCHER."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, with many of the observations of the Senator from Florida I am in hearty accord. I am not going to discuss them, however, and I am not going to discuss at length the differences that appeared in this Chamber prior to the war. These differences were simply the reflection of the differences among the people throughout the country as to what would be the wise policy to pursue as to our shipping. Everybody desired a large American merchant marine. Everybody desires it now. We differed, I think, honestly and patriotically upon the policies that should be pursued. Those of us who opposed the ship-purchase act of 1914 did not believe that that act would accomplish what all of us wanted accomplished. We did not think it was the wise course to take. I still think we were right. That is true with reference to the act of 1915, to which the Senator has referred. But, Mr. President, the act under which our shipping has been built, the act under which the many contracts that are now made have been made, was an act that was passed by this body without any division whatever. It was an emergency act. It was to aid in the prosecution of the war, and was passed without any division. I have it in my hand; and I think it well, in connection with the Senator's remarks, to have it put in the RECORD.

This is the act approved June 15, 1917, "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes."

On the first page there is a paragraph under the heading "Emergency shipping fund," and it reads in this way:

The President—

Not the Shipping Board, but the President—is hereby authorized and empowered, within the limits of the amounts herein authorized—

(a) To place an order with any person for such ships or material as the necessities of the Government, to be determined by the President, may require during the period of the war, and which are of the nature, kind, and quantity usually produced or capable of being produced by such person.

(b) To modify—

That is, the President is authorized—

To modify, suspend, cancel, or requisition any existing or future contract for the building, production, or purchase of ships or material.

(c) To require—

That is, the President—not the Shipping Board, but the President—is empowered—

To require the owner or occupier of any plant in which ships or materials are built or produced to place at the disposal of the United States the whole or any part of the output of such plant, to deliver such output or part thereof in such quantities and at such times as may be specified in the order.

(d) To requisition—

That is, the President is empowered—not the Shipping Board, but the President is empowered—

To requisition and take over for use or operation by the United States any plant, or any part thereof, without taking possession of the entire plant, whether the United States has or has not any contract or agreement with the owner or occupier of such plant.

And, Mr. President, all shipping plants in this country that have been taken over during this war have been taken over under that provision and not under the general shipping act to which the Senator has referred.

(e) To purchase—

That is, the President is empowered and authorized to purchase—requisition, or take over the title to, or the possession of, for use or operation by the United States, any ship now constructed or in the process of construction or hereafter constructed, or any part thereof, or charter of such ship.

Then there are other provisions here with reference to compliance with these matters; and, again:

The President may exercise the power and authority hereby vested in him, and expend the money herein and hereafter appropriated, through such agency or agencies as he shall determine from time to time.

He selected the Emergency Fleet Corporation, which the Senator is correct in saying was the corporation organized under the ship-purchase act; but the President could have taken any other agency. He could have taken an individual, and he could supplant that at any time; so that it was simply the agency that the President took under this act, and when it is discharging the duties imposed on it by the President it is discharging the duties given to the President and the powers of the President under this act, and not under the shipping act.

Then, listen:

All ships constructed, purchased, or requisitioned under authority herein, or heretofore or hereafter acquired by the United States, shall be managed, operated, and disposed of—

Not as the Shipping Board may direct; not under authority of the ship-purchase act, but—as the President may direct.

So that everything that is being done in connection with the war emergency in securing ships to take care of the situation developed by the war is done under this act passed in 1917 and not under the ship-purchase act of 1915.

All authority granted to the President herein, or by him delegated, shall cease six months after a final treaty of peace is proclaimed between this Government and the German Empire.

Then, Mr. President, the Emergency Fleet Corporation will proceed to act under the act of 1915, and not before.

Under this act we authorize the expenditure of $500,000,000 for the construction of ships and appropriate $250,000,000 of that amount. We also authorize, for requisitioning ships and taking over plants, the expenditure of $250,000,000. Then these appropriations were supplemented, as has been stated heretofore by others in this discussion, until now they amount to over $3,000,000,000.

Now, just a word, Mr. President.

The Senator has referred to the seamen's act, and he has pointed out many things that that act takes care of; and with many of his suggestions in regard to that act I am in hearty accord. For many years prior to the passage of that act I was strongly in favor of legislation to free the seaman from practical slavery, and I welcomed that act for this purpose if for no other. There may be some things in that act that ought to be changed. I do not say that there are not; but I think the people who are interested in shipbuilding and in the future of shipping in this country should realize the fact that that act is not going to be repealed, at least until it is actually demonstrated that it is not only a detriment to the building up of an American merchant marine, but that it will absolutely prevent the building up of such an American merchant marine. In all of our plans for building up and maintaining a great American merchant marine that fact must be taken into account and must be a part of the basis for all legislation to accomplish what we all so much desire.

There are two great elements interested in this proposition. One is the great labor element of the country and the other is the capital or business element of the country. I should like to see these two great interests get together, through representatives, face to face, and talk over the situation, each one trying to take into account the viewpoint and the interests of the other, both of them taking into account the higher interest of the United States in building up a great American merchant marine, and see if they can not unite upon a common ground and a common basis for maintaining and building up the American merchant marine.

If there are things in the seamen's act that will absolutely prevent the American flag from being upon the sea it ought not to be difficult for labor and capital to get together and remove such a detriment. If there are conditions that labor will insist upon and must have and that capital can concede, it ought not to be difficult for them to get together upon a common basis in that regard.

I hope something of this kind will be done. I do not believe we will ever get results until it is done. What I fear is that substantially the same controversies that prevented us before this war began from enacting legislation under which the American flag would fly over ships upon the seas will, now that the war has ended, when peace is formally declared, prevent our giving the encouragement that I think must be given in order to keep our flag upon the seas.

We are going to come out of this war with a large tonnage. Is it going to fly the American flag or will it, under restrictions that our people can not bear, be driven off the sea or driven to other flags? I hope not.

I think this is one of the most important problems that confronts the American people to-day. We ought to have our own transportation upon the sea, or at least our great share of it. Ships ought to be sailing the seas flying the American flag, under conditions prescribed by American law, framed upon the principles of justice, liberty, and humanity, and I hope it will be done; but unless we do see to it that the conditions under which our ships sail are substantially the conditions of our competitors our ships will be driven off the sea. Their conditions must be brought up to ours or else we must provide in some way to take care of the difference.

Let us see if we can not do it. I hope we can bring their conditions up to ours, but I see the tremendous difficulties in the way of that. But if we can not do it, then I want to say that I am willing that we should take governmental action in some way to make up the difference, whatever it may be; and I hope we can consider this question free from politics, free from partisanship, looking only to the welfare and glory of our country. I hope that labor and capital will look upon it in that way; and if that is done, in my judgment we will pass whatever legislation is necessary not only to build up the American merchant marine—or, in other words, to keep upon the sea the American merchant marine that we will have when this war ends—but also to build it up to the point where it ought to be.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if it does not seem reasonable to him that with our present facilities, with ample yards located on both coasts, the Gulf, and the Great Lakes, and with the raw material right here in our own country, we ought to be able to compete with any country in the building of ships?

It is true that our labor charge may be a little higher, but we have contended heretofore, and I think very reasonably, that the increased efficiency of American labor makes up for the added cost. Does it not seem reasonable that we ought to build ships just as cheaply in this country as they can be built anywhere? If that is true, then we eliminate any difference in the cost of construction.

Now, with reference to the matter of operating, if we can equalize the labor cost—and that of itself covers but a small difference in cost—if we do that, ought we not to be on practically an equality with other countries? If, for instance, the cost of operating under the British flag was higher than it was under the American flag, the shipowners of England might have operated under some other flag; but her people were patriotic enough to fly the British flag even though it did cost them a little more to operate British ships than they would have paid under some other flag.

I think we ought to appeal a little to the patriotism of our American shipowners. Even if the cost of operating is a little bit higher—it can not be very much higher—they ought to be willing, as a matter of patriotism, to keep their ships registered under the American flag.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator has assumed a great many things that I might agree with him upon; but he has assumed some things that I do not admit to be true; but if his assumptions are correct we probably will not have very much difficulty. I do think that we have the great opportunity now to put ourselves upon the sea where we ought to be. I think we have now the very opportunity that was presented to England during the Civil War. She took advantage of it; and the question is, Will we take advantage of it now? We have the shipyards; we have the ship labor. Our people are looking to the sea. They are looking to shipbuilding. They will extend their activities along this line with anything like an equal chance.

This thing is certain to my mind, that England and France, especially, are going to do everything in their power not only to maintain the position they have upon the sea but to strengthen that position, and these Governments are going to give every assistance they possibly can and that they deem to be necessary not only to keep their ships upon the sea but to increase them. Now, assuming all other conditions to be equal, if they grant governmental aid and assistance to private enterprise we will have to do the same thing or else we will be driven off the sea. We will have to do it in some form or other. It is all very well to appeal to the patriotism of our laboring people; it is all very well to appeal to the patriotism of our capitalists; but business is not carried on in the commercial world very greatly upon the basis of patriotism. It is carried on upon business lines; it is carried on with the most intense competition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And for profit.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And, as the Senator from Georgia suggests, it is carried on for profit, and that is the great incentive, and we can not get around it. If the profit ceases, the business will soon die.

I think that the American capitalist and laborer, with practically equal conditions, can compete with any people on the face of the earth. But if you find the great commercial countries of the world coordinating governmental power with individual initiative and effort, then, Mr. President, our individuals can not stand up before it unless they also have help in some form or other. I do not now suggest what form that shall be; but they can not stand up against it unless they have, in some form or other, the aid and assistance of this Government. Are we ready, are we willing, to give that aid rather than forego the ships that we so much need in peace and that are imperative in war. We hope for lasting peace, but war may come. It should not find us without ships, as this war did.

What I want to suggest is simply that when we get all the facts, when we get all the conditions and find out with what we are confronted, we meet the problem without partisanship, without striving for party advantage, but, working simply as patriotic citizens, do what we believe to be for the welfare and good of our country.

Mr. JONES of Washington subsequently said: Mr. President, in connection with my remarks a while ago I desire to ask permission to have printed as part thereof a couple of paragraphs with reference to the emergency shipping fund—that is, the portion of it that I have marked. It is not very long and will give most of the part of that act I have not already read relating to that subject in a concrete form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Compliance with all orders issued hereunder shall be obligatory on any person to whom such order is given, and such order shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts placed with such person. If any person owning any ship, charter, or material, or owning, leasing, or operating any plant equipped for the building or production of ships or material shall refuse or fail to comply therewith or to give to the United States such preference in the execution of such order, or shall refuse to build, supply, furnish, or manufacture the kind, quantities, or qualities of the ships or material so ordered, at such reasonable price as shall be determined by the President, the President may take immediate possession of any ship, charter, material, or plant of such person, or any part thereof without taking possession of the entire plant, and may use the same at such times and in such manner as he may consider necessary or expedient.

Whenever the United States shall cancel, modify, suspend, or requisition any contract, make use of, assume, occupy, requisition, acquire, or take over any plant or part thereof, or any ship, charter, or material in accordance with the provisions hereof, it shall make just compensation therefor, to be determined by the President; and if the amount thereof, so determined by the President, is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in his opening remarks the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] called attention to certain newspaper publications recently going over the country which charged that large Government activities have taken place in the Southern States, and the claim has been made that these activities were due to the influence of representatives from that section.

These publications have been unkind and unjust. They have been utterly devoid of truth, both so far as they indicated the extent of the activities and so far as they in any way suggested selections due to influence rather than desirability of location for the Government activities.

In point of fact, the activities in the Southern States have in no way measured up to the opportunities that the Government had, and the real blunder has been the failure to use opportunities in those sections and avail of the advantages which are there found. Really, the fear of such publications, and such publications themselves have, I think, intimidated representatives of the present administration and deterred them from using opportunities, to the injury of that section and to the loss of the Nation.

About three-fourths of our eastern water front stretches from the mouth of the Potomac to the Rio Grande. Nearly one-half of the entire water front of this Nation is found between those two places. For shipbuilding nothing north of it was comparable with that south of the Potomac. I had occasion to request a study of one of the harbors in the Southeast as a shipbuilding point. A new railroad stretches from it to the Birmingham coal and steel fields. At no point could steel and coal be laid down cheaper. Ample wood and lumber are to be had in that immediate section. There in 1857 our Government spent $150,000 to buy a thousand acres of land with 2 miles of water front, and it still owns this valuable tract.

Nearby an island was bought by our Government prior to that time for the lumber on it for shipbuilding purposes. This island, covered with timber, is still owned by the Government. A mile front was available upon which to begin shipbuilding, without a dollar of expense required for preparation of the water front. Yet it was simply impossible to interest the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation with that opportunity for ship construction where, for the year around, there was a perfect climate for outdoor work. If they had gone there instead of to places which were selected farther north, we should not have had the story of only one ship finished after an enormous expenditure of money preparing a water front. They could have finished and begun sailing vessels from that harbor in six months. I believe it was prejudice that prevented the use of this harbor, or the fear of publications along the line referred to by the Senator from Florida. Complaint is made that the "South is in the saddle," yet not a man from three-fourths of our eastern water front, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, was given a place upon the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation, nor was a man from this entire section given a place of prominence with either.

An effort has been made to create the impression that many offices were given to the South by the present administration. My State fared in this respect better under President Taft than it has under President Wilson.

Mr. KING. The same claim is made by some other Democratic States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A Supreme Court judge was selected by President Taft from Georgia, and also an Interstate Commerce Commissioner was selected by President Taft from Georgia. They died and their places went, I think, to Massachusetts. There has been nothing more inexcusable than the stories circulated throughout the country that the southeastern section was getting any advantage out of this administration. I desire to repeat that my State fared better under President Taft than it has under President Wilson so far as offices are concerned, and as to the location of enterprises the country has been the loser by neglect to use desirable locations in the Southeast.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Georgia visited a number of the departments of the Government during the war, which were engaged in providing ships, munitions, and so forth, he would have observed upon the walls maps of the United States and little red circles to indicate the places where the great manufacturing plants and other great governmental activities were being erected and carried on; and he would have seen, if he observed, that practically all, at least 90 per cent, of those governmental activities were within five or six States in the northeastern part of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And there was no excuse for not utilizing the splendid harbors of the south and southeast with their all-year season for outdoor work. It is true that the majority of the camps must necessarily have gone south of the Potomac, otherwise all-the-year training could not have been given unless they had gone upon the Pacific slope.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that it is possible on the coast of Oregon, Washington, and California to get all-year outdoor exercise.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for one moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely desire to observe the concentration of these activities at the few points which the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has mentioned resulted in terrific congestion; so that the report from the Department of Justice with reference to Hog Island shows that the railroads were loaded with cars which could not be moved, and that the cars were jammed all the way from Norfolk to Hog Island.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator is correct in stating that in Washington, Oregon, and California on the Pacific coast labor can work all the year around without diminution. That is one of the great elements that led to the shipyards of Seattle, for instance, making a record not only in the construction of wooden ships but in the construction of steel ships, notwithstanding the fact that the steel had to come from the East.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in the city of Brunswick, to which I have referred, there is a great harbor. Years ago our Government bought there an island, with 2 miles of water front, with a view to development of a great naval plant. Within 25 miles of that place the Government owns a large island, bought avowedly at the time on account of the lumber upon it that could be used in shipbuilding. To this city there is a new railroad, which runs nearly in a straight line to the Birmingham coal and iron fields, a road not crowded with business, but with ample facilities for the transportation of steel and coal not through a congested territory but through an unoccupied territory, a railroad not used to anything like its full capacity on account of the fact that it has only recently been constructed, and the territory along it has not been developed. It was built with a view of transporting steel and coal from middle Alabama to the coast.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, before the Senator got fairly away from the question of the greater eligibility of the southern sites on account of climatic conditions, I wanted to ask him if he could give me any estimate of what the difference in temperature is between the north and south banks of the Ohio River between Indiana and Kentucky?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator is waiting for an answer, as he lives nearer to that section than I do, I would prefer that he answer his own question.

Mr. NEW. The Senator has answered it in his own mind, and I think that the people of the two States have also formed some sort of an estimate of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was speaking of shipbuilding and the advantage of taking a location where the work could continue the year around.

Mr. NEW. I rose to make my inquiry at the point where the Senator had made reference to the greater eligibility of the Southern States for the location of cantonments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was not referring to Kentucky; I was referring more particularly to the States considerably farther south.

Mr. President, passing from that subject, I wish to call attention to an editorial in the Washington Post of this morning, entitled "The Nation Supreme"; and I desire to ask that it be printed in the RECORD. It is such an excellent discussion of the subject, and so full of suggestion, I think it ought to have wide circulation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

THE NATION SUPREME.

Bolshevists who are honest in their belief are in favor of a world community or internationalism which shall be paramount to all nations. They do not specifically demand a superleague of nations, but they should favor such a league, as it is a step toward the universal proletarianism which they fondly believe would cure human ills. The Bolsheviki are against nations as at present constituted, and the advocates of a sovereign league of nations are also dissatisfied with nations as at present constituted. Both Bolsheviki and proleaguers are trying to find a method of forcing nations to obey a will higher than the sovereign will of each State.

Is that what Americans want?

Diligent inquiry has failed to disclose any action or utterance by the American people or upon their authority which would permit anyone to assume that Americans are dissatisfied with their Government and are trying to find a plan which will evolve a universal sovereign superior to the United States and capable of compelling the United States to obey its will within a certain sphere.

Inquiry fails to reveal any growth of Bolshevism in the United States which could be regarded as anything more than a neighborhood outburst of mingled folly and sedition. There is no national movement toward Bolshevism. On the contrary, wherever the people's will could be ascertained on a respectable scale, there has been manifested a readiness to attack and destroy Bolshevism and an equal impatience with any scheme which would impair the sovereignty and independence of the United States.

No "internationalism" is wanted by the American people, so far as their will can be ascertained except the mutual and voluntary association of free nations temporarily acting together for the protection of liberty and civilization.

Whenever any proposal is made to create an international tribunal which would have jurisdiction over the Monroe doctrine, the American people kick and will not have it.

Whenever Socialists and Bolshevists propose to substitute an international system for the United States Government, the police are usually required to protect the utterers of such doctrines. It is noticeable that soldiers and sailors returned from the war zone are the first to attack the would-be destroyers of the Government.

Whenever the concrete suggestion is made that there should be a "world police force," with power to compel the United States to desist from any course which it might desire to take in defending its rights, its independence, or its honor, there is an immediate protest from Maine to California.

Efforts have been made to commit the United States to the principle of a league of nations empowered to enforce peace, and these efforts have failed. It is evident that the Senate will not approve of such a project, even in principle. The country will not agree to any project which requires the United States to surrender any of its sovereign will or freedom of action.

But, say the advocates of a league of nations, the States of this Union yielded certain sovereign powers for the sake of creating a strong general government, and they are all benefited by the arrangement. Why should not the nations combine in one union, as the States did?

The answer is that the people of the States were one homogeneous people, held together by common origin, language, experience, and danger. They were the antithesis of the heterogenous peoples of the world's nations, who are separated by differences of race, color, origin, language, experience, and environment. The Americans joined together because they had common interests. The nations can not join together in the United States of the World because they have conflicting and irreconcilable interests.

If the present war has not taught mankind that there are cleavages between certain peoples which never can be welded together, it has taught them nothing. Gloss the subject as you will, with all the eloquence and idealism that the mind can conceive, and the fact remains that the people of the United States are firmly resolved to hold their destiny in their own hands. They will not admit any other nation or people to a partnership in deciding the questions that affect the honor and existence of their country. The Nation, under the Almighty, is to them the ark of safety and the last resort in time of trouble.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish also to call attention to the fact that in the statement attributed to the President on last Sunday he declared that the force which the league of nations should use would be a moral force. If he is correctly quoted, it would seem that the character of a league of nations which he is advocating is one the moral force of which should be used to preserve peace. The President in an address on receiving a doctor's degree bestowed by the University of Paris said:

My conception of the league of nations is just this: That it shall operate as the organized moral force throughout the world, and that whenever or wherever wrong and aggression are planned or contemplated, this searching light of conscience will be turned upon them, and men everywhere will ask, What are the purposes you hold in your hearts against the fortunes of the world?

To that doctrine I think all of us may give the warmest of support; surely we may go that far, although we may not be willing to surrender any of the sovereignty of our country to a new constitutional government embracing the nations of the worl that would have the right to dictate for us governmental policies. I can not believe for a moment that the President has advocated or would advocate any such extreme plan for a league of nations. I think his views are far more in line with those found in the Post editorial.

In presenting this editorial it is in no way meant as a criticism upon what is taking place in Paris and in England, but to commend there as well as everywhere else a rational view of cooperation by at least the nations who are now acting as allies, that they may plan to preserve universal peace through moral force, without undertaking to establish any international tribunal in the shape of a constitutional form of government, court, or police to interfere with the governmental power of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has just submitted a most interesting address concerning our merchant marine. While all may not agree with his statements and conclusions, there can be no difference of opinion as to the importance of the subject which he has considered. I have not taken the floor for the purpose of submitting any extended observations upon this subject, but rather to express my regret that the Senator from Florida has not indicated what the Committee on Commerce, of which he is the chairman, intends to suggest with respect to the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the work in which it is now engaged. The practical close of the war compels, in my opinion, some immediate action upon the part of Congress with respect to the future operations of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. I feel sure that the American people will not be satisfied to permit these organizations to continue in peace times to carry out a program which was the product of war conditions. I think I express the views of many Senators when I say that a plan or program would be welcomed from the Commerce Committee which attempted to deal with the shipping interests of our country. It is not satisfactory to continue for an indefinite period in a laissez faire manner. The Senator from Florida has very clearly pointed out the necessity of a merchant marine. There can be no question but what our Nation has suffered for 50 years for a lack of shipping facilities. Prior to the Civil War 80 per cent or more of our foreign commerce was carried in American bottoms. Shortly before the outbreak of the present world war less than 20 per cent of American commerce was carried in American ships. The future prosperity of our country depends very largely upon our foreign commerce. The industry and genius of the people of this Republic will annually produce hundreds of millions of dollars of agricultural products and manufactured goods in excess of our domestic needs. To maintain suitable prices and to promote industrial peace and national prosperity we must secure adequate foreign markets for our surplus products. There is no more pressing problem for our consideration than that involved in the question of merchant marine. With the superior advantages which we possess by reason of the great quantity and variety of raw materials produced in the United States we can conquer the markets of the world. Our commercial interests must no longer be dependent upon foreign ships. An intolerable, as well as precarious, situation would result from such a condition. It is apparent, therefore, that we should address ourselves at the earliest possible moment to a question of such stupendous importance.

I express the hope that the Commerce Committee will submit a well-considered plan before this session is ended which will deal in a broad and rational manner with this entire question. There is much opposition now that peace has come to a continuation of the activities of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. There are many objections to a policy which commits the Government to the construction of a merchant marine and the operation of the ships after they have been built. While all concede the necessity of a merchant marine there is deep-seated opposition to the Government entering upon the task of building the ships and becoming a sea carrier of commerce. Of course, there are duties which the Government properly can perform connected directly or indirectly with our commercial prosperity; but, in my opinion, the majority of the American people will not approve of the policy of placing the instrumentalities of transportation of commerce in the hands of the Government. I know there is a school of thought that is now clamoring vociferously for governmental ownership and control, not only of our means of transportation but of many of the industries and activities which have engaged and properly engaged the attention of individuals. The bureaucratic, paternalistic, and socialistic schools are strongly in evidence to-day. They are urging the extension of the activities and duties and labors of the Federal Government into the domain of private endeavor. There is no task or no work which—in the view of some persons belonging to one or more of these schools—the Government ought not to perform. War breeds paternalism and a voracious, tyrannous, oppressive bureaucracy.

It requires great effort to throw off this incubus when war ceases. I sincerely hope that the Committee on Commerce will soon indicate that it does not approve of a plan which places the merchant marine in the hands of the Government as the sole owner and proprietor. A program should be worked out which will result in the construction of ships, such as our country needs, by private persons and not by the Government. I believe that with the superior advantages which our country enjoys over any other country in the world we could can build ships as cheap here as they can be constructed in any other nation. This, of course, can not be done if they are built by the Government.

Judge Hughes in a recent address referred to the inefficiency of governmental service. An investigation of enterprises conducted by the Government during the war, as well as in times of peace, conclusively demonstrates that governmental control makes for inefficiency, extravagance, and inexcusable waste. There is no question but what ships can and will be constructed by private concerns at a very much less cost than if constructed by the Government.

The construction and operation of railroads by the Government will be very much more costly than if constructed and operated by individuals or corporations. It is axiomatic that inefficiency and extravagance follow the entrance of the Government into business, industrial, and commercial undertakings. If the Government should construct and operate ships for commercial purposes, it is as certain as that the stars shine that the cost would be very much greater than if the ships were constructed and operated by private interests. And, of course, if the agency selected by the Government to build and operate ships did not have the Public Treasury from which to draw, its operations in building and controlling a merchant marine would soon lead it into bankruptcy. Congress should at the earliest possible moment agree upon some clean-cut, rational, and American program with respect to the great question of transportation, not only transportation upon sea but transportation upon land. The uncertainty as to the future policy of the Government concerning the railroad and shipping interests of our country can not result other than in serious consequences to the business interests, as well as the interests and welfare of all classes in our land. The American people are entitled to know what the policy of our country will be. Of course, the transition from war conditions to peace conditions can not be effectuated in an hour; and a reasonable time must be allowed for the purpose of evolving just and rational plans to deal with the great questions which are of such vital importance.

Personally I hope the President will convene Congress in extraordinary session soon after the adjournment in March. An extra session, in my opinion, is necessary in order to deal with the question of transportation, as well as other questions of transcendent importance to the American people.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KING. I yield to my friend.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator know whether or not the leaders on his side of the Chamber have determined that there shall be no extra session?

Mr. KING. Answering the Senator, I will say that I have not heard the subject discussed. I think there are some Senators upon this side of the Chamber who believe an extra session of Congress is necessary. I am not one of those who believe that Senators upon the other side, if an extra session of Congress shall be convened, will approach the consideration of these questions in a purely partisan manner. I think that the Republicans are just as patriotic as we are, and are just as anxious to reach a just and proper solution of these pressing problems as are the Senators upon this side of the Chamber. These questions are too big, as was very properly said by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] for partisan purposes; and I should be glad if we could meet together in special session and in a patriotic and genuinely American way work out the tremendous problems that are now pressing for solution.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I only want to say that I fully concur in the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Utah; but it has been my understanding that there would be an effort made, at any rate, to prevent an extra session of Congress. I feel quite sure that the Republicans do not desire an extra session of Congress for partisan purposes; but, so far as there has been an expression of the Senate on this side, it has been that there should be an extra session for the express purpose stated by the Senator from Utah, to take up and consider the great overwhelming problems that confront us. It is almost impossible that we shall legislate on the railroad question, the telegraph and telephone question, the cable question, the shipping question, and all of the other momentous problems within the next two months, with all of the great appropriation and supply bills to pass. It is a physical impossibility, because these questions alone would occupy the attention of Congress for many, many months before it could correctly solve the great problems that of necessity confront and perplex us. Therefore it is very refreshing to me to hear the Senator from Utah proclaim that he is in favor of an extra session of Congress, and that many of his associates and colleagues on that side share in his opinion.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. While we are trying to get information upon this matter of an extra session, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Indiana if he has heard anything said on that side of the Chamber about preventing the passage of some of the principal appropriation bills so as to force an extra session of Congress?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I presume my friend asks me that question in good faith.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I certainly do.

Mr. WATSON. And I shall answer it in the same way. I have heard no intimation from any Senator on this side relating to that or any kindred subject.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am very glad to hear that report from the Senator from Indiana. I hope and trust that his information is general among the Members of the Senate on that side of the Chamber. I have heard some rumors to the contrary.

Mr. WATSON. I have heard nothing of the kind from this side—not even a rumor—and I do not believe that anybody has taken that sort of position.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONFERENCE.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, if possible, and if not on Monday then on Thursday next, I shall make some remarks on the approaching peace conference.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if no other Senator desires to occupy the floor, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 30, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 27, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, our Heavenly Father, we lift up our hearts in gratitude and praise to Thee, that the terrible war, which has brought desolation, sorrow, and grief to thousands of homes throughout the world, is comparatively over; that the work of reconstruction is in progress; and we pray that the great men of the world may lend their light, strength, and good purposes to establish a permanent peace that shall purify, sanctify, glorify mankind; that Thy kingdom may indeed come and Thy will be done in earth as in heaven, in the name of Him who lives and reigns in the hearts of all good men. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, December 24, 1918, was read and approved.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE DAVIDSON.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, February 16, 1919, be set aside for addresses on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. JAMES H. DAVIDSON, late a Member of Congress from the State of Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that Sunday, February 16, 1919, be set aside for memorial services on the life, character, and public services of the late Representative JAMES H. DAVIDSON. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RECESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that it will be about 15 minutes before the Senate sends over the revenue bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly, at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m., the House stood in recess until 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, at 12.30 o'clock p. m. the House resumed its session.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5213. An act to amend the act approved April 18, 1918, to give indemnity for damages caused by American forces abroad; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 5102. An act to authorize the change of name of the steamer Charlotte Graveract Breitung to T. K. Maher; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 15 (calendar day, December 23), 1918.

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, and asks a conference with the House of Representatives on the said bill and amendments thereto.

Ordered, That Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 5213) to amend the act approved April 18, 1918, to give indemnity for damages caused by American forces abroad, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

THE LATE SENATOR STONE AND THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MEEKER.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, February 2, 1919, be set aside for memorial addresses on the life, character, and public services of the late Senator WILLIAM JOEL STONE, of Missouri, and the late Representative JACOB EDWIN MEEKER, of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that Sunday, February 2, 1919, be set aside for memorializing the late Senator STONE and the late Representative MEEKER, both from the State of Missouri. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the appropriate number of bills be printed of the revenue bill, H. R. 12863.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the revenue bill, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the Senate resolution also read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, and asks a conference with the House of Representatives on the said bill and amendments thereto.

Ordered, That Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina—and I shall not object of course to the printing of the proper number of bills—it is usual where the Senate adds amendments to a House bill to ask concurrence of the House in the Senate amendments? I notice they do not do that in this instance.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. By this resolution will the Senate retain possession of the papers?

Mr. MANN. No; this is merely a Senate resolution. They have not asked the House to concur in the Senate amendments. I suppose that will not prevent our concurring in them if we desire.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Peculiarly enough, upon revenue bills it has seemed to be the custom, beginning with the Dingley Act, for the Senate immediately to pass a resolution insisting upon its amendments and appointing its conferees first.

Mr. MANN. They have not done that in this instance, have they?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the Senate resolution.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Senate resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The resolution does say that they insist upon their amendments.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is a rather strange practice, but it is the practice on revenue bills, though I do not like it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12863, the revenue bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. MADDEN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MADDEN. To ask the gentleman from North Carolina to postpone his request just made until next Monday, for the purpose of giving opportunity to those who have not yet read the bill as amended to examine it. A great many Members are anxious to read the bill before it goes to conference, and I am one of those Members.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I think that that is a fair request, and I shall postpone it until Monday next.

The SPEAKER. What about the printing request? The gentleman started in to make a request some time ago about printing.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is to have the bill printed with Senate amendments numbered.

The SPEAKER. How many copies?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just the usual number, about 600 I believe it is. I would say to the House that under the rules of the House the Committee on Ways and Means can print about a thousand, and under the rules of the House the House can print about 600. If the 600 are not sufficient for the Members, our committee will furnish the balance.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. BARNHART. There is nothing in the rules of the House preventing it having $250 worth printed. The number of the documents would depend upon the size.

Mr. KITCHIN. I was under the impression it was 500.

Mr. BARNHART. You can have $250 worth printed.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. As I read the last report of the Senate, I saw it had in it that Senator LA FOLLETTE had offered an amendment that incorporated all the other amendments as a substitute for the bill. Is that the way the bill comes over, or do the amendments come over separate?

Mr. MANN. There are 602 separate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill be printed with the Senate amendments numbered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, December 30, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting urgent estimate of appropriation required by the Office of the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1616); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Department of Commerce, submitting estimate of appropriation required for certain light stations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920 (H. Doc. No. 1617); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for additional employees for the fiscal year 1920, being an increase over the amount asked in the Book of Estimates for 1920, page 88 (H. Doc. No. 1618); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting urgent estimate of appropriations required by the Treasury Department, office of chief clerk and superintendent, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1619); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation for repairing damages to the lower Yellowstone reclamation project, Montana (H. Doc. No. 1620); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WHITE of Maine: A bill (H. R. 13546) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. JAMES: A bill (H. R. 13547) granting a gratuity to members of the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DENT: A bill (H. R. 13548) to authorize the resumption of voluntary enlistments in the Regular Army, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JAMES: A bill (H. R. 13549) granting a gratuity to members of the United States Navy and Marine Corps; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 13550) providing a rate of duty on wool sufficient to stabilize the prices of wool purchased or on which a price has been fixed by the United States; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 30, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee at the close of another year of our Lord, a year whose sad and tragic history has been written in blood; a year expressed in sorrow and in tears, in the anguish of the hearts of millions, in the starvation of many, and yet a year whose closing hours show forth the triumph of righteousness and the unity of purpose in the world to secure the blessings of peace and the domination of the ideals of the Gospel of Thy Son.

We Thank Thee for these victories that have come; and now, as we address ourselves, at the beginning of a new year, to the yet more difficult tasks of peace and pursue those lines of action and life that are laid out by our Lord, we pray that we may be guided by the spirit of the Christ, that in the coming year peace may settle, with its gentle and blessed benediction, upon all mankind. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on motion of Mr. SHEPPARD and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

He also presented a petition of Local Division No. 5, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Cambridge, Mass., praying for the freedom of Ireland, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 5249) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to grant an honorable discharge to drafted and enlisted men for certain reasons, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 5250) to donate a captured German gun to the cities of Salt Lake City, Ogden, Provo, Logan, and Manti, in the State of Utah; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 5251) tendering the thanks of Congress to Gen. John J. Pershing, United States Army, and the officers and men under his command; and to Maj. Gen. Enoch H. Crowder, Provost Marshal General, and the members of the local and district boards throughout the United States, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 5252) granting a pension to John Daley; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 5253) granting an increase of pension to Milton W. Burnham (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 5254) granting a pension to Nellie McPhearson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 205) permitting the loan of aircraft motors and aircraft material to educational institutions under certain conditions; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I introduce a bill which has reference to the packing houses, being similar to a bill which has been introduced in the House. I introduce the bill by request, because witnesses are to be here for the House hearings, and they desire also to have the opportunity, while here, of participating in the Senate hearings. I suppose the bill will have to be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, although I shall ask later that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The bill (S. 5248) to provide transportation, storage, and marketing facilities for, and to regulate commerce among the States in, live stock, meats, and other products derived from live stock or the slaughtering of live stock, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

Mr. BORAH. I introduce a bill for reference.

The bill (S. 5247) to repeal section 19 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," passed and approved October 6, 1917, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a letter which is signed by what is called the American Honor Roll Co. I have before me the original letter and also the envelope in which this letter was addressed to the parties. The envelope is from The Adjutant General's office of the War Department sent under the franking privilege of that department. I do not assume, Mr. President, that The Adjutant General's office is responsible for this matter. I take it that some one has taken advantage of the situation and is using privileges which the War Department in all probability has no knowledge of. This letter advises the next of kin of a wounded soldier, after commenting on the great victory of our soldiers and the sacrifices they have made, that if they will send in a dollar they will place the wounded soldier's name upon the honor roll and send him a fine certificate. It looks on the face of it like a petty larceny scheme for getting a dollar out of somebody whose kin have been wounded in this war. I introduce it for the purpose of calling it to the attention of the War Department, and that others who may receive such letters may be advised. I desire that those in charge of this letter will keep the original letter and the original envelope in order that The Adjutant General's office may know precisely how this matter is being carried on.

THANKS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 204) extending to members of local and district boards, Government appeal agents, and members of medical and legal advisory boards the thanks of Congress for their services rendered in the administration of the selective-service law; also authorizing the President to appoint by brevet commissions the members of such local and district boards; also authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to cause to be struck and presented to each of such officials in the name of Congress an appropriate medal, was read the first time by its title, second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the thanks of Congress be, and is hereby, extended to all the members of local and district boards, Government appeal agents, the members of medical and legal advisory boards, for their loyal and devoted services, rendered without military preferment or proportionate pecuniary reward, in the administration of the selective-service law; and as a further expression of appreciation and gratitude for the able and efficient manner in which such services were performed, and in recognition of their achievements, the greatest of our Government, in the raising of our Army, and of their invaluable contribution to the successful prosecution of the present war, the President of the United States of America be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint by brevet to the Army of the United States of America the members of all the local and district boards, who as such members of said boards performed services in connection with the administration of the selective-service law, issuing commissions of the rank of captain by brevet to the chairmen of all such boards and the rank of first lieutenant by brevet to all other members of such boards; and that the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be struck and presented to each of such officials in the name of Congress an appropriate medal, with suitable emblematical devices and inscriptions to be determined by him; and that to enable the President and the Secretary of War to carry this resolution into effect a sufficient sum of money, not to exceed $500,000, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

AMENDMENT TO DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for the purchase of parcel 81/8, fronting on Columbia Road, Lanier Place, and Harvard Street, for a playground site, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SHIP CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SMOOT. A few days ago the Senate ordered printed what is known as Senate Document No. 315, relative to contracts for ship construction, but there are certain illustrations in the report, and I ask for the adoption of an order providing for the printing of the illustrations.

There being no objection, the order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the illustrations accompanying the communication from the acting chairman of the United States Shipping Board, transmitting, in response to a Senate resolution of November 21, 1918, information relative to existing contracts for ship construction, the cost of such construction, in both private and Government shipyards, be printed as a part of Senate Document No. 315.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS.

Mr. SMOOT. On December 3 the annual report of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics was submitted to the Senate, together with a number of illustrations, but the Senate failed to enter an order that these illustrations be printed as a part of the report. I ask that an order be made that these illustrations be printed with the report.

There being no objection, the order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the illustrations accompanying the annual report of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, as submitted to the Senate December 3, 1918, be printed as a part of Senate Document No. 307.

AFFAIRS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have received very many letters and telegrams from people in Michigan in relation to the status of the American soldiers who are now in Russia. This subject has been presented to the Senate several times, but I wish to read one telegram which I received this morning and which will be a preface to what I desire to say. The telegram is directed to me, and it reads as follows:

Deplorable conditions among American troops in Russia have been brought to our attention by several wounded soldiers just returned. There are 1,000 Michigan soldiers of the 339th Infantry Regiment with allied forces near Archangel, and one soldier reports 100 died of influenza because of lack of treatment. Many wounded die because of privations. Boys fight on empty stomachs and sleep in swamps and snow, outnumbered 15 to 1, and are in danger of extermination unless reinforced. Get us information and advise us as to desirability and possibility of reinforcing them or withdrawing them at once. Immediate action necessary, as troops will be trapped by ice in less than two weeks.

This telegram is signed by the Michigan War Preparedness Board, Col. Roy C. Vandercook, secretary. It is similar to hundreds which I have received.

I have received letters from soldiers at Archangel, Russia, in which they have verified the statements which are made in this telegram. I have submitted the matter to the Secretary of War on several occasions for information, but thus far have got no satisfaction. This morning, however, I was able—I think from a reliable source—to learn something about the situation. The officer with whom I talked told me that these Michigan troops were sent to Russia, together with troops from Italy, France, and England, under charge of a British officer. They were sent there with the understanding that they were to protect Archangel against a then impending or threatened invasion by the German fleet. Of course, that danger has passed; and now this officer informs me that these men are to remain in Russia for an indefinite period; how long nobody seems to know. However, it seems that it will depend entirely upon the President, who, this officer tells me, has that matter in charge; and it can not be decided until after the peace conference terminates, which no doubt lies some distance in the future. It appears from the talk with my informant that the President believes he is authorized as a peace delegate to settle Russian affairs. I submit that was not the idea of Congress or of the people. Certainly not that of the American boys who were sent into Europe to fight Germany. The people should know what the President is going to authorize a British general to do with these soldiers after the war against Germany has ended.

This officer does not know of any way to grant relief, although he thinks that these troops are properly cared for, and that these stories have been exaggerated somewhat; that these men went there with winter clothing; that he can not speak for the food situation now, as that is entirely in control of Great Britain. The British commanding officer looks after that, and his word is law so far as these men are concerned.

The thing that interests me, and the thing that interests the people of Michigan and the people elsewhere throughout the United States, is why those soldiers are there and what is this indefinite speculative problem which has yet to be solved at the peace table by the President of the United States? This officer himself knows nothing about it. He realizes that it is a serious situation, but he is helpless at this stage of the proceedings to grant any relief or any comfort to the people at home.

The wounded soldiers who are returning from Russia corroborate all of these sad reports, and many letters have been received from them to that effect.

I make this statement, Mr. President, because I am receiving literally hundreds of telegrams and letters from the thousands of parents and friends in Michigan of these soldiers who feel that their loved ones are in that God-forsaken country and are practically lost so far as the United States is concerned. We know little, if anything, about it. I have urged as best I could that this matter be given special consideration and attention, and the only answer I receive is, "It is out of our hands." It now rests with the allied forces in Europe, and what the outcome will be will depend entirely upon the attitude of the President; and I think the country ought to know it. Some day the truth may be known. I trust it will not be too late to bring some comfort to the thousands of aching hearts which are agonizing over the doubt and uncertainty surrounding their loved ones who enlisted for a clear and definite purpose but are now being held for the President only knows what.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, may I add just a word to what has been said by the Senator from Michigan? Since I addressed the Senate recently upon our policy in Russia I have been overwhelmed with letters upon that subject. So many have come to me that I have had to respond with a form letter, for it has been utterly impossible for any one individual to go through the mass. Some of these letters have been put aside, and I shall read them to the Senate in a few days in order that it may be in possession of the heartaches and the anguish of many of the American people over this situation and over their lack of knowledge of their loved ones, who, without a declaration of war, are at present waging war in Russia.

I wish, however, to call to the attention of the Foreign Relations Committee, before which now is pending the resolution of inquiry—respectful inquiry only—that I introduced recently upon this matter, the fact that in response to an insistent popular inquiry in England, the foreign office in England through Lord Milner has told to the people of England what Britain is doing in this regard. I wish to call to their attention, too, that yesterday M. Pichon, the Minister of Foreign Affairs in France, told the French people what the French Government is doing. Now, it matters not whether the facts stated by either may be in accord with our views, it matters not whether the facts stated by either shall be in accord with what is actually transpiring or what has happened, at least England and France have replied to their people. The only Government on the face of the earth that does not take into its confidence its people is the present Government of the United States.

MAIL TO EXPEDITIONARY FORCES.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Postmaster General on the subject of some remarks I made in the Senate the other day relative to the post-office service to the enlisted men in the field and to the service of mail from them to the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 24, 1918.

Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HITCHCOCK: An examination of the RECORD of December 23 discloses that you inserted therein part of my communication to you of December 21, replying to criticisms of the postal establishment in connection with mail deliveries to our Expeditionary Forces in France. I note that complete acquittal is given the Post Office Department for any responsibility for failure of mail deliveries in France since June 30 last, for which I beg to make my acknowledgments.

In the course of the discussion the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], for whom I have great respect, asked a very pertinent question, to wit: "By what authority does the Post Office Department avoid the responsibility, which rests upon it, of transmitting the mail and taking care of it?"

The reply to this question called for that part of my communication which was not read to the Senate, which, in my opinion, discloses the exact reason why the Post Office Department insisted that the military authorities should at once [May] take over the delivery of the mails to our soldiers in France and conclusively shows that the responsibility for failure to make prompt mail deliveries did not rest with the Post Office Department officials or agents.

In the same connection the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who is always just and fair, made a brief statement, reciting conditions in connection with mail deliveries during the Civil War and put his finger on the crux of this controversy when he said: "Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, I beg leave to say that during the Civil War our experience was this: The Post Office Department would send the mail to the different camps or to different organizations. After it reached there the mail would be distributed by the officers of the different corps or regiments. After the mail has reached France, manifestly, it seems to me, that the men connected with the Army were the proper ones to distribute it. Our Army was in motion; it was not like distributing mail here in the city of Washington, where every man's house is numbered. The Army was moving rapidly from place to place, from camp to camp. They were here one day and at another place another day. Hence, from the necessities of the case, it was proper for the War Department to distribute the mail after it got to France. That is exactly the method which was pursued during the Civil War."

You very justly have said, "There can be no question now that the failure (since July 30) is due to the failure of the War Department," but you also said, "So from the 30th of June on the Post Office Department is not actually responsible for the failure to deliver mail, but prior to that time it was responsible."

Now, as to whether this opinion is founded upon fact, I will be content for each Senator to decide for himself if the other part of my former communication is brought to their attention, which I again submit as follows:

"Since January 1, 1918, the Post Office Department has delivered to the headquarters of the various military units in France a total of 30,167,698 letters and 11,622,282 newspapers and parcels, making a total of 41,789,980 pieces of mail in the first six months of this year. This is an average of nearly 7,000,000 pieces of mail per month. The Post Office Department completed the delivery of this mail to the military representatives in the field and in the cities of France on an average of better than 30 days' time from the average date of postmarking to the delivery to the mail orderlies. Any complaints here or abroad that mail deliveries to our soldiers in France and to their friends and relatives in this country 'are wretchedly inadequate' or that much of the mail fails to reach its destination are utterly without foundation so far as the Post Office Service is concerned.

"After the mail was delivered by the postal authorities to the mail orderlies, usually at division headquarters, it passed out of the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department, and the postal authorities had neither control nor knowledge as to its subsequent movements into the hands of the individual soldiers. This report, therefore, deals only with the movement of the mail from the time of its postmarking in the United States to the day of its delivery in bulk to the accredited representatives of the military forces in France.

"An investigation directed by the Post Office Department developed statements from 31 superintendents of postal stations and 50 officers of the United States Army who were directly or indirectly concerned in mail delivery, showing that 55 of these 81 officials gave an average of from 15 to 30 days for the passage of a letter from date of postmarking to its delivery to the Army mail authorities. Eleven reported an average of from 31 to 35 days, 12 reported an average of from 5 to 6 weeks, and 3 scattered reports range from 6 to 8 weeks.

"There was no delay in the movement of the mail from the points of origin to the port of embarkation, all mail being worked to companies and other units usually days before a passenger ship or transport was available for its movement to France. Irregularities of sailing of vessels occasionally held mail at the port from a few days to two weeks. Lack of railway facilities abroad occasionally delayed mail at the ports in France, as well as in transit between the ports and the interior points of delivery. Inability to obtain Army trucks for moving the mail from the railheads to the postal stations at the front occasionally contributed to delay, and, again, the firm attitude taken by the highest American military authorities in France, that changes in location of troops could not be promptly furnished to a civilian postal organization, occasionally caused delays of from one to two weeks. Very frequently dispatches of mail from the United States would not meet any of the delays above cited; many dispatches would meet with a few minor delays; but occasionally there would be large consignments that would feel the cumulative effect of all or a greater portion of the delays which might befall mail in transit. But as an average the time from the date of postmarking to the delivery to the unit headquarters was considerably better than 30 days."

A large part of the complaints about the mail service to the troops since January 1 arose out of the unfortunate attempt on the part of the War Department to parallel the work of the Post Office Department in the handling of Christmas parcels for the soldiers, whereas the Christmas packages handled by the Post Office Department, being parcel post to the extent of 90 carloads delivered on or before the morning of the 25th of December, 1917, and 4 carloads from a transport belated by storm delivered on December 27, 1917; the Christmas boxes which the Army undertook to deliver through its lines of communication were not all delivered as late as the month of March, 1918. The blame for this state of affairs was laid by the senders and the recipients of these delayed articles at the door of the Post Office Department, whereas the sole responsibility for the delivery of same from the port of embarkation in this country to the man at the front lay with the Army.

Every complaint received about delivery of mail to a soldier in France, or from such a soldier, has been given individual attention. Each complaint was sent to the postal agent, who took it up immediately with the commanding officer of the company to which the soldier concerned belonged. In a majority of cases the soldier promptly replied, though in some instances no responses were obtained. As a result of this procedure, thousands of reports are on file in the Post Office Department, either from the soldier about whose mail complaint was made or from the military commander of his unit, showing that the service was satisfactory. These files are too voluminous to include in this report, but they are open to anyone interested in the mail service to the troops abroad as it was conducted by the Post Office Department.

The following typical communications are some of the very large number of replies received from the soldiers:

MAY 10, 1918.

Hon. OTTO PRAEGER,
Post Office Department, Washington:

I wish to thank you for your energy in facilitating the delivery of mail to soldiers and officers in France.

On March 20, 1918, my father, Mr. Edwin A. Munger, called on you in regard to this matter, and you forwarded his letter with request to the postal authorities in France to make a special effort.

On May 10 I received the letter. I wish to express my appreciation of the excellent work which the postal authorities are doing under the difficult conditions over there. We are here to fight a war and not to write letters and any mail at all is greatly appreciated.

Yours, very truly,

R. Y. MUNGER,
First lieutenant, Three hundred and seventh Infantry.

Mr. JOHN CLARK,

France, May 16, 1918.

To United States Postal Agent, Paris, France:

The delay in the delivery and transmission of this soldier's mail was due to his being transferred to several different organizations upon his arrival in France, thus causing his mail to be forwarded from one place to another until he was permanently located in some company. Since coming to this organization his mail has been arriving promptly and is delivered without delay.

To the United States Postal Agent, Paris, France:

My mail has been coming as regularly as possible under the circumstances. I have no complaint to make. Delivery of last first-class mail received within 20 days of posting in Appleton, Wis.

To: Postal agent, Paris.

Mail has been coming more regularly recently; this complaint was made by my father without my knowledge before the squadron was located, hence the delay in delivery of mail at the beginning and at the time this complaint was made; neither did he understand the conditions under which you are working.

HEADQUARTERS SEVENTEENTH AERO SQUADRON,
SIGNAL CORPS, AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES, May 8, 1918.

To: Postal agent, United States Army Postal Service, American Expeditionary Forces.

1. I am surprised to learn that there has been complaints of delay in regard to mail for this squadron. So far as I am aware, it has been received as regularly and promptly as war conditions permit. There has been delay in the cases of a very few of the enlisted men who have been taken to hospitals at some distance from their stations and whose mail was held awaiting their return, which was expected within such a short time that it was doubtful if they would receive the letters if forwarded—in most instances where there has been any considerable delay it has been due to the length of time required for the men to make the journey back to the squadron. This office has been holding mail for Pvt. William H. Reed, concerning whom a notification dated February 19, 1918, that he had embarked for France from England to rejoin the squadron, was received. He has not yet reported and it was only recently that word was received that he was at Air Service Replacement Concentration Barracks, American Expeditionary Forces, to which address his mail has been forwarded.

2. Of the 31 officers and cadets belonging to this squadron, upon its arrival in England in January, 27 were left there on detached service, but for some time their mail was received here, and had to be forwarded to them, occasioning a certain amount of delay.

3. The four flights of this squadron are attached to different units of the Royal Air Force, but the mail for the whole squadron had been received at these headquarters, where it has been sorted and forwarded as promptly as possible. This would cause delay of a few days or possibly longer under certain circumstances, but could not well be avoided, as it would be ridiculous to expect the postal authorities to distribute mail to members of the squadron according to the flights to which they belonged.

4. In the case of Pvt. Meek, I am informed that his mail was forwarded to him at the hospital at which he was left in England and was returned with the information that he had left to rejoin the squadron. He reported on April 28 and his mail had been delivered to him.

Subject: Delay in the delivery of mail.

1. The matter referred to in your letter stating that Pvt. Frank B. Stevens, of this company, had not received mail regularly was investigated personally by me. I find that the mail referred to was held back while passing through the organization from which he was transferred and that it was only at the time of his transfer that the delay occurred.

He is now receiving his mail in good time and as regularly as anyone else in the organization, and I feel sure that there will be no more trouble from that source.

First Lieutenant and Adjutant.

STATISTICAL SECTION, DEPOT DIVISION,
FIRST CORPS, May 22, 1918.

To: United States Army Postal Service, office of postal agent, station 702.

Returned with the information that soldier has been questioned and states that his mail is coming regularly at the present time and the reason that he has not received his mail heretofore was due to the many changes in stations. Mail for men connected with this department has been received regularly.

HEADQUARTERS COMPANY E, TENTH ENGINEERS (FORESTRY), AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES, May 20, 1918.

To: Postal agent, United States Army, Paris, France.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt this morning of copy of letter from France, dated April 2, regarding looking up forwarding of mail to my boy, who has been changing around some.

He is now First Lieut. George F. A. Mulcahy, C. A. C., U. S. A., A. P. O. 710, American Expeditionary Forces, via New York, and I am delighted that he is making good for our own dear old Uncle Sam.

Notwithstanding the picayunish, pettifogging meddling of the powers that "would be," including ——— ——— from my dear old Bay State, you all are doing wonderfully well, and I trust I am expressing the convictions of several million of us common people in thinking so.

Thanking you for your kind attention and regretting I have to trouble you, I am,

Very truly, yours,

GEO. J. MULCAHY,
Superintendent R. S. Howard Co.,
68 Thirty-fifth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

In a letter addressed to me by Maj. Gen. Pershing on the mail service in France, the commanding general of the American forces writes:

"Mr. R. L. Maddox, United States Postal Service, inaugurated the United States Army postal service in France last June and has conducted it very satisfactorily ever since. I take pleasure in commending him to you accordingly."

Secretary Baker, on the occasion of his recent visit to the Army in France, wrote John Clark, United States postal agent in Paris, as follows:

"I have read with very great interest the papers which you left with me at Chaumont and now have a much better appreciation of the difficulties which you have been facing than I had gotten from any other source. Quite frankly, it seems to me that both you and the military have approached the problem in an admirable spirit, and while, of course, there have been difficulties and complaints, I think in justice both to the post office and Military Establishment it is fair to say that you have cooperated intelligently and harmoniously and that the difficulties have perhaps been inescapable during the early days of organization and movement."

This response to the Senate resolution deals with the mail service to June 30, 1918, since which date the Army is conducting the transportation and delivery of the mail to the soldiers. This became inevitable in the interest of safety to the Army. Those charged with responsibility for the conduct of the war in France contended that military necessity required keeping secret the movement and new location of troops; also that it is not advisable to permit this information to pass into the possession of a civilian organization, which is the status of our postal establishment in France. The delay to the delivery of mail to large military units caused thereby sometimes involved from one to five carloads of letters, papers, and parcels, and ranged from several days to two weeks in time. All other obstacles to an expeditious delivery of mail to a large force of men under field conditions could be overcome by reasonable cooperation between the postal and military authorities, but this obstacle was fundamental. Under the circumstances the Post Office Department reluctantly asked the War Department either to change its point of view and furnish promptly to the postal authorities information as to the location of troops, so that the mail might more speedily follow the men as they moved, or to take over the entire movement and delivery of the mail in France. The military authorities adhered firmly to their original conclusion, that they could not with safety disclose to a civilian postal organization new locations or movement of troops. Although disagreeing with the military authorities as to the correctness of their position, the Post Office Department accepted their judgment on this purely military matter. After careful study of the subject, and as a result of conference with the military authorities, a satisfactory rearrangement of the service was reached. According to this agreement the Army assumes responsibility for the soldiers' mail from the time of its delivery to the military authorities at a port of embarkation in the United States until its final delivery into the hands of the individual soldier at the front, and the Post Office Department assumes responsibility for the mail from the soldiers from the time of its receipt by the postal authorities at the French seaport until its delivery into the hands of the addressees in the United States.

Mail for the American Expeditionary Forces is distributed to regiments and companies at two large Army postal stations, one in Chicago and one in New York. No congestion is permitted to occur at either station. All the mail for the soldiers is promptly separated and pouched for dispatch. At New York the mail is delivered in lead-sealed sacks to the military authorities, who, I am informed, dispatch it to the extent that space is available on every military vessel or commercial liner that will most expeditiously convey it direct to France. Upon its arrival at a port in France the mail is dispatched and delivered to the soldiers entirely by the military authorities.

Mail from the American Expeditionary Forces to the United States is delivered by the military authorities into the custody of the postal officials at two French seaports, where it is distributed direct to the cities between the sailing of the vessels for the United States. Arriving in New York, the residue, or unworked portion of the mail, is worked on the trains to its final distribution. In this manner the mail is being given the most expeditious treatment humanly possible with the ocean and railway facilities available under the stress of a world's war.

In conclusion, I desire to express the hope that under the new conditions and facilities, which the Army contended could not be extended to a civilian postal organization, the mail will be expedited to the soldiers, because I realize the importance of the prompt dispatch of mail matter to men in the field; but I will say frankly that my knowledge of postal affairs gives rise to grave doubts whether this new arrangement will result in complete satisfaction.

Having read this recitation of the facts based upon truth, how can any honest, unbiased mind reach the conclusion that postal officials were in any wise derelict or neglectful in the discharge of this important and responsible duty during the period of the war prior to June 30, as well as after that date?

In this connection I now desire to direct attention to another condition which is certain to prove a fruitful source of complaint and criticism, and that, too, in the near future. The failure to deliver mail to our troops in France before the various units are broken up for replacement with other units and before their return to this country necessarily will occasion great confusion. Already carloads of this undelivered mail are being turned back to the postal authorities for return to the senders. This situation, as I have said, will create widespread criticism, which the public, for lack of information as to the real facts, will direct against the postal authorities instead of placing the responsibility where it properly belongs. This in due time will, of course, be pressed on the attention of individual Members of Congress.

My attention has also been directed to certain observations submitted by you with reference to the taking over of the marine cables, wherein you said:

"I think the seizure of the cables was an utterly unjustified proceeding. I go so far as to say that it smacks of bad faith. Congress consented to give certain war powers to the President. Among those war powers were, if there was a war necessity, that he could take the telegraphs and the telephones, and when he took, in the name of the Postmaster General, the telegraphs and telephones there was no general complaint, because we were in the midst of war and there may have been a justification for the seizure; but when, after the war had closed in fact if not in law, the Postmaster General took possession of the cables, not only those crossing the Atlantic Ocean to countries with which we were associated in the war but also across the Pacific Ocean, which had no possible relation to the case, I think it was a high-handed outrage, and am frank to say so. * * * I think, furthermore, that it smacked of bad faith. Congress deliberately put the power into the hands of the administration for war purposes; but after the war is over it has been used to gratify the personal convictions, personal opinions, and personal wishes of the Postmaster General.

"If he had desired to secure from Congress the right to take over the cables, he should have asked for it. I think there is no justification at all in any reason that has been stated or which can be stated for that seizure."

Of course, my dear Senator, no one understands better than you that a public official is not called upon to notice the monthings of irresponsible blatherskites who may criticize or misrepresent his official actions, but when a critical statement is made by a Senator of the United States, and especially by one for whom I have always entertained high regard and respect, it not only justifies but calls for response.

Of course it is not true that I have of my own will ruthlessly seized and taken possession of these cables. Of course it is not true that I have taken possession of them just to gratify my personal convictions, personal opinions, and personal wishes. Of course it is not true that I have reached out to control business activities the Congress did not intend to put into my hands. I feel that a reply to all such charges can be conclusively made by quotations from a motion to dismiss filed by the representative of the law department of the Government made by direction of the Attorney General of the United States to a silly suit recently instituted (for publicity purposes) in a court known to be without jurisdiction against the Postmaster General, in which these unfounded charges are set forth. I quote certain pertinent paragraphs from this motion:

"First. The possession taken through the Postmaster General and the defendant Carlton of the complainant's property on the allegations of the bill of complaint as amended has been taken by the President, in the exercise of his executive discretion, pursuant to a resolution passed by the Congress in the exercise of its discretion, as possession by the United States and not by the defendants as individuals, and the possession and rights involved are exclusively those of the United States and of the President in the exercise of his executive duties as such, and the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York has no jurisdiction to entertain this bill as amended, to which neither the United States nor the President is or can be a party."

"Fifth. The Congress has authorized the President to take over the complainant's cables, and the President in his discretion has exercised judgment that the taking over of such cables is necessary for the national security and defense, and this judgment is conclusive, and the proclamation of the President that it is deemed necessary for the national security and defense to take these cables is conclusive to negative the allegations of the bill of complainant to the contrary, and these allegations should be stricken out and dismissed from the bill as manifestly unfounded and impertinent."

"Eleventh. The allegation 'that the seizure of said cables on the ground that they were or are necessary for the national security and defense was and is a mere pretext without substance or basis of fact whatsoever' is an allegation of the complainant's opinion, immaterial in view of the judgment of the President and the action taken by him, and if intended as an allegation of bad faith on the part of the President is insufficient and should be stricken out and dismissed from the bill as insufficient, impertinent, and scandalous."

"Thirteenth. The allegation of the bill of complaint that the complainant is not provided with just compensation for the taking over complained of is manifestly unfounded in that Congress has in the resolution alleged expressly provided that the complainant shall receive just compensation and has provided for the executive and judicial determination thereof with recourse to the courts in the normal and reasonable manner for the ascertainment of compensation in the case of takings by the United States, and this court has judicial notice that Congress uniformly appropriates moneys for the payment of all judgments rendered by the Court of Claims, and the allegations that the right of application to that court is an illusory right and that there is no reasonable expectation of the timely payment of such a judgment are allegations that the United States and the Congress will exercise bad faith, whereas this court has judicial notice that the United States and the Congress are incapable of bad faith, and the allegations of the bill of complaint to the contrary are manifestly unfounded and should be stricken out and dismissed from the bill as impertinent and scandalous."

"Third. The war existing on July 16, 1918, still continues and there has been no proclamation of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace, and of these facts the court should take judicial notice to negative the allegation of the bill of complaint that the war ceased on November 11, 1918, and this allegation should be stricken out and dismissed from the bill as manifestly unfounded and impertinent."

"Fourth. The proclamation by and under which the possession alleged was taken was signed by the President on November 2, 1918, and the proclamation by the President that it was done on November 2, signed by the President and attested by the Secretary of State, is conclusive that it was done on that day, and this court should take judicial notice that it was signed on November 2, 1918, to negative the allegation of the bill or complaint that it was not signed until after November 11, 1918, and this allegation should be stricken out and dismissed from the bill as manifestly unfounded and impertinent."

"Eighteenth. The allegations concerning the landings of the complainant's cables on territories of foreign nations and the complications likely to arise from the action of the Government are insufficient to state any cause of action or any part of a cause of action and have no relation to the validity of the possession taken from the complainant, or to the relief sought in the bill of complaint, and said allegations should be stricken out and dismissed from the bill as insufficient and impertinent."

Every intelligent lawyer in America knows that these allegations are not only founded upon truth, but that they are supported by well-established principles of law which have been long recognized and are no longer questioned by lawyers or judges who make any pretensions of a knowledge of the law as it is. I believe you want to be fair and am sure you would not consciously do me or the postal establishment an injustice. It is in this spirit I am writing you and on your sense of justice I rely for bringing these facts just as they are to the attention of your fellow Senators.

Sincerely, yours, A. S. BURLESON.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I made the request because the Postmaster General complains that I did not insert the full copy of what he sent me the other day, consisting of some printed matter, and, in order to be entirely just to him, I ask to have this letter printed in the RECORD. I will say that the additional matter consists of statistics showing the quantity of mail matter delivered in bulk to the military authorities during the time that the Post Office Department undertook to transport it across the ocean. It also consists of a number of certificates or statements from lieutenants and other officers in France complimenting the Post Office Department by the statement that the mail had been promptly delivered—as promptly delivered as the circumstances of war would permit. With relation to those, I wish to say that these few complimentary statements that the mail was promptly delivered remind me very much of the defense offered by the Irishman in court. After two witnesses had been introduced to testify that they saw him kill a certain individual he introduced five witnesses who testified that they did not see him kill the individual. [Laughter.]

I have no doubt some of the mail was promptly delivered in France; but the statement of a few officers to the effect that their particular units received the mail promptly is really no defense at all, in view of the widespread and universal complaint of the nondelivery of mail.

Mr. President, the Postmaster General concludes his letter by an attempt to reply to my criticism of the seizure of the cables after the war was over. His defense consists of a quotation from the brief of the Attorney General, which, however good it may be in law as to the jurisdiction of the court, is no answer whatever to the statement that these cables were seized on the pretense that they were taken over under the war power, when as a matter of fact the war had ceased; and I do not think any intelligent person will support the Postmaster General in his claim that because the order for the seizure of the cables purports to be signed, and probably was signed, on the 2d of November, such signing at that time, on the 2d of November, was a justification for taking over the cables.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, I did not see the order; but I am informed that while the order may have been signed by the President on the 2d of November, it was entirely incomplete. It was not countersigned by the Secretary of State. It was never published or exhibited to anyone until after the war had closed and the armistice had been signed. Even the date when it was exhibited to one of the telegraph companies was blank, and the order was never made before the signing of the armistice. The law authorized the President to take over the cables and telegraph lines as a war necessity, and not a Senator on this floor or anywhere else dreamed that we were giving the Postmaster General power to force on this country Government ownership whether the people wanted it or not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What the Senator says adds force to what I am seeking to show here, but it is absolutely not necessary. Even if the order had been signed on the 2d of November and had been fully completed and countersigned, and even if it had been announced at that time, it would not have been good faith with the Congress of the United States; but, as a matter of fact, it was not announced then. It was suppressed, and the country knew nothing of it until the armistice had been signed and had gone into effect. I believe I am correct in that.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So I renew my statement, made here the other day, that when the Postmaster General took the very grave step of taking over these international cables under the pretense that it was necessary to take jurisdiction of them for war purposes he did something which was entirely outside of the authority the Congress intended to give; and many speeches made upon the floor of the Senate at the time that that great power was put in the hands of the Executive showed conclusively that it was only given under the great urgency and the tremendous necessity of fighting a war. To take those cables over after the fight has ceased and the war has come to an end is, in my opinion, very close to breaking faith with the Congress of the United States.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I have made some investigation with reference to the taking over of the cables, having had the honor to address the Senate on that proposition; and to the best of my knowledge and belief at this time, when that order was made the date was first put down in pencil as the 14th, the armistice having been signed on the 11th. Afterwards that date was erased and the 2d inserted.

I have every reason to believe that that fact is susceptible of proof. The object of it is quite apparent, without comment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I merely desire to say that the quotation from the Attorney General's brief may show conclusively that the Postmaster General has the power legally to take over the cables, and it may show, as he says in his statement, that the bringing of the suit was a silly thing and that the court has not any jurisdiction; but, admitting all that, it does not vindicate the Postmaster General from the charge I made, that in taking over the cables he practically violated good faith with the Congress which had given him the power.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads nor of the Military Affairs Committee, but, I must say, that when men are trying to do what they think is best and exercising their judgment I do not believe in the criticisms that are made against the executive officers of the Government.

The war is not over yet, as a matter of fact. There is no question but that the fact that a mere armistice exists does not conclude the war, and consequently the Postmaster General, no doubt, thought that the cables would be of great use, perhaps, in connection with the matters to be negotiated upon the signing of the peace treaty. It all is a part of the war matters.

At all events, I do not believe that men should be criticized here when they are doing what they think is best. There is nothing corrupt in this matter. There is nothing that in any manner would reflect upon a person's good intentions, and for that reason it does not seem to me that we ought to have criticisms continually of men connected with the Government with relation to these matters.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator has said something with relation to the letters that he has received, and illustrated it by the fact that one man said he had seen a shot fired, whereas five men said they had not seen the shot fired. The same logic can be used with relation to the number of letters in which complaints are made. I have not received 20 letters from people in my State with relation to this matter, and yet 30,000 of the men of Colorado have been enlisted in the Army of the United States. In the same manner a person could say that inasmuch as the 30,000 did not complain, therefore the mere 20 letters that I have received simply illustrate the case of one person out of probably a thousand or fifteen hundred people that are in the Army of the United States.

We can not look into these matters with fairness unless we know the circumstances attending each one. I know, as a matter of fact, that the sending of letters to the armies in France has been attended with the greatest difficulty, and it has been a wonder to me that many of them ever were received at all. When men move from one part of the line to another within perhaps two hours how is it possible to follow them up?

There is no question but that soldiers have been wounded and placed in hospitals, and there is no doubt but that there has been a lack of delivery of letters in those instances; but you must remember, as a matter of fact, that when that occurs it is almost impossible to find them. With a state of war existing everything is in such a condition that it is impossible to follow matters up. I have not any doubt but that there has been complaint, and I have been told that the English Government and the French Government both have had great difficulty in reaching their men, but perhaps not to the extent that has obtained with regard to ours, because our men were there only a short time, whereas the men of the English Army and the men of the French Army have been there for a long period of time and have had their points upon the firing line much more definitely settled and fixed than ours.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. Regarding the letters, I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if this is not true:

The Post Office Department has had this difficulty in delivering mail in Europe from the 30th of June of this year. I think justice ought to be done that department. The Army would not give the Post Office Department the location of the various units. They said that the civil department of the Government ought not to have the location of the units of the Army. Consequently, it was nearly impossible for the Post Office Department to deliver the mail, not knowing where the units of the Army were. As I understand, when that condition arose on the 30th of June, the understanding was that the mail should be delivered by the Post Office Department to the ports in France, and that the Army, which knew where the units were, should have the control of the mail after that time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is substantially correct, except that since the 30th of June the Post Office Department has delivered the mail to a terminal in New York City, and has received the mail at a terminal in Bordeaux.

Mr. SWANSON. Now they deliver the mail in New York, and the Army gets the mail delivered in France and brings it here; but up to the 30th of June, as I understand, the Post Office Department complained that they had tried and had been unable to get the location of the units in France in order to deliver the mail. As I understand, the War Department said it would not be wise, it would not be proper, they would not like to trust to all these individuals the location of these units, since if that were done Germany might learn where the units were. Then the department, as I understood, said it was impossible for them to deliver the mail, not knowing where the units were, and on account of that condition after the 30th of June this arrangement was made. Now, that is the reason.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is true, as stated by the Postmaster General.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, in all justice and fairness, how could the Post Office Department deliver mail when they did not know where the units were, when they were being changed all of the time?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The fact is that the service was very wretched prior to the 2d of June. The Post Office Department blamed the War Department, and the War Department said, "Let us take over the delivery of the mail." Since the 30th of June the Post Office Department can not be held responsible for the failure.

Mr. SWANSON. But up to that time—now, just be fair——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But since that time the complaint has been just as great as prior to that time. There has been no change.

Mr. SWANSON. But there is no complaint——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And in this communication of the Postmaster General, which I have not taken the time of the Senate to read, it is explained that much of the delay in the delivery of the mail has been due to the fact that men were taken to hospitals, and instead of sending their mail after them to the hospitals it was kept with their companies until they returned, so the poor devils lying on their beds in the hospitals sometimes for months at a time could not hear from their families at home. At the very time when the men should have had their mail they were deprived of it.

Mr. SWANSON. But in all fairness to the Post Office Department, when the Post Office Department did not know the location of the units, did not know whether they were in northern France or southern France or where they were, and the War Department, as I understand, would not tell them where the units were, I should like the Senator to explain how the Post Office Department could deliver the mail to people when they did not know where they were and they were being changed every day. As I understand, the Post Office Department was anxious to get the location of these units, so that the mail could be delivered promptly.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. With that condition I think the criticism of the Post Office Department is not called for, unless they could get the names of the units and where the men were.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, whom would the Senator hold responsible?

Mr. SWANSON. If the War Department thought it was unwise to give the location of the units, I could not hold them responsible. A great deal of this condition was due to the fact that these men were changing every day, every week, and every month, and therefore it was impossible for their mail to follow them. It was considered unwise to let anybody in the civil establishment know the location of these units, because if that were done the Germans would know at once the number of men opposed to them. It was a war condition.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. By way of an additional contribution to this little discussion, I will say that the explanation that the Senator from Virginia makes as to the delay certainly does not apply to cases of base hospitals, for instance, which were located shortly after the American troops went over there, and they have never been changed from that time to this; but their mail has been delivered with no more regularity, perhaps, than that of those units the location of which has been changed from time to time.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, how could the Post Office Department know that a man was in a hospital wounded until the name was furnished them and the unit?

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I am not referring at all to the men who were wounded and in hospitals. I am referring to the officers and the men who constituted the personnel of the base-hospital organization.

Mr. SWANSON. The Post Office Committee, of which I am a member, asked the representatives of the department about this matter and knew the difficulties of the situation. They realized that unless the Army could furnish the Post Office Department the location of the various units of the Army it was impossible to deliver the mail.

Mr. NEW. Exactly.

Mr. SWANSON. They tried to get it, and the War Department thought it was unwise to give it to them. I am not prepared to say whether it was wise or unwise, but they would not give it.

Mr. NEW. If the Senator will permit me, I do not think he gathers my point exactly. I mean this: As early as January, 1918, certain base hospitals were definitely located at points in France. That location has never been changed from that moment until the present day. The men who constituted their personnel originally are the same to-day as they were then, and yet their mail has been most irregularly and unsatisfactorily delivered on both sides—both the mail to them and the mail from them to the people on this side.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator suggest that all the mail should be sent to these base hospitals?

Mr. NEW. The mail intended for them certainly should be.

Mr. SWANSON. How would they know at home that they were in the hospital when the mail was directed?

Mr. NEW. The Senator still fails to catch the point I make. For instance, you were detailed as commanding officer of a certain base hospital, having with you a certain number of other officers and men to the number of 100 or more. Your location was fixed at a certain definite point.

Mr. SWANSON. I can understand why that class of people ought to have gotten their mail promptly; but that is a very small class of people. The entire Army was not made up of that kind of units.

Mr. NEW. No.

Mr. SWANSON. They were a very small class, and I have not heard any complaint from people in base hospitals.

Mr. NEW. I make the point that the statement that units were moved from one point to another does not hold good in cases of that kind, certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I rose simply to say that I do not think criticism should be made against officials relative to their acts when full information does not exist with relation to the surrounding circumstances. It is not fair to them, especially when we believe that every man connected with this Government has been anxious to give good service.

It is true complaints have been received that mail has not been promptly delivered to our soldiers; but how could it be to an army of two or three million men, the companies and regiments of which were continually being shifted from one post to another of a battle line extending over many miles?

As to the failure to receive allowances, upon investigation it was found in many instances that the parties had transferred the allowance to somebody else. All of these matters indicate that there ought not to be criticism of officers of the Government unless there are specific complaints and clear evidence of a willful neglect. Nobody is willfully neglecting anything in this Government.

Mr. President, we had a storm of indignation against the Secretary of the Navy at one time because, it was alleged, he was not doing things properly; but now I think everybody concedes that he has made the most wonderful record that has ever been made by any Secretary of the Navy since the establishment of the Government. The criticisms were improper; they were unfair; they were hasty and founded upon matters that did not take into consideration the viewpoint of the Secretary of the Navy.

Soon after that there was a storm of indignation against the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, that he was not doing anything; that he was neglecting everything; that he was absolutely inefficient. Secretary Baker is one of the most methodical, accurate, and industrious men in the public service, and it is now conceded that the record which has been made by the War Department of the United States in this great conflict has never been equaled by that of any country in the history of the world.

The European nations have been amazed at the efficiency and skill with which we have prosecuted the war. While we are being so greatly admired by disinterested peoples——

Mr. POINDEXTER rose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is it possible that we are now to criticize our officers who have done such wonderful work, especially upon matters the full circumstances of which are not known. War upsets everything. You can not have the same regularity in war as where ordinary conditions exist. Because of that fact, it seems to me that instead of criticism we ought to commend men unless we know that they have been guilty of willful neglect or that it is probable that their intent has been to give poor service.

The statement which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has made is illuminating upon this question. I have never before heard it, but I can readily see why the War Department would not want the employees of any other department to have the location of the various companies, regiments, and divisions of our troops on the firing line. I can readily see that the War Department did not believe that it was proper or wise to give to the employees of any other branch of the Government or any one not connected with the Army such information. It would be sure to leak out and reach the enemy and give to the Germans great military advantage. Of course, the Post Office Department could not deliver the mail to soldiers when their location was unknown to them. See how wrong it is to criticize officers when the surrounding circumstances are unknown.

Then, again, there was a crowding of tonnage on our ships. Everything was subservient to the getting to the place where the troops were located of munitions and other supplies as well as soldiers, which were deemed more important in the midst of conflict than even the letters of the soldiers. While letters are important in some respects, everyone must concede that they are not nearly so important as those things which were absolutely necessary in order to win the war.

Mr. President, I feel that when we have made such a wonderful success of the war, have gained such a great victory, a victory accomplished in less time than anybody expected, instead of criticism of the men who have been bending all their energies to do what is right, there should be praise and not criticism, unless the facts showing the justice of such criticism should be plainly established and show that the conduct of the officials amounts to willful neglect.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like very much to proceed with and finish my remarks. I have yielded for three-quarters of an hour, but if the Senator from Washington is only going to take a moment, I will yield to him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will not interrupt the Senator at this time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do wish that the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] had reserved his castigation of those who dare criticize until after I had made the few observations which I have in mind to make. They will be in the nature of suggestions, rather than in the way of criticism, but in view of the fact that the Senator has spoken of criticisms of the War Department in the past, and I having been one of those who dared indulge in such criticisms, I am rather disposed to believe that the Senator had some reference to my humble self, and undertakes now to frighten me from the path which I have mapped out for myself, assuming, perhaps, that I intend to do now what I did in the past, and that is, to criticize those in charge of the Military Establishment. But, Mr. President, I shall not be deterred from the discharge of a duty as I see it, whether there be timid souls or not, or courageous spirits, if you will, who feel that it is not proper for anybody connected with one branch of the Government to criticize those connected with another branch, or to make such suggestions as one may see fit to assist in the proper conduct of the war or in the adjustment of the affairs of the Government after peace has been declared.

The rôle of a critic, Mr. President, is never a pleasant one; but, in my opinion, no one can contribute so much to the welfare of this country as can the man who dares sometimes to criticize when there is a just foundation for such criticism. There is nothing that so compels a man who has a duty to perform, if there is the least disposition upon his part to do it carelessly or do it wrongly, as to turn the light upon his pathway, so that the observant public may see that his feet pursue the proper path, and that the duties which devolve upon him are properly performed.

Mr. President, conditions to-day, after the armistice has been signed, are not very unlike those which existed when Congress convened in December, 1917. When I say that I mean that when Congress convened in 1917 the Members thereof were overwhelmed with letters of complaint, and particularly was that true as to Members of the Military Affairs Committee and the chairman of that committee—from men of practical affairs all over the United States, and from good mothers who had sons either in France or on the way to France, or from wives whose husbands had gone over, calling attention to the fact that the industrial life of this Republic, so far as preparation for war was concerned, was not doing its duty under the inefficient direction of the War Department, whose duty it was to see to it that industries were so marshaled, were so coordinated, were so arranged, that those things which were necessary to the safe conduct of the war should be done and performed effectively. Complaints are coming to us now, Mr. President, not with regard to industrial life, but now that the war has been won, and our sons and brothers and all are coming back to us, armless and legless and eyeless, that America is unprepared to take care of them now, just as America was unprepared for more than a year to so conduct the war as to conserve life, to conserve energy, and to conserve the health of this Republic, as far as it was possible to do.

God only knows, Mr. President, how many lives have been uselessly sacrificed by our unprepared condition, even up to the time the armistice was signed. Acting upon complaints that were made to the Military Affairs Committee and to its members prior to the assembling of Congress in December, 1917, the committee began to investigate conditions in the War Department. It investigated the situation with reference to ordnance, munitions, and arms of all kinds; it investigated the Quartermaster's Department; it investigated aircraft production; it investigated every branch of the Military Establishment which had some duty to perform in connection with the war. While there was no formal report signed and presented by the committee to the Senate, except with reference to aircraft, yet the deliberations of the committee induced it to report at first a bill creating a director of munitions, as indicating the views of the committee as to what was necessary to coordinate the Ordnance Department so that the best results might be attained, and, next, further carrying out the views of the committee, a bill creating a war cabinet, not to interfere with the functions of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, but to still further centralize the power of this Government in some hands between the President of the United States and the fighting force, so that industrial life might be still further utilized and plans mapped out for the future conduct of the war.

The Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy on the 11th day of January, 1918, disapproved of the bill creating a director of munitions, and the unpleasant controversy which occurred at about that time between the President and myself is still remembered, I am sure, at least by the Members of the Senate. It got to be almost treason to dare to criticize anybody, except the Members of Congress, and it was looked upon generally as commendable to criticize them. It amounted almost to treason—aye, indeed, the suggestion of treason was leveled against some men, Members of Congress, too, who dared to criticize the conduct of those in public place. I myself, Mr. President, passed under the yoke for daring to express an opinion as to the War Department, but without a single regret; and if my criticism saved the life of one young man on the battle front of France I am willing, if need be, to yield my seat in the Senate of the United States to-day. But the bill creating a director of munitions was disapproved; it was bitterly resented that the charge had been made that the Military Establishment had fallen down; that it had almost quit functioning because of inefficiency in the departments of the Government.

But when the munitions director measure was disapproved by the President what happened? There was presented to the Senate as an administration measure a bill which in effect confessed inefficiency in the War Department, and went further than confessing inefficiency in the War Department, in that it confessed inefficiency in every department, and placed it in the power of the President to reorganize every executive department of the Government. If there was no inefficiency in the War Department, why reorganize it? Why grant this great power? If there was not inefficiency in any other of the departments, why grant power to change any of them? It was true, then, and we realize as we glance back over the past year that it was true, Mr. President, that there was inefficiency in many of these departments. The Senator who had the bill in charge stated more than once on the floor of the Senate that the power was needed because there was inefficiency in all departments and bureaus. I voted for the measure which the President sent to Congress giving him this great power, because, as the greater included the less, so this measure which he sent to us included in the main the measures which the Military Affairs Committee had reported to the Senate. The measure of the President was broader than either of the bills which the Military Affairs Committee presented and was broad enough to cover both or all or any other form of coordination that he desired to bring about by reorganization, and I approved of it. In order that I may not seem to have overstated the effect of the so-called Overman bill, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and so the Military Affairs Committee ousted of its jurisdiction over legislation of the kind, I will ask the Secretary to read the first few sections of that act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

An act authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces the President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act, and to this end is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem necessary, which regulations and orders shall be in writing and shall be filed with the head of the department affected and constitute a public record: Provided, That this act shall remain in force during the continuance of the present war and for six months after the termination of the war by the proclamation of the treaty of peace, or at such earlier time as the President may designate: Provided further, That the termination of this act shall not affect any act done or any right or obligation accruing or accrued pursuant to this act and during the time that this act is in force: Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

SEC. 2. That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized to utilize, coordinate, or consolidate any executive or administrative commissions, bureaus, agencies, offices, or officers now existing by law, to transfer any duties or powers from one existing department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer to another, to transfer the personnel thereof or any part of it either by detail or assignment, together with the whole or any part of the records and public property belonging thereto.

SEC. 3. That the President is further authorized to establish an executive agency which may exercise such jurisdiction and control over the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment as in his judgment may be advantageous; and, further, to transfer to such agency, for its use, all or any moneys heretofore appropriated for the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the mere fact that that bill was requested to be enacted into law was a confession that every department of the Government was inefficient. Under it reorganization after reorganization has taken place in the War Department, and possibly in some of the other departments, although I have not paid much attention to them; but reorganization after reorganization has taken place under that act, and under it many of the things which were necessary to be performed, as found by the Military Affairs Committee, for the successful prosecution of the war have been performed.

It may be asked, "Why refer to this? It is ancient history." Mr. President, I am referring to it in order to draw from the past, with regard to the prosecution of the war, a lesson for our guidance in the future in the protection of those who have suffered as a result of that war. Criticism has been resented all the time. It will be resented now. It will be resented most by those who deserve it most.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. GORE. I want to make a little statement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can not yield for that purpose. Does the Senator mean in reference to the pending matter?

Mr. GORE. Yes; in reference to the Senator's last remark.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection, if it will take but a moment.

Mr. GORE. Only a moment.

I wish to say that Camp Doniphan is situated 4 miles from the town where I live in Oklahoma—Lawton, Okla. One of the most tragic incidents referred to by the Senator a year ago occurred at Camp Doniphan, and conditions there, I suppose, were typical of what prevailed in other cantonments. I was informed soon afterwards by one of the leading citizens of my town that within 24 hours after the Senator's speech of criticism conditions began to improve at Camp Doniphan; that the improvement was immediately noticeable, and that conditions had been good, in shipshape; I think that is the expression that he used. I say this not merely in vindication of the Senator's course of criticism but in vindication generally of the importance of constructive criticism as one of the leading incentives to human progress and to human improvement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thank the Senator for calling attention to the conditions out there and the changes that took place for the better.

Mr. President, let us see what the Military Affairs Committee found to criticize in the Military Establishment, beginning with December, 1917; and I am not going into detail.

I merely called attention to the fact that there was a lack of ordnance matériel and great tardiness about furnishing small arms; that there was a lack in quartermaster's supplies, and not only that, but that the uniforms that were furnished to the soldiers were reduced in wool content so that they were almost absolutely unfitted for use in France, resulting in the purchase of such supplies on a very large scale in Great Britain by Gen. Pershing, and individuals in authority over there. A perfect vindication of that criticism is to be found in the fact that the wool content of the uniform was restored just as soon as Gen. Goethals took charge of the Quartermaster's Department. Instead of being shoddy, the uniform was made up in such a condition that an honest soldier fighting for his country could wear it with comfort and without shame, coming as he did from the richest country on the face of the globe; and that wool content has been maintained ever since the criticisms of the Military Affairs Committee, and God only knows what became of the junk that these men were formerly compelled to wear. The only good thing about it was that it would not last very long.

I called attention to the fact that there was great delay in aircraft production; that there was great waste of the people's money in useless experimenting; that although the war had been in progress then from April until December, 1917, and during January and February, 1918, while the committee was still investigating conditions, there were no airplanes overseas.

Those were the principal criticisms of the Military Affairs Committee. The details of these criticisms have been gone into before now, and I am not going to repeat them; and I want to say now, Mr. President, that I am saying nothing in malice, because personally I am very fond of the Secretary of War. I know nearly everybody here connected with the Military Establishment. Some of my warmest personal friends are there; but what I say is to assist in solving postwar problems with reference to those who are coming back to us.

As proof of the correctness of these charges, I call attention first to the fact that we passed the administration measure known as the Overman bill to give the power of reorganization and correction. Whatever was necessary to be done, Congress was willing and glad to give to the President and did give it to him. It gave him generously, promptly, and without criticism nearly everything he asked, as it ought to have done.

That is the first proof. The second is that just as soon as these matters had been brought to the attention of those in authority the inefficients went out. Usually they were promoted out from all the departments and bureaus in the Military Establishment into other fields of activity, whether for the benefit of the Government or not; but they were all placed in positions of innocuous desuetude, where they could not do any harm, if they could not do any good.

The third proof is that curative legislation was passed from time to time that would remedy defects that had been pointed out by the committee all down the line.

And the last proof, but not the least, is furnished by the man who above all others knows what conditions have been and were at the date of the signing of the armistice. We did not expect to get all the truth, or all the facts, if you please—to put it in a milder form—before the armistice was signed, but now that the lid has been lifted we are able to turn the light on and look into the dark places and get evidence from incontrovertible authorities, and we know for a fact that every charge that the Military Affairs Committee made was absolutely true.

How do we know it? Gen. Pershing, in his report to the Secretary of War on the 20th of November, 1918, says:

Our entry into the war found us with few of the auxiliaries necessary for its conduct in the modern sense. Among our most important deficiencies in material were artillery, aviation, and tanks. In order to meet our requirements as rapidly as possible we accepted the offer of the French Government to provide us with the necessary artillery equipment of seventy-fives, one-fifty-five millimeter howitzers, and one-fifty-five G. P. F. guns from their own factories for 30 divisions. The wisdom of this course is fully demonstrated by the fact that although we soon began the manufacture of these classes of guns at home, there were no guns of the calibers mentioned manufactured in America on our front at the date the armistice was signed. The only guns of these types produced at home thus far received in France are 109 seventy-five millimeter guns.

In aviation we were in the same situation, and here again the French Government came to our aid until our own aviation program should be under way. We obtained from the French the necessary planes for training our personnel, and they have provided us with a total of 2,676 pursuit, observation, and bombing planes. The first airplanes received from home arrived in May, and altogether we have received 1,379. The first American squadron completely equipped by American production, including airplanes, crossed the German lines on August 7, 1918. As to tanks, we were also compelled to rely upon the French. Here, however, we were less fortunate, for the reason that the French production could barely meet the requirements of their own armies.

It should be fully realized that the French Government has always taken a most liberal attitude and has been most anxious to give us every possible assistance in meeting our deficiencies in these as well as in other respects. Our dependence upon France for artillery, aviation, and tanks was, of course, due to the fact that our industries had not been exclusively devoted to military production. All credit is due our own manufacturers for their efforts to meet our requirements, as at the time the armistice was signed we were able to look forward to the early supply of practically all our necessities from our own factories.

A most generous suggestion upon the part of Gen. Pershing, after we had been in the war for 18 months, to be in such a position when the armistice was signed on the 11th of November, 1918, that we could look forward with some degree of pride and comfort to the prospect that we were likely to have "all our necessities from our own factories" in the near future!

The answer to all of this by those who resent criticism is: "But France was doing this for us." Why, Mr. President, the idea of America depending upon France for these things! The piece of ordnance that is looked upon the world over as the greatest piece of artillery in the world is the 75-millimeter gun, and here we found our Ordnance Department undertaking to improve the carriage and the gun itself and to make it better than France, when Germany had been trying for years to acquire the secret of the recoil mechanism of the French 75-millimeter gun, and no government on earth had ever gotten it except America. We finally abandoned our attempted improvement of the French 75-millimeter gun and went back to the French gun and began to get them in quantity; and when the armistice was signed, though none of American manufacture were at the front, there was some chance of our getting the 75-millimeter and these other guns that are mentioned in Gen. Pershing's report.

Now, notwithstanding the splendid generosity of Gen. Pershing in his report to the Secretary, once in a while something slips out in his report to show the condition in which our men found themselves. If there was one great battle in France where American boys made their names and their country immortal it was at St. Mihiel. Gen. Pershing, in his account of that battle, said this—and I am only going to read a paragraph from it:

The French—

Again, "the French." This was one of the first battles in which Gen. Pershing had gotten the American force together so as to have it purely and distinctively an American victory when it was won—

The French were generous—

Says Gen. Pershing—

In giving us assistance in corps and army artillery, with its personnel, and we were confident from the start of our superiority over the enemy in guns of all calibers. Our heavy guns were able to reach Metz and to interfere seriously with German rail movements.

Now, notice again:

The French Independent Air Force was placed under my command, which, together with the British bombing squadrons and our air forces, gave us the largest assembly of aviation that had ever been engaged in one operation on the western front.

In other words, these splendid divisions of ours, with all America and her wealth behind them, were dependent in this very great battle upon the French for the artillery and the personnel to man the artillery that went into this great fight! Splendid, heroic, patriotic France! And then, with the exaggerated stories by those in authority about sending over airplanes by the thousands and tens of thousands, we find that in that great battle, with America's "thousands and tens of thousands" of airplanes and Liberty motors, the independent French air service and the British bombing service were there to aid our own service in the observations which were absolutely necessary to conduct the artillery fire of our own troops and to watch the movements of the enemy.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I should ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Can the Senator tell me how many of the planes of which Gen. Pershing spoke in the report that was read were pursuit planes and combat planes? How many of those did we have when the war closed?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am going to call attention to that in just a few minutes.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now I am going to call attention to some testimony obtained and reported by the representative of the President himself—Hon. Charles E. Hughes, who was appointed by the President to investigate the aircraft situation; and in offering that testimony I presume I can not be charged with unfairness or misrepresentation with reference to facts. But first we have Gen. Pershing's own statement in his report that within three months and a half before the armistice was signed—that is, on the 7th day of August, 1918—the first American squadron, completely equipped by American production, including appliances, crossed the German lines; and yet we had been led to believe by the statements of many of those in authority, given sometimes officially and sometimes in extraofficial statements, that as far back as February 20, 1918, we were sending those airplanes over by the thousands.

A squadron consists of 18 planes. The first squadron of 18 American-made planes, then, went over the German lines on the 7th of August. We were assisted by the French again in this service; but even France, Great Britain, and America all combined could not get enough airplanes over there to do the work that was necessary to be done. If America had gotten to work and had done the things that were necessary to be done, we would have had the air just simply swarming with airplanes, and would much sooner have determined the war, and would have saved thousands and tens of thousands of American lives.

Now, Mr. President, to show my authority for this statement, you will remember that the Military Affairs Committee investigated the aircraft situation. I do not know why the idea got abroad that that committee was partisan. There were a number of Republicans on it, but the majority were Democrats. The majority could have watched and found out at any time when Republican advantage was attempted to be taken of a situation; but, Mr. President, so long as I was serving on that committee, from the 4th of December up through all of that investigation, I never saw a Republican at any time indicate a desire to take partisan advantage of what was transpiring. Every man was animated by the same desire, and that desire was to assist those in authority in preparing our country to win this war. Criticisms by all or by any of us were made in the utmost good faith and in order to help, not to hurt. But there seemed to grow out of the situation that feeling.

I have had Democrats upbraid me for indulging in criticism. Why, Mr. President, if the time ever comes when I can not put my finger on a rascal in my own party and improve my party, and if the time ever comes when I must not use my judgment and must not criticize because it may hurt my party, though it may help my country, then I want to get out of public life; but I shall, so long as I serve the people of my State, point out the things in this Government which I think are detrimental to my State and to the Nation. If it destroys my party, I am willing to destroy it if by so doing it will help to save the country.

So the criticisms of that committee were leveled not against the individual, but against conditions. The criticisms were constructive or were intended to be constructive. If they hurt anybody or hurt in any direction, it was simply because it was inevitable under the conditions that then existed.

Now, let us turn to the report of Judge Hughes. I want to be careful, for I was once charged with an unjustifiable distortion of the truth, and no higher motive could be found for my criticism of conditions than that I was in opposition to the policies of the administration: yet I think I can say without egotism—and I think the Senate will bear me out in saying it—that I have had as much to do with legislation that the administration wanted, particularly with legislation bearing upon the war, as has any other one man in the Senate, acting, of course, only as the representative of the Military Affairs Committee. So I could not have been opposed to any policies. Ah, Mr. President, that committee wanted to help the situation, and not to hurt it.

Now, notice this in Mr. Hughes's report. Right here, Mr. President, in view of the fact that I have never seen a copy of the Hughes report anywhere except in the Official United States

Bulletin of November 6, 1918, and in view of the fact that that report goes fully into the whole question of expenditures under this aircraft legislation and production, I am going to ask to have it printed as an appendix to my observations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report referred to will be found as Appendix A to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S speech.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, Judge Hughes says in one place in his report:

> In the face of the delays in production a series of misleading public statements were made with official authority. While these statements were authorized by the Secretary of War, he states that they were issued in reliance upon information furnished by the Chief Signal Officer, Gen. Squier, and by Col. Deeds, who were acquainted with the actual conditions. It is unnecessary to review the delusive predictions and exaggerations contained in these utterances.
> But particular attention should be directed to the official statement released for publication in the papers of February 21, 1918, which contained the following:
> Notice this, Senators—
> The first American-built battle planes are to-day en route to the front in France. This first shipment, though in itself not large, marks the final overcoming of many difficulties and in building up this new and intricate industry.

There was not any plane on the way to France at this time. Mr. Hughes continues:

> At the time this statement was issued (February 20) only one plane had been delivered for shipment to the American Expeditionary Forces, and while this had been shipped from the factory on February 5 it did not leave the United States until March 22. The only other service planes which had been delivered were five DeH–4s, which had been shipped for use at Gerstner Field, La. No additional shipments of airplanes for the use of our forces abroad were made until April 3. Actual production in quantity did not really begin until May.

It is but fair to say, in this connection, that Mr. Hughes finds that Mr. Baker made his statement on the strength of representations of Col. Deeds; and in view of the fact that I am asking to have the whole report printed as an appendix to my remarks, I shall not indulge in commenting on it any further than to say that the American people were led to believe that the sending of airplanes over to France was in quantities, when, as a matter of fact, if Gen. Pershing tells the truth, the first American squadron that went over the German front was on August 7, 1918.

The evidence before the Military Committee showed that these false statements did great harm in Europe. Our allies thought they could depend upon us for any number of planes, and so production fell off, while Germany, fearing the truth of these statements, stimulated production of planes. The result was inevitable at the battle front.

Now, with reference to training planes furnished by France. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] asked me about that. I really do not know how many we had, but I do know that Gen. Squier, while he was chief signal officer and in charge of aviation as well, sent a great many American boys over to France to be trained. I do not know how many—2,000 it may be. Those boys, or a large part of them, did not have any training. Many of them had to come back. And we were commissioning American boys here on this side and sending them over to outrank boys who had volunteered several months or a year before.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. NEW. In answer to the question put by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I will say that the only planes sent over by the United States Government were what are known as the D H–4, which is not a pursuit plane. No planes which are known as pursuit planes were sent by the United States Government at any time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to have the information which has been furnished me by the Senator from Indiana. I do know, however, that many of those boys were sent back, and later some steps had to be taken to correct the inequality of commissions, so that those who had volunteered and gone over there to be trained as aces should at least rank on an equality with those who went over from America very much later, and who had had training here, while their colleagues in France had not been trained at all. The morale of these young men had been practically destroyed. And I am going to call the attention of the Senate to just one case, which is measurably personal in its nature, but it illustrates the situation that existed there almost under Gen. Pershing's nose.

A few days before the registration for the last draft two splendid young fellows came into my office. They were dressed in lieutenant's uniforms, and they told me that they had just come from France. I do not mind mentioning their names. I do not usually mention names, because, as a rule, it leads to dire consequences to the poor fellow whose name is mentioned; but I will mention them. One of them was Lieut. Paul Conihe and the other was Lieut. John K. Ney, of the same name as the famous French marshal. These boys went over there as volunteers; they enlisted May 3, 1917, left New York for overseas duty October 26, 1917, and they came back here to America just before the registration for the last draft, discharged from the Army and their commissions revoked. They told me a story that reached my heart. They had been over there all these months to be trained, not for display, but to fight; but they did not get any fighting; they did not even get any training; they got tired of doing camp and police duty and asked for a transfer to the Artillery—one of these young fellows was ambitious and got into a French artillery school—they asked to be transferred to the Artillery or to the Infantry or to any place where, as red-blooded, splendid, well-educated Americans, they could "do their bit" for their country.

Now, what do you suppose was the answer to their petition? They were sent to one of the points of debarkation in France and in a few days ordered back to America, with their commissions revoked, and they were relegated to private life. When they appealed to me they said: "We have no unit to which we can go; we can not appeal, because there is no record. There was never any board of inquiry; there was never anything; we were just simply sent home by the personnel officer." I took up those cases with the Chief of Military Aeronautics, but I did not get anywhere with them. I then took them up with The Adjutant General, but made no progress there. In the meantime I advised them to register for the draft, which they did; and in the meantime, on the day that the draft took place over in the Senate Office Building, it happened that Gen. March was there, and I asked him as a favor to me, when he left the office, to come into my private office, as I wanted to talk to him about a case that seemed to me extremely unjust to two fine American boys. He came in and I told him the case. He said he would like to see them, and I took them down to see him the next morning. I told him if there was anything wrong about their records I would cease my efforts in their behalf, but that on the surface of things it all looked wrong to me.

One of them was over 6 feet high, a graduate of the University of Washington and an athlete of that institution. The other was from Iowa. Gen. March looked them over, asked them a few questions, and promised to take their cases up personally, which he did; and inside of four days he telephoned me that he found nothing wrong in the records of these boys and ordered their commissions restored, but transferred them to the Tank Corps.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator whether the revocation of their commissions, to which he has just referred, was done by the order of the commander of the Expeditionary Forces or by the Chief of Staff here?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it was done by their personnel officer.

That is just one instance, but must Senators be compelled to follow up each one of these cases in order to have justice done the young men? They would not have gotten anywhere, Senators, if it had not been that I was willing to take up their cases and help them out. And not only that, they had not been paid, and I loaned one of them money, which he promptly repaid, in order that he might send a telegram to his father.

The way to correct those things, Mr. President, is to get at the man who is guilty of the act of injustice; and in that case it was the personnel officer, who discharged these men without cause and without inquiry. There is an old French adage to the effect that whenever an individual gets into trouble, "Cherchez la femme." That might be transposed to "Search for the fellow who has been guilty of the injustice and punish him," and not put it up to Senators and Representatives in Congress or anybody else to take up the individual cases of young men. I might cite other cases, Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Has the Senator given the name of the officer who is responsible?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; but the department knows it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why not put that in the RECORD?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I only know it by hearsay, but I understand his name is Col. Bingham. I do not want to do an injustice; I simply give the name on hearsay. I did not pursue the inquiry as to him; I wanted to get these boys reinstated to the places they were entitled to hold, and they are in the service now, unless they have been recently discharged.

Mr. President, I will not discuss this matter that is behind us any further. I have done it because the good faith of members of the Military Affairs Committee has more than once been called in question—as splendid a body of men as I ever worked with, Republicans and Democrats. We differ sometimes, but you can only get good legislation by discussion and compromise. No man ever gets exactly what he wants. So that in these questions in the committee where there are differences of opinion you get the truth only because you discuss them.

Now, why all of this? To bring the attention of the Senate to the fact that the conditions which existed prior to December, 1917, so far as criticisms of the War Department are concerned, exist to-day, and for a little while I am going to address your attention to them.

There come over my desk every morning hundreds of letters from young men in the Army, from their mothers, from their wives, and from every class of people who are directly or indirectly connected with the Military Establishment. I know that you have to discount some individual complaints, and I do discount them, but there are exceptional cases which are proven beyond a peradventure of doubt. The exception usually proves the rule, and whenever you find one case where a great hardship has been worked against an individual in any particular place you can rest assured that the conditions are practically the same where the same opportunities are afforded for injustice.

I shall not indulge in harsh criticism of the department, but I want to prophesy that unless something is done to correct conditions now the men who are coming back from France are going to make themselves heard and are going to make themselves felt; and they ought to make themselves heard and felt. Let us see how many men we have had over there and how many men have been killed, wounded, and are missing. According to Gen. Pershing's report—

There are in Europe altogether, including a regiment and some sanitary units with the Italian Army and the organizations at Murmansk, also including those en route from the States, approximately 2,053,347 men, less our losses. Of this total there are in France 1,338,169 combatant troops. Forty divisions have arrived, of which the Infantry personnel of 10 have been used as replacements, leaving 30 divisions now in France organized into three armies of three corps each.

Taking the number of combatant troops given by Gen. Pershing and the casualties—the dead, wounded, and missing—and we find that 17 per cent of the combatant troops have been killed or wounded or are missing.

According to Mr. Baker there were casualties reported to October 23, as follows: 53,160 deaths, 179,625 wounded, 1,160 missing, 2,163 prisoners, making a total of 236,108.

Now, Mr. President, the wounded men are coming back to the United States. They are on the way back now, and we are pursuing the same dilatory policies with reference to getting ready to take care of them that we pursued during the war with reference to getting ready to fight. That is one of the criticisms that probably my good friend from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] will resent, but it is a criticism I make, and I charge it now. We are getting word from many hospitals and cantonments that the conditions for taking care of these young men are bad.

There are 179,000 of them, in round numbers. Where are the hospitals that they are going to put them in? Let me read into the RECORD on this subject a criticism of Representative JOHNSON of South Dakota, who has just returned. He was a lieutenant in the Army.

His statement was published in the St. Paul Pioneer Press of December 26, and is as follows:

REPRESENTATIVE JOHNSON SAYS WOUNDED WERE MISTREATED AT CAMP MERRITT.

WASHINGTON, December 21.

Investigation of the hospital service at Camp Merritt, N. J., was demanded of the War Department by Representative ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of South Dakota, formerly a first lieutenant in the Three hundred and thirteenth Infantry, immediately after he was discharged from the Army yesterday.

Representative JOHNSON said, on leaving to-day for his home at Aberdeen, that he will make formal complaint to the War Department when he returns from a short visit with his family.

NOTIFIED WOUNDED WERE COMING.

"Twenty or more of the officers and men who came over from France with me," Representative JOHNSON said, "were not fully recovered from their wounds. The captain of our ship, the Mani, notified the hospital authorities at Camp Merritt by wireless that these men would be sent there upon arrival in New York. They were put on a train at Jersey City on the day of our arrival and were given no nourishment until 10 p. m., although they reached Camp Merritt in a few hours.

"At Camp Merritt the sick men were placed in ordinary barracks. Those who were able to get about skirmished around for blankets and other bedclothing for themselves and the others.

"MEDICAL OFFICER AT FAULT.

"One of the medical officers was most at fault. He refused to credit the statement that some of the patients were officers and would not give orders for their proper care. These men were kept in barracks for two days before they were removed to the camp hospital. I have demanded an investigation and will file a formal complaint with the War Department upon my return from South Dakota."

Representative JOHNSON was wounded in battle himself, but had recovered and was not a victim of the mistreatment which he says was accorded some of the men.

Mr. President, of course, no Senator can vouch for these statements in the newspapers, but they are pretty accurate when quotation marks are used, and this statement of Representative JOHNSON purports to be a quotation.

The New York Times is a reputable paper, and I am going to ask to have read a little clipping from that paper printed on the 28th of December, having reference to the same subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Secretary read as follows:

THESE MEN SHOULD BE PAID.

In the single week ending with December 20 there were landed at the several Atlantic ports, chiefly at or near New York, 7,000 sick or wounded soldiers. These men have had the best of medical care, as they so well deserve; but from a large number of them there are coming complaints, often bitter, that their pay is far in arrears. This is a cruel hardship for the soldiers whose convalescence is considerably progressed, for they find themselves penniless at a time when lack of money is particularly trying.

The War Department has heard these complaints with a sympathetic ear, and it probably is doing what it can to remedy the evil. Its efforts, however, have not been very successful as yet, and the reasons it gives for the delay in paying these men, while fairly good explanations, are not adequate excuses. Of course, the task of keeping track of men frequently moved from hospital to hospital was great. Difficulties, however, are not insuperable because great, and it is not easy to believe that a pay system could not have been devised by which the money earned at such risks and sacrifices could not have been brought to those who needed it.

Some of the wounded have remained unpaid for as long as 10 months, and a delay of 4 months is almost the common rule. The discontent thus created has harmful effects that extend far beyond the men directly affected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. In that connection I have a copy of a memorandum of date December 28, issued by Brig. Gen. H. M. Lord, entitled "Memorandum for Mr. D. H. Allen, office of the Secretary of War." Would the Senator object to having the memorandum inserted in the RECORD at this time? It is upon this identical subject.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; I am glad to have both sides of the question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DECEMBER 28, 1918.

Memorandum for Mr. D. H. Allen, office of the Secretary of War.

MY DEAR MR. ALLEN: I am returning herewith letter from Mason Olcott, dated December 21, 1918, at 322 West Seventy-fifth Street, New York City, with which he incloses a clipping from the Newport News Daily Press relative to the arrival of casuals from overseas who have not been paid for some months previous to their sailing for this country and arrive here without funds.

Up to the present time the great majority of casuals wounded and sick coming from overseas arrive in this country without funds and without the papers which are necessary to enable payment here. The reasons for failure to pay men regularly in France and the causes which are responsible for their failure to be provided with service records and other papers which are necessary for pay purposes are many, and probably you do not require a discussion of these reasons and causes in this memorandum. However, all who have been in France and are familiar with conditions over there are unanimous in the statement that the resultant condition is a necessary outcome of actual conflict, where troops are fighting and advancing day and night and are necessarily separated from their records, and when wounded separated entirely from their commands, never again to get in touch with them.

To meet this condition after arrival in this country several very revolutionary procedures have been installed. Steps have been taken so that these casuals on their arrival in this country are given something on account. This payment is made at the hospitals to which they are assigned temporarily before locating permanently in some other concentration hospital. The commanding officers of all these concentration hospitals have been instructed by the director of finance, with the approval of the Chief of Staff, to make out pay rolls on the affidavit of the soldier, so that he may give him his pay in full not only for the current month but for any prior months for which the soldier claims he has not received pay. There is absolutely no sanction of law for this procedure, and the officer who certifies to a roll under those conditions and the disbursing officer who pays a roll thus executed do so with the possibility, if not probability, that considerable amounts of money will be charged against them by the accounting officers of the Treasury. Congress has been asked by the Secretary of War to enact legislation that will sanction this procedure and protect the certifying officers and the paying officers who comply with the instructions issued by the Director of Finance.

There is no reason why any casual from France who has not been discharged from the Army should be penniless at this time, for, as stated, on their arrival in this country they are given some payment on account, and after reaching the hospital they are in most cases given their pay in full. There may be cases, of course, where the commanding officers of hospitals hesitate or possibly refuse to certify to pay rolls under these conditions for fear of the consequences, but I am led to believe that these cases are rare, and I think there are no cases where soldiers are not getting something on account.

In June last, on the initiative of this office, a pay card was instituted which would serve when a soldier was separated from his command as an identification card, and would contain enough of his military history to provide for his payment. These pay cards were sent to France with the intention that they would be put into use. It was thought over there, however, that a more durable document would be necessary, and a pay book which a soldier should carry with him was prepared, but this was not put into effect until November. Many of the casuals now arriving are provided with these pay books, and if this proves to be general the casuals from now on will have with them all the information required to properly and correctly pay them, so that the complaints which are being so commonly heard will be from now on lessened until they are finally eliminated, but I will repeat that under the procedure installed there should be no occasion for any casual from France who has not been discharged from the Army to be without necessary funds.

I am dictating a letter this date to the Newport News Daily Press, calling attention to these facts, with request that they correct the rather unwarranted editorial which was inclosed in your letter.

Very truly, yours,

H. M. LORD,
Brigadier General, Assistant to the Director of Purchase, Storage, and Traffic, Director of Finance.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, that letter may state the exact truth. I have no disposition to take issue with Gen. Lord. He is a good soldier and a good man; but for the present, at least, I prefer to take the word of the innumerable young fellows who are writing to me every day, and I doubt not to every Member of the Senate, complaining that they do not get their pay.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In line with what the Senator from Oregon has just said, I have a letter this morning from the uncle of a young soldier who joined the Army at the age of 18. He went to France, and soon after arriving there was sent to the front. He received four wounds, was sent back to the United States, and he writes that he has been transferred to three hospitals. His wounds have all healed, but he is, of course, crippled for life. He is now at his home in Mississippi, on furlough. He has asked to be released from the Army, because he can render no further service to his country as a soldier. He states that for six months he has not received one penny of pay, and that it is difficult to get answers to his letters; and they are appealing to me to intercede in his behalf. That is only one of hundreds that I have received since I came back to Washington in August.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am not going to give individual cases, although I have hundreds of them, which are not in line with the statement of Gen. Lord. I am not overlooking the fact that it is very difficult to handle this situation. What I am now stating is the same criticism I indulged in once before—of not having hospitals ready in advance of the return of the wounded. We knew when we assembled men in cantonments and camps more than a year ago that some of them were going to be sick; but there were no hospitals made ready for this contingency in advance. Therefore there were thousands of deaths that ought to have been avoided. We have not sufficient hospitals prepared now to accommodate all these wounded men who are coming back here, and therefore we are going to have a great deal of suffering. If the War Department would pay half as much attention to arranging to receive these boys as they do to getting legislation through that will protect contractors who have made contracts over the telephone and otherwise in violation of law, it would not take long to get something done. Pick up the paper any day—pick up the Washington Post of this morning—and I will venture to say that you will find that they are urging some piece of legislation that will protect some firm or corporation that made a contract over the telephone. If you do not pass such legislation, it is usually stated, there is going to be bankruptcy for such corporation or firm. If you do not protect these boys by constructing hospitals you are going to have deaths and suffering and untold agony, because there is not any form of suffering that will not have to be endured by reason of the terrible wounds that these young men have received.

Now, as a general proposition with reference to hospitals, I am going to take the liberty of reading into the RECORD, in view of Gen. Lord's statement, a letter under date of December 29, 1918, from Mrs. C. P. Farrell, of New York City, who is a responsible lady who knows whereof she speaks. I ask that the Secretary read the letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

117 EAST TWENTY-FIRST STREET,
Gramercy Park, New York City.

To the Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN.

DEAR SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN: May I have just a moment of your valuable time to say that my niece, Mrs. Walston Brown, and I are in daily touch with our returning soldiers and we have yet to see one who has received any pay for months—beginning as far back as February and the majority in April. They come to us and to Pershing House, next door, in large numbers every day from the Greenhut Hospital and from Ellis Island. Their spirit is wonderful—no complaints of any description—but their position is a very difficult one. The majority were severely wounded, having lost legs, arms, and eyes.

With great respect, I am,
Very sincerely,
SUE M. (Mrs. C. P.) FARRELL.

DECEMBER 29, 1918.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not quite sure, Mr. President, but I think the lady whose name is mentioned in the letter is daughter of the late Robert G. Ingersoll.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So you see now here are letters coming from people who contradict people like Gen. Lord who are interested in making it appear that the soldiers are protected as they should be. The writers of such letters have no interest in the matter at all, except the interest that every good woman has; that every good mother has; that every good wife has; that every good sweetheart has; and that is, to see that these boys are in as good condition as possible when they arrive, and that they shall be put in even better condition when they get here.

Mr. President, I would not have had that letter read into the RECORD but for the fact that Gen. Lord's letter was read into the RECORD. I could have read into the RECORD a great many such letters to the same effect not only from ladies who are members of the Red Cross and other similar societies that tell about the conditions of these men but from the men themselves. It is all right to talk to me about furnishing these men money when everybody knows better. They have not been furnished with it, and they will not be until those who are responsible are criticized for not doing what it is their duty to do.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. KING. It would seem that the situation to which the Senator from Oregon is just inviting attention calls for criticism of officials on the other side of the water rather than of officials here, for, as I understand the matter, full authority was given to Gen. Pershing—and, of course, that authority could be utilized by him, or could be conferred by him upon his subordinates—to pay all of the officers and soldiers who were there under his control. I have understood that there was a paymaster system there and that all they needed to do was to draw upon the Government and their requisitions would be honored. Can the Senator from Oregon tell why Gen. Pershing, or those who have charge of the matter overseas, have been so derelict in paying the men who were there?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can not say, Mr. President. I realize the very great difficulty of following these wounded men particularly from one hospital to another, but all things are humanly possible, and it ought to be made humanly possible; it ought to be done; and at least as to the poor boys who are coming back in the condition which has been described, and which is admitted in the letter of Gen. Lord, some system ought to be devised, either in France or here, to see that these men do not come back penniless. There is some default in the pay system somewhere. I am undertaking to call attention to the necessity of going ahead and doing things, for the War Department does not need any legislation to correct conditions. All they need is to get a move on and to do the necessary work.

They have had ever since the 6th of April, 1917, to arrange for these hospitals. Did they expect the men would come back here intact, just as they went over? Did they not know that this was the most deadly and destructive war that ever was waged, and that there was bound to be terrible destruction of limb, as well as of life, and that the limbless and the eyeless had to come back to the United States and here be cared for? Yet I have not heard anything of any hospital being provided for these boys; that is, I mean on a scale that is sufficient to take care of them.

I do not know anything about the row which is on in Chicago about a Speedway war hospital, which is said to be a permanent fireproof structure, and the wooden hospital buildings at Fort Sheridan, which are in course of construction. I do not know anything about the merits of the controversy now waging with respect to them; but although the Surgeon General and nearly every department of the Government having to do with these things approve of the Speedway Hospital we find that somebody is going ahead with the construction of a wooden hospital at Fort Sheridan. If you see the Surgeon General to-day, he will tell you that that hospital ought to be constructed, but they are not doing it. What the reason is I do not know. So it is, Mr. President, all over the country. They are not arranging to receive these young men. That is what I am complaining of.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me a moment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I can aid the Senator from Oregon, I think, in following out the conclusion that he is looking for as to who is responsible.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to know, for I do not know.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The one man who is responsible for the executive departments of the Government is the President of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that is true; but that begs the question, I will say to the Senator from Washington. The President is responsible for the execution of all these laws; but the Senator from Washington knows very well that the President could not give these matters his personal attention. I know the Senator from Washington wants to be fair; but that is hardly a fair way to put it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I certainly do not want to be unfair; but I would like to ask the Senator from Oregon if he takes the position that the President of the United States, who is elected by the people and who has the appointment of the different Cabinet officers who have charge of the business of those departments, is not to be held responsible for any of the results of their administration?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; I do not claim that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then it follows, I suppose, that the President, is to be held responsible?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in the last analysis, what the Senator from Washington says is correct; the President is responsible for the appointment of men upon whom devolves the discharge of these duties which are not performed, but I thought possibly the Senator's question would leave the impression that the President himself had put his hand on this particular thing and had tied it up.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My complaint is—if it may be denominated a complaint at all—just the opposite to that; not that the President has put his hand on it and made a mistake, but that he has not put his hand on it at all. In all the discussion during the morning as to whether the Post Office Department was responsible or whether the War Department was responsible for the failure of the aircraft, the failure of ordnance, and the neglect of wounded soldiers, no one seems to have assumed that there was any head to the Government superior to the different departments whose duty it is to coordinate them and demand efficiency in them all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is right theoretically, but the Senator knows that the President can not know—it is not humanly possible for him to know—all that is going on in the War Department, in the Interior Department, and in the other departments, because one man has not enough heads and enough hands to know and do these things, but he is responsible for the appointment of these men, and if I knew of a case where the President is directly responsible in any particular matter, you can rest assured I would point it out. I am not afraid to criticize the President or anyone else.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I know the Senator is not, and I honor him for it, and I think he is honored by the country for the fact that he is not afraid to criticize any officials. The higher the official is the more important it is that he should be subject to the operations of public opinion and to just criticism. But I should like to ask the Senator if he takes the position that in such a general failure as he has described, in the case of a number of the heads of great executive branches, for instance, the failure to pay the soldiers, the general fact that soldiers are not paid, as the Senator alleges, if the President of the United States ought not to be expected to know that, and to remedy that condition? One word from him would remedy it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And one word from the Secretary of War pretty nearly would remedy it. That is what I am trying to get—the one word.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But the Secretary of War is under the orders of the President. The people of this country do not know the Secretary of War; they did not elect the Secretary of War; they did not know that Mr. Baker was going to be Secretary of War when they chose the man responsible for the executive branch of the Government. They elected the President of the United States; and he is the man that they have a right to hold responsible for results.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think theoretically the Senator is correct.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, Mr. President, I do not concede that it is merely theoretical; it is intensely practical. The President of the United States is entitled to the credit for the success of his administration, and everyone wants to give him credit for any merit that may be found in the conduct of the executive branch of the Government, but by the same rule he ought to be held responsible for those things that go wrong.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know that there is anything further I can say to the Senator. I have held executive positions where great responsibilities rested upon my shoulders, and I know from experience how impossible it is for the Executive to know and do everything. My own State, for example, has millions of acres of school and public lands, and it was a physical impossibility for me when I was governor of that State to know just exactly the condition of all of those lands. Of course, I knew in a general way, but not in detail. Fraud was charged on every hand. We cleared the atmosphere; but I had to do that through agents; I could not do it myself. If I chanced to get an agent who was wrong, then I would have had to suffer just as the President suffers when he has an agent who is wrong. I think we ought to know whether or not a man under the President, who holds his position by virtue of a presidential appointment, is doing his duty, and, if he is not doing his duty, let the people know it.

Now, Mr. President, I am anxious to go ahead. What I have been discussing is the hospital situation generally. At this time I am not prepared to put my hand on any particular thing and say this is wrong or that is wrong or there is graft here or graft there. I do not make any such charge as that. What I am trying to do is to call attention to a fact which the country knows, and that is that a reception for these young men is not being properly prepared—not hastily enough prepared. Congress is doing all that it can to relieve the situation both here and abroad; Congress has never declined to do anything; it has gone ahead on its own initiative and given these young men their uniforms, given them extra pay, and things of that kind, but that does not reach the young fellows who are coming back here crippled.

So I suggest, as a word of warning, that the men who are responsible for this muddling along when conditions demand haste and action will be held accountable by the American people and by the boys who are directly interested. These matters not only affect the young fellow who is wounded, but his neighbor is going to be affected in the same way, and they will see to it that they are all treated fairly and justly in this matter. That is the beauty, if I may say so parenthetically, of the selective-draft law—every community in the land is represented and interested, and every time a community loses a boy and every time a boy is wounded the whole community stands with him. So the American people are going to hold delinquent officers responsible, whoever they may be.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It has been suggested to me that the reason the payments have not been made is because the soldier's record upon which the payment is based is not obtainable. It seems to me that a provident and prudent company commander, knowing that a soldier of his command was going to be separated from his company, would make a copy of the soldier's record and certify to it, so that the soldier might bring it back to the States and carry it to the hospital with him, and thus be enabled to receive his money. It seems to me a piece of carelessness that is inexcusable.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. President, passing from the hospital situation, let me, if I may, offer one or two words of advice along other lines to the War Department. I do this because these things come to me just as the case of the young lieutenants who returned from France came to me, and I can not take up individual cases. I hope I am taking up thousands of cases in these observations. Take the pay of soldiers. That question has been discussed here to some extent. Mr. President, there is absolutely no excuse for not paying these men. There may be some difficulties in the way; there are difficulties in the way, because from the pay of a private soldier who gets $33 a month there have to be deducted forfeitures, for instance, imposed by courts-martial; there have to be deducted premiums for his war insurance; there has to be deducted the money that is set apart for his dependents. All of these things take time, but they ought to be done; and if it takes 5 men where only 1 man is acting now, or if it takes 10 men where only 1 man is acting now to hasten the pay of these young men, let the department get the 10 men or the 5 men to do the work promptly and efficiently.

Why, Mr. President, I have innumerable letters giving instances where liberty bonds have been actually paid for as long ago as last July and have not yet been delivered. There are young men who have not been paid for 9 or 10 months. The department asks, "Why do you not send these complaints to us?" Why, Mr. President, I would have to have a clerical force almost as large as that of the War Department to take up these letters individually, so that I am just sending a message through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to cover them all. I have sent a good many letters to the department. Let me give you an instance of the case of a hospital record which I sent down for investigation. It was the case of a young constituent of mine at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., who had tuberculosis. He was in the Letterman Hospital in California for a while, and then was restored to duty; but later there was a return of his trouble and they sent him down to Fort Bayard; all of which was perfectly proper. I have known the father of that boy for 40 years, and the boy has known me ever since he was old enough to know anybody. He said he did not believe he could get well there and made the usual application through military channels for discharge. He had a wife and a family dependent upon him. He volunteered, like many other young fellows. They turned down his application, and then he wrote me, and he wound up his letter by saying—I will quote the exact language, because I do not want to misquote it:

> There is an outstanding order against a soldier asking outside aid for a discharge, and a letter being written; but this letter would not necessarily have to be submitted to the Surgeon General's office. Have no complaint against treatment here at all. Best of everything is done for patients.

That was a harmless statement. Now, I usually observe these requests and do not send the letters to the department when requested not to do so; but through some inadvertence this letter slipped through my hands and got down to the department. You would think that the boy had a right to write to his Senator or his Representative; but just exactly what that boy feared happened. His letter was sent right back to the officer who was responsible.

Here is what happened: That poor boy, suffering with tuberculosis, was brought up before some sort of a board of inquiry. I am not going to take the time to read the record; but his pay was forfeited for 15 days, and he was punished for having had the temerity to write to his Senator! Now, that seemed such a palpable outrage to me that it was one of the individual cases that I went to see the Secretary of War about personally. I said, "If we have reached a point when a young man in a hospital or in the Army or anywhere else can not talk or write to his Senator the country wants to know it." The Secretary of War very kindly said, "I will take that up personally if you will send it to me," and he did take it up for me personally; and in due course, after having investigated the matter, he reported to me that the punishment had been inflicted and he could not relieve that, but that he had ordered the rule revoked under which the boy was court-martialed—the rule which forbade these young men writing to any outside person for aid. I immediately wrote him, and told him that in view of the fact that I had inadvertently gotten him into trouble, if he would let me know how much of his pay he had forfeited I would send him the money at once.

That, however, did not cure the situation. What they ought to have done was not to partially correct the wrong that had been done to this boy, but to get rid of the men who were responsible for adopting any such un-American rule as that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me the date of that letter, and, if possible, the date on which the rule was revoked?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I sent the Secretary's letter to the young man. I will tell you in just a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I ask the question because recently I had brought to my attention the case of a constituent of mine. He not only was summoned before his commanding officer, but he happened to be a sergeant, and he was demoted at once and put back as a private, and was censured in the strongest terms for having written me a letter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wrote to the young man on the 23d of December, 1918, inclosing him the Secretary's letter to me; and the Secretary's letter was dated just a few days before that.

Mr. SMOOT. That letter, then, is subsequent to the case I have referred to; and I sincerely hope the rule has been revoked.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss any further this question of soldiers' pay and insurance. I feel tempted to discuss the casualty lists, but I understand the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is going to discuss that matter. I think he gave notice of it a few days ago, and I am not going to discuss it, because there is no use in taking up the time of the Senate on it in view of this fact.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator to say that he is not going to discuss the casualty lists?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not just now, because I understand the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is going to discuss that subject.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask one question, not for the purpose of leading the Senator into a discussion of this matter if he does not wish to discuss it, but evidently he has given consideration to it: What is the explanation for this delay in the publication of the casualty lists?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, it is a long story.

Mr. BORAH. Is it a just story?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes and no. Take the Battle of the Argonne Forest, for instance. There many young men were killed, and under the intense fire there it was impossible even to go where they were, or to bury them, until later. The result was that it was quite difficult in many instances, because of wounds and natural decay, to identify many of them. There might have been, we will say, by way of illustration, 50 of them lost in that way and 50 others were temporarily missing from their command. They sought to identify those individuals—the killed and the temporarily missing—in order not to harass needlessly the fathers and mothers and friends of the boys at home. That is the purpose of it—not to give to the public the name of a soldier until they have had the casualty list verified.

Mr. BORAH. I can understand perfectly how that would be true at the time the conflict was being waged and for a considerable time thereafter, and I am not raising this point for the purpose of discussion; but I suppose every Senator has had numerous letters on the subject, and I never have been able to explain why it is that 11 weeks, going on two months, after the armistice was signed the casualty list is still coming out day by day. It does seem to me that within a short time after the armistice was signed and after the settlement of the difficulty an accurate statement of casualties could be made. It is the suspense, the agony of suspense, that is even worse than the knowledge.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am inclined to agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I simply wanted to know whether or not there was any reason that we could assign to the people who write us, "Why this delay?"

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am frank to say that from the evidence taken before our committee there is no excuse for all of it. There is an excuse for some of it. The Red Cross had information on a lot of these boys before the War Department did. We had Mr. Castle, of the Red Cross, before our committee. We had Mr. Keppel, Assistant Secretary of War, who had the matter immediately in charge in the War Department, before us. Mr. Keppel went over to France to undertake to find out what the difficulties were and to try to correct them, so that we would get speedier returns, but for some reason the Red Cross was not permitted to give out the information it had until after the armistice was signed or very shortly before that time.

I never have been able to see any reason for that. I think they ought to have been permitted to give it all out, because here were Red Cross nurses that attended the hospitals in France where young men died, either from wounds or from disease. A young man would write a letter to his mother or to his sister or to somebody in this country and hand it to the Red Cross nurse, and those letters came over here to the Red Cross, and they were not permitted to give them to the people to whom they were addressed. That may have been all right, but it never has seemed all right to me, and I have not been satisfied with any explanation that has been attempted to be made. The reporting of casualties ought to have been improved. There are so many individual cases that appeal to the heart that one hardly knows where to start and where to stop in discussing the situation.

Take the case of an old classmate of mine, at Washington and Lee University, who had two sons in France, both lieutenants. One of them was a young staff officer, not over 22 years old. He was given a dangerous mission to perform, and he performed it like a man; and when he lay down, wounded, to die, he wrote a message to his commanding officer telling him why he had failed in his mission. That message was on the boy's body; and the first notice the father had of that boy's death was on the blackboard in the Sunday School of a church that he attended! Now, here was an officer performing a dangerous errand, "carrying a message to Garcia," if you please, but under the most desperate circumstances. It seems that the War Department ought to have had official information about that officer; and the father came here to talk to me, and see if I could not get some official information about him.

That is only one case. There are hundreds of them. I presume every Senator gets letters about them. I could read into the RECORD here stories that would make the hearts of the American people bleed, due largely to inefficient methods. I am not charging anybody with doing wrong. I think we have accomplished wonders in this war, but we seem to have forgotten the little things that set the heartstrings in motion. We seem to have forgotten those who above all are entitled to our attention, now that the war is over.

Passing that, I come to another thing, Mr. President, not so much in the way of criticism, as by way of suggestion, in the hope that some remedy may be found for conditions that exist. It is with reference to inequalities in the administration of the law as it affects the soldiers. The administration of military justice during this war has developed many cases of life or long-term sentences by courts-martial which either would not have been imposed at all or would have been much more lenient if the rights of the enlisted man had been properly protected in the course of his trial before the court-martial. Mere boys, some of them wholly irresponsible mentally for their acts, have been adjudged guilty of serious civil or criminal offenses and sentenced for life or long terms in the penitentiary. Court-martial sentences found by the reviewing authority to be null and void for want of jurisdiction have been allowed to stand, thereby subjecting to illegal punishment a man sentenced without justification of law.

A soldier doing military police duty who entered a shop during the night, because, according to his own story, he heard a noise which he thought was made by a burglar, was found in the shop and himself accused of burglary. The court-martial which tried him found him not guilty. The commanding officer who had appointed the court disapproved the verdict and "recommended" that the court reconsider the case. The court did "reconsider" and found the man guilty and imposed a long term of imprisonment. The evidence was wholly circumstantial. On final review of the record in this case it was recommended that the verdict of guilty be set aside and the man discharged. The commanding officer, disapproving of this recommendation, has allowed the verdict to stand, and the man is now serving his sentence. This case, while not typical, illustrates the control which the military commander exercises over the administration of military justice.

A lot of those cases come to me. I have looked up many of them to verify them. I know of a case where a young lieutenant was on a court of inquiry in a certain cantonment—I will not mention where. His commanding officer said: "A. B. is charged with crime. He ought to be severely punished. He ought to be sent up for six months." The young officer, a lawyer, detailed for court-martial duty, looked into the case, and he and his colleagues sentenced this young fellow to five days in the guardhouse. His commanding officer called him up and said: "You know, that is the man whom I told you ought to be severely punished. I see you have only sentenced him for five days in the guardhouse." The lieutenant replied, "That is all that the evidence warranted. It was a very minor offense." "That is the way military law is administered here, is it?" and in a very short time the young officer was removed from that detail, simply because he had not carried out the orders of the commanding officer. What use of a court if a commanding officer is to practically control its actions?

Senators, I am not blaming the Secretary of War for this. I blame him only to this extent: That a word from him would stop such practices.

These individual cases give the human touch to conditions, and in order to impress it upon the attention of the War Department I am just going to call attention to two or three more as illustrative of what is in my mind. I am not going to give the names of the soldiers, either.

A green country boy, a private in the machine-gun company of the One hundred and fifty-sixth Infantry, was tried and convicted of the charge of absence without leave from Camp Beauregard from May 9 to May 15, 1918. That is six days. It was shown in evidence by the prosecution that he had been notified of his selection for overseas duty. The accused testified that he went home to see his mother, probably for the last time, as she was ill in a hospital. He was sentenced to a dishonorable discharge, total forfeitures, and confinement at hard labor for 25 years in a disciplinary barracks.

Now, Senators, I realize the necessity of maintaining discipline. There is not any question about that; but, in God's name, could not a boy like that have been punished a little less severely under the circumstances than 25 years in a prison, where his life in the very nature of things must be ruined?

A similar case is that of a private of Company D, One hundred and fifty-fifth Infantry, who was charged and convicted of absence without leave from May 9 to May 15, 1918—the same period of time—from Camp Beauregard—the same place—after notification of his selection for overseas duty. It was shown that the boy had gone home to his folks in Mississippi to tell them good-by. He was sentenced to dishonorable discharge, total forfeitures, and 15 years' confinement at hard labor in a disciplinary barracks.

You see, there is 10 years' difference between the punishment meted out to these two young men in the same place and for the same crime. There may be aggravated circumstances connected with them that I do not know anything about, but I can not conceive how it should have been found necessary to have inflicted such terribly severe punishment. I can understand that if it was on the battle front and a boy had left his post without leave his punishment should be severe, even to sentencing him to be shot.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He returned voluntarily, did he?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So I understand.

Now, take another case: A private of Company M, Forty-ninth Infantry, was convicted of sleeping on his post at Camp Merritt, N. J., and was sentenced to a dishonorable discharge, total forfeitures, and 10 years' confinement at hard labor in a disciplinary barracks. You see, there is the same kind of a case, and yet there are 15 years' discrepancy between the punishment meted out to the first soldier, where both crimes committed were practically the same.

Mr. WATSON. Did these men come back of their own accord?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am so informed. If the Senator from Indiana wants, I will give him the names and record, and I will give them to the Secretary of War if he wants them; but I dislike to publish these cases in the RECORD, so that the young men may probably be discredited, because I hope that something will be done to relieve many of these sentences.

Take another case: A private of Company F, Forty-ninth Infantry, was convicted of sleeping on his post at the United States Engineers' Depot, New York City, and was sentenced to dishonorable discharge, total forfeitures, and 10 years' confinement in a disciplinary barracks. He was assigned to what was virtually a watchman's job; and he gets 10 years. I can not conceive why such severe punishment should be meted out to young soldiers for such small crimes. I believe in the strictest military discipline, but it can be accomplished without any such severity as that.

A case somewhat different from these in which the President showed mercy was that of a private of the Third Training Company, Casual Detachment, who was convicted of disobedience of orders to drill and of having seditious literature in his possession for distribution. He was sentenced to be shot. It appeared that he was a sincere conscientious objector and that he had not been offered noncombatant service, as provided in General Order No. 28, War Department, March 23, 1918. He had in his possession some literature in which certain passages had been condemned by the Department of Justice, but that department had ruled that such books might be retained by members of religious sects for private study, and there was no evidence that the accused attempted or intended to distribute these books. His death sentence was disapproved by the President, and the prisoner was discharged; and very properly so. I hope the President will exercise the same clemency and show the same mercy in many other cases; and I believe he will. But I call attention to these cases to show the inequality of sentences by court-martial in the country; and there is no reason for it.

The commanding officer's control over the court-martial is such that he may "suggest" the action which the court should take.

It is wholly repugnant to our ideas of the administration of criminal law that anyone should have the power to set aside a verdict of acquittal. Nevertheless, this is the power of the commanding officer over a court-martial trial. He may exercise this power not only in the case of military offenses but also in the case of ordinary civil offenses, as, for example, larceny committed by a soldier.

The cases which may be sent to court-martial are not definitely defined or limited. The commanding officer may determine what offenses shall be tried by court-martial. He may, for example, subject to the disgrace of court-martial every soldier who, no matter what the justifying circumstances, has been absent from his post for five days. He may, without any investigation of the circumstances, order such a man tried by court-martial. In the French Army such cases are not sent to trial until an investigation has determined that the man ought to be tried. With us the commanding officer exercises at all stages a military disciplinary control of the administration of military justice. We do not administer military justice according to law; it is constantly under the control of a military commander, who is not obliged either to ask for legal advice or to follow it when he has asked for it and it has been given to him by the responsible law officers of the Army.

It is not surprising under the circumstances that there are too many trivial cases sent to trial by court-martial, too many unduly severe sentences and widely varying punishments imposed for like offenses. Terms for the same or similar offenses imposed by courts-martial during the present war range all the way from life imprisonment in the penitentiary to six months' confinement in a disciplinary barracks. Frequently the life term is imposed for an offense for which in other cases a few months' imprisonment is imposed.

In the case of the less serious offenses the punishment ranges from days or months of disciplinary confinement to a few years' imprisonment. There is no standard of punishment, and the changing personnel of courts-martial and their lack of familiarity with criminal law make anything like uniformity of punishment impossible. If we are to have a democratic Army, military justice ought to be administered as it is in other countries, by courts which are constituted, whose procedure is determined, and whose action is controlled by law. Courts-martial should be required to accept the interpretation of the law by a responsible law officer in the same manner that a jury in a civil criminal court accepts the interpretation of the law by the judge of the court. This is not to suggest that military discipline should be undermined, but that it should be supported by a fair and effective system of determining guilt and imposing punishments. There is no greater obstacle to discipline than the resentment which the soldier feels for unjust and arbitrary punishment.

The records of the courts-martial in this war show that we have no military law or system of administering military justice which is worthy of the name of law or justice. We have simply a method of giving effect to the more or less arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer.

All of that responsibility does not rest on the Secretary of War; much of it may rest on Congress. We ought to enact a code that would fix the boundaries of these courts, and which would define their jurisdiction and duties; but, as it is, with these inequalities of administration, it seems to me that a word from the Secretary of War to the commanding officers would bring them very quickly to a more uniform administration of the law. There is nothing in the world that will make the members of the Military Establishment do their duty in a proper way more surely than to discharge or reprimand an officer once in a while. There is a sort of free masonry amongst them, and whenever one of them is put on the tenter-hooks for anything that he has done irregularly, everyone in the Army who is of the same rank and grade has his ear to the ground and knows it, and governs himself accordingly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has not the Senator from Oregon noticed the various determinations by courts of justice in the States, and noted how vastly different are the sentences which are imposed by such courts as the result of judicial proceedings?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is true in like cases of like offenses which are prosecuted. I have noticed such variations to have been from 1 year to 14 years. Such sentences often depend upon the judge and upon the character of his impression as to what would be the proper sentence. Some judges believe in severe sentences; others believe in light sentences; while still others believe in almost no sentences. The severity of the sentence oftentimes results from the make-up of the individual. So I do not see how in such cases anyone can be properly charged with any neglect or any wrong in permitting these judge advocates to remain in office. People both in times of war and in civil life invariably hold different views as to crime. Some will say, "This man should be set up as an example; I will show the people in this community that there has got to be respect for a certain law"; and such judges will impose severe sentences, while at the same time almost across the border in another judicial district there will be another judge who will impose a very light sentence. That is human nature; men are differently constituted; so it seems to me when these inequalities of sentences have occurred no one is to blame except the individual who imposes the sentence.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I realize the force of the Senator's suggestion. I have had some of the same experiences the Senator has had, and, besides that, I was prosecuting officer in my State in a large district for four years, and I know the difficulty of meting out exact justice. The conditions in different communities or different counties in the same State will be entirely different; but there is the great equalizing power in the chief executive, and ninety-nine times out of one hundred he exercises it so as to equalize inequalities by the use of the pardoning power or in some other way. But here is a great central government with a Secretary of War entirely in charge of the military branch of it, and under whose jurisdiction all of these crimes come. He can very much relieve the situation if he will only attempt by proper order to do so. When he sees that two young men in the same cantonment, as at Camp Beauregard, are sentenced, one for 15 years and one for 25 years, for exactly the same offense, a simple word from him to the President of the United States would result in equalizing the sentences, if necessary, by the use of the pardoning power.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator mean the same offense or the same charge?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The same charge.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When two men are charged with the same offense and brought up for trial, the Senator must recognize, as I do, that the facts may appear entirely different in the two cases. The characters of the two culprits, or the alleged culprits, may appear entirely different. There is not an inequality of punishment for an offense, but an inequality of punishment on a charge. One man is found guilty of killing another, another man is found guilty of killing still another, and a third of killing still a third; one man is hung, one man is sent to the penitentiary for life, and one man is convicted of manslaughter. All the Senator knows about these cases is that the charges were identical.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The suggestion of the Senator is more or less true. In the very great haste——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether these individual cases to which he has referred have been appealed to the Judge Advocate General?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think all of them have been.

So much for that, Mr. President. Where there is a noticeable inequality on the face of the record, and there are those under the Military Establishment who know the facts, it seems to me they ought to be looked into, with the power of recommendation somewhere to relieve the situation; but the sure cure for it all is to have some sort of a tribunal, appellate or supervisory, that shall have the power to formulate rules and equalize these unjust sentences, under the direction, of course, of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question there, if he will yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Taken for granted that the Senator's suggestion is perfectly apropos and perfectly right, whose fault is it that there is no such tribunal? It can not be the fault of the Secretary of War.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator another question in that connection, and let him answer them both at once. Suppose he was Secretary of War or suppose that I was Secretary of War. Does the Senator imagine that either he or I could take personal cognizance of all the thousands of cases, examine them like a justice of the peace, and go into the testimony to see just how far each individual ought to be punished? In other words, if there is not a tribunal—and there would have to be about a thousand tribunals, by the way, for one could not attend to all the business—how do you expect a man of flesh and blood, like Baker or CHAMBERLAIN or WILLIAMS, to go into all these cases?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I realize the force of what the Senator says, and I stated before the Senator came in and did me the honor of his presence that I am delivering this one message and placing it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to call the attention of the Secretary of War to conditions. I can not take up the innumerable cases that have come to me, and do not expect the Secretary of War to do so; but the Secretary has never been denied anything in the way of assistance that he has asked for in this war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the Senator will pardon me just once more, and then I hope to let him alone——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope so, because I wish to finish.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not only the present Secretary of War, but various Secretaries of War, have communicated to us in times of peace and in times of war, during the Revolution, the Mexican War, the War between the States, the Spanish-American War, and this war, and so far the committee over which the Senator from Oregon presides—the Military Affairs Committee—has had charge of the question of courts-martial. The whole country has agreed to substitute in time of war for the ordinary courts operative in times of peace, for justices of the peace, circuit courts, appellate courts, and various courts, so-called courts-martial. They have tried to organize them so that approximate and quick justice could be dispensed in war times. It must be quick; we can not fool with it; we have got to keep up discipline in the Army; and being determined to do that we have organized the present courts-martial. The Senator will remember that while serving upon the committee of which he is chairman and of which I was once a member, I found at one time that one officer had been the accuser, the judge, and the chief witness against a man whose rank had been taken away from him. We remedied that, and why can not the committee remedy such other injustices as suggest themselves?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the committee will attempt to do so where legislation is necessary, Mr. President, but the committee occupies this position: The committee is limited as to its clerical force. To attend to all these things is a physical impossibility for the committee with the clerical force that the committee has, while the Secretary of War is supplied not only with a great body of legal advisers, to whom he can refer any of these matters either for advice or to draft legislation, but with as much money as he needs for any legitimate military purpose. We have amended the Articles of War during this Congress two or three times at the request of the Secretary of War. He is having these difficulties pointed out to him, and I have not any doubt that if he asks for another amendment to the Articles of War we will amend them again.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator if, from his observations, he has not long since arrived at the conclusion that all of the punishments imposed by courts-martial, taking them as a body, are immensely more severe than punishments which would be imposed by the ordinary courts and in most cases we might say unconscionably severe?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is true, but I will say to the Senator that in times of war I have no objection to the severity of sentences, as a rule, because discipline is absolutely necessary to be maintained. If a soldier is guilty of an offense and is only sentenced to five days there might be 5,000 men associated with him who would commit the same offense if they knew they would only get five days' punishment.

Mr. McCUMBER. But even in times of peace I find the punishments imposed by courts-martial immensely more severe than the punishments imposed by civil courts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator would not punish the Senator from North Dakota for going to sleep at all, would he?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not if he were in good company and with some one like the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator would punish a soldier for going to sleep when he was a sentinel, and he might have to shoot him for doing it, because it is a very serious offense.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, of course; there is no doubt about that in time of war.

Now, Mr. President, these remarks are just by way of suggestion with reference to the dispensing of military justice, and I do hope that the War Department will take some notice of them.

There is only one other matter that I am going to discuss, and that is the question of demobilization. That is a question we have had a good deal of trouble about, and one concerning which, I presume, every Senator has been getting a great many letters. I am not one of those who believe that we ought to hastily disorganize our Army. This war is not ended yet. I hope that those who are negotiating peace terms will reach a conclusion which will end it; but at this time we are not at peace. I think we ought to move with some degree of care in the demobilization of the Army; and yet whether we are moving quite as fast as we ought, I am not prepared to say. That is a military proposition. Now, what I object to and what I want to call the attention of the Secretary of War to is the fact that the American Army, both in France and here, do not know what to expect. They ought to know—not only the American Army, but the American people ought to know—just exactly what they are to expect in reference to demobilization. We do not know.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. NEW. I hesitate to interrupt the Senator, and yet, with his permission, I should like to read a few lines from the law approved June 15, 1917, with reference to the duration of the period for which men were conscripted or for which enlistments were to last. It is as follows:

> Whenever said war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war, the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and within four months after the date of said proclamation, or as soon thereafter as it may be practicable to transport the forces then serving without the United States to their home station, the provisions of said act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selected draft or otherwise, shall cease to be of force and effect.

In other words, Mr. President, we made an implied contract with every soldier we took into the service that his enlistment should end not longer than four months after the declaration of peace. It is true, to be sure, that the President has issued no proclamation and that until he does theoretically we are still at war, but it is quite as true that in point of fact hostilities have ceased and that we are no longer actually at war.

In common with every other Member of this body, I suppose, I am in daily receipt of letters from people from home and applications in person and in writing from soldiers on both sides of the Atlantic who are anxious to get out, and who feel that their obligation to the Government under this law has been amply discharged. I have been hoping that the Senator would come to a discussion of that question in the course of his remarks, and, in order that he may enlarge upon that somewhat, I have taken the liberty to interrupt and to call to his attention that feature of the law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Oregon very kindly consented to yield. The Senator's remarks would imply that he construed the act as meaning that the four-months' period to which he refers dated from the armistice. Obviously the Senator is wrong, because that four-months' period would not begin to run until the proclamation of peace was signed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And promulgated.

Mr. KING. And promulgated.

Mr. NEW. No, Mr. President; I understood that full well. The law states that this shall date from the issuance of a proclamation by the President, and I, of course, understood that until that proclamation is issued we are theoretically at war. But practically and actually we are not at war; and what I seek to bring out is the fact that not only the soldiers themselves but the people at home are exceedingly anxious to reach some understanding as to when the period of this service may be reasonably expected to cease.

Mr. KING. The point I was trying to make was that I think it would be very unfortunate to have the country believe that the period of four months would begin to run from the time the armistice was signed; and it seems to me that it is purely speculative now to say when their services will not be required. We can not say that the war is over at all. There may be at any moment a recrudescence in some form or other in Europe, and we would be very foolish to withdraw our troops now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I am infringing a good deal upon the time of the Senator from Oregon, and I will reserve an answer to that question until I can make it in my own time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will pardon me——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like very much to conclude. Does the Senator wish to ask a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not say that it is a question, because it is pursuing the thought suggested by the Senator from Utah just a moment ago. There are somewhere between two and three million German soldiers still with their arms, armed now, and fighting one another, in Berlin and elsewhere, and under the admirable military machine system of the German Empire they can be remobilized within 48 hours. If we are fools enough not to leave a "watch on the Rhine," we will have to remobilize all over the civilized world to lick Germany again.

The Senator from Oregon says, "What are we to expect?" and "somebody ought to tell us what to expect." I can tell him what we are to expect. Each boy in that army is expected to stay until he knows that this fight has been won and that Germany has been handicapped and hamstrung and rendered helpless as a part of the ultimate terms of peace, and not as part of the provisional terms of an armistice.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in answer to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, permit me to say that if he had listened to me he would have heard me say that I was not one of those who believed in the immediate or hasty demobilization of the whole Army.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was not replying to the Senator from Oregon; I was replying to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator referred to the Senator from Oregon. Perhaps he meant somebody else. But now let me tell you what I meant when I requested information for the soldiers and for the people as to what they intend to do.

You can take the circular letter that has been sent to every Senator and to every Representative from the Adjutant General's Office telling what is necessary to be done in order to get young men discharged and what is the program of demobilization, and it is so loosely drawn that anything is possible to be done under it. There is no certainty about it. There are so many provisos to it that when it gets to a man in the ranks who thinks he has had a promise that he is going to be discharged he does not know what it means. What I am getting at is to have the department tell these young men what they and their people may expect. Now, here is what I mean by that:

The war has been ended now a month and a half—more than a month and a half.

Mr. THOMAS. That is, it is a month and a half since the armistice was signed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I mean, the armistice has been in force over a month and a half. On the 12th day of November, 1918, the next day after the armistice was signed, Great Britain commenced to plan for the demobilization of her army at home and in France. Great Britain was not afraid to take these steps because of Germany. Great Britain did what the Secretary of War ought to have done. It does not need any legislation to do it. He can not come back to Congress and say—

> Shake not thy gory locks at me.
> Thou cans't not say I did it.

No legislation is necessary. The Secretary of War has absolute power to act in the premises, under the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of course.

Now, let us see what Great Britain did.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. The act to which my colleague [Mr. NEW] has called attention seems to be dual in character. The first part of it recites:

> That the service of all persons selected by draft and all enlistments under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, shall be for the period of the war, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise—

Having reference to the soldiers yet in the United States—

> Whenever said war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war, the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and within four months after the date of said proclamation or as soon thereafter as it may be practicable to transport the forces then serving without the United States to their home station, the provisions of said act, in so far as they authorize compulsory service by selected draft or otherwise, shall cease to be of force and effect.

It seems to be dual in character, the first portion having reference to those in the United States, the second portion having reference to those without the United States; and as to those within the United States, they can begin demobilization at any time under the provision of that act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into that discussion, because, whatever my personal views may be with reference to the disbandment of the Army, I am willing to leave that as at present advised to the military authorities, acting probably under the advice of or in conjunction with Gen. Pershing, to do what seems to be the best thing to do in this emergency. What I mean to suggest is that we ought to have followed in the footsteps of Great Britain. The next day after the armistice was signed we find that Mr. MacPherson, the undersecretary of state for war, discussed this question of demobilization in Parliament, and between the 12th day of November and the 23d of November they had adopted a policy, and they sent men out to lecture to the soldiers to tell them what they might expect. There is not a cantonment in the United States where the soldiers can tell you that they understand what to expect. All of them expect something different.

Mr. MacPherson says:

> I am fully aware of the importance of the diffusion amongst the troops serving abroad—

Serving abroad, mind you. These are the troops on the Continent—> of information as to the Government plan for demobilization of forces. Arrangements have been made by which full information concerning the method of demobilization will be given to the troops when the situation is suitable. Lectures are already being given at the front dealing with the outlines of the procedure to be adopted.

If we had adopted some such policy as that, there would not exist the present discontent amongst the troops and the people.

There ought to have been some notice given to our soldiers and to the American people, first, that the married men would be excused; second, that the boys who were going back to a job would be next; third, that those who had dependents would be next or whatever order was determined upon. In other words, we ought to have organized the Army for demobilization along the lines that appealed to the economic condition of the country.

Continuing, Mr. MacPherson said:

> The claims of married men to early relief have been recognized, and it has been provided in the scheme of demobilization that, other conditions being equal, married men shall be selected in preference to single men for draft for disposal.

And again:

> In view of the present situation, as many additional miners—

Now, this is the coal miners—

> as many additional miners as possible who are serving at home will be released.

And I understand some British miners and others are being released in France. In other words, they considered the economic conditions of the country, and selected the men for discharge along the lines that were for the best interests not only of the men and their dependents but of the country.

What have we done? We have a War College. Has it studied out and given to the people the advantage of the knowledge that it had? Has any decree been issued for the demobilization of these men along lines that fitted into our life? We have not heard of any.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I saw a statement in the paper, I think it was yesterday, that 600,000 American troops had been demobilized within five weeks, and I saw another statement to the effect that 30,000 were to be transported every day from France or from the Continent to the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. How many married men were in that number?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. How many miners were in it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. Perhaps it was 30,000 that were going to be discharged.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask the Senator how many married men were in that number?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. No account was given of it. I did not suppose that men were demobilized except in regiments and companies. I supposed that was the manner of demobilization—I think it was the manner of demobilization in the Civil War—without regard to the question of whether they were married or whether they were not. At least it could take place more speedily. To inquire as to each person and as to the necessity of his being at home would require a great deal of time of itself. I supposed that demobilization took place in companies and in regiments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; they have not done that, as the Senator will find if he will take the trouble to inquire. They are demobilizing individually now. What I am getting at is, On what basis are they demobilizing these men?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say that I made application a few days ago to the War Department to discharge drillers in the oil fields. They are engaged in the production of a very important source of industrial power, standing pretty much on the same footing as coal, and I thought that the department would be justified in expediting the discharge of these men, because they are largely young men and have been largely taken by the draft. There is a sore need for labor of this sort which can not be easily supplied, or supplied in an impromptu way. The department advised me that it would not be practicable to do that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to have that statement from the Senator. If those men had been in Great Britain they would have been released, whether they were in the army in France or whether they were in the army in England.

With reference to the great number that are being discharged, as stated by the Senator from Colorado, we may be discharging them too fast. I am not prepared to say as to that. The proposition I am suggesting, and the criticism I have, is that we are not discharging them on any uniform basis, so far as I have been advised. There is no system about it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would call the Senator's attention to Circular No. 77, issued by the War Department, if the Senator has not yet examined it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have read them all; and if the Senator will get the circular letter that goes out of The Adjutant General's Office covering the whole method he will find that it is like a Delphic oracle. You can construe it into anything you want.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Is Circular No. 77 the one under which they permit each individual to make his own application or assign the particular reason for his discharge?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the one; yes.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that that has been put in abeyance somewhat? That is to say, I am informed that at certain cantonments and certain training stations they will line up a company and men will go along and say to that man, "Step out," and to the other man, "Step in front," and so forth, and in that way they select 60 men from each company to be kept there, regardless of the business that the man left when he entered the service or the business that he could go back to when he goes home, regardless of his family relationships, regardless of the number of dependents upon him. In that way they leave men in the service who in reality ought to be discharged and they discharge men who ought to be left.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true. That is just what I am criticizing, and that is what I am suggesting, and that is why I call attention to the British method, which is the same method, the adoption of a policy uniform in character and the instruction of the men as to just what they may expect.

We think we are quite progressive in America, but the British people not only outstrip us in this race of demobilization, but they have adopted a policy that is more liberal than our own policy, and I think probably our Congress will be still more liberal than they have been. Now, note. Mr. MacPherson says further:

It may be well that I should state at once that on demobilization—

Now, notice this—

Each man will receive at least 28 days of leave, with pay and allowances, and that he will be fully insured against unemployment for a period of not less than 20 weeks during the first year.

See how those people are taking care of the men who have been fighting for four long, weary years! Have we any policy in this regard? None at all, so far as I have been advised.

That is the criticism I have, Mr. President. I am not blaming the Secretary of War or anybody else because these men are not being discharged faster, for I do not know what the military necessities are now; but I am blaming the authorities because they have no policy, and they have not let the American people know what plans, if any, they have, so that they may know how to govern themselves; that is all. "If that be treason, make the most of it." Referring again to the proceedings in Parliament on the subject of demobilization of the army, I ask, Mr. President, to have the discussions printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEMOBILIZATION IN GREAT BRITAIN—OFFICIAL STATEMENTS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS FROM THE SIGNING OF THE ARMISTICE TO THE PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT, NOVEMBER 21, 1918.

Information for the army. November 12 (2469).

Mr. MACPHERSON (undersecretary of state for war). I am fully aware of the importance of the diffusion amongst the troops serving abroad of information as to the Government plans for the demobilization of the forces. Arrangements have been made by which full information concerning the method of demobilization will be given to the troops when the situation is suitable. Lectures are already being given at the front dealing with the outlines of the procedure to be adopted.

Married men (release). November 12 (2469).

Mr. MACPHERSON. The claims of married men to early release have been recognized, and it has been provided in the scheme of demobilization that, other conditions being equal, married men shall be selected in preference to single men for the drafts for disposal.

Coal supply (release of miners). November 12 (2470.)

Mr. MACPHERSON. In view of the present situation, as many additional miners as possible who are serving at home will be released, and I understand some are being released from France.

Leave with pay and unemployment benefits. November 12 (2521).

Dr. MACNAMARA (secretary to the Admiralty). It may be as well that I should state at once that on demobilization each man will receive at least 28 days' leave with pay and allowances, and that he will be fully insured against unemployment for a period of not less than 20 weeks during the first year.

Unemployment benefits. November 12 (2581).

Dr. ADDISON (minister of reconstruction). The rates for benefits for both ex-service and civil workers are as follows: Adults, 24s. per week for men and 20s. per week for women, with 6s. per week for the first dependent child under 15, and 3s. per week for each succeeding dependent child, so that a man with a wife and one child will get 30s. per week and 3s. for each additional dependent child. The donation will not be payable for the first three days of any continuous period of unemployment. The out-of-work donation payable to partially disabled men in receipt of pensions will be additional to their pensions, and no deductions will be made on account of such pensions.

Plan of demobilization. November 12 (2583–2588).

Dr. ADDISON. I propose to issue a pamphlet, which is in popular form, but I hope honorable members will not like it any the less for that. It is intended to be read by the general public. It will be posted to every member this evening. The pamphlet sets out the whole scheme of army demobilization, and it is reduced at the end to the form of question and answer. It deals with the navy, the air force, and the army. This matter was gone into at great length by a committee presided over by my honorable friend the secretary of state for India [Mr. Montagu], appointed by the previous government, and we have adopted the principle that demobilization must be governed by industrial requirements. It has been a most elaborate piece of work. We have had to have the army classified into trade groups, of which there are 42, and the department at the war office that deals with this side of the question fills me with admiration. Arrangements have been made to mark down first, what we call the demoblizers. They are the people required to start the demobilizing machinery. That has been done. The next group are what we call pivotal men, and here again I have issued a precise statement. You get in practically every work some men round whom the work revolves, and until they are there you can not get the work started. Therefore the ministry of labor have invited the different trades to specify their pivotal groups, and these are separately catalogued in the army.

The demobilization, whilst the man is with the colors, will be managed by the war office, but the order or priority of demobilization—the arrangement for picking out the pivotal men—is undertaken by the organization at the ministry of labor under Sir Stephenson Kent. The civil side is under that organization, and the army deals with the military side of it. Those are the two organizations which work in common, and which deal with the whole arrangements.

In discussing occupation we naturally have to have regard to those occupations the reestablishment of which causes the biggest amount of employment. We naturally put them very high in the scale. Therefore the priority grading of employment is based upon considerations of that kind. It must depend partly upon the time of the year, because grading is different now from what it would be in harvest time. At any rate, these pivotal men represent a group, and they, of course, will come back early. But within each group we have regard to the length of service the men have done during the war, whether a man is married, and other considerations of that kind. Another large group of the army which has been separately marked down, and which makes our problem very much easier, is that large group of men for whom there are jobs waiting for them when they come back. I am sure we all recognize that it is a national duty to secure these men the priority of reemployment when they return. I am glad to say, according to information I have received from the minister of labor, that more than 60 per cent of the men in the army are what are called "slip" men—that is to say, men who have jobs awaiting them. So that when a commanding officer receives an order to send back a certain number of men, he knows at once which men are the pivotal men and which men have a job awaiting them, and this eases our problem enormously with regard to employment at home. Those have been the governing considerations right through this very elaborate scheme.

The scheme deals with the whole of the army, whether at home or abroad. The committee considered very carefully the rate of demobilization. That necessarily must depend upon all kinds of military considerations, some of which are obvious, and the maximum rate of demobilization can clearly only be attained after some time, but the general scheme contemplates that the rate of demobilization from the forces at home will be the same compared with the rate of demobilization of the forces overseas. That at first, might look as if it gave some advantage to the men at home, but, as a matter of fact, the men at home, in the vast majority of cases, have seen foreign service; they have been abroad, therefore you can not distinguish in that way, and the scheme contemplates an equal demobilization of the two groups. The machinery by which they are to be demobilized is set out in detail in the pamphlet which I am circulating to honorable members, therefore I need not trouble the committee with it now. I may say that a man is sent primarily to a place that is called his dispersal station, which is near his home. There he receives a protection certificate, a railway warrant home, a cash payment of his war gratuity and an out-of-work donation policy, which lasts in the case of the soldiers 12 months and covers 26 weeks of unemployment, with benefit at the rate I have mentioned. He will receive the war gratuity. The precise method of the payment of that will be announced shortly. I believe it is likely that it will be paid in four weekly installments. The man will receive 28 days' furlough when he reaches his dispersal station, and will then receive pay and ration allowance during that time, and the separation allowance will also continue during that period.

There is another class of demobilized men, before I come to the officers, for whom we have to make special provision. A large number of men joined the army who had not completed their apprenticeship. It will be, I am sure, a waste of brains and energy if these men, after three or four years' service, have to go back to civil life and find that they have lost their skill. They were practically unskilled workmen, and we must provide some incentive to their completing a short term of apprenticeship which will bring them up to a sufficient standard of skill. Therefore we have worked out this scheme for a system of completion of apprenticeship for men who have been serving in the forces. Again, I will circulate the full details, as it is a rather elaborate scheme. It is a rather elaborate scheme, but what it comes to is this—we discussed it with the employers and the workmen's representatives in great detail—the employer is to pay wages to the apprentice during the first 12 months representing not less than seven-twelfths of the current rate of wages, and the State makes them up to the man, so that he gets in the aggregate three-fourths of the wages to which he would have been entitled at that stage of his apprenticeship, and the next year it makes up to a bigger fraction still, namely, five-sixths. That is to say, what we really do, on the basis of the employer affording facilities for an intensive form of apprenticeship, is to make a contribution in view of the man's age being greater than it otherwise would have been, in order to bring up his wages practically to the standard of what they would have been at that stage of his career. The details are elaborate, therefore I do not give the committee anything but a bare statement.

Now I come to the question of officers. We have dealt with great care with the question of officers, and the committee, under Sir Reginald Brade, spent a great many months working on this business. I am sure the committee will recognize that in respect to a large number of young men of all branches of training who gave up their prospects, who have been in the army, and have become dislocated from their normal employment, we are under a very special heavy responsibility. The Government has accepted the general principle that from the beginning of demobilization and for a year afterwards permanent appointments in the civil service shall be reserved for ex-officers and ex-soldiers. As the rigid application of this rule, however, would exclude certain candidates with special qualification, it is intended that the rule should not apply (a) to the relatively small number of posts requiring special technical qualifications or involving special responsibility, and (b) that it should not apply to a limited number of cases in which men pronounced unfit on grounds of health for general service have been temporarily employed and are specially recommended by the heads of their departments. With those exceptions, by that means we open the civil service to ex-officers and ex-soldiers for 12 months after the war.

The next thing is that a great number of officers and men in various callings have had their professional training interrupted during the war, and it would be equally, as in the case of the skilled mechanic and the apprentice, very unfortunate if we were not to recognize that we have special responsibility with regard to enabling these men to complete their professional or other training. Therefore, it is recognized that the further training or education of young ex-officers in various callings, or men not officers, who have interrupted their training in those callings, is a matter in which we have special responsibility, and the war cabinet has agreed to the principles of a scheme whereby, where circumstances require, assistance with respect to fees and maintenance shall be given on the recommendation of the training committee to enable men in those classes to complete their training. The details of the scheme proposed will be announced very shortly.

With regard particularly to a special class of cases in which the one-man business figures very largely, we propose to make provision against that by continuing the civil liabilities department after the termination of the war, so that assistance subsequent to demobilization may be given in accordance with a scheme based upon the existing regulations of the department. That covers assistance with regard to officers and men who are unable, by reason of their undertaking military service, to meet their financial obligations after demobilization, and are thereby exposed to serious hardship, and the obligations in respect of which assistance may be granted are those arising in respect of rent, interest, and installments payable in respect of loans, including mortgages, installments payable under agreements for the purchase of business premises, a dwelling house, furniture, and the like, rates and taxes, insurance premiums, and school fees. We will continue the existing scheme for assisting those cases. There it will be within the discretion of the department which deals with the civil liabilities to make a grant, either in the form of a lump sum or by quarterly or other installments, and if in any particular case the department is of opinion that in lieu of assistance in respect of any of the specific obligations mentioned above it is desirable that assistance should be given for the purpose of enabling applicants to purchase stock, trade, or shop fittings, a grant may be given for this purpose.

In connection with reorganization, we have to consider another question which has been present to the mind of everyone, and that is the considerable and very right demand that in appropriate cases where they are capable of making good use of these facilities the men shall have some right of access to the land. A scheme has been worked out and examined in great detail by a cabinet committee, the details of which will be announced shortly, which will provide facilities for ex-service men of all branches of service, for settlement either on small holdings, allotments, or gardens.

Civil positions (priority of release). November 13 (2651).

Mr. MACPHERSON. Provision has been made in the demobilization scheme that those men whose civil positions have been kept open for them shall receive priority of release within their several industrial groups. Instructions will be issued in due course, but no application should be made by employers until public notification is given. While it is not proposed to differentiate between volunteers and conscripts as such, the object aimed at will be achieved by including in early drafts a certain proportion of those men who have served longest in a theater of active operations.

Information from employers. November 13 (2652).

Mr. ROBERTS (minister of labor). In order to assist the working of the scheme by which men with definite employment awaiting them can be released early, action in the direction indicated by the honorable and gallant member is being taken. Letters are being issued to employers suggesting that they should prepare particulars of men now with the forces whom they wish to engage immediately upon dispersal. The particulars required will be the men's names, the nature of the employment, and the rate of wages offered, and also, if possible, the unit, regimental number, and home address. It is not desired that these particulars should be supplied to the ministry of labor at present, but employers will be asked in due course to send the particulars to the employment exchanges on special cards which will be supplied.

Applications for release. November 14 (2869–2870).

Mr. ROBERTS. The civil demobilization and resettlement department of the ministry of labor will be responsible for dealing with applications for the release of men from the forces and for laying down the principles which, subject to the exigencies of the naval and military situation, will regulate the order of release. I propose to deal with both these points in a public announcement.

Police. November 14 (2876).

Mr. MACPHERSON. Provision has been made in the demobilization scheme for the early release of policemen serving with His Majesty's forces.

Procedure. November 18 (3201).

Mr. MACPHERSON. Men will be released from military service in accordance with a general scheme of industrial priority which is being prepared by the ministry of labor. When demobilization begins, dispersal drafts will be formed by officers commanding units strictly in accordance with instructions which have been laid down, wherein the principle of a priority on industrial grounds is combined with that of a limited priority on other grounds, such as marital condition, length of war service, etc.

Memento of service. November 19 (3310).

Mr. MACPHERSON. It is intended that on demobilization a soldier will retain his uniform (except greatcoat) and kit, and he will therefore keep his cap and badge.

Agricultural labor. November 19 (3310–11).

Mr. MACPHERSON. There are at present over 70,000 men in agricultural companies, and 5,000 plowmen who are in medical category "A" have just been sent out on two months' furlough. All men at home of any medical category, who are thrashers, are now being obtained from the army. During the harvest 20,000 soldiers were supplied, of whom about 3,000 are still engaged in potato lifting. Any men of low medical category who are experienced farm workers and are serving at home are being attached to agricultural companies and made available for agricultural work.

Professional men. November 19 (3338).

Dr. ADDISON. Arrangements have been made to earmark for early release when general demobilization begins soldiers who have definite offers of employment. The honorable member will appreciate the need for demobilizing first of all those men whose services are essential for the reestablishment of industries which will be able to absorb labor. In regulating the priority of release, due weight will be given to the industrial importance of surveyors and valuers.

Young soldiers (education). November 20 (3383–84).

Mr. MACPHERSON. It has been arranged that officers and men whose education has been interrupted by military service and who wish to resume their studies will be treated on the same basis as those men who have definite employment awaiting them, and they will be granted early release within the period of general dispersal. I am unable to make any statement as to when this release will take effect. * * * What I have tried to arrange is this: There are a great many brilliant young boys in officers' cadet battalions, and I am now most anxious that they should be allowed to attend their examinations at Oxford or Cambridge.

Building trade. November 20 (3419).

Mr. MACPHERSON. The urgent necessities of the building trade will not be lost sight of in the administration of the scheme of demobilization.

Business proprietors. November 20 (3419).

Mr. MACPHERSON. The general scheme of demobilization provides that proprietors of one-man businesses who will be able to recommence their business may be released from the army on the same basis as other men with employment awaiting them.

Pivotal men. November 21 (3452).

Mr. BRIDGEMAN (parliamentary secretary to the ministry of labor). Employers who wish to insure that men serving with the forces who desire to return to their employment are earmarked for early release should obtain from the nearest employment exchange a postcard (E. D. 406), enter on it each man's full name, unit, regimental number, and the theater of war or command where he is now serving, and return it to the exchange. These forms E. D. 406 are also obtainable from employment exchanges throughout Scotland.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if we shall have some system like that, suitable of course to our conditions, I shall be fully justified in my suggestions about the matter.

Mr. President, there are many other things that I might say, but I have already detained the Senate very much longer than I had intended.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Before the Senator takes his seat, I should like the privilege of asking him one question as to one phase of the present situation, in order that I may have his views; that is, with reference to the order of the Secretary of War against further promotions in the Army after a fixed period of time. I understood that an order had been issued by the Secretary of War that there should be no promotions after the armistice. Is there any truth in that statement?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not received any information on that subject.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will permit me, I will inform the Senator from Indiana that I took that subject up some time ago with the Secretary of War, and I can state that he is in great sympathy with the proposition that promotions which have hitherto been ordered, but upon which commissions have not been issued, should be granted, and, when it is possible, also granted with the discharge. It may be, however, that some legislation is necessary in regard to that.

The Secretary of War also suggested that it would be pleasing to him if every officer who has served and served well and with credit were advanced one point in promotion at the time of discharge.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. In further answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Indiana, I will say that I, too, had a conference with the Secretary of War upon the same matter; and, as I understood, the promotion that was to be given to an officer who was honorably discharged from the service was that he should be advanced one point, provided he remained in the Reserve Army.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not want to be understood as saying that the Secretary of War would do what I have stated he favored; but that is what he would like to do, and we may be able to assist him in that effort by enacting legislation here.

Mr. SMOOT. I had noticed the Senator from Colorado had introduced a bill directing the Secretary of War to issue such commissions where they had been recommended on or before November 11, 1918.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I have introduced a bill to that effect.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think that it is absolutely necessary to have legislation in the matter. All the Secretary of War has to do is to revoke the order which was issued by the War Department and to issue those commissions up to November 11; but the order was that no matter whether a commission had been recommended through the regular military channels or not, if it had not actually been perfected at the time of the signing of the armistice it should go no further and the promotion should not be granted. I hope the Senator from Colorado will use all of his endeavors to see that the bill which he introduced shall be reported to the Senate, for I know there is a feeling both in the House and in the Senate that legislation of that kind ought to be enacted, and enacted at an early date.

Mr. THOMAS. I intend to make the effort at the next meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs to have the bill favorably reported.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am going to request that there be printed as an appendix to my remarks the report of Gen. Pershing to the Secretary of War. That report will be found in the report of the Secretary of War for the year 1918.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The report referred to will be found as Appendix B at the close of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's speech.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, reading Gen. Pershing's report, brief as it is, it will be seen that the splendid courage and conduct of the American troops reflected credit not only upon them but upon America as well. The combat operations from the time they first entered the lists of combatants is told in a soldier's way and with an eloquence which only a soldier can command. I am not going to refer to that report except to call attention to and ask Senators to read the account of the battle of St. Mihiel, which Gen. Pershing said was the first great offensive of our troops, to the story of the Meuse-Argonne offensive in its first phases, in its later phases, and in its final consummation. I do not believe that any army in the world ever made such a splendid record in so short a time. In those particular operations the American soldiers constituted a separate and an independent command, and they very soon convinced the allies that America had an Army in the field on which they could rely, and one which soon taught Germany that it must be respected and feared.

One of the remarkable things about it is that from the time of the first movement forward until the Germans surrendered there was never a backward step of the American troops, except at one time, and that was under the order of a commanding French officer. Even then the American officer in command of our reluctantly and temporarily retreating forces served notice upon the world that American soldiers could not understand why there had been given to them the order to retreat and that he was about to make a counteroffensive, which he did. Mr. President, from that hour to this very holy moment there has not been a time when America has not given a proper account of herself through her splendid soldiery.

Those soldiers, as well as those here who wanted to go but who were prevented by war's sudden ending, are of the best blood and of the flower and chivalry of this country. There is represented in our Army at home and abroad every community of American life, the best of American life. The farmer's son, the laborer's son, the lawyer's son, the banker's son, the rich and poor alike, from every avenue of this splendid Republic of ours, all are there, and they have together been marching shoulder to shoulder to a victory which not only means France redeemed but means civilization protected and perpetuated for America as well as for those other countries. Glad we ought to be that our boys, those by whom government in America must in the last analysis be administered, have assisted in conquering across the seas 3,000 miles from the homeland an army brutal in its nature, unrelenting in its enmities and in its hates, no respecter of women or of children, of innocence or of age, an army which has followed and justified the advice given to it at one time by its Kaiser, "Make yourselves more frightful than the Huns under Attila. See that for a thousand years no enemy mentions the very name 'Germany' without shuddering"; an army whose subjection will for all time remove a constant menace and an obstruction to civilization.

"By the light of the stars in Old Glory's free flag
We tramp through the battle field's night;
By our side floats the sun-flag of faithful Japan
As we charge through the smoky daylight.

"Hurrah for the roar of the guns that we man
For Belgium oppressed; or perchance,
Hurrah for our allies who march as one man
For every man's country and France!

"The tricolor 'll float with our aid once again
Where the Hun trod the lilies of France!
May God mark the road from Archangel to Rome
As the line of our final advance!

"There's red in the blood of our veins as it flows,
There's red in the flags that we bear,
May peace join the shamrock, the maple, the rose,
With the lily of France, everywhere!

"So here's to the way, and here's to the day
When victory's banner's unfurled
O'er the Anzac, Italian, the Serb, and the bear, O'er the Briton, the Yank, and the world!"

America has played her part. Our soldier boys are coming back with an enlarged vision; they are coming back to take part with those who have been compelled to remain at home in the administration of the affairs of Government; and do not fear, Mr. President, that those, whoever they may be, who are responsible for their mistreatment, must give an account of themselves at the opportune moment.

Let us receive them, then, not only with loud and glad acclaim, Mr. President, but let us receive them with the tenderness which is their due for the suffering they have endured in the cause of liberty and of civilization.

APPENDIX A.

JUDGE HUGHES'S REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS ON THE AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION INVESTIGATION TRANSMITTED TO ATTORNEY GENERAL GREGORY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 25, 1918.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL:

I have the honor to submit the following report of the aircraft inquiry:

The investigation has been concerned with aircraft production. Other activities relating to aviation, but not to production, have been touched only incidentally. Thus, upward of 30 training or flying fields with numerous structures have been provided, and to meet other aviation needs a great variety of construction has been required, here and abroad. These enterprises, being aside from aircraft production itself, have not been the subject of this inquiry, save as transactions relating to Wilbur Wright Field and McCook Field have invited scrutiny by reason of the aircraft enterprises centered at Dayton, Ohio, and the activities of Edward A. Deeds and his former business associates.

Another governmental activity which does relate to aircraft production, but is conducted separately from the orders for airplanes and engines, is known as the sales department. The Government itself purchases large quantities of lumber, fabric, chemicals, etc., which it resells. When these commodities are supplied by the Government to contractors, the sales department is credited and the items are transferred to the other appropriate accounts. The largest item of this sort is for spruce. The account of the sales department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, shows that spruce orders amounted to $76,211,360.35, on which there had been deliveries and payments aggregating $6,357,853.83, leaving unfilled orders of $69,853,506.52; and of the spruce delivered the Government had resold to the extent of $3,679,155.95. It appears that the Government had also (to June 30, 1918) invested in its cut-up plant at Vancouver, Wash., the sum of $1,487,237.81. While to some extent testimony has been taken bearing on the spruce contracts, it became evident as the inquiry proceeded that it would be impossible to reach any satisfactory conclusion with respect to the transactions of the spruce production division without a special inquiry on the Pacific coast, which, in view of the extent and character of the activities involved, would probably take several months. It has not been practicable to undertake this as yet, in view of the magnitude of the work involved in other branches of the investigation, and accordingly it has been left to be undertaken hereafter by the Department of Justice as it may be advised. For this reason, a report on the operations of the spruce production division or of the sales department will not now be attempted. Also, in view of the importance of the present inquiry in its special relation to airplanes and airplane engines, transactions of the balloon division have not been examined.

Aside from these limitations, the inquiry has taken a wide range. It has been prosecuted without pause since it was begun in the latter part of May last. About 280 witnesses have been examined and over 17,000 pages of testimony have been taken. The more important plants have been visited, and a large part of the testimony has been taken at these plants where books, records, employees, and Government representatives have been available. To compass all the activities involved in aircraft production, reaching into a great variety of contracts and operations involving numerous plants and the expenditure of many millions of dollars, would require the constant efforts of a force of investigators for a year or more longer and also the services of an army of accountants charged with the responsibility of checking and auditing the work of the hundreds of Government representatives now supervising the contractors' accounts. It is impossible, of course, to say what irregularities or offenses such a protracted inquiry would bring to light, but the investigation has been sufficiently comprehensive to give, it is believed, a survey of the field as a whole and to disclose the facts bearing upon the serious charges which have been made.

In addition, and as a result of information received through this inquiry, there have been special proceedings before grand juries. Thus, on information of violations of the sabotage act at the Hammondsport (N. Y.) plant of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, the matter was examined by the grand jury and indictments were returned in the western district of New York, and there have also been indictments in the same district for violations of this act at the North Elmwood plant, Buffalo, of the same corporation. There also has been a special investigation by the grand jury at Sacramento, with respect to conditions at the Liberty Iron Works.

It is manifestly impracticable to state the details of even the more important evidence, but the salient and controlling facts which have been elicited will be set forth, so far as this is deemed to be compatible with military exigency.

First. Appropriations and expenditures.

At the time of the declaration of a state of war with Germany, April 6, 1917, the appropriations available for aircraft production were those applicable to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917. By the act of August 29, 1916, the sum of $14,281,766 was appropriated for the expenses of the Signal Service, with the proviso that not more than $13,281,666 should be used for the purchase, manufacture, maintenance, and operation of aircraft and of described vehicles necessary for the Aviation Section. It was further provided that not to exceed $50,000 should be used for the payment of all expenses in connection with the development of a suitable type of aviation motor and not more than $500 should be used for the cost of special technical instruction of officers of the Aviation Section. Of the total appropriation above mentioned the sum of $4,500,000 was later (act of May 12, 1917) made available for the establishment of aviation schools and experimental stations, and it was under this appropriation that Langley Field, Va., was acquired and developed.

The act of February 14, 1917, appropriated $3,600,000 for aircraft, buildings for equipment, and other accessories necessary in the Aviation Section, for use in connection with seacoast defenses.

The act of May 12, 1917, appropriated for the expenses of the Signal Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the sum of $11,800,000, with the proviso that not more than $10,800,000 should be used for aircraft production, including experimentation, and for the buildings for equipment and personnel and necessary accessories. The sum of $43,450,000 was appropriated by the deficiency appropriation act of June 15, 1917, of which $31,846,067.16 became available, under the terms of the act, for the fiscal year 1917–18.

Provision for an adequate aircraft program for the Army was not made until the passage of the act of July 24, 1917, appropriating for aeronautical purposes the sum of $640,000,000.

STATEMENT FOR FISCAL YEAR JUNE 30, 1917, TO JUNE 30, 1918.

The aggregate of all aeronautical appropriations which were available for the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, were as follows:

Act of July 24, 1917	$640,000,000.00
Other aeronautical appropriations	51,851,866.47
Total	691,851,866.47

The estimated obligations charged against these appropriations during the fiscal year amounted to $933,948,959.03. To the extent of $176,924,903.42 this excess represented obligations of the sales department already described, for which it was contemplated there would be reimbursement by resales. (Of this last-mentioned amount there were reported as disbursed in the sales department (to June 30, 1918) that is, for deliveries of materials, $25,966,739.95 [corrections on further accounting raised this amount to $26,557,706.87], the resales amounting to $19,008,150.26, and the balance representing assets on hand.) Exclusive of the obligations of the sales department, the estimated aeronautical obligations of the Government for the fiscal year 1917–18 amounted to $757,024,055.61. These obligations were calculated on estimated costs, and the excess over the total aeronautical appropriations (that is, over $691,851,866.47) will largely be offset by savings on the estimated costs and by cancellations of orders.

OBLIGATIONS OTHER THAN FOR AIRPLANES AND ENGINES.

The estimated obligations for the aviation equipment division covered not only airplanes and engines, but a variety of equipment and other essentials. Thus the estimated obligations, charged against the $640,000,000 appropriation, for transportation, including motor trucks, chassis, motorcycles, bicycles, etc., amounted to $42,938,630.73; for general equipment, including various sorts of apparatus and supplies, $34,979,741.53; for maintenance, including maintenance of supply depots, planting of castor beans, etc., $17,948,955.60; for special clothing for aviators, mechanics, etc., $2,520,512.63; for machine guns, ammunition, and bombs, $29,249,033.29; for acquisition of plants $2,595,599.83; and for miscellaneous equipment, including various incidental expenses of officers, stations, and schools, $7,748,617.75.

There were also charged against the $640,000,000 appropriation the estimated obligations of the construction division, embracing training fields and construction here and abroad, amounting to $62,232,664.55; of the balloon division (covering balloons and accessories), $16,910,891.20; of the schools division, $1,016,223.48; and of the finance division, including the pay of reserve corps and of civilian employees, and the reserve for foreign expenditures, $35,963,417.55. The various estimated obligations for similar purposes other than for airplanes and engines, which were charged against the other aeronautical appropriations for the fiscal year 1917–18, aggregated $28,009,060.92.

Thus out of the total estimated obligations ($757,024,055.61) for all aeronautical purposes, exclusive of the sales department, the estimated obligations for purposes other than airplanes and engines aggregated $282,113,349.06.

OBLIGATIONS FOR AIRPLANES AND ENGINES.

The amount of the estimated obligations for airplanes and engines, and spare parts of both (including experimental and development work), charged to June 30, 1918, against the aeronautical appropriations for the fiscal year 1917–18 was as follows:

Charged to the $640,000,000 appropriation	$457,379,122.15
Charged to other appropriations	17,531,584.40
Total	474,910,706.55

ACTUAL DISBURSEMENTS FOR ALL AERONAUTICAL PURPOSES.

It should be noted that the amounts above stated represent estimated obligations, not actual disbursements. Although obligations were incurred, payments were to be made only as payments were earned by performance of contracts. Payments prior to June 30, 1918, were made on vouchers for amounts represented as earned, but such payments were only a part of the estimated obligations, by reason of delays in production. Further payments should be made only as production goes forward and contracts are duly performed.

Thus, as against the total estimated obligations for aeronautical purposes, aggregating $933,948,959.03 (including the sales department), the disbursements reported down to June 30, 1918, amounted to the sum of $430,234,316.99. Out of the $640,000,000 appropriation, the total disbursements for the fiscal year for all aeronautical purposes (that is, embracing those apart from airplanes and engines, as well as for the latter) amounted to $363,818,014.87 (subject to correction by addition of $590,966.62 for sales department); and, according to the accounts of the Bureau of Aircraft Production, there remained of this appropriation in the Treasury of the United States on June 30, 1918, the sum of $276,181,985.13. According to the books of the Treasury Department, the unexpended balance of the $640,000,000 appropriation amounted on June 29, 1917, to $304,478,211.70. The difference of $28,296,226.57 is explained by the existence of unwithdrawn balances which had been allotted to the Quartermaster Corps and the Ordnance Department, and by various credits pertaining to the month of June which were not received in the Bureau of Aircraft Production until July.

ACTUAL DISBURSEMENTS FOR AIRPLANES AND ENGINES.

The actual payments for the fiscal year 1917–18 against the estimated obligations for airplanes and engines, and spare parts of both (including payments for experimental and development work), are reported by the finance division of the Bureau of Aircraft Production as amounting to $155,535,946.41, as follows:

Disbursed from the $640,000,000 appropriation	$142,908,398.95
Disbursed from other appropriations	12,627,547.46
Total	155,535,946.41

These disbursements included not only payments to contractors for articles delivered or on account of work and materials, but also advances in the nature of loans to contractors, upon security, made by the War Credits Board, and, in addition, the payments which had been made for the manufacture of planes and engines overseas.

The payments for manufacture overseas amounted to $25,605,074.31, as follows:

Cash remittances to overseas disbursing officers for payment on overseas contracts for airplanes and engines	$16,600,000.00
Paid on purchase of materials, supplies, etc., purchased by United States for shipment abroad to be used in overseas manufacture of airplanes and engines. [This includes the compensation of the purchasing agent, The J. G. White Engineering Corporation, amounting to 3 per cent of the purchases, or $262,662.02]	9,005,074.31
Total	25,605,074.31

The unpaid balances of advances to contractors (whose contracts are embraced in the obligations for airplanes and engines above described), these advances being repayable to the Government, amounted on June 30, 1918 (exclusive of interest), to $21,491,551.14. The principal contractors who have received these advances are specified below:

Contractor.	Advances authorized.	Advances made.	Balance unpaid June 30, 1918 (without interest).
Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation	$8,000,000	$8,000,000	$5,561,645.94
Dayton Wright Airplane Co	2,500,000	2,000,000	1,405,222.57
Duesenberg Motors Corporation	1,650,000	1,650,000	1,632,447.97
Fisher Body Corporation	2,000,000	2,000,000	1,944,933.33
Lincoln Motor Co	6,500,000	6,500,000	6,255,392.00

Trego Motors Corporation	315,000	285,000	281,695.70
Willys-Overland Co	2,500,000	2,500,000	451,861.25
Various other contractors			227,120.38
Total			21,491,551.14

The amounts paid, to June 30, 1918, on account of experimental and development work on airplanes and engines amounted to $1,697,830.19, of which the principal items are these:

Expenditures of experimental station at McCook Field	$974,300.20
Director, Bureau of Standards	64,077.33
Department of Agriculture	34,540.82
Packard Motor Car Co	249,159.10
Dayton Wright Airplane Co. (other vouchers allowed before June 30, 1918, but not paid until later, $89,630.52)	48,120.89
Dayton Metal Products Co	66,097.14
Miscellaneous payments	261,535.21
Total	1,697,830.19

Deducting these advances and the payments of experimental and development work, the disbursements to the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1918, for airplanes and engines and their parts manufactured or in process of manufacture in the United States amounted to $106,741,490.77, as follows:

Total disbursed for airplanes and engines		$155,535,946.41

For some of the units thus delivered payments had not yet been made at the close of the fiscal year. The payments to June 30, 1918, covered about 5,530 of the airplanes delivered and about 9,750 of the engines delivered. In addition, there had been deliveries of various planes and engine parts, and the greater part of these were also covered by the payments above mentioned. And there were also large payments to contractors under cost-plus contracts for labor, materials, and overhead charges in connection with work in process.

ALLOCATION OF PAYMENTS TO JUNE 30, 1918.

The payments for the production of airplanes and engines, and parts, were made under two classes of contracts, (1) fixed price, and (2) cost-plus contracts:

Payments under fixed-price contracts	$57,193,621.06
Payments under cost-plus contracts	49,547,869.71
Total	106,741,490.77

FIXED-PRICE CONTRACTS.

In the case of payments under fixed-price contracts the payments presupposed delivery to and acceptance by the Government of the articles contracted for. Most of the JN training planes, 150 of the Standard J–1 training planes, metal parts for Handley-Page planes, all the engines for the elementary training planes, and 1,500 of the Hispano-Suiza 150-horsepower engines are embraced in the orders placed on a fixed-price basis. Large numbers of parts of planes and engines were ordered on the same basis.

The payments under fixed-price contracts are shown to have been distributed as follows:

For engines and their parts	$23,216,930.28
For airplanes and their parts	33,976,690.78
Total	57,193,621.06

COST-PLUS CONTRACTS.

The cost-plus contracts for engines and parts related to the Liberty engines (United States twelves), most of the Hispano-Suiza, and the Le Rhome, Gnome, and Bugatti engines. Among airplanes 1,450 of the Standard J–1 elementary training planes, the De Haviland four, and Bristol service planes, and the Handley-Page wood parts were under cost-plus contracts. The following is the distribution of payments under cost-plus contracts to June 30, 1918:

For engines and their parts	$28,348,487.44
Total	49,547,869.71

These payments (being exclusive of advances in the nature of loans) embraced (1) cost of special tools and "Increased facilities" owned by the Government, but located in contractors' plants, (2) fixed profits on completed units delivered, (3) royalties on completed units delivered, (4) cost of manufacture of completed units delivered, and (5) payments for work in process—that is, for materials, labor, and overhead expense applicable to units in course of production. The distribution of these payments to June 30, 1918, is:

Special tools and increased facilities owned by the Government	$6,840,971.70
Fixed profits on completed units delivered	3,279,028.18
Royalties on completed units delivered	374,986.40
Payments to June 30, 1918, under cost-plus contracts for labor, materials, and overhead charges applicable to delivered units and to work in process	39,052,883.43
Total	49,547,869.71

It is impossible at this time, by reason of the state of the accounts, to divide the last item covering cost of manufacture so as to give separately the manufacturing cost (exclusive of fixed profits and royalties) of the units which had been delivered and the cost of work in process at the close of the fiscal year.

Appropriations and obligations for fiscal year, June 30, 1918, to June 30, 1919.

CONTINUANCE OF PRIOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The act of July 9, 1918, making appropriations for the fiscal year 1918–19, continued the prior appropriation of $640,000,000, and other aeronautical appropriations, thus making them available for the present fiscal year and for the payment of obligations incurred prior to the passage of the act. Under this provision the production orders given in the last fiscal year, which remain uncanceled, will be continued and payments will be made in accordance with the terms of the existing contracts as production progresses.

NEW APPROPRIATIONS.

The act of July 9, 1918, also made a new appropriation for the Air Service of $884,304,758. This appropriation is available for the purchase, manufacture, maintenance, repair, and operation of airships, war balloons, and other aerial machines, with equipment, aviation stations, schools, and fields; for the expenses of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees; and also for training, experimental work, creation, expansion, acquisition, and development of plants, etc. Of this amount there has been apportioned for Air Service productions the sum of $760,000,000, of which $200,000,000 has been set aside for airplanes, their spare parts, instruments, and accessories; $250,000,000 for engines, their repair parts, instruments, and accessories; and $200,000,000 for foreign expenditures. Various items for balloons, oils, gases and chemicals, transportation, plants, miscellaneous equipment and supplies, experimentation, and pay of Reserve Corps and civilians make up the remainder.

Against this new appropriation, thus apportioned, the obligations incurred to September 30, 1918 (exclusive of the sales department) amounted to $151,580,503.35, of which $21,603,470.90 is for airplanes, their spare parts, etc., and $102,746,372.91 is for engines, their repair parts, etc. The total payments against the new obligations amounted to September 30, 1918, to $3,670,707.66 (exclusive of foreign expenditures and transfers to other departments), leaving then unexpended of the new appropriation of $760,000,000 apportioned to Air Service production, the sum of $756,329,292.34.

PAYMENTS SINCE JUNE 30, 1918, AND TOTAL PAYMENTS TO DATE.

The last financial reports available are of September 30, 1918. The disbursements to that date which were made after June 30, 1918, for all aeronautical purposes and were chargeable to the appropriations for the prior fiscal year (continued as above stated) are as follows:

Disbursed from the $640,000,000 appropriation (act of June 24, 1917)	$128,265,038.31
Disbursed from other aeronautical appropriations	7,250,915.36
Total disbursed since June 30, 1918, under prior appropriations for aeronautical purposes	135,515,953.67

The total disbursements for aeronautical purposes from June 30, 1918, to September 30, 1918, are, in the aggregate:

Under appropriations prior to June 30, 1918	$135,515,953.67
Under appropriations after that date, as above	3,670,707.66
Total	139,186,661.33

These disbursements for all aeronautical purposes can not at present be apportioned so as to show separately the amounts disbursed since June 30, 1918, for airplanes and engines and parts.

Payments for airplanes condemned.

STANDARD J–1 TRAINING PLANES.

This type of plane was condemned as dangerous in June, 1918, because of the unsuitability of the motor (Hall-Scott, A7a) used with it. There were 1,600 of these SJ–1 planes ordered and delivered, and all deliveries had been made prior to June 30, 1918. The entire amount disbursed for these planes and their spare parts to September 30, 1918, the date of the last financial statement, is $11,027,733.61, of which $8,593,576.11 was under cost-plus contracts.

There were 2,250 A7a engines ordered for these planes, all of which, with parts, have been delivered. The amount disbursed for these engines and parts (exclusively under fixed-price contracts) to September 30, 1918, amounted to $6,487,134.75.

The aggregate cost of the SJ–1 planes with the A7a engines with spare parts to September 30, 1918, amounted to $17,514,868.36.

There appears to have been no defect in the SJ–1 plane itself, and there is an expectation that it may be utilized by the installation of another engine. The cost of adapting these planes to such an installation may amount to $2,000 a plane.

What salvage may ultimately be gained in this way, or on the A7a engines, can not now be determined.

BRISTOL FIGHTERS.

The Bristol Fighter was condemned as unsafe in July, 1918. A contract for 2,000 of these planes and for 1,200 sets of spare parts had been placed with the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation on a cost-plus basis, at an estimated cost of $19,190,100. Orders were also given to the Hayes-Ionia Co. and to the Lewis Spring & Axle Co., each for 400 sets of spare parts, at the estimated cost of $1,890,000, or $3,780,000 in all. The estimated cost of the Bristol planes and spares was thus $22,970,100.

Only 27 had been delivered prior to cancellation, but there was a large amount of work in process. The amount shown by the accounts of the Bureau of Aircraft Production to have been paid on these contracts to September 30, 1918 (exclusive of "increased facilities" owned by the Government) is about $2,350,000. Taking the materials purchased for the Bristols, the labor and estimated overhead charges, it would appear that the total amount expended by the Curtiss Co. in the course of the production of the Bristols was about $3,000,000. This does not include any claim for damages for the cancellation of the contract. The finance division of the Bureau of Aircraft Production makes a general estimate (which includes unpaid vouchers and possible claims for damages growing out of the cancellation of contracts) that the aggregate cost of the Bristol will amount to about $6,500,000. What salvage there may be on the materials can not now be determined.

The Liberty engines intended to be used in the Bristols can be utilized in other planes.

On this estimate the cost to the Government of the SJ–1 planes (with engines), and on the Bristol planes, subject to reduction by whatever salvage there may be, amounts to $24,000,000. [Further information has been received that a contract is contemplated under which about $3,500,000 of Bristol parts may be used in a new type of plane, which, if successful, would reduce the estimated loss on the Bristols to $3,000,000 and the total loss on SJ–1s and Bristols, subject to salvage on the SJ–1s, to $20,500,000.]

Second. Responsible officers and advisory boards.

By the act of July 24, 1917, full authority was given to the President to provide through the War Department for the purchase, manufacture, maintenance, and operation of all types of aircraft, with all necessary equipment.

SIGNAL CORPS.

Under the Secretary of War the authority to establish the aircraft program and the control and administration of matters relating to aircraft production for the Army were vested in the Chief Signal Officer, Brig. Gen. George O. Squier. It was under his direction that the organization of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps, with its various departments of production, supply, inspection, and accounting was effected. The matter of aircraft production was intrusted to the equipment division, which was organized on August 2, 1917. Edward A. Deeds was made chief of this division, with Sydney D. Waldon as his assistant. At the same time Robert L. Montgomery was made chief of the finance and supply division. There was a reorganization on August 29, 1917, by which these two divisions were abolished and the functions of both were transferred to a new Equipment Division, with Edward A. Deeds in charge. Robert L. Montgomery was made the head of the finance department of the equipment division. Deeds, Montgomery, and Waldon had been members of the Aircraft Production Board, and in or about August, 1917, they were commissioned with the rank of colonel. Thus Col. Deeds, as the head of the Equipment Division, had direct charge under the Chief Signal Officer of all matters relating to aircraft production. On January 14, 1918, Col. Deeds became industrial executive in the Executive Division of the Signal Corps, and was succeeded by Col. Montgomery as head of the Equipment Division, but despite the change in technical relation it is apparent that Col. Deeds remained in practical charge, under the Chief Signal Officer, of production. In February, 1918, William C. Potter became the head of the Equipment Division, and remained in this position until the passage of the act of May 20, 1918.

BUREAU OF AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

By order of the President, dated May 20, 1918 (promulgated May 24, 1918), the Chief Signal Officer was put in charge of military signal duties not connected with the Aviation Section; Gen. W. L. Kenly was appointed Director of Military Aeronautics and charged with the duties which had formerly pertained to the Aviation Section, except so far as they related to aircraft production, and for the latter purpose the executive agency known as the Bureau of Aircraft Production was established. Mr. John D. Ryan was appointed head of this bureau and thus became Director of Aircraft Production, Mr. Potter taking the post of assistant director.

Advisory Bodies.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS.

By the act of March 3, 1915, an Advisory Committee for Aeronautics was established, to consist of two members from the War Department, two from the Navy Department, a representative each of the Smithsonian Institution, of the United States Weather Bureau, and of the United States Bureau of Standards, together with not more than five additional persons qualified as experts. The prescribed duty of the committee was to supervise and direct the scientific study of the problems of flying with a view to their practical solution. This body has been continuously maintained; it has examined numerous inventions and has been engaged in scientific study. But it has had nothing to do with the formulation of the aircraft program or with decisions as to the types of planes or engines selected for production.

The committee was also active in securing the adjustment reflected in what is known as the cross-license agreement for the payment of royalties for the use of patented inventions pertaining to aircraft.

JOINT ARMY AND NAVY TECHNICAL AIRCRAFT BOARD.

This board was constituted in the early part of May, 1917. It was composed of officers of special qualifications by reason of scientific study and experience, who were designated by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively. The declared purpose was "to standardize, so far as possible, the designs and general specifications of aircraft except Zeppelins." The board has been in continuous existence and has made various recommendations. These, however, have not been controlling and the board has had no authority to enforce its views.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION BOARD.

The Aircraft Production Board was created in May, 1917, pursuant to a resolution of the Council of National Defense. Its function was solely advisory. The initial steps in organization were taken under the authority of the Council of National Defense by Howard E. Coffin, who became chairman of the board and selected the civilian personnel, consisting of Edward A. Deeds, Sidney D. Waldon and Robert L. Montgomery. Mr. Coffin—vice president of the Hudson Motor Car Co.—was a member of the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense. Mr. Deeds had been engaged in manufacturing enterprises at Dayton; in April, 1917, he had been appointed a member of the munitions standards board and placed on the subcommittee on fuses and detonators. Mr. Waldon had formerly been a vice president of the Packard Motor Car Co. Mr. Montgomery was a member of the firm of Montgomery, Clothier & Tyler, bankers and brokers, of Philadelphia. In addition to the four civilian members, the chief signal officer and Rear Admiral D. W. Taylor, Chief of the Bureau of Construction, were appointed members of the board, representing the Army and Navy, respectively.

While the Aircraft Production Board had no authority to commit the Government, the board was continuously active in the formulation of programs and the adoption of resolutions of advice. Numerous contracts for airplanes and engines were placed upon its recommendation. When the Equipment Division of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps was organized in August, 1917, the work of the board became of less actual importance, though it was still conspicuous in routine. Col. Deeds, Col. Waldon, and Col. Montgomery now had executive duties in the Equipment Division under the Chief Signal Officer, and for the most part the recommendations relating to the Army aircraft program naturally followed the views of the Army officers who were in actual control. Similarly, the recommendations relating to the Navy reflected Navy proposals. The board, however, afforded a valuable opportunity for the interchange of opinion and the unification of effort.

AIRCRAFT BOARD.

The Aircraft Board, superseding the former organization, was established by the act of October 1, 1917. This was composed of nine members, including the Chief Signal Officer (Maj. Gen. Squier) and two other representatives of the Army, and the Chief Constructor of the Navy (Rear Admiral Irwin) and two other naval officers. For the Army, the Secretary of War designated Col. Deeds and Col. Montgomery; and for the Navy, the Secretary of the Navy designated Capt. N. E. Irwin and Lieut. Commander A. F. Atkins. The civilian members, appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, were Mr. Coffin (chairman), Richard F. Howe (who had been connected with the International Harvester Co.), and Harry B. Thayer (president of the Western Electric Co.)—the last named being appointed in February, 1918.

The act creating the Aircraft Board empowered it under the direction and control of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, "to supervise and direct, in accordance with the requirements prescribed or approved by the respective departments, the purchase, production, and manufacture of aircraft, engines, and all ordnance and instruments used in connection therewith, and accessories and materials therefor, including the purchase, lease, acquisition, or construction of plants for the manufacture of aircraft, engines, and accessories: Provided, That the board may make recommendations as to contracts and their distribution in connection with the foregoing, but every contract shall be made by the already constituted authorities of the respective departments."

It was also provided that "except upon the joint and concurrent approval of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy there shall not be established or maintained under the board any office or organization duplicating or replacing, in whole or in part, any office or organization now existing that can be properly established or maintained by appropriations made for or available for the military or naval service."

In February, 1918, Acting Judge Advocate Gen. S. T. Ansell gave an opinion to the effect that the provisions of the act should be construed to contemplate "only advisory or recommendatory functions." Thereupon, the Chief Signal Officer, in an order approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, defined the duties of the Aircraft Board as follows:

"(a) To act as a clearing house between the General Staff and the Signal Corps for all matters pertaining to raw materials for foreign governments for the production of aircraft, the Equipment Division of the Signal Corps to act as purchasing agency.

"(b) To act as a clearing house between the General Staff and the Signal Corps for all information in relation to requirements of foreign governments for aircraft to be manufactured in the United States.

"(c) To act as a clearing house for all information as to requirements as between the Army and Navy for aircraft and raw materials.

"(d) To study the requirements of the Army and Navy as regards combat and training planes. To study types with the technical divisions of the Army and Navy to the end that recommendations be made that given types be placed with industrial plants best fitted to undertake their manufacture. The Aircraft Board shall have no direct communication with manufacturing plants, except through the medium of the procurement divisions.

"(e) As a result of above studies the Aircraft Board may recommend that preparations be made for production before actual contracts are made.

"(f) To recommend the placing of experimental contract.

"(g) All programs should be made up by the board from information which shall be furnished by the proper Army and Navy military and naval branches on the one hand and the equipment and production divisions of the Army and Navy on the other. All foreign cables respecting aircraft production should be cleared through the board.

"(h) The Aircraft Board should be the instrumentality through which contact is made on matters of large policy with other bodies, such as Shipping Board, allied representatives, etc."

Despite the broad language of the act of Congress as to the power which might be committed to the board under the direction of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, it will be observed that this Executive order had the effect of greatly limiting the authority of the board and that it was denied even the right to hold "direct communication with manufacturing plants." It was further provided that all programs should be made up by the board "from information which shall be furnished by the proper Army and Navy military and naval branches on the one hand and the equipment and production divisions of the Army and Navy on the other." The manifest purpose was to leave no question that the actual control of aircraft production rested with the military and naval officers.

The Aircraft Board held frequent sessions and continuously made recommendations upon which action was taken and contracts placed, the service of the board being virtually that of a clearing house for proposals which generally emanated from the responsible authorities and in all cases were dependent upon the action of these authorities for their final approval and execution.

Third. Personal interests.

There are no common-law offenses against the United States, and a charge of crime under Federal law must rest exclusively upon the violation of a Federal criminal statute. (United States v. Eaton, 144 U. S. 677, 687; United States v. George, 228 U. S. 422.)

The applicable statutes of the United States dealing with the question of personal interest of officers and agents of the Government in Government contracts are the following:

(1) Section 41 of the Criminal Code of the United States, formerly section 1783 of the Revised Statutes, provides:

"SEC. 41. No officer or agent of any corporation, joint-stock company, or association, and no member or agent of any firm, corporation directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm shall be employed or shall act as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm. Whoever shall violate the provision of this section shall be fined not more than $2,000 and imprisoned not more than two years."

Under this statute it is not enough that an interested person merely recommends or advises transactions with the Government. To constitute a violation of the statute the interested person must "be employed" or "act as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation," and so forth.

(2) Section 3 of the act of August 10, 1917 (food and fuel control act), provides:

"SEC. 3. That no person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the United States in any capacity, including an advisory capacity, shall solicit, induce, or attempt to induce any person or officer authorized to execute or to direct the execution of contracts on behalf of the United States to make any contract or give any order for the furnishing to the United States of work, labor, or services, or of materials, supplies, or other property of any kind or character if such agent or employee has any pecuniary interest in such contract or order, or if he or any firm of which he is a member, or corporation, joint-stock company, or association of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in the pecuniary profits of which he is directly or indirectly interested, shall be a party thereto. Nor shall any agent or employee make, or permit any committee or other body of which he is a member to make, or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States, or any member or subordinate thereof, without making to the best of his knowledge and belief a full and complete disclosure in writing to such council, board, commission, or subordinate of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and of his interest in any firm, corporation, company, or association being a party thereto. Nor shall he participate in the awarding of such contract or giving such order. Any willful violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not change, alter, or repeal section 41 of chapter 321, Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large."

This section covers those who act in an advisory capacity. It has no application to transactions occurring before its passage.

It is apparent that the section was guardedly drawn and its limitations should be noted. The first sentence of the section applies to interested persons only where they "solicit, induce, or attempt to induce" any person or officer, who is "authorized to execute, or to direct the execution of contracts," to make any contract or give any order for labor, services, materials, etc. The use of different expressions in the different clauses of the section suggests possible shades of meaning. The act of recommending does not come within the first sentence unless it is found to amount to "soliciting," "inducing," or "attempting to induce," nor does the first sentence cover solicitations addressed to others than the persons or officers duly authorized to make the contracts or give the orders.

The second sentence relates to "recommendations" by interested persons, but it is limited to recommendations made "to any council, board, or commission of the United States or any member or subordinate thereof" in the absence of the disclosure described. Apparently this sentence does not cover recommendations made to individual officers acting under the authority conferred upon them by law, who are not members or subordinates of a "council, board, or commission."

The third sentence provides that the interested person shall not "participate in the awarding of such contract or giving such order." This would seem to relate to those who take part in the actual awarding of the contract or giving of the order and not to those who act in an advisory capacity only.

The section concludes with the proviso that its provisions shall not alter or repeal section 41 of the Criminal Code above quoted.

To come within these statutes an interested person must either (1) act as an officer or agent of the Government for the transaction of business with the concern in which he is interested, or (2) solicit, induce, or attempt to induce the person or officer, who is authorized to execute or direct the execution of contracts, to make a contract with, or give an order to, the concern to which the interest relates, or (3) take part in a recommendation to a "council, board, or commission," or subordinate or members thereof, without the disclosure stated, or (4) participate in the award of the contract or giving of the order.

In connection with these statutes attention may be called to the following provision, which appears as a rider in the appropriation act of March 3, 1917, immediately following an appropriation for the distribution of documents (39 Stat., p. 1106):

"Provided, That on and after July 1, 1919, no Government official or employee shall receive any salary in connection with his services as such an official or employee from any source other than the Government of the United States, except as may be contributed out of the treasury of any State, county, or municipality, and no person, association, or corporation shall make any contribution to, or in any way supplement the salary of, any Government official or employee for the services performed by him for the Government of the United States. Any person violating any of the terms of this proviso shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 or imprisonment for not less than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, as the court may determine."

It will be noted that this provision, enacted in March, 1917, is not to be operative until July 1, 1919. It may be contended with force that this constitutes a legislative declaration, by implication, that the action described by the provision—that is, the mere supplementing of the pay of Government officials by private contributions—should not be deemed contrary to law prior to the date fixed.

Individual relations of officials.

PRESENT BUREAU OF AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

(John D. Ryan—William C. Potter.)

There is no suggestion and no evidence that either Mr. Ryan or Mr. Potter has taken any part in Government transactions with any concern in which he has a personal interest.

MEMBERS OF THE AIRCRAFT BOARD.

The relations of the members of this board who received commissions in the Army are stated hereafter. As to Mr. Coffin and as to the naval officers who were members of this board, it should be said that there is no evidence that any one of them has taken any part in transactions or recommendations relating to any corporation, firm, or association in which he has an interest. Disclosures of interest in particular corporations have been made from time to time by Mr. Howe and Mr. Thayer, and with respect to such corporations it appears that they have abstained from participating in the recommendations made by the board, except that Mr. Howe in his disclosure of interest to the board on February 12, 1918, stated that he was interested in a corporation holding preferred stock of the Willys-Overland Co. and that he was present at the meetings of the board on December 7 and December 18, when resolutions involving a contract with that company were passed, but that he was not aware of such financial interest at those times. As the board acts in an advisory capacity simply, section 41 of the Criminal Code can not be regarded as applicable, and the limitations of section 3 of the act of August 10, 1917, with respect to mere recommendations, have already been pointed out.

OFFICERS OF THE SIGNAL CORPS FORMERLY IN CONTROL OF AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

(1) The Chief Signal Officer: It does not appear that Gen. Squier had any interest in any corporations or concerns transacting business with the Signal Corps. The defects in the organization, which was created under his direction for the purpose of aircraft production, are matters distinct from any question of personal interest and will be considered in another division of this report.

(2) Col. Edward A. Deeds: The charges pertaining to personal interest in Government contracts relate particularly to Col. Edward A. Deeds and grow out of the highly suggestive transactions with his former business associates at Dayton. These transactions have been subjected to careful scrutiny.

Col. Deeds was born near Granville, Ohio, on March 12, 1874. There is testimony that he once said that his name originally was "Dietz." No public record has been found to this effect. Col. Deeds denies making the remark attributed to him and states that his family has borne the name of Deeds for at least four generations—his great-grandfather of that name coming from Pennsylvania. For many years Col. Deeds was an officer of the National Cash Register Co. and was one of several connected with that organization who were indicted in the Federal District Court for the Southern District of Ohio, in 1912, for violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Upon the trial Deeds, with other defendants, was convicted, but this conviction was set aside by the circuit court of appeals (Patterson v. United States, 222 Fed., 599) and the prosecution went no further.

At the time of our entry into the war Mr. Deeds had large business interest at Dayton. His intimate business associates were Charles F. Kettering and H. E. Talbott. Mr. Deeds and Mr. Kettering (an inventor and engineer of ability) have been jointly associated in many enterprises with equal shares, it being their policy to organize corporations and to take their respective interests in stocks. Mr. Deeds has supplied the financial talent and Mr. Kettering, who is without any aptitude for business details, the engineering skill. They have had, and still have, a common agent of a highly confidential sort—George B. Smith, of Dayton—who holds the power of attorney of each, keeps their respective books, has charge of their bank accounts, signs their checks, and generally looks after their financial affairs. They are still associated in various undertakings and their relations are of the most intimate character.

In 1904 Kettering was employed in the National Cash Register Co. as a designer in the engineering department, and later he became associated with Deeds in the development of what is known as the Delco ignition system for automobiles. In the course of this development Deeds and Kettering organized the Dayton Engineering Laboratories Co., known as the Delco Co. The enterprise was successful, and the common stock was sold by Deeds and Kettering in 1916 to the United Motors Corporation for several million dollars in cash and certain shares of stock. Deeds and Kettering each retained a few shares of preferred stock. Deeds continued as president of the corporation, with a salary of $60,000 a year, and Kettering as vice president, with a salary of $50,000.

In April, 1915, Deeds, Kettering, H. E. Talbott, sr., and his son, H. E. Talbott, jr., organized the Dayton Metal Products Co. with a capital stock of $200,000. The stock was held as follows: Talbott, sr., 900 shares; Deeds, 500 shares; Kettering, 499 shares, Talbott, jr., 99 shares; Charles H. Mead, 1 share; and George B. McCann, 1 share. Prior to our entry into the war this company had profitable fuse contracts with the British Government, and had accumulated a considerable surplus. It appears that in the spring of 1917 both Deeds and Talbott were appointed on the subcommittee on fuses and detonators of the Munitions Standards Board. In 1916 the company had a contract with the Navy Department for fuses, and it received other fuse contracts from the Navy and the Ordnance Department of the Army in 1917. As vice president of this company, Deeds had a salary of $25,000 a year. The relation of the Dayton Metal Products Co. to aircraft production is that this company, in the latter part of the year 1917, acquired all the stock (save four qualifying shares) of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., and also had subcontracts for metal parts with contractors making airplanes and engines. The Dayton Metal Products Co. also subscribed and paid for 1,000 shares (par value, $100,000) of the stock of the Lincoln Motor Co., which was organized to build Liberty engines, and had a paid-up capital stock of $850,000.

In September, 1916, Deeds and Kettering organized the Domestic Building Co., of Dayton, for the purpose of erecting and financing plants for the use of various companies. The capital stock is now $1,000,000, of which all but four qualifying shares are held by Deeds and Kettering, in equal parts. This company owned the land and erected the building acquired by the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. for its principal airplane plant.

On April 9, 1917, the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. was incorporated with a capital stock of $500,000 by Deeds, Kettering, H. E. Talbott, and H. E. Talbott, jr., in conjunction with Orville Wright. They had taken over the former Wright organization and thus had started an airplane enterprise at Dayton in a small way in the summer of 1916. The larger enterprise of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. was launched about the time of our entry into the war, manifestly with the expectation of obtaining Government contracts. While Deeds was one of the incorporators, he did not become a stockholder, the subscriptions for the first 5,000 shares being as follows: H. E. Talbott, 1,990 shares; C. F. Kettering, 2,000 shares; H. E. Talbott, jr., 990 shares; George H. Mead, 10 shares; and C. A. Craighead, 10 shares. In August, 1917, the capital stock was increased to $1,000,000 ($600,000 common and $400,000 preferred). The new common stock was taken by Messrs. Talbott and Kettering in the proportion of two-fifths, two-fifths, and one-fifth. There were early negotiations for a Government contract, and as early as June 12, 1917, a contract with the company was recommended by the Aircraft Production Board. The contract was executed on August 17, 1917 (under date of Aug. 1, 1917), and was for 400 Standard J–1 training planes, at the fixed price of $6,500 each. For this there was substituted the contract dated September 7, 1917, which was also recommended by the Aircraft Production Board and was approved by Gen. Squier. This contract was for 400 Standard J airplanes, 2,000 De Haviland nines, and 1,500 Martinsydes, with spare parts. By later modifications the Martinsydes and De Haviland nines were omitted and provision was made for 4,000 De Haviland fours. These contracts were on a cost-plus basis, the estimated amount involved being upward of $30,000,000. There was to be a fixed profit of $620 on each Standard J plane and $875 on each De Haviland, making a total fixed profit of about $3,750,000, exclusive of fixed profit on spare parts covered by the contract, thus expected to be earned, according to the contemplated deliveries, before the end of 1918. The contract also provided for additional profits to the extent of 25 per cent of the saving under the bogey or estimated cost of the planes ($7,000 on the De Havilands), and it is estimated that the additional profit on this basis would have amounted to over $2,600,000. When the bogey cost of $7,000 was fixed, letters were obtained from the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. and from the Fisher Body Corporation (which also had a contract for De Havilands) that after 250 machines had been produced there would be an equitable adjustment if the bogey cost was found to be "materially wrong."

Accordingly, a contract is now about to be signed reducing the bogey cost to $5,000 and the fixed profit to $625 per plane. Even at this rate the fixed profit on the 4,000 De Havilands will be $2,500,000, and it is believed that there will be an additional profit through saving under the bogey cost and on spare parts of not less than $1,000,000. In August and September, 1917, when the first Government contracts were awarded, the capital stock of the company ($1,000,000) had not been paid in. It was not paid in until December 1, 1917, when, in one transaction, the stock was paid for and all the shares, preferred and common, save five qualifying shares, were transferred to the Dayton Metal Products Co., which thus became, and still remains, the owner of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. As the latter company practically received nothing on the issue of its capital stock save the fixed property represented by its plants, it was lacking in working capital, and this at the outset was supplied by various loans and advances of the interested parties. In December the Government agreed to advance the company $2,500,000, of which $1,500,000 was advanced at once.

The name of Orville Wright was used in this enterprise, but his chief activity has been as a consulting engineer in connection with experimental work. He has not been responsible for production. Mr. Kettering is an engineer of ability, but his work also has been that of experimental engineering; he is not a manufacturing or production expert. Much emphasis is placed by the parties concerned upon the fact that they were able to avail themselves of the old Wright organization, which has been continued as already stated. But this was a very slender basis for the prompt selection of this newly organized company, which had not even completed its financial arrangements, as one of the few companies immediately admitted to the advantages of large and highly profitable Government contracts. The promoters of this enterprise, not content with these profits which were to accrue to them either directly or through their ownership of the Dayton Metal Products Co., at once took advantage of the opportunity to increase their gains by salaries as executive officers of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. Dating from August 1, 1917, the salaries thus allowed were as follows: H. E. Talbott, sr., $35,000; C. F. Kettering, $35,000; and H. E. Talbott, jr. (30 years old, who was made president of the company), $30,000. Talbott, sr., was at the time receiving, and continued to receive, $60,000 a year as president of the Dayton Metal Products Co., Kettering received a salary of $25,000 from the Dayton Metal Products Co. and $50,000 from the Delco Co., and Talbott, jr., was also receiving a salary of $18,000 from the Dayton Metal Products Co.

There would seem to be no question but that the members of the Aircraft Production Board in recommending contracts had confidence in the capacity of those undertaking the venture, and the previous success of this group, while Mr. Deeds had been associated with them, was well known. But the fact remains that practically at the inception of the Government's aviation activity in connection with the war, and within the sphere of Col. Deeds's important, if not commanding, influence, his former business associates were placed at once, through Government contracts, in a position where they had the assurance of very large profits upon a relatively small investment of their own money and in addition were able to secure generous salaries which they charged against the Government as part of the cost of manufacture.

That Deeds, Kettering, and Talbott continued to be on the most intimate and confidential footing in connection with the prosecution of the Government work by the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. is apparent from their correspondence, of which the following are excerpts:

Letter, Deeds to Kettering, June 13, 1917:

WASHINGTON, June 13, 1917.

Mr. C. F. KETTERING,
City National Bank Building, Dayton, Ohio.

MY DEAR C. F.: You will be interested to know that the standard training machine is going to be called the United States primary training and will not be called the Curtiss J. N. This was decided last week, and I forgot to tell you when in Dayton.

Provision will be made for either Mr. Coffin or myself to appear before the S. A. E. [Society of Automotive Engineers], and as I am one of the committee on arrangements will see that the plans of the Aircraft Production Board get properly before the association.

Relative to the design of planes, I do not care to write what is being done, but will discuss it with you when I get home, and you will see that we have already gone away down the pike in this matter. Everything is lining up now in pretty good shape.

Yours, very truly, E. A.

JULY 3, 1917.

Mr. H. E. TALBOTT,
Dayton, Ohio:

Gen. Squier went direct to Detroit. Will probably spend Fourth at his old home in Michigan. May be in Dayton Thursday or Friday, arriving there from Detroit or from Champaign, Ill. Harold, Kettering, and Wright can take care of him. He will be interested in the Dayton Wright factory and laboratory, Orville Wright laboratory, and especially Mr. Kettering's views on scientific subjects. In general, he is highly technical.

OLD POINT, VA., September 16, 1917.

Mr. H. E. TALBOTT,
Dayton, Ohio:

For your personal information as coming from your local attorney, Judge Advocate General has ruled it legal for Government to select one, contractor one, and the two a third as appraisers of market value of plant at expiration of contract. If you care to raise the question, the above will be found to be the final ruling.

E. A. DEEDS.

When this last telegram, which puts in a strong light the relations of the parties, was sent, Deeds was an officer in the Army. This highly improper conduct, in holding communication in this matter with his former business associate in a transaction pending between the Dayton Wright Co. and the Government department in Col. Deeds's charge, demands the attention of the military authorities.

But evidence of favoritism, influence, or confidential communications of this sort, however otherwise reprehensible, do not make out criminal liability under the statutes above quoted, unless it appears that the representative of the Government has a pecuniary interest in the Government contract or order, or is an officer or stockholder of, or has a pecuniary interest in, a corporation, firm, or association which is a party to the Government contract or order. And the question is whether Col. Deeds had such an interest. His statement is that he had no such interest, but, on the contrary, had given up large salaries to devote himself to the Government service.

About the time he received his commission as colonel in the Army Mr. Deeds addressed the following communications to the Secretary of War and to the Aircraft Production Board, under date of August 28, 1917:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 28, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You have honored me by appointment temporarily as an officer in the Regular Army of the United States and as a member of the Aircraft Production Board connected with your department. It is possible that this board in the development of the airplane work may wish to recommend a contract with some of the corporations in which

I have had an interest. Following the advice of counsel, I have resigned my official relations with these corporations and made bona fide transfers of my stock therein to other parties.

For your protection as well as my own, I desire to file with your department a copy of a written disclosure of my relations, both past and present, to these corporations which I have this day filed with the Aircraft Production Board, and I inclose same herewith.

In serving in the positions to which you have appointed me I desire to comply with both the spirit and letter of the law, and to do no act which might invite criticism upon myself or your department.

I count it an honor and privilege to be thus called into the service of our country, and am pleased to make whatever sacrifice of time and money that service may demand.

I inclose a second copy of my statement to be filed with you as chairman of the Council of National Defense.

Yours, very respectfully,

(Signed) E. A. DEEDS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 28, 1917.

The AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION BOARD,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: As a member of your board and interested in the letting of contracts on the recommendation of that board on behalf of the Government, I desire at this time to make a full and complete disclosure of the interest I may have in any corporation which might be a party to any such contract or which might furnish supplies to the Government through the instrumentalities of your board.

I was a stockholder and officer in the following, to wit:

(1) The United Motors Co. of New York, being a union of several companies manufacturing automobile parts.

(2) The Dayton Engineering Laboratories Co., of Dayton, Ohio, manufacturers of ignition and starting devices for automobiles.

(3) The Dayton Metal Products Co., of Dayton, Ohio, engaged, among other things, in the manufacture of munitions.

(4) The Domestic Building Co., of Dayton, Ohio, a corporation formed for the development of real estate and which now owns the land and buildings leased to the Dayton Wright Airplane Co.

In all of the foregoing corporations I have severed my official connection therewith by resignation and have made a bona fide transfer to other parties of all my stock therein.

In addition to the above corporations, I was an incorporator of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., but never owned any stock therein. I am also the president of and a large stockholder in the Domestic Engineering Co., of Dayton, Ohio, makers of Delco light plants, and expect to retain my official connection therewith and my financial interest therein.

I also own the ground embraced in the Moraine Experimental Flying Field near Dayton, Ohio, used for aviation purposes, but out of which I receive no compensation.

I make this disclosure now so that your board, as the representative of the Government, may be fully informed as to my relations, past and present, with these corporations, and be thus enabled to act wisely on any order or contract involving any of these corporations, either directly or indirectly. I desire that this written disclosure be recorded in the minutes of your board for the mutual protection of all of us.

Yours, very respectfully,

(Signed) E. A. DEEDS.

The facts with respect to the disposition of Col. Deeds's interests (so far as pertinent to this inquiry) and the method of disposition are as follows:

UNITED MOTORS CORPORATION—DAYTON ENGINEERING LABORATORIES CO.

The significance of Col. Deeds's statement with respect to the disposition of his interests in these corporations is that the Delco ignition system is used in the airplane engine known as the Liberty motor. In the planes manufactured abroad the magneto ignition system had been used and, prior to its use on the Liberty motor, it appears that the Delco system had not been employed on an airplane engine. In the specifications for the Liberty motor the Delco system was required to be installed with the first 20,000 engines. As already stated, the Delco system is controlled by the Dayton Engineering Laboratories Co. (Delco Co.), and this company is owned by the United Motors Corporation.

On the sale of his Delco stock to the United Motors Corporation, Deeds had received, in addition to cash, 30,000 shares (no par value) of its stock. [The total issued stock amounted to 1,200,000 shares.] After certain distributions, he still held at the time in question 17,500 of these shares. He also had an interest in a pool of certain shares, on which 3,880 additional shares were received in November, 1917. In his letter (above quoted) to the Aircraft Production Board, Deeds stated that he had severed his official connection with the United Motors Corporation and had made a bona fide transfer of his shares. He had resigned as vice president and director on August 16, 1917. The only transfer made by him of any of his shares in that company was by gift to his wife. He indorsed for transfer the certificates for 17,500 shares on October 13, 1917, and they were transferred to Mrs. Deeds's name on October 17, 1917. Thereafter, it is testified, they were held by the confidential agent, George B. Smith, for her account. Entries of the transfer were made in Col. Deeds's books by Smith not earlier than October, 1917, and were dated back to August 28, 1917. In the statement of his assets on August 31, 1917, submitted to him by Smith, the shares appear as part of his property. Mrs. Deeds's name first appears in the statement of assets of October 31, 1917. The remaining shares (3,880) received on the dissolution of the pool, about November 22, 1917, were transferred from the pool manager directly to Mrs. Deeds, as Mr. Deeds's donee, and the certificates were received by Smith on her behalf. Prior to the transfer of the stock in October and at the time of Col. Deeds's letter to the Aircraft Production Board he had simply told his wife that it was to be her stock, and it does not appear that there had been an effective gift of the shares. The actual value of the 21,380 shares was approximately $500,000.

In addition to these shares in the United Motors Corporation, Deeds also held 38 shares of Delco preferred stock, which he had retained at the time of the sale of his common stock. These preferred shares he transferred to Kettering. It appears that the transfer was first entered by Smith in Col. Deeds's private journal in December, 1917. The date of the entry was afterwards changed to August 28, 1917, to correspond to the date when Smith was notified that Col. Deeds had received his commission in the Army. The stock was transferred to Kettering on the books of the company on October 13, 1917. The payment was made by debits in Deeds's open account with Kettering.

If there were evidence that Col. Deeds had acted as officer or agent of the Government in the transactions with the Delco Co. or with the United Motors Corporation prior to October 13, 1917, there would be ground by reason of his interest for charging a violation of the statute, and it may be doubted whether there was then or thereafter such a transfer as would avail to take the case out of the statutory prohibition. But there is no evidence that Deeds acted for the Government in any transaction with either of these corporations. So far as appears the Government made no contracts for Delco ignition either with the Delco Co. or with the United Motors Corporation. The contracts for the Delco system were made by the contractors who were manufacturing the engines under contracts with the Government, and the dealings with the Delco Co. or with the United Motors Corporation in relation to the Delco system were had by these contractors. It must also be said that, despite the natural inference from former business association and interests, the proof is lacking that the selection of the Delco system was due to the solicitation of Deeds. It can hardly be questioned that the design of the Liberty motor contemplated the use of the Delco system and that the magneto system could be used only by a special adaptation. The Delco system, however, had been extensively used for automobiles, notably by the Cadillac and Packard companies, and was in high favor with those who were developing the Liberty motor. While there has been a question as to which system was preferable, and it has been understood that foreign representatives at first did not approve the departure from foreign practice, and many may still be found to disapprove it, there is considerable evidence that the use of Delco ignition has been growing in favor and there has been testimony in this investigation from impartial and competent sources commending its adoption.

Special attention has been given to the memorandum directing the use of the Delco system in the first 20,000 Liberty motors. In the first memorandum by Maj. Gray, chief of the specification section, under date of October 6, 1916, the accessories recommended were so placed that the Delco ignition came last on the list. This was then rearranged, apparently to attract less attention to Delco, in alphabetical order. The recommendation, Maj. Gray testifies, for the use of the Delco system and the other accessories specified came from Maj. Vincent, one of the designers of the Liberty motor and then executive officer of the airplane experimental department of the equipment division, who stated that he did not believe they would be justified "in specifying for quantity production any other accessories than those which had thus far been tested out satisfactorily." The situation was a delicate one, says Maj. Gray, as Maj. Gray himself had been president of the Hess Bright Co. (he had resigned his office and disposed of his holdings in June, 1917), whose ball bearings were required as one of the accessories, and Col. Deeds had developed the Delco system. Maj. Gray testifies that he brought the question to Col. Deeds's attention, who said, "I do not like really to have anything to say about it, because in that list is the Delco ignition, and if I authorize it, it will look as though I have an ax to grind." The sum of the matter is that there is no satisfactory evidence that Col. Deeds signed, prepared, or directed the order for the use of the Delco ignition, although it can not be doubted that he desired the system to be used. Nor is there evidence that any recommendation was made by Col. Deeds to the Aircraft Board or to any other council, board, or commission regarding the matter.

His statement to the Aircraft Production Board on August 28, 1917, that he had made a bona fide transfer of all his stock in the United Motors Corporation, when the stock had not in fact been transferred, and at most he contemplated a gift of the stock to his wife, was neither candid nor truthful, and is certainly not to be regarded as a "full and complete disclosure." But in the absence of proof of solicitation, inducement, or recommendation by him, or action on his part as an officer or agent of the Government in transactions with the United Motors Corporation or the Delco Co., there are no facts bringing the case within the statutory prohibition.

DOMESTIC BUILDING CO.

In his letter of August 28, 1917, to the Aircraft Production Board, Col. Deeds stated that he had made a bona fide transfer of his stock in this company. This was not true. It appears that on that date he resigned the office of president of the company, but he did not dispose of his stock. The stock of that company is still held in equal portions by Deeds and Kettering.

Col. Deeds was plainly led to make the statement in his letter by the fact that the Domestic Building Co. had acquired the land and had erected the building which was in course of completion, and was then occupied and intended to be used as the principal plant of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. for the manufacture of airplanes. It is said that in anticipation of a lease of the property to the Dayton Wright Airpalne Co., it had been agreed prior to August 28, 1917, that Deeds's stock in the Domestic Building Co. should be sold to Kettering. But there is not sufficient evidence of a definite and binding agreement to that effect, or of anything more than a loose understanding between intimates, whose arrangements could at any time be adjusted to suit their mutual convenience. Certainly, there had been no transfer of the stock. It was not until November that there was an adjustment of accounts with this company, and then, instead of a sale of his stock by Deeds, he retained his stock in the Domestic Building Co., and the plant erected by that company was purchased by Talbott, sr., Kettering, and Talbott, jr., who at once transferred it to the Dayton Wright Airplane Co.

On February 4, 1918, the Domestic Building Co. made a direct conveyance to the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. of an additional tract of 8.34 acres, adjoining the first tract, at the price of $13,344, or $1,600 per acre.

However, there is no ground, so far as the retention of Deeds's stock interest in the Domestic Building Co. is concerned, for charging a violation of statute. It is not enough that the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. purchased these properties, or that certain advances by Deeds were taken into account in fixing the purchase price of the main plant, or that both parcels of land were sold at more than the amount they had cost the Domestic Building Co. The Government has never had any contracts with the Domestic Building Co. and it does not appear that Col. Deeds has acted as an officer or agent of the Government in any transactions between the Government and that company. The gratuitous statement contained in his letter to the Aircraft Production Board that he had made a transfer of all his stock in this company may be said to indicate a willingness to state, as an accomplished fact, a transaction which never took place but was merely in contemplation as a step to be taken if deemed to be necessary.

DAYTON WRIGHT AIRPLANE CO.

Col. Deeds's statement in his letter of August 28, 1917, that he had never been a stockholder in this company was true. The stock is owned by the Dayton Metal Products Co., and if Col. Deeds had or has any interest through stock ownership in the profits on its contracts with the Government, this interest must be derived from an interest in the stock of the Dayton Metal Products Co.

His relation to the organization of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. is this: He was an incorporator, and while he did not subscribe for stock, and none was issued in his name, the payment of the stock of the company to the extent of upward of four-fifths of its par value was made, in substance, by the transfer to the company of the plant built by the Domestic Building Co. owned by Deeds and Kettering, and this company received therefor unsecured notes of Talbott, sr., Kettering, and Talbott, jr., only a small part of which has been paid. Thus Deeds and Kettering through the Domestic Building Co. virtually furnished the main plant of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. on a credit to the Talbotts and Kettering. The transaction was as follows:

The airplane factory was erected on a tract which the Domestic Building Co. had acquired from the Moraine Development Co. (a corporation in which Deeds and Kettering were largely interested) at a price a little more over $753 an acre. The building was intended for the use of the Domestic Engineering Co., another concern owned by Deeds and Kettering, which was engaged in the business of supplying Delco lights for general illuminating purposes. It was later decided that it should be used by the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., which entered into possession. Still later it was arranged that the syndicate composed of Talbott, sr., Kettering, and Talbott, jr., should purchase the plant from the Domestic Building Co. and convey it to the Dayton Wright Airplane Co.

In November, 1917 (while the building was still incomplete), Mr. Allan R. Smart, a public accountant (of Barrow, Wade, Guthrie & Co.), made an adjustment of the accounts of Deeds, Kettering, Talbott, sr., and Talbott, jr., for various advances, and a balance was struck of $683,732.16 as owing to the Domestic Building Co. In this adjustment the land (25.55 acres) was taken at $1,200 an acre and the building at the amount of the expenditures upon it, making the price of the plant (called the Moraine plant) $836,401.08. The balance of $683,732.16 was covered by three individual notes of Talbott, sr., Kettering, and Talbott, jr., in the proportion of two-fifths, two-fifths, and one-fifth, as follows: H. E. Talbott, $273,492.87; C. F. Kettering, $273,492.87; and H. E. Talbott, jr., $136,746.43. All of the notes were dated November 4, 1917, and were payable to the Domestic Building Co. one year after date, with 6 per cent interest. The notes are unsecured. The makers of the notes have paid interest quarterly, and, in addition, Talbott, sr., has paid $3,492.87 on the principal of his note, reducing it to $270,000, and Talbott, jr., has paid $26,746.43 on the principal of his note, reducing it to $110,000. It appears that Mr. Kettering has made payments of $6,000. This transaction left the Talbotts and Kettering as the owners of the Moraine plant, which the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. was operating, and the stock of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., for which they had subscribed, had not been paid in.

The payment of the subscriptions for the stock of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., the concurrent payment by that company for two plants (the Moraine plant, already mentiond, and another at Miamisburg), and the transfer of its stock, thus paid for, to the Dayton Metal Products Co. were effected by an exchange of checks on December 1, 1917. Shortly before the Miamisburg plant had been acquired by Talbott, sr. (for the syndicate), for the sum of $60,000 and was turned over to the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. at $127,202, the profit being divided between himself, Kettering, and Talbott, jr., according to their respective interests in the syndicate. To accomplish the desired result the following procedure was adopted:

The Dayton Wright Airplane Co. gave to the syndicate its check for the sum of $955,071.25, made up of the purchase price of the Moraine and Miamisburg plants ($836,401.08 less an item of interest ($8,531.83) for the Moraine, or main plant, and $127,202 for the Miamisburg plant). The Dayton Metal Products Co. gave its checks to the syndicate for $183,459.55, for various balances of accounts, and for $999,500, the purchase price at par of the stock of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. (less 5 shares retained). The syndicate thus received checks to the aggregate amount of $2,138,030.80. The syndicate gave their check to the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. in payment of the capital stock of $1,000,000 and another check to the Dayton Metal Products Co. for $1,136,537.20 as the purchase price of certain securities which the Dayton Metal Products Co. sold to the syndicate, making the total of the syndicate's checks $2,136,537.20. The Dayton Wright Airplane Co. gave its check to the Dayton Metal Products Co. in repayment of advances for $44,928.75, the difference between the sum of $955,071.25 paid by the company for the plants and the sum of $1,000,000 received for its stock. The transaction was accomplished with a minimum use of cash (less than $1,500), and as a result the Dayton Metal Products Co. had all the stock (save 5 shares) of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. had the Moraine and the Miamisburg plants, Messrs. Talbotts and Kettering had the securities which they had purchased from the Dayton Metal Products Co., and the Domestic Building Co. (owned by Deeds and Kettering) continued to hold the notes which the Talbotts and Kettering had given to that company on the settlement in November.

On the transfer by the syndicate of the shares of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. to the Dayton Metal Products Co. it was agreed that all dividends in excess of 7 per cent per annum on the transferred stock and in excess of 8 per cent per annum on the common stock should be paid to Talbott, sr., Kettering, and Talbott, jr., in the proportion of two-fifths, two-fifths, and one-fifth. Why they should have desired these profits to be divided in the syndicate proportions instead of taking the profits through their dividends in the proportions in which they held the stock of the Dayton Metal Products Co., the purchaser of the shares, has not been made clear. The Talbotts and Kettering also took an option from the Dayton Metal Products Co. to repurchase all the shares at any time within five years for the sum of $999,500.

DAYTON METAL PRODUCTS CO.

Col. Deeds originally held one-fourth of the stock of this company, or 500 shares. It appears from the minutes of the board of directors that at a meeting of the board in Dayton on May 21, 1917, President Talbott stated that the company had been advised by the Ordnance Department of the Army "that, in all probability, the entire facilities of the company would be utilized for munition work, and in all probability contracts would be given to the company as soon as appropriations were made by the Government." It is further set forth "that Mr. E. A. Deeds explained that he had been called to Washington and requested to take place on some of the committees of the Council of National Defense; that he had been to Washington and that he had accepted the call; and he therefore desired it that he might act as uninterested, directly or indirectly, in any manufacturing plant which was contemplating business with the Government, and that he desired to offer his resignation as vice president and as director of the company." The minutes show the acceptance of this resignation and that Mr. Kettering was elected vice president. The minutes of the meeting of May 21, 1917, conclude with the following statement:

"At this meeting Mr. Deeds offered for sale and discussed probable purchasers for his stock in the Dayton Metal Products Co., and Mr. Deeds offered to the directors his entire holdings of stock at its book value less 15 per cent to cover costs and probable losses in view of the possibility of no future Government contracts being secured and the business of the company would have to be readjusted into lines being developed by the experimental department."

Some time subsequently—in the early part of the year 1918—the accountant drew a line across the last-mentioned statement in the minutes. He explains that he did not consider it "a corporate record," but a matter between the stockholders.

The testimony of the parties concerned is that Talbott, sr., Kettering, and Talbott, jr., purchased all Deeds's shares in the Dayton Metal Products Co. at their book value as of May 1, 1917, less 15 per cent, and gave in settlement of the purchase price their notes as follows:

H. E. Talbott, 200 shares	$207,706
C. F. Kettering, 200 shares	207,706
H. E. Talbott, jr., 100 shares	103,853

The notes were dated May 22, 1917, were payable to Deeds's order one year after date, with interest at 4½ per cent, and were placed in the hands of George B. Smith, the confidential agent of Deeds and Kettering. The notes were wholly unsecured. According to the stock certificate book the old certificates were canceled and new certificates issued to the Talbotts and Kettering under date of May 22, 1917.

It is not only open to doubt whether the transaction described in the minute book took place on May 21, 1917, but on all the evidence it is reasonably clear that it did not take place on that date. The minutes are typewritten and pasted in the minute book. No one of the parties is willing to testify positively that the proceedings described in the minutes took place on that day. Mr. S. S. King, of the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co., has testified that he and Deeds went to Washington on the same train on May 18, 1917, and that they were in communication every day in Washington, from May 19 to 23. Furthermore, it appears that on May 21, 1917, when Mr. Deeds is represented as making his statement at the meeting of directors in Dayton, he was making his first appearance, according to the minutes of the Aircraft Production Board, at a meeting held by that board on that day in Washington. He himself testifies that he was in Washington on that day. While Mr. Deeds is represented as resigning his office as vice president of the Dayton Metal Products Co. in May, 1917, he continued to draw his salary until the end of June, 1917. The notes were placed in the custody of the confidential agent, Smith, but he made no entry in Deeds's bills receivable book of these notes until September. It does not satisfactorily appear, in view of the nature of some of the items, that the adjustment of accounts in fixing the book value and the determination of the amounts of the notes could have been made before June 30, 1917. There are stock certificates bearing the date of May 22, 1917, and purporting to have been issued after the issue of the new certificates to the Talbotts and Kettering for the Deeds shares, but these certificates were issued to members of the Talbott family, dividing the shares he had formerly held.

Upon all the evidence it is not established that the stock was purchased as early as May 22, 1917, and there are many indications that the transaction was dated back to that date.

However, Col. Deeds's stock was actually transferred on the books of the company, and the notes dated May 22, 1917, were given, apparently, not later than September, 1917.

On December 31, 1917, interest was paid by the makers on their respective notes to that date, and interest was paid quarterly thereafter. On January 18, 1918, Talbott, sr., paid $7,706 on account of the principal, reducing his note to $200,000; in February, 1918, Talbott, jr., paid $3,853 on account of the principal, reducing his note to $100,000, and on September 11, 1918, Kettering paid, on account of his note, the sum of $10,000.

If the transaction was a bona fide sale of the stock, Col. Deeds thereby parted with all his stock interest in the Dayton Metal Products Co., and thus did not have, by virtue of an interest in that stock, an interest in the profits of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. The parties all deny that there is any secret agreement or option or understanding of any sort for a retransfer of the shares to Col. Deeds or for a sharing of profits with him.

To conclude: The fact is that the transfer of the shares in the Dayton Metal Products Co., which owns the stock of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., was made to Col. Deeds's intimate business associates on their unsecured notes, which are overdue and unpaid save to a small extent. But there is no proof upon which it can be charged that Col. Deeds retained an interest in the Dayton Metal Products Co. and thereby in the Dayton Wright Airplane Co.

OTHER AVIATION ACTIVITIES CENTERED AT DAYTON—THE WILBUR WRIGHT FIELD.

This is a tract of about 2,245 acres leased to the Government by the Miami conservancy district, of which Mr. Deeds was the head. It was a portion of the area selected by the Miami conservancy district for the impounding of waters in the event of a serious flood. The property was acquired by the Government for a flying field and was developed by the erection of hangars, barracks, a storehouse, and other structures. Upward of $3,000,000 has been expended by the Government in this development.

On April 30, 1917, Maj. (now Gen.) Foulois was directed to inspect land sites for aviation purposes at various places, including Dayton, and several tracts at Dayton were examined by him and by Capt. (now Col.) Edgar on May 8. These officers were met at Dayton by Mr. Deeds, and both Deeds and Orville Wright accompanied them on their inspection of the tracts in the vicinity. As to these, on May 11, 1917, Maj. Foulois reported as follows:

"The largest tract of land inspected is about 10 miles from Dayton and contains about 4,000 acres. This tract of land is admirably suited for aviation purposes, is under the control of the conservancy directors, and any portion of it can be acquired by the Government at a very low cost. The purpose for which this land has been set aside by the State of Ohio makes it extremely desirable for aviation purposes, in that it will be always used for agricultural purposes only and no buildings or other obstacles will ever be erected within the area set aside. Options on this tract of land or any portion thereof will be mailed to this office within the next few days."

On May 15, 1917, Gen. Squier recommended that the approval of the Secretary of War be obtained for the rental of several aviation training sites, including the one at Dayton, which was thus described:

"Approximately 2,500 acres in the vicinity of Dayton, Ohio, at the rate of $17,500 per year, with the privilege of renewal for three years, and the option of purchase at $350,000, the cost of crop destruction being $75,000. This will provide a four-squadron training field."

Mr. Coffin, as chairman, indorsed the proposal, stating that it was "in the judgment of the committee a wise and necessary action," and the project was approved on behalf of the Secretary of War by the Acting Chief of Staff. On May 19, 1917, Gen. Squier authorized Capt. Edgar to lease this site and others, and to proceed with the contracting for the necessary buildings. The first lease was signed on May 22, 1917 (by Capt. Edgar for the Government and Mr. Deeds for the conservancy district), for 2,075 acres for the period ending June 30, 1917, at the rental of $2,000, the Government also agreeing to pay $73,000 to cover damages to crops. There was an option for renewal for the year beginning July 1, 1917, at the rental of $17,660, and for a further renewal for the year beginning July 1, 1918, for a tract containing 2,500 acres (including the 2,075 acres first mentioned) at a rental of $20,000, and for further annual periods ending July 1, 1922; and there was also an option to purchase the 2,500 acres for $350,000.

Of the proposed tract of 2,500 acres, 505.27 acres were found to be marshy and were withdrawn and 250.47 acres, said to be of equal value, were added. This left a tract of 2,245.20 acres, for which a new lease was executed on July 1, 1917, for the period ending June 30, 1918, at the rental of $18,404.59, with annual options of renewal at a rental of $20,000 until June 30, 1922, with the option to purchase at the same price. The rental for the first year is explained by the fact that there were 210.47 acres of which possession could not be taken until March 1, 1918. Soon after that date the commanding officer at the field stated that 34.94 acres were in the possession of the Government, but that the remaining acres were available for occupancy, but "were very low and swampy and in the present condition of no value to the Government." For the Miami conservancy district it was stated that it had settled with the tenants at considerable expense in order to get possession and it was unwilling to take back the land from the Government.

There is an adjoining tract of 32 acres (part of the original 2,500 acres) which with 8 acres additional were sold to the Government as a site for a warehouse.

It appears from the testimony of Ezra M. Kuhns, the secretary of the Miami conservancy district, that at the time of our entry into the war the district had been able to secure options on only about 300 acres of the tract in question, but when negotiations with the Government began there was swift action. Mr. Deeds had brought the matter to the attention of Mr. Waldon as early as April 24, 1917, and had sent to him one of the district's engineers with maps. The following telegrams show the activity of Deeds and Talbott:

Think you should advise Wright, Morgan, Harold, Talbott, and Kettering so that they will not disclose anything inadvertently. The civilian school will continue regardless of what is done with the other plan, and Ohio State will give the preliminary instruction in military tactics and all class-room work, while the Wright Field Co. will give the instruction in aviation. Harold Talbott should be the channel through which publicity is given out, and there is no objection using the last statement if called upon.

This applies to central 1,000 acres in front of new building. Builders may retain use of buildings and barns for a few months and in some cases until winter, but main fields must be prepared without delay if they are to be used this fall. Think best to give no reason for immediate possession and feel sure we can arrange it. We can arrange financial matters as suggested. Wire if you approve.

E. A. DEEDS.

The partiality for this site does not appear to have been warranted by any advantages it can be said to possess. Indeed, no satisfactory reason appears for the securing of so large a tract, as apparently 1,400 or 1,500 acres would have answered the purpose.

Fields of about 650 acres were selected at Rantoul and Detroit for two-squadron fields, and the field at Dayton was for four squadrons. Both the leasehold interest and the option to purchase are subject to a flood easement. The evidence is that in case of a flood such as that of the year 1913, the impounded water (that is, after the completion of the dam, which it is understood will be completed in two or three years) would cover the lowland to a depth of about 40 feet; the lowest hangar would have 24 feet of water, that is, over the eaves, and the highest hangar would have 13 feet of water. The barracks and various buildings, which stand on higher ground, would not be seriously affected. The warehouse itself (a large structure) is in a dry place, and the suggestion that some of the property stored there during the past year has suffered from moisture is not supported. Aside from the consequences of flood in the Miama Valley and the use of the area as a detention basin, it should be added that a considerable part of the tract consists of swamp land, which is unsuitable for the use for which it was leased.

There is no evidence that Deeds himself had any interest in the land acquired. He was head of the Miami conservancy district, but this was a public enterprise not organized for profit. Apparently at an earlier period advances had been made by the Dayton Metal Products Co. (a portion of which had originally been charged to Deeds personally and later credited back to him and charged to the maintenance account of the company, which had been used for the purchase of options for the district. The result of this transaction was to leave the Dayton Metal Products Co. a creditor of the enterprise but without interest in the land. Mr. Deeds had been appointed on the Munitions Standards Board in March, 1917, and he accepted appointment on the Aircraft Production Board on May 11, 1917. At this time, however, he was acting only in an advisory capacity, and it was before the passage of the act of August 10, 1917. He testifies that his only interest in this project was as a citizen of Dayton.

THE CONTRACT FOR THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE WILBUR WRIGHT FIELD.

The next step was the placing of the contract for development. The contract was signed by Capt. Edgar, under the direction of the Chief Signal Officer, and its terms were not unreasonable. It was on a cost-plus basis with a sliding scale, which as applied to the amount actually expended gives the contractor a commission of 7 per cent, with a maximum limit of $140,000. The contractor, the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co., was recommended by Deeds. This company had done nothing in an extensive way for several years, having been engaged since the year 1908 in selling material and in operating a planing mill and a lumberyard. Its capital stock was $75,000. Prior to April, 1917, one S. S. King had owned 117 of the 750 shares. King's holdings were then increased to 417 shares, and in acquiring these 300 shares King was backed by H. E. Talbott, who as president of the City National Bank of Dayton arranged for a loan of $60,000 for the purpose. King wrote to Talbott on April 25, 1917: "As to the ownership of the stock, if you see fit to back me up in it, this can be determined in any manner that you see fit." It was not long after the control of the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co. was thus acquired that the arrangement was made for giving to this company the contract to develop Wilbur Wright Field. King's narrative of the circumstances in which this contract was obtained is very illuminating and affords a notable contrast to the difficulties of many who unavailingly sought contracts with the Government.

King was sent for by Talbott and informed that he (King) had been "recommended down at Washington to assume the responsibility of putting up some buildings for Wilbur Wright Field," and suggested that he immediately set about effecting an organization for the purpose. This was on Saturday, May 17, 1917, and on Sunday Talbott telephoned to King, asking him to leave immediately for Washington. Accordingly King went to Washington on Sunday afternoon, taking the same train with Deeds. It was arranged that King should call the next day at Deeds's office, which he was informed was on the same floor with that of the contracting officer, Capt. Edgar. Accordingly on the following day, May 19, Deeds introduced King to Capt. Edgar, and in two or three days, on May 23, the contract was signed. As Col. Edgar testifies: "King was brought down here by Col. Deeds and recommended to us as a proper contractor, the most available in Dayton for the work."

The following is a portion of the correspondence between Deeds and Talbott relating to this contract:

Repairing highways to facilitate trucking operations from Dayton. Purchased five new Packard trucks to augment transportation over the existing available trucks. Next week will see everything booming along. All material, lumber, cement, planks, board roofing located and on the way. Wish you would think over method of authority which can be given me to rush transportation of railway cars. This looks like the main point of congestion. All departments of construction now organized with experienced and competent supervisors and foremen. All this in spite of the fact that it has rained every day since Waring has been here.

H. E. TALBOTT.

Despite the indications of these messages, and of his transactions with King, Mr. Talbott testifies positively that he had no interest in the enterprise, except as a citizen of Dayton and got nothing out of it beyond 6 per cent interest received by the Dayton Metal Products Co. on money loaned.

King had no capital available for the enterprise, nor had the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co. King's testimony is:

"Q. Did you have the capital to swing that?—A. Not without assistance.

"Q. Where did you expect to get the assistance?—A. When I talked to Mr. Talbott he told me on the Saturday afternoon, I said, 'Well, this will take a good deal of money.' He said, 'Yes, but,' he said, 'you need not worry about that. We will work out some way for that.' He said, 'I do not know how we will work it out, but we will work out some way for that.'"

The financial assistance that King needed was obtained upon the credit of the Dayton Metal Products Co., supported by the personal guaranties of H. E. Talbott and C. F. Kettering. Notes of the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co. to the extent of $400,000 were discounted by the Dayton Metal Products Co. with the American Exchange National Bank, of New York. It was originally contemplated that these notes should be indorsed by Deeds and Talbott, as is shown by the following extract of a letter to Mr. Talbott from W. H. Bennett, vice president of the American Exchange National Bank, under date of June 25, 1917:

"Referring to the conversation which the writer had with you on Thursday, I have conferred with Mr. Kenzel, assistant cashier of the Federal reserve bank, and upon your statement that the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co. is under contract with the United States Government for the preparation of the aviation field at Dayton, and that said company is to receive payments on the 10th of each month on the presentation of receipted vouchers for work completed in the previous month; and that it is the intention of the Dayton Metal Products Co. to make advances to said Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co. of amounts necessary to carry on the work, he ruled that the paper executed by the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co. and indorsed by the Dayton Metal Products Co. to cover said funds so advanced will be eligible for rediscount with the Federal reserve bank.

"Therefore, we feel that it will probably be of mutual advantage to provide for the advance of $400,000 requested from us by a three months' note executed by the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co., to the order of the Dayton Metal Products Co. and indorsed by Mr. H. E. Talbott and Mr. E. A. Deeds. If you so desire, the indorsement of the individuals can be secured by an assignment from the Dayton Metal Products Co. of certain securities now in safekeeping with us to the individuals referred to."

It was subsequently arranged that the indorsements should be those of Talbott and Kettering, who also gave their separate agreement of guaranty. The avails of discounted paper were passed by the American Exchange Bank to the credit of the Dayton Metal Products Co. It appears from the accounts between the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co. and the Dayton Metal Products Co. that, while the latter company ultimately paid the notes, their proceeds were used in large part from time to time for the benefit of the Dayton Metal Products Co.

The credit to the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co., thus extended to it upon its notes, was furnished without security, or, as Mr. Talbott put it, with "no further security except in the man (King). I trusted the man; I knew his contract." After the contract had been obtained, King increased his stockholdings in the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co. by the purchase of 104 additional shares, borrowing for the purpose $20,000 from the Dayton National Bank.

It appears that the total amount paid by the Government under the contract with the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co. to August 14, 1918, amounted to $3,115,161.94. This represents the amount paid for the cost of the work; that is, for lumber, materials, etc. The commission or profits of the contractor, which had been paid to that date, amounted to $102,436.04. There has been considerable trouble in connection with the contract, and the accounts are far from being in satisfactory shape. An audit of the books of the company was made by Barrow, Wade, Guthrie & Co. to November 30, 1917. They reported that they found "the pay rolls very incomplete, full of errors, corrections, and erasures," and that there was "abundant evidence that great laxity and carelessness has been exhibited by the employees of the company, especially those in the paymaster's department." These statements are amply confirmed by the evidence in this investigation, and the accounts are in course of being reaudited by Government accountants. The consideration of the various irregularities in the accounts and of the questions to which they give rise must await the result of this examination. It will be observed that the Government has withheld a large part of the compensation of the contractor until a satisfactory adjustment has been made. Of the profits received from the Government it would appear that the moneys have been retained in the business of the company, except to the extent of a dividend of $37,500, that is, 50 per cent on the capital stock. Of this dividend King was entitled on the 521 shares acquired in his name to $26,050, and of this amount it appears that he had received 70 per cent, or $18,235, to July 1, 1918. He had paid $11,000 on account of his loan ($21,000) to the Dayton National Bank. He had paid nothing on the $60,000 loan from the City National Bank. No agreement has been proved for a division of profits on this contract, and there is no proof that Col. Deeds has had an interest in the contract or in the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co. Even if it appeared that the Dayton Metal Products Co. was interested in the contract (which would explain transactions otherwise difficult to understand), this fact would not affect Col. Deeds, unless he were found to be interested in that company. The question would thus come back to the transfer of his stock in the Dayton Metal Products Co., which has already been considered.

M'COOK FIELD (FORMERLY KNOWN AS NORTH FIELD).

This is a field of approximately 200 acres in and adjacent to Dayton, which was leased by the Government from the Dayton Metal Products Co., and has been used for the purpose of making various tests. Lieut. Col. Vincent first suggested another field (South Field or Moraine Field) and brought the matter to the attention of Col. Deeds by whom that field was principally owned. On September 27, 1917, Col. Deeds sent the following telegram to Mr. Talbott:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 27, 1917.

Mr. H. E. TALBOTT,
City National Bank Building, Dayton, Ohio.

Col. Clark takes letter regarding Moraine flying field with him to Dayton to-night. George McCann has another letter, for Mr. Kettering. Government will lease land, put up buildings, and operate experimental field. Lease will be for three years without privilege of purchase, as that is not necessary. Have complete description of property prepared, also statement of cost of buildings already erected and suggested monthly rent arrangement and have George McCann bring them to Washington to complete lease. Have him prepare deed for this property to Mr. Kettering, who in turn will lease it to the Government.

DEEDS, Equipment Division.

Talbott and Kettering refused to consent to this use of South or Moraine Field, as it was said to be needed for experimentation in connection with the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., and they suggested North Field, or what afterwards became known as McCook Field. The latter tract had originally been purchased by Deeds and Kettering, each of them bearing one-half of the cost, and they had made some improvements, such as leveling, removing trees, etc., and had erected one or two small buildings. The object of their purchase had been to develop a training field for airplanes, to be used by civilians, but this project could not be carried out. The suggestion was that this parcel, with approximately 82 acres of land adjoining, which was owned by the Dayton Metal Products Co., would be suitable for the Government's use as an experimental station. Deeds did not wish to be a party to the lease, and conveyed to Kettering his undivided one-half interest in the parcel owned by them in common, and Kettering then conveyed that parcel to the Dayton Metal Products Co., which thereupon leased the entire tract to the Government.

The lease was dated October 4, 1917. Col. Deeds was present at the conference at which the terms were settled and sent the following telegram to Talbott on October 3:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 3, 1917.

Mr. H. E. TALBOTT.
City National Bank Building, Dayton, Ohio.

Have worked out a lease for the North Dayton Field, $12,800 a year without cash payment. It is the best thing that can be done under the circumstances, and suggest its acceptance. Craighead will discuss it with you in detail when you see him.

DEEDS, Equipment Division.

Lieut. Col. Edgar, under the authority of the Chief Signal Officer and the approval of the Chief of Staff and of the Assistant Secretary of War, signed the lease on behalf of the Government. The rental is at the rate of $12,800 a year with an option of renewal from year to year, until June 30, 1921. There is no option to purchase; the lessor agrees that at the expiration of the lease the lessee may remove the structures and improvements erected by it upon the premises.

The contract for the development of the field was made with the Dayton Lumber & Manufacturing Co., notwithstanding the fact that the contractor had failed to give satisfaction in connection with the Wilbur Wright Field. This is explained by Col. Edgar as follows:

"We had an organization at the Wilbur Wright Field. We had practically reorganized King's force, and it was determined to take them over to McCook Field, which was brought to us by Col. Deeds as a rush job which must be done immediately. * * * He personally brought the proposition to me as a proposition that had to be put through immediately. They had no place to test the planes that were coming out. We did not pick out McCook Field; we had nothing to do with its location. A contract was made for the rental of the ground of the McCook Field, and we were importuned to take our organization over there with this contractor and finish this job up and it was done.

"Q. Importuned by whom? A. By Col. Deeds."

The total amount expended by the Government upon McCook Field to August 14, 1918, amounts to $949,085.35, and the contractor's compensation is 7 per cent of the cost with a maximum limit of $46,200 The amount paid to that date as contractor's profit was $26,667.65 The remaining portion of the total compensation has been withheld awaiting the audit of the contractor's accounts.

There is no proof that Col. Deeds has had an interest in the contract for the development of this field. Nor does it appear that he had an interest in the lease executed by the Dayton Metal Products Co. to the Government, or in the rent reserved. While Col. Deeds originally owned a part of the tract leased to the Government, he conveyed—by what purported to be an absolute sale—his interest to Kettering, and was not interested in the lease by Kettering's grantee, the Dayton Metal Products Co., unless he was interested in the stock of that company, a question already considered. It is understood that the amounts advanced by Deeds in connection with the development of that portion of the tract in which he had an undivided one-half interest were taken into account in the settlement that was made in November, 1917, when the amount to be paid (by notes) to the Domestic Building Co. for the plant acquired by the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. was determined; but this fact is not sufficient to establish an interest in the lease so as to bring the matter within the range of the Federal penal statute.

SOUTH FIELD OR MORAINE FIELD.

This is a tract of about 110 acres lying south of the city of Dayton and a short distance from the plant of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. The greater portion of the land belongs to Col. Deeds. It has been improved by the erection of a number of hangars and other buildings. This land was leased about November 30, 1917, to the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. for a period of three years at a rental of $1 per year. It is used by that company as a place of experimentation. The expenditures for hangars and improvements upon South Field which had been made by Col. Deeds had been taken into account in the settlement made with the Domestic Building Co.

ACCEPTANCE FIELD.

This is a field lying close to the plant of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., upon which the airplanes it manufactures for the Government are taken out for trial. The greater part of this field belongs to the Moraine Development Co., and it appears that Deeds is interested in this field as a stockholder in that company. Deeds and Kettering each hold 2,055 shares out of a total of 10,003 shares, the majority of the stock being held by Adam Schantz. This field is leased to the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. The transactions relating to South Field and Acceptance Field were with the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., and not with the Government.

(3) COL. SIDNEY D. WALDON.

During the period in question Col. Waldon was a stockholder in the Packard Motor Car Co. This interest he retained, but he disclosed it to the Aircraft Production Board at its meeting of August 27, 1917, and to the Secretary of War, and it does not appear that he took part at any time in any proceedings of the board or in any other transactions in relation to the Packard Co. No interest on his part in any other concern having dealings with the Government is shown.

(4) COL. ROBERT L. MONTGOMERY.

At the time Col. Montgomery entered the service of the Government he was one of the directors of the J. G. Brill Co., of Philadelphia, holding one share of common stock. Col. Montgomery states that he resigned from the board of directors and sold his share of stock on September 22, 1917, before any contract was made by that company with the Government and that he did not negotiate the contracts in which that company is interested. Col. Montgomery further states that at the time he entered the Government's service it was agreed with his partners that no member of the firm should have any interest in any concern connected with aircraft work. It appears that the wife of one of his partners held for some time 200 shares of the stock of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, which she had purchased in her own right, and then sold it, and that subsequently she bought some 500 shares of the stock of the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation. With these transactions Col. Montgomery had no connection.

Col. Montgomery's firm (Montgomery, Clothier & Tyler) in August, 1917, took an interest of $250,000 in an underwriting syndicate through the National City Co. for the flotation of $5,000,000 6 per cent notes of the Electric Auto-Lite Corporation. Later, Montgomery, Clothier & Tyler issued a circular offering the notes for sale to the public. These notes of the Electric Auto-Lite Corporation were secured, in part, as the circular states, by a specific pledge of collateral, among which were shares, amounting to $12,500,000 in par value, of the common stock of the Willys-Overland Co. The Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., of New York, was made trustee to receive the pledge. The sale of all the notes was completed by September 12, 1917, $116,000 being sold through Montgomery, Clothier & Tyler, who received $8,500 in settlement of their interest in the underwriting. Col. Montgomery states that this transaction, with others, was undoubtedly mentioned to him by his partners at or about that time, but that he never saw the circular or had the transaction fully explained to him until May of this year. In August and September, 1917, at the time of this transaction, Col. Montgomery, on behalf of the Government, was negotiating contracts with the Willys-Overland Co. for the manufacture of engines for training planes. The Willys-Overland Co. not only made these contracts but also had a substantial interest in the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, which at the time had contracts with the Government for airplane engines. While the Electric Auto-Lite Corporation was affiliated with the Willys-Overland and Curtiss Cos., the transaction in question concerned the flotation merely of notes of the Electric Auto-Lite Corporation, and the interest of purchasers of these notes in the stock companies having dealings with the Government was only through the pledge of the Willys-Overland stock as collateral security. It appears that while Col. Montgomery's firm took part in the sale of the notes as members of the underwriting syndicate, none of the notes were actually purchased by his firm, either for firm account or for any individual partner, and in these circumstances it is believed that there would be no sufficient ground for holding the above-quoted statutes to be applicable.

Apart from the above matter, there is no evidence that Col. Montgomery has had an interest in any corporation, association, or firm with which he has dealt as an officer or agent of the Government.

Other officials.

LIEUT. COL. JESSE G. VINCENT.

In April, 1917, Mr. Vincent was vice president of the Packard Motor Car Co. in charge of engineering, with a salary of $25,000 a year. Under his contract with that company made in 1912 he was entitled to subscribe for certain shares of its stock. On August 15, 1917, having resigned his office, he made a settlement with the company, receiving his salary to that date and a bonus of $5,000 for the preceding year's work, and at the same time, through the exercise of his option, he acquired $15,000 of common stock at par, which, with the stock dividends previously declared thereon, gave him approximately 347 shares. He had purchased outside about 82 share, so that he became a stockholder in the Packard Motor Car Co. to the extent of 429 shares of the common stock of the par value of $42,900. This stock he has continued to hold since August, 1917; he has received dividends of 1½ per cent quarterly, with the exception of one quarter, for which a dividend was passed.

From about May 27, 1917, until August 15, 1917, Mr. Vincent, while paid by the Packard Co., was actually at work for the Government in the development of the Liberty motor. It is said that for this period he was "loaned" by his company to the Government. On September 3, 1917, he received a commission in the Army with the rank of major, and later he was raised to the rank of lieutenant colonel. About July 1, 1917, he was put in charge, as a civilian, of the engine design section of the Signal Corps, and he remained in this service after he was commissioned and until October 1, 1917. On the latter date the airplane experimental department of the Signal Corps was established in charge of Lieut. Col. Clark, with headquarters at McCook Field, Dayton, and Maj. Vincent was associated with this department as its executive officer with his office at the Lindsey Building, Dayton. On February 6, 1918, he was put in charge of the airplane engineering department at Dayton and in command of McCook Field. He is now in charge of the airplane engineering division of the Bureau of Aircraft Production.

Both before and after Maj. Vincent received his commission in the Army he had transactions with the Packard Motor Car Co. in which he acted on behalf of the Government. On June 6, 1917, the Aircraft Production Board adopted a resolution which provides, after recitals, as follows:

"Therefore be it resolved, That the board proceed immediately to secure space wherein to bring together sufficient draftsmen under a competent engineering organization to produce complete designs of 8 and 12 cylinder motors, to be known as the US–8A and US–12A, respectively; that the design for the 4 and 6 cylinder motors follow as soon as practicable, these motors to be known as the US–4A and US–6A, respectively. These designs and drawings to be made to include the designs and drawings for the special tools necessary to produce the parts of these motors. The board should undertake to have the parts made wherever in its judgment they can be most quickly and advantageously done and have them sent to Washington and assembled here in space to be secured, parts to be made for five (5) US–12A and five (5) US–8A.

"And be it further resolved, That the board recommend to the office of the Chief Signal Officer that the sum of $250,000 be immediately set aside to carry on this work and that a disbursing officer be assigned to handle this fund."

This allotment, or $249,159.10, was paid to the Packard Motor Car Co. for drawings, models, tests, etc., and for six US–8A's and five US–12A's, which were to serve as standardized engines. No written contract for this work or written order for this work setting forth unit prices or specifying the terms on which the work was to be performed is found in the files of the Signal Corps, and in this respect the proceeding was very irregular. Instead of there being an appropriate agreement or written order, it appears that verbal orders were given from time to time by Mr. Vincent, which, it is testified, were confirmed in conversations with Mr. Deeds.

The first voucher presented by the Packard Co. for this development work was for $104,500, which was paid on August 11, 1917, upon a certificate of Mr. Deeds, then a civilian, in charge of the equipment division. While Mr. Deeds was familiar in a general way with the work, it does not appear that he or any one else acting for the Government, except Mr. Vincent, had detailed information as to what had been done or as to actual cost. The exact amount of the outlays could not then be stated either by the company or by Mr. Vincent, and while definite amounts were placed opposite the particular services and engines described in the voucher, these amounts were mere estimates. The voucher did not so state, but the payments were virtually payments on account. Included in this first voucher (paid August 11) were the salaries and traveling expenses, as estimated, of those in the engineering organization which Mr. Vincent had effected for this development work, including the salary of Mr. Vincent himself after he came to Washington as above stated. As he testified:

"In other words, this item was intended to cover not only the making of drawings, but the moving of engineers here to date and also a lot of traveling expenses incident thereto * * * that was all lumped under original design work. * * * Q. Was there any itemization of that anywhere? A. There was not, because it was impossible to make any such itemization. I knew roughly what it would cost. * * * Q. How much of that amount of $37,000 included in that voucher—that is, the voucher for $104,500—was for salaries? A. I should say about one-third. Q. For what period were those salaries allowed. A. They were allowed for the period that the men were actually on the job.

* * * * * * * *

"Q. Is your salary included in the $37,000? A. I think it is."

Another voucher in similar form for $73,194.72 was presented by the Packard Co. on November 20, 1917. It was accompanied by a letter from Maj. Vincent, representing the engine-design section of the Signal Corps, to Col. Deeds, which stated:

"I have personally supervised this work and hereby certify that all of the above material has been delivered to the Government and is now being used for Government purposes.

"The prices at which the engines are billed are only approximately correct and may be high or low, but this can not be determined until a final checkup is made when the job is completed. There are several engines yet to be delivered, and before we pay for the final ones, I will arrange to have a checkup made in order to insure that the total amount paid for the entire job is entirely fair to both the Government and the Packard Motor Car Co. I would ask that payment be made the Packard Motor Car Co. promptly in this connection, as they are going to a great deal of trouble to do this experimental work for us."

A third voucher for $60,000, for three engines, which was also a mere estimate, was paid on December 6, 1917, on Col. Deeds's certificate.

The fourth, and final, voucher was paid on January 19, 1918, for the two remaining engines, which were put down at $5,732.19 each so as to bring the total amount expended for the development work within the above-mentioned allotment of $250,000. The Packard Co. at this time submitted an itemized statement of its outlays which Maj. Vincent examined and approved. This statement purported to show the total cost of the entire work; that is, the cost of material and labor, the direct expense (including traveling and other expenses of the organization which Mr. Vincent brought to Washington for the purpose of working on the design of the Liberty motor) and the overhead charges. These items aggregate $221,474.75, to which a profit of 12½ per cent ($27,684.35) was added, making a total of $249,159.10. Maj. Vincent wrote the following letter to Col. Deeds in submitting the final voucher with his approval of the itemization of cost:

DAYTON, OHIO, January 19, 1918.

From: Maj. J. G. Vincent, airplane experimental engineering department, Lindsey Building, Dayton, Ohio.
To: Col. E. A. Deeds, Southern Railway Building, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Final payment on the Liberty engine development order.

1. I am inclosing herewith bills from the Packard Co. for the last, or No. 6, 8-cylinder engine, and the last, or No. 5, 12-cylinder engine. These bills have been held in abeyance until the Packard Co. could furnish us with a final accounting covering the cost of the job.

2. You will remember that the joint Army and Navy technical committee set aside an appropriation of $250,000 to cover the cost of this job. At the time they set aside this amount and asked me to have 10 engines built I was afraid it could not be done within the appropriation, but am glad to be able to advise you that altogether we built 11 engines, as well as 2 wooden models and ran several tests under this order and still kept within the appropriation. You will note that the last two engines are built at $5,732.19 each, as this just balances out the net cost to the Packard Co. plus 12½ per cent profit.

3. As a matter of general information I want to point out that the Packard Co. cooperated with us to the limit on this job, and many of their executives gave a great deal of their time to this work for which they received no pay whatsoever. It is also a fact that this work was put ahead of a great deal of other work, causing losses which can never be computed. They did this cheerfully because their heart was in the job, and my only object in mentioning it is to in some degree give them credit for their attitude, as I know no one at Washington can possibly realize what this brand of cooperation costs.

4. I want to go on record as stating that I do not know of any other place in the world where this job could have been done at anything like this cost

5. During the last two years that I was with the Packard Co. they spent approximately a half million dollars on aircraft development work. The spending of this money not only put me in position to know what should make an aircraft engine, but it also resulted in the development of an organization at the Packard plant which was ready and waiting to grab this Liberty job. I think you will find the brief résumé of costs entirely satisfactory, but I simply want to state that the Packard Co., of course, have a complete record of all the transactions, if they should ever be required. I think, however, that this job is so obviously reasonable that nothing else will be required. I want to urge that you have final payment made to the Packard Co. immediately, as they are carrying on a lot of development work for us and are, therefore, carrying considerable investment at all times.

(Signed) J. G. VINCENT,
Major, S. C., U. S. A.

The irregularity of proceeding in this manner without a contract or proper order in writing is apparent. No price had been fixed for the work or materials; if only outlays were to be reimbursed, it was necessary that outlays should be appropriately proved before payment was made, and this had not been done in the case of the first three payments. Nor does it appear that at the time the first voucher for $104,500 was passed, on or about August 11, 1917, Mr. Deeds had any authority in the absence of a written contract or a proper written order to give the certificate. The Chief Signal Officer testifies that he did not have such authority. Nor was his certificate itself accurate in its terms, as there was no agreement for a price, and if there was an agreement for the reimbursement of actual outlays, the voucher, being a mere estimate, was not in accordance therewith.

It should be said, however, that the evidence does not afford ground for the conclusion that the Government was defrauded or that there was any intent to defraud the Government on the part of any of the parties concerned. The work was development work, these first engines being made by hand in advance of tooling up for quantity production in order to standardize the design, and it does not appear that the services rendered were not worth the amount paid or that the estimates of the outlays were not fair estimates; that is, that the amounts as estimated were not actually expended as set forth in the final statement. Both Maj. Vincent and Mr. MacCauley, the president of the Packard Motor Car Co., testify that the amount paid under these vouchers as finally adjusted did not embrace any expenses incurred in the original work of the Packard Co. in developing an aircraft engine; that is, prior to the time when Mr. Vincent came to Washington on May 27, 1917. Viewed as an arrangement for services on a cost-plus basis, the allowance of profit does not seem to be excessive. While the vouchering was irregular, there is no sufficient basis for a charge under the statutes relating to false and fraudulent vouchers or the facilitating or obtaining of payments with intent to defraud the Government.

A distinct question, however, is presented as to Lieut. Col. Vincent. Section 41 of the Criminal Code explicitly prohibits any person who is directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of a corporation from acting as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation. It is manifest that Lieut. Col. Vincent acted as an officer and agent of the Government for the transaction of business with the Packard Motor Car Co., in which he was a stockholder, and that this was in violation of the statute.

LIEUT. COL. GEORGE W. MIXTER.

Lieut. Col. Mixter, formerly vice president of Deere & Co., of Moline, Ill., manufacturers of agricultural machinery, came to Washington in July, 1917, to undertake the organization of the inspection department of the aircraft engineering division of the Signal Corps. He was later chief of the inspection department of the equipment division of the Signal Corps. He was commissioned as an officer in the Signal Corps, with the rank of major, about August 15, 1917. The work of the inspection department covered the inspection or acceptance of material and manufactured articles frunished to the Signal Corps, including the inspection of airplanes and engines manufactured under contracts with the Government. As chief of the department, Maj. Mixter dealt with the matters of organization and personnel and exercised a general supervision over the department in matters of administrative policy. In May, 1918, Maj. Mixter was made production manager and on the reorganization which resulted in the establishment of the Bureau of Aircraft Production he continued to carry the title of production manager, being directly under Archer A. Landon, who is Director of the Production Division, which is broadly charged with the actual execution of the aircraft program after the receipt of engineering data.

Prior to his connection with the Government, Mr. Mixter held 25 shares (par value $2,500) of the preferred stock of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation. He has not disposed of this stock. He testifies that he had sold his common stock in the company about two years ago and that he had not given thought to the retention of the few preferred shares; that his personal accounts are kept at his office in Moline and are in charge of his secretary. The Curtiss Co. had important contracts with the Government for the production of aeroplanes, and Lieut. Col. Mixter was in charge of the organization of the inspection of materials and products at its plant as well as at other plants, and he visited the Curtiss plant from time to time in the exercise of his authority as head of the inspection department and as production manager, and as an officer of the Government he dealt with such questions at this plant as required attention.

The statutory phrase "transaction of business" is broad enough to embrace the activity of officers or agents of the United States who are heads of divisions having charge of the inspection of products under contracts requiring the action of Government inspectors in course of performance. It would be a narrow construction to hold that the statute (Crim. Code, sec. 41) is limited to the making of contracts or the placing of orders or transactions relating to payment or discharge. It would seem to be quite as important that the chief of a department of inspection, selecting the inspectors who act under his instructions at the plants of contractors, should be free from interest in the corporation whose work is inspected, as the inspectors themselves, and both the chief of an inspection department and the inspectors may properly be regarded as agents of the Government for the transaction of business with the corporation. The same would be true of the production manager having supervision of production under contracts with the Government. No ruling in the Federal courts with respect to the applicability of the statute to such an officer or agent of the Government has been found. In the view that the statute has the scope suggested, Lieut. Col. Mixter acted as an officer or agent of the United States, contrary to the prohibition, for the transaction of business with the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, in which he was a stockholder. His holdings were small, but it can not be said that for that reason the statute is inapplicable.

MAJ. HOWARD C. MARMON.

Maj. Marmon joined the Signal Corps about June, 1917, and almost immediately was sent to Europe with the Aeronautical Commission. On his return he was assigned to duty with the airplane experimental department at McCook Field, Dayton. Prior to his service with the Government he was vice president and engineer of the Nordyke & Marmon Co., of Indianapolis, which was engaged in manufacturing mill machinery and motor cars, and he held $15,000 in par value of the stock of that company, its book value being several times its par. On entering the Army, he gave to his brother a power of attorney to dispose of his shares, and they were transferred to his mother, Mrs. Elizabeth C. Marmon, and have since stood in her name. The transfer was a gift; Maj. Marmon testifies that he has no interest in the stock. His mother turns over to him the income of other property which is the equivalent of the salary he had previously received from the Nordyke & Marmon Co.

The Nordyke & Marmon Co. has a contract for 3,000 Liberty engines and spare parts, and previously had a contract, which was filled, for 1,000 Hall-Scott engines and spares. The evidence is that Maj. Marmon had no part in the negotiations relating to these contracts or with the supervision of inspection, production, or payments. He has been engaged in the airplane experimental department, or engineering department at McCook Field. It does not appear that he has had any transaction with the Nordyke & Marmon Co. save that he sent to that company, with others, from McCook Field, the blue prints for the Liberty engine. It also appears that he signed a communication from McCook Field relating to a Marmon automobile which had been ordered by Lieut. Col. Vincent for that department. Taking all the facts into consideration, there is no sufficient ground for a charge of violation of the statute in his case.

SECOND LIEUT. SAMUEL B. VROOMAN, JR.

In a subsequent portion of this report reference is made to the Mahogany Manufacturers and Importers Association, a voluntary association of the leading mahogany manufacturers of the United States, which was formed last January in connection with negotiations for the purchase by the Government of mahogany for airplane propellers. One of the members of the association is the S. B. Vrooman Co., of Philadelphia. Second Lieut. Vrooman is the son of Samuel B. Vrooman, who was the head of this company until his death, a short time ago. Second Lieut. Vrooman is 31 years of age, and for upward of nine years was at work in his father's company handling lumber, inspecting, and selling. On his marriage, in June, 1917, his father gave him $10,000 in par value of the company's stock, which for some years has paid 20 per cent dividends annually. This stock he still holds. In addition to the dividends on his stock the S. B. Vrooman Co. has continued to pay him since he entered the service of the Government the sum of $50 a week, which is the equivalent of the compensation he previously received for his services to the company.

In December, 1917, S. B. Vrooman, jr., became identified with the Equipment Division of the Signal Corps as a civilian and was made an inspector of mahogany purchased by the Government. In February, 1918, he was put in charge of the inspection of all propeller lumber. He selected the district officers, who in turn selected the inspectors. Mr. Vrooman issued instructions to the district officers, visited the plants to see that the inspectors were doing their duty, and passed on disputed points. He has continued in this service, and in July, 1918, received a commission as second lieutenant. Among the plants subject to his jurisdiction as head of inspection of propeller lumber is that of the S. B. Vrooman Co., which has had contracts with the Government and is within the territory assigned to the district office at New York. S. B. Vrooman, jr., selected the head of this office, Mr. McCullough, who was responsible to him for the efficiency of the inspection and for the carrying out of his instructions, which related to the inspection at the Vrooman plant as well as others. The conclusion is not to be escaped that S. B. Vrooman, jr., was the agent of the Government directly responsible for the proper inspection of the mahogany delivered by the S. B. Vrooman Co. to the Government under its contracts, and that his acting as such agent for the transaction of business with the corporation in which he was a stockholder was in violation of the statute.

Fourth. The aircraft program.

At the time of our entry into the war we had no combat planes and only a few planes for training and scouting purposes. Approximately 100 airplanes had been delivered to the Army up to the year 1917. There were few flyers and still fewer who had any acquaintance with aviation engineering. The airplane manufacturing industry was in its infancy in this country. But these difficulties were not concealed. The necessity of prompt endeavor to surmount them and of securing at once the full benefit of foreign experience was obvious.

On May 22, 1917, the Joint Army and Navy Technical Aircraft Board, consisting of officers of the Army and Navy especially qualified by reason of aeronautical experience, made a series of recommendations to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, which were duly approved by each Secretary. It was recommended that there should be purchased by the Army (from the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation) "700 Curtiss JN-4 advanced training planes, equipped with the Curtiss OX-5 engines, with 50 per cent extra engines and appropriate amount of engine and airplane spares." The purchase of 100 Gnome engines (40 for the Navy and 60 for the Army) from the General Vehicle Co., was also advised. It was recommended "that no action be taken on the suggestion by the Aircraft Production Board for the purchase of the Standard J airplanes, pending tests of this machine by Army flyers." Other recommendations were as follows:

"9. The board recommends that the Aircraft Production Board take immediate steps to obtain complete working drawings, complete machines for use as samples, and to arrange for the manufacture in this country of the following airplanes and engines:

"AIRPLANES.

"Sopwith, 1½ strutter.
"Spad, 1-place pursuit type.
"S. E. 5, 1-place pursuit type.
"Sopwith, 130-horsepower Clerget, 1-place pursuit type.
"D. H. 4, 2-place reconnoissance.
"B. E. 2 D, 2-place reconnoissance.
"White, Gnome pusher, seaplane.
"Two types of Fairey seaplanes; 130-horsepower Clerget type; and also a Campania type.
"Farman, with a 150-horsepower Hispano-Suiza engine, seaplane.

"Hispano-Suiza, 200 horsepower.
"Rolls-Royce, 270 horsepower.
"B. H. P., 200 horsepower.
"Gnome Mono-soupape, 170 horsepower."

The same board on May 23, made further recommendations to the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy, which were also approved, as follows:

"3. It is estimated that the needs of the United States Army for heavier-than-air aircraft until July 1, 1918, will be as indicated hereinafter, and it is recommended that a building program to accomplish these needs be started at once.

Under the present conditions in order to meet the needs of the United States Army only:

REPORT OF AERONAUTICAL COMMISSION.

Two months after we had entered the war an aeronautical commission was sent to Europe. This commission, which sailed on June 17, 1917, in charge of Maj. (afterwards Col.) R. C. Bolling, was composed of Army and Navy experts and civilians. Capt. Virginius E. Clark and Capt. Edgar S. Gorrell represented the Army, and Navy Constructor G. C. Westervelt and Lieut. Warren G. Child represented the Navy.

Maj. Bolling's report was sent from Paris on August 15, 1917. The governing principle for the American production program was stated by Maj. Bolling to be:

"First. The United States must first provide itself with all airplanes and engines required for training purposes in America.

"Second. The United States must next provide the airplanes and engines necessary for use strictly in connection with the operation of American forces in the field. It is best known in Washington what will be the size and composition of the American forces in the field at any given dates in the future. You have the information as to the number of types of airplanes required in direct connection with military operations of these forces. We have learned nothing to change the views on that matter which were held by Maj. Foulois when we left Washington.

"Third. After these first two considerations comes the American program of putting into the field next year air forces in excess of the tactical requirements of its Army in France. It is greatly desired that the United States shall do this. Such air forces should consist of fighting airplanes and bombers." (Then follows a statement of the proportions deemed advisable.)

The conditions of European production were described, and the advisability of obtaining through foreign orders the supply of airplanes and engines required for use at the front and in training abroad for a period extending to July 1, 1918, was strongly emphasized, as is shown by the following extract from the report:

"In our opinion, these American needs may be divided into two periods: First period, from the present time to July 1, 1918. Second period, subsequent to July 1, 1918. With every confidence in the ultimate performance of the American production program our investigations of production experience over here and of the sea tonnage situation have convinced us that airplanes and engines produced in America can not be actually delivered at the front in any great quantity prior to July 1, 1918. Subsequent to July 1, 1918, we believe that American production will not only take care of our needs but may become a large factor in maintaining the air forces of our allies. In considering the period between now and July 1, 1918, due weight must be given to the experience of all foreign countries and manufacturers in the delays in airplane and engine production which were not and could not be foreseen. Only at close hand can one appreciate how many and how great those delays have been. * * *

"After long and careful consideration of this subject, we and all others here have come to the very strong conviction that most of the airplanes and engines for American use at the front and for our training here between now and July 1, 1918, must be produced either in France or Italy, where effective and successful methods of production are already in full operation. Because we consider this imperative and absolutely essential to prevent failure of our air campaign next year, an arrangement has been made with the French Government under which they are to produce for us the airplanes and engines shown on the attached table, which also includes a schedule of guaranteed deliveries. * * *

"You will also find annexed a schedule of approximate prices of these airplanes and engines and a draft of the proposed agreement between the American and French Governments which is now in the final stages of execution, although the orders have been actually placed by the French Government with its manufacturers. This agreement has been prepared after conference with the Judge Advocate General and his staff here and considerations of the arrangements under which England is having engines built in France."

Foreign orders.

Accordingly Maj. Bolling reported that the following orders had been placed abroad:

In France.

In Italy.

Five hundred S. I. A. 6 B (reconnaissance and day bombing airplane similar to the Breguet). Deliveries to begin October and be completed in December.

Two hundred to three hundred Caproni biplanes with the new Isotta-Fraschini engine. Deliveries prior to June 30, 1918.

A formal contract was made between Gen. Pershing and the French Government under date of August 30, 1917, for the 5,000 service planes and 8,500 engines above described. The French Government entered into this contract upon the express condition that the United States should furnish the machine tools and raw materials, which were fully listed. In order to perform this condition a contract was made under date of October 4, 1917, by the United States Government with the J. G. White Engineering Corporation, by which the latter was to act as an agent for the purchase of the required materials on the basis of cost plus three per cent as compensation. It turned out that there was great difficulty in obtaining these materials, as the French specifications in important instances could not be met at the time by American manufacturers. While the contract with the French Government called for deliveries of materials for planes two and one-half months before delivery of the finished planes, and materials for engines three and one-half months before delivery of finished engines, and that all materials advanced by the French production service should be replaced not later than November 1, 1917, it appears that only 14 per cent of the required materials had been placed at points of embarkation in the United States by November 1 for shipment to France, 46 per cent by January 1, 1918, and 67 per cent by March 1, 1918; 91 per cent was delivered at points of embarkation by June 1, 1918, and 99 per cent before the end of August. From information recently received it appears that all materials shipped under the contract arrived safely in France, and that substantially all have been satisfactory as to quality. For the materials thus delivered during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, there had been paid to the J. G. White Engineering Corporation $9,005,074.31, of which $8,742,412.29 represents the purchase price and $262,662.02 the agreed compensation.

It is understood that in December, 1917, in view of the existing conditions and the serious need for airplanes on the part of the French, the original contract was modified by a new contract calling for about one-quarter of the deliveries within the period contemplated in the first contract. The exact terms of the second contract are not now available here. It is also understood that further orders were placed with the French Government from time to time.

The deliveries originally contemplated on the foreign orders were not made; most likely by reason of the delays on the part of the United States in furnishing the required materials and the increased pressure of the needs of the allies.

DELIVERIES ON FOREIGN ORDERS.

Up to February 1, 1918, it appears that only about 600 planes had been received under the orders placed with the French Government, of which only about 70 were fighters and bombers. The situation as it then existed is disclosed in the cable from Gen. Pershing under date of February 16, 1918:

P. 610, Paragraph 1–A.

Dated FEBRUARY 16, 1918.

Conference to-day between Chief of Air Service, A. E. F., and French undersecretary of state for aeronautics develops fact that due to nonarrival in France of sufficient raw materials French production of aeroplanes and engines is insufficient to meet needs of French and American air service during the next three months. Nine American squadrons will be available for front-line service next month, and if military necessity requires that they be put into front-line service several of these squadrons must be equipped with inferior types of aeroplanes purchased from the French Government, a procedure which is strongly disapproved. Urgently important every effort be made to expedite remainder shipment of J. G. White & Co. materials destined for France—almost 14,000 tons—and also urgently request no delay in shipment of service aeroplanes from the United States.

PERSHING.

PLIGHT OF OUR CADETS ABROAD.

There may also be noted at this point the serious delays which occurred in securing adequate provision for the training of American cadets abroad. Hundreds of these cadets were held at concentration camps and other places for several months without suitable training. This was the more regrettable because these students embraced a large number who were exceptionally proficient, and who had gone abroad early on the assumption that they would have important and superior advantages in training. It is said that their numbers were larger than the capacity of the French and British schools which it was expected would receive them.

In his cable of March 13 Gen. Pershing speaks of the plight of these cadets as follows:

P. 726, paragraph 1.

MARCH 13, 1918.

For Chief Signal Officer. Approximately 700 cadets are now under flying training in Europe. These cadets had to wait an average time of three months before commencing flying training. Approximately 700 cadets in Europe awaiting flying training. These cadets have already waited from three to five months for training, and it is estimated that some of them will have to wait at least four months before their training can be commenced. All of those cadets would have been commissioned prior to this date if training facilities could have been provided. These conditions have produced profound discouragement among cadets. In order to remedy injustice and to relieve cadets in Europe on equitable basis of rank with cadets trained in the United States request approval of plan to immediately issue to all cadets now in Europe temporary or reserve commissions in Aviation Section, Signal Corps, subject to revocation in all cases where on completion of training cadets so commissioned are found not to have requisite qualifications for officers in the Air Service If plan approved, will recommend cadets by groups according to seniority. Strongly recommend approval.

PERSHING.

The Secretary of War observed this condition during his visit to France in the spring and cabled that these cadets should at once receive their commissions, which were to be held subject to revocation if later they were not found to be qualified. Gen. Pershing stated in his cable of March 30, 1918, that this relieved the principal difficulty so far as training was concerned, and the situation as it then existed was "difficult because of lack of machines for front, and not because of lack of training facilities."

LACK OF INFORMATION HERE AS TO EXACT STATUS OF FOREIGN ORDERS.

Despite constant interchange of cables information was lacking here as to the exact status of the foreign orders. While cable inquiries had been made from time to time, it appears from a letter written by Lieut. Col. Horner for the Chief Signal Officer to Col. Bolling, as late as March 12, 1918, that the desired information had not been obtained. There had been apparently an utter lack of an adequate system of communication by which proper records could be kept here of the transactions abroad. Tables and charts of the foreign orders and deliveries were finally received here, but it seems that there still was considerable uncertainty as to the extent of the foreign obligations, and at the beginning of this investigation the extraordinary statement was made by Lieut. Col. S. E. Wolff, then head of the finance division, that notwithstanding repeated inquiries, extending over many weeks, he had been unable to ascertain within $100,000,000 what obligations had been incurred abroad.

AGREEMENT WITH FRENCH GOVERNMENT OF MAY 3, 1918.

On May 3, 1918, a new agreement was made with the French Government by which the contract of August 30, 1917, was canceled. Provision was then made by the French Government for the acceptance of orders of the American Government for aeronautical material and for the acceptance by the American Government of orders of the French Government for raw materials and other supplies. As these orders would be intended to meet, in the common interest, the military needs of each country presenting them, it was agreed that each Government should fill the orders so far as compatible with its own requirements and resources. It was further agreed that upon the arrival in France of the raw materials included in the contract of August 30, 1917, they should be delivered to the French Government on the assurance that they would be utilized in accordance with the conditions set forth in the new agreement; and also, that until the American Army should be able to meet its own requirements in aeronautical material, the French Government should place at the disposal of the American aviation units, and such instruction units as may be required, the same aviation material as used by the corresponding French units, both as to quality and quantity.

It would seem that by May 23, 1918, there had been delivered by foreign governments for our use abroad about 1,400 training planes and about 350 service planes. Since that time there have been additional deliveries, and according to a list obtained by Gen. Kenly the approximate number of airplanes received by our forces from European sources to July 31, 1918, were as follows:

School or training planes	1,617
Service or combat planes	1,512

Production in the United States.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF BOLLING COMMISSION.

While Maj. Bolling's commission, in anticipation of delays here, placed large orders abroad, it is evident that the speediest production in this country that was possible, of a variety of airplanes and engines, was contemplated. The Bolling commission recommended for production here:

"AIRPLANES.

"Advanced training Bristol Scout, with 80 Le Rhone.

"Division or Corps d'Armée Bristol Fighter, with 200 Hispano.

"Long-range reconnoissance and day bombing DH–4, with Rolls-Royce or some other equivalent engine to be later adopted. Fiat 300 has proved successful here.

"Fighting or pursuit (fixed engine) Spad, with 200-horsepower Hispano.

"Fighting or pursuit (rotary engine) new Spad, with 150 Gnome. (This airplane is now undergoing final tests.)

"Night-bombing Caproni triplane, with 3 Isotta-Fraschini 270-horsepower engines, or other equivalent engine to be later adopted. For very long distance bombing with heavy loads the Italians are now arranging to use the Caproni biplane with three Isotta-Fraschini engines instead of the heavier Fiats now used. For distances of 400–500 miles (out and back included) the much greater consumption of gasoline and oil by the triplane gives it little greater bomb-carrying capacity than the biplane with Isotta-Fraschini engines, and the biplane can be produced much more quickly and in greater quantities. It is also much easier to house at the front. For bombing at shorter distances nothing gives such great bomb-carrying capacity as the triplane.

"ENGINES.

"Eighty Le Rhone for training purposes.

"Two hundred Hispano Suiza for fixed engine one-place fighters and division or corps d'armée airplanes.

"One hundred and fifty Gnome Monosoupape for rotary engine fighters.

"Rolls-Royce for United States production only under some special arrangement of a Rolls-Royce factory in the United States. This engine is not considered suitable for great quantity production. It also requires very skillful mechanics to keep it in commission at the front.

"While we have investigated many other excellent engines such as Renault, Fiat, Isotta-Fraschini, and S. P. A. all of them are too heavy per horsepower to be recommended as engines for great quantity future production in the United States. Renault, Fiat, and Isotta-Fraschini all have new designs now under test which may prove very desirable. The Bugatti engine appears perhaps to offer the most interesting future development for light weight per horsepower and ease of quantity production. The developments with our United States engine now under test are probably the most important consideration in this question of engine production in the United States. Of course, we are without any adequate information over here as to these developments."

RECOMMENDATIONS OF ARMY AND NAVY TECHICAL MEMBERS OF BOLLING AERONAUTICAL COMMISSION.

Capt. Clark, U. S. A. S. C.; Capt. Marmon, U. S. A. R. S. C.; Naval Constructor Westervelt, U. S. N.; and Lieut. Child, U. S. N., the Army and Navy technical members of the Bolling commission, on their return to the United States made a report to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy under date of September 4, 1917, which embraced the following recommendations:

"23. So far as land airplanes are concerned, the types at present indicated as necessary are the following:

"(A) Primary training—dual control—about 90 horsepower.

"(B) One or two types of machines for training toward the fast fighter—single seater—using for the present the 80-horsepower Le Rhone rotary engine.

"(C) Army observation—two seater—using probably between 225 and 250 horsepower.

"(D) Single-seater fighter—using a rotary engine of about 170 horsepower. (If a water-cooled engine can be built which will, at altitudes, give more power per total weight than the rotary, this type of aeroplane should be eliminated.)

"(E) Single-seater pursuit—should mount an engine which will give about 150 horsepower at 20,000 feet altitude.

"(F) Day bomber—should mount one engine which will give about 325 horsepower at 15,000 feet.

"(G) Night bomber—should mount two or three of the engines mentioned under (F).

"In order to minimize the number of types of engines, it might be desirable to use the same engine in the Army observation and in the single-seater pursuit. Such an engine should be given about 180 horsepower at 15,000 feet."

RECOMMENDATIONS OF CAPT. (AFTERWARDS LIEUT. COL.) CLARK.

Capt. Clark, who had a larger experience in aeronautics prior to our entry into the war than any other member of the commission, was the expert largely relied upon to make suggestions as to the planes which should be manufactured. He visited numerous factories in England, France, and Italy and also observed the types of planes in operation at the front. He testifies that his final recommendations on his return to this country in early September, 1917, after learning the situation with respect to engine production here, were for the production of the following types of planes:

Day bomber DeH–9, with the Liberty direct drive, 12-cylinder high-compression engine.

Army observation Bristol fighter, with the same engine.

Night bomber, a Caproni triplane with three Liberty low-compression geared engines (Handley-Page an acceptable substitute).

Two-seater fighter, a Bristol fighter with a Liberty 8-cylinder, or with that number of cylinders which should be developed.

Single-seater pursuit—the Spad, with the Hispano-Suiza.

Single-seater combat with a rotary engine, 150-horsepower Gnome.

Advanced training machine. Bristol Scout, with 85-horsepower Le Rhone.

Program as adopted.

ELEMENTARY TRAINING PLANES.

There were selected for production to be used as elementary training planes the Curtiss type known as the JN4–D, with the OX–5 engine, and the standard type, known as SJ–1, with the Hall-Scott or A–7a engine. The program called for 4,800 JN–4Ds (later reduced to 3,700, and this number was somewhat increased after May, 1918), for 1,600 SJ–1s, for 7,950 OX–5 engines, and 2,750 Hall-Scott, or A–7a, engines (reduced to 2,250).

ADVANCED TRAINING PLANES.

For advanced training it appears that there were originally chosen the Bristol Scout, with the Le Rhone 80 horsepower engine, the Thomas Morse S–4, with Gnome 100 horsepower, and the United States Training, with the Hispano (150 horsepower). There were modifications which resulted in the adoption of the types known as S4–B (with Gnome 100 horscpower), the S4–C (with Le Rhone 80 horsepower), the JN4–H and JN6–H (with the Hispano 150 horsepower), and the Penguin (with the Lawrence 28 horsepower).

SERVICE OR COMBAT AND BOMBING PLANES.

The type first selected for production were the Spad (single-seater pursuit), with the 200-horsepower Hispano Suiza engine; the Spad, using the U. S.–8 engine; the Spad Monocoque, using 150 horsepower Gnome engine; the Martinsyde; the De H–9; the Caproni and the Handley-Page, with the Liberty engine (U. S.–12). Subsequently the Martinsyde and the Spads were rejected, the production of the De H–9 was first limited and then postponed, the Caproni and the Handley-Page was not treated as a part of the immediate program, and the plans for production were centered on the De H–4 and the Bristol Fighter, with the 12-cylinder Liberty engine (U. S.–12).

The program charts which were prepared show extraordinary variations with respect to quantities and surprising expectations as to deliveries. Thus the program for De H–4s shows a total program on August 2, 1917, of 8,000; August 16, of 7,500; August 22, of 5,000; August 24, of 6,000; August 25, of 15,000; August 31, of 6,000; September 4, of 15,000; October 17, of 250; October 29, of 1,000, at which number it appears to have been continued until January 18, 1918, from which time it was increased until 4,500 appear in the program of February 11, 1918, and 8,000 in that of February 19 and thereafter.

According to this program or schedule it seems to have been anticipated on August 2, 1917, that 25 De H–4s would be delivered in October, 100 in November, 425 in December, 750 in January, and 1,000 in February, and more in each of the succeeding months. Even as late as September 4, 1917, the schedule shows expected deliveries of 62 in October, 1917; 250 in November; 1,063 in December; and in the program of November 5, 50 were scheduled for delivery in December, 100 for January, etc.

The program of September 5, 1917, for the De H–9s calls for 2,000 of this type; that of October 9, for 4,000; October 17, 6,750; October 25, 7,750; October 29, 7,000; at which it was continued until January 18, 1918, when it became 7,500, to be reduced on February 1 to 5,400, and on February 12 the De H–9 schedule was canceled.

On September 5, 1917, according to this schedule, deliveries of De H–9s were expected as follows: November, 1917, 50; December, 200; January, 250; and 300 in February, March, April, and June. On November 5, 1917, 50 seem to have been expected in January and 300 in February, 1,050 in March, 1,500 in April, 1,900 in May, and 2,200 in June. As late as January 18, 1918, 40 are scheduled for March and 500 for April.

The program for the Bristol Fighters started on August 2, 1917, with 1,000. It appears to have been raised to 3,000 on August 16, 1917, within one week it was dropped again to 1,000, and on November 26 the program was finally raised to 2,000. It seems that on August 2, 1917, deliveries of 25 were scheduled for October, 50 for November, 100 for December, 125 for January, etc. On November 5, 1917, the schedule calls for 50 in January, 150 in February, 200 in March, etc.

On August 9, 1917, the Caproni program called for 500; on August 16, for 9,000; on August 22, for 2,000; on August 24, for 500, and there were other variations until the program appears to have settled down after September 28, 1917, to 1,000. On February 19, 1918, the program dropped to 50; it called for 250 on May 3, 1918, and was afterwards increased to 1,000.

On August 9, 1917, when the program for Capronis called for 500, monthly deliveries of 100 were scheduled to begin in February, 1918. A week later, on August 16, 1917, when the program was increased to 9,000, deliveries of 900 were scheduled for December, 1,350 for January and each month thereafter. When the schedule was dropped to 1,000 deliveries appear to have been expected of 100 in February, and in February deliveries of 100 seem to have been looked for in May.

The Handley-Page program shows on September 5, 1917, a total of 1,500, with anticipated deliveries of 100 in December, 300 in January, 400 in February, etc. As late as January 8, 1918, deliveries were scheduled for February of 110, 190 for March, 200 for April, etc. On March 18, 1918, the program had dropped to a total of 50.

These programs, with their variations and schedules of deliveries, appear to be grotesque in the light of the actual facts, but they bear the imprimatur of the planning department of the equipment division with the countersign (except in the case of the DeH–9s) of official approval.

SUSPENSION OF THE PROGRAM FOR SINGLE-SEATER PURSUIT PLANES.

On October 5, 1917, in reporting the failure of the Spad Monocoque, the cablegram from our representatives overseas also contained the following advice as to single-seater pursuit planes with rotary engines:

"Recommend you build no rotary engine single-seater pursuit airplanes to be sent to Europe; existing machines this type will be outclassed by changing time yours arrives; build only what you need for use in United States training purposes."

This, however, did not touch the Spad intended to be used with the fixed engine—that is, with the Hispano Suiza engine. That machine was not experimental. As early as July 15, 1917, there was official advice that "200 H. P. Hispano Suiza (is) now fighting on front in Spad aeroplanes." Col. Bolling reported in his cablegram of August 1, 1917, that the Spad with that engine is "the best-fixed engine fighter now in service." There is no reason why this fighting plane should not have been produced here in quantity many months ago. The failure to do so was not due to lack of facilities, but simply to a change of opinion at a critical time as to what was advisable.

Responding to repeated and urgent recommendations for production of Spads in this country, an order for 3,000 Spads was placed with the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation under date of September 19, 1917. But this order had barely been placed when doubt was cast upon the enterprise, and after preparation for production was well under way the order was canceled on November 7, 1917. This is the date of the cancellation, as testified to by Mr. Morgan, then vice president of the Curtiss Co. It was nearly six months later that the production of a single-seater pursuit plane (the S. E. 5) was undertaken, and thus there was a serious loss of time through a reversal of judgment, which was in turn reversed.

It should be noted that virtually all the cables of advice sent by our military representatives abroad are signed "Pershing," but doubtless they most frequently come from subordinate officers and, with respect to the subject under consideration, from those in charge of the Air Service overseas. In a cablegram received here on October 5, 1917, the following appears:

"If USA 8 cylinder heavier than Hispano Suiza pounds per horsepower build no monoplace pursuit airplanes with USA 8 cylinder engines. Machine will be useless by time it arrives here. Increase number DH 4s or DH 9s by number monoplace pursuit airplanes. This is necessary provided USA 12 is success. Useful loads increasing so rapidly here that engines now in United States are not considered powerful enough meet requirements. Two-place pursuit airplanes considered most urgently needed airplanes next year."

The view thus set forth found support in influential quarters here. On October 27, 1917, Lieut. Col. Clark, in a memorandum sent to Mr. Coffin, expressed the opinion that "all fighting and bombing by day will be done in two-seaters flying in regular formation." And he added, "The single-seater will be eliminated." A few days later the following cablegram was received:

NOVEMBER 8, 1917.

No. 252 (S. D. 2709), paragraph 1:

"Your 359, paragraph 7, and other cables concerning American engine program. Situation here has changed much during three months since original recommendations and continues changing constantly. Following general principles appear clear to us: First. Single-seater fighter will probably become obsolete general use next year, although small numbers will always be used special purposes. Recommend you to produce number already actually under contract and started. Believe we can obtain here all this type required future above number actually under contract here and America. This applies both single-seater fighting airplanes and engines. Second. Two-seater fighter airplane with stationary engine will supersede single-seater. Four hundred horsepower probably sufficent next six months, after that 500 horsepower necessary. This summarizes cables already sent you."

It will be observed that while this message recommended against further production, it distinctly stated that the number, already under contract and started, should be produced. But this was not done.

On November 30, 1917, Col. Deeds cabled:

"Curtiss company have completed drawings and ordered material for Spad for 220 H. P. geared Hispanos. We have canceled that order. Tulasne suggests possibility of helping the French program by building Spad planes here to be equipped with 220 H. P. geared Hispano engines built in France. We could get production in February without materially affecting output of two-place fighters. We are not urging this because of the fact that we have ordered material which can be utilized in other machines, but if it would help your program here is a quick source for these machines."

To this there was a reply (from London) on December 14, 1917, as follows:

"* * * With reference to paragraph 1 your cablegram 461 do not recommend unionized production Spad airplanes for France. No such request received from French here. Believe they can produce all these airplanes they need. Think our only efforts should be applied airplanes and engines already on our program. United States should leave production single-place fighter to Europe."

The Spad contract having been canceled and preparations for the production of single-seaters in this country abandoned, in less than two months there was an urgent request from our military representatives abroad that Spads be produced here. As early as February 10, 1918, it was recommended that steps be taken to "put into production 1,000 Spads one-place with 220-horsepower Hispano Suiza engines for earliest possible delivery in France." It was said that "French delivery of one-place Spads very uncertain and can not be depended upon. Should have more definite information next two weeks as to whether your production Spud one-place fighter should be further increased." While this new proposal was evidently the result of the breakdown in the French deliveries, it seems that a closer inquiry into the progress of our deliveries of raw material abroad and the conditions of French manufacture would have revealed the serious importance of continuing the production of single-seaters in this country in accordance with the original program.

However, the authorities here were not then ready to follow the new recommendation, and two weeks later, on February 25, 1918, they cabled the following reply:

"Production of Spads with 220-horsepower Hispano Suiza engines does not fit well into our program because engines can not be put in production without material delay. Probably first deliveries in France in December. We could somewhat more easily produce the 300-horsepower Hispano Suiza engine. We are now producing large number of 150-horsepower engines for training planes, and could even increase production. We believe with this information you will probably decide not to request production of Spads here. Please give us your full advice."

It was not until March 9, 1918, that this cablegram was answered, with the statement that "question being considered. Will advise you soon." On April 6, 1918, Mr. Potter cabled that the British Air Board had advised that they could supply at once 200 SE–5 planes without engines. He added: "We can arrange production for 180-horsepower Hispano Suiza engines for same at rate of five per day within 30 to 60 days. Shall we arrange engine supply? If so, will you arrange contract for planes?" On the same day Col. Deeds cabled:

"We could within four weeks begin to supply 180-horsepower high-compression direct-drive Hispano Suiza engines to be shipped to England, to be installed in the planes by the plane manufacturer. Would this type of fighting machine be of value to you, and if so shall we proceed to provide them for you? We are advised that this type is in successful use by the British on the front."

On April 19, 1918, the following urgent message was received from our representatives abroad:

"The United States should make immediate preparations for the production of single-seater machines to supplement those we may receive from France and England."

But on April 21, 1918, there was a further cablegram (referring to Mr. Potter's cable of April 6, 1918), stating that the whole subject was still under consideration. This message was (in part) as follows:

"Will the production of 180-horsepower Hispano Suiza engines be interfered with by contracts placed by French or English? If not, we strongly recommend production of this motor for our needs this year on following basis." (Giving delivery dates.) * * * "The situation with reference to single-seater fighters for remainder of 1918 is as follows: Both France and England have a plane production in excess of their engine production, and as the 180-horsepower Hispano Suiza is already in production in the United States in small quantity, our only practical means of securing the necessary number of single-seater fighters will be for the production of this engine for overseas duty to be increased so as to provide the number indicated and for us to distribute these engines here month by month as conditions require. The entire question of the provision of single-seater aeroplanes for 1918 and 1919 is being thoroughly investigated, and a comprehensive report, with all data necessary, will be forwarded by an officer familiar with the entire situation."

On April 24, 1918, Mr. Potter cabled that contract could be made with the British Government for SE–5s at the rate of 30 per week beginning July 1; that 180-horsepower high-compression Hispano Suiza motors could be supplied from here for those planes at the same rate, and that the same machine could be put into production here and shipments begun in September. He asked quick advice if arrangements were desired which would permit of "quickest possible delivery of single-seater fighting planes on the front," and he added "SE–5 equipped with 180 Hispano is the only machine we can produce quickly."

To this an answer was received on May 4, 1918, disapproving the production of SE–5s, as follows:

"Production of SE–5 for 180 Hispano in America disapproved, since it appears that necessary planes for this engine can be obtained in Europe, either SE–5, Spad, or both."

This was followed on May 12, 1918, however, by a cablegram stating that the question was still open pending final report of board of air service officers and that final recommendation would be cabled in about 10 days.

On May 15, 1918, Mr. Potter cabled referring to the message from overseas of April 19, 1918, urging immediate preparation for production of single-seater fighters, and calling attention to the fact that the cablegram of May 4, 1918, was an exact reversal of the former recommendation. He said:

"We took immediate action on this recommendation, and have given orders for 1,000 SE–5s. Your 1052, paragraph 2–A, exactly reverses these recommendations. In view of this inconsistent information, and also due to requests for production of SE–5 from Air Division for training purposes, we have decided not to change our orders for production on these machines, and request that samples be sent promptly in accordance with our London 81, paragraph 3."

The final result is that there has been no renewed order for the production of Spads and that the order for SE–5s is being proceeded with, but that the American machine of this type is still in an experimental stage. It is understood that the machines are being tested, and that the questions which have arisen and have been brought to the attention of the authorities are receiving their consideration. We have not as yet sent from this country to the battle front a single pursuit or combat plane, as distinguished from the heavy observation or bombing planes, and, after giving due weight to all explanations, the fact remains that such pursuit planes could have been produced in large quantities many months ago had there been prompt decision and consistent purpose.

DELAYED PROGRAM FOR THE HANDLEY-PAGE AND CAPRONI BOMBING PLANES.

Although the Handley-Page and Caproni planes remained in the program, production was delayed. Both these types of bombing planes were included in the modified recommenadtions of the Joint Army and Navy Technical Board on November 21, 1917, and these recommendations were approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

On January 25, 1918, a resolution recommending a contract for Handley-Page planes with the Standard Aero Corporation was tabled by the Aircraft Board, in view of the fact that such an order might interfere with work already undertaken by the company. On February 8 the board discussed the advisability of concentrating upon the manufacture of a single type of night bomber, and it was stated that, due to the lack of history as to the comparative performance of the Handley-Page and Caproni, the decision had been made to put both types into production in the United States. Arrangements had been made for the assembly in England of Handley-Page machines for the American service, and on February 19 the minutes of the Aircraft Board show that a cable had been received on February 14 by the British War Mission indicating that it would be serious to cancel these arrangements. The minutes add that in view of "a cable received February 18 from Gen. Foulois recommending the building of both the Handley-Page and Caproni types, because of the military needs for the immediate future, it was decided that at present both types should be constructed," and the Secretary was asked to keep before the board's attention the necessity of making a decision prior to July 1 concerning the concentration on the manufacture of one of these types for the year 1919.

On March 19 the Aircraft Board recommended that a contract be placed with the Standard Aircraft Corporation for the assembling of 500 Handley-Page planes and the furnishing of such parts (other than wood parts) as the Government might require, these planes to be assembled and taken down and disassembled and packed for export shipment to such extent as the engineering department should require, but not more than 10 per cent of these—that is, 50 planes—to be fully assembled for testing and flying in this country. Orders for 1,000 sets of wood parts and for various metal parts of the Handley-Page were placed. In a letter to Col. Bloomfield, Air Division, under date of March 20, 1918, M. W. Kellogg, director of production, thus summarizes what had been done up to that time:

"2. Some time ago miscellaneous orders were placed from time to time, either by letter or word of mouth, with people that our production department felt could facilitate this matter by having manufacturers start on the work. These manufacturers, as per list attached, have done more or less work. The ones that are further advanced are the W. R. Mullins Co., of Salem, Ohio, who are supplying approximately 75 per cent of the metal parts to be used, also the Grand Rapids Airplane Co., of Grand Rapids, Mich., on the wood parts, they having at this time received about 250,000 feet of spruce, and I understand that a large part of this has been in the kilns and they will start work in a short time, which we would judge to be approximately from a week to 10 days, manufacturing some of the parts. The other manufacturers are in a more indefinite condition. We are now trying to adjust the questions between them and the Signal Corps by giving them a formal contract, and at the same time ascertaining as far as possible the exact conditions of their detail part of the work. Some of these subcontractors have very small items. As an example, the two tire companies have only been instructed to develop and make the molds for the tires and have manufactured a very few tires each. Other companies have only made dies for a very small percentage of the stampings, etc.

"3. We gave a contract a week ago for the assembling of the machines that are going to be assembled, to wit, 50, and for the marking, listing, packing, etc., for export abroad for 450, to the Standard Aircraft Corporation who, in connection with our engineers, will use their best efforts to push the work.

"4. We are just starting at this time to line up our production department on an aggressive assembling of this material and a correlation of same with a view that if it develops that any of the manufacturers are in such a position that they would seriously delay the work, to put pressure upon them to try to overcome such a condition.

"5. We are advising you of all these facts to as clearly as possible give you a picture of the situation so that you can use your own judgment and do as he sees fit in this connection.

"6. You will note that while we have ordered numerous parts for 1,000 planes, our assembling contract only covers 500. This was done with the distinct understanding that if the contractors did their work efficiently and well and in proper time, we would favor them with a further order of not less than 500 more machines."

The first Handley-Page plane assembled in this country was flown in the early part of July.

The Standard Aircraft Corporation, it appears, was able to produce the first Handley-Page machine within 90 days from the time they were given full authority for that purpose, and the testimony is that making allowance for whatever advantage existed by reason of the fact that previous contracts had been let for certain parts the first machine could have been produced, at the outset, within 120 days. Further time, of course, would have been required for quantity production, but for the long postponement of the program of the Handley-Page no satisfactory reason is shown.

CAPRONI PLANES.

In the minutes of the Aircraft Board, under date of February 12, 1918, it was recited that the Italian manufacturer Caproni had sent to this country samples of his triplane and biplane, with his production engineer, Capt. D'Annunzio, expert flyers, and 13 factory experts to assist the United States in placing Capronis into production. On February 7 the board had recommended that a contract be made with the Standard Aircraft Corporation for the manufacture of 50 Caproni planes. Mr. Coffin urged on February 20 that plans be laid for quantity production of Capronis, to be assembled in Italy, but it was the feeling of the board that the matter should be held in abeyance until the production of sets of Caproni parts for the Italian Government were under way.

On April 11, 1918, it appears to have been the sense of the Aircraft Board that the Caproni should be put into immediate production in view of (1) repeated cable advices to that effect; (2) the actual experience in Europe with the Caproni; (3) the fact that Capt. D'Annunzio had assured the Signal Corps that there would be no difficulty in the installation of the Liberty motor. On March 21, 1918, Mr. Potter advised the board that the Italian Government did not desire a contract for the manufacture of Caproni parts in this country, because of the remoteness of contemplated deliveries, and inquired the disposition of the board as to the manufacture of 50 complete Capronis, as recommended on February 7. On March 26, 1918, the question of manufacturing the Caproni was again raised in the board and after discussion was referred to the Chief Signal Officer for the consideration of Col. Waldon, with especial reference to the question of the establishment of an assembly plant in France. On April 2 a letter addressed by the Italian ambassador to the Chief Signal Officer was referred to the board, inquiring whether the American Government intended to build Caproni planes for its own use, and if so, how many. Discussion was had of the question, "in view of cables recently received urging such production and the expense already incurred by the Government in prepartion therefor."

On April 23 Mr. Potter stated to the board that a verbal order had been given to the Fisher Body Corporation for 250 Caproni planes, and that preparations for production were under way. On May 9 it was further stated by Mr. Potter that arrangements had been made with the Fisher Body Corporation and Capt. D'Annunzio for the manufacture of 500 sets of Caproni parts by that company, contract for which would be let as soon as funds were available and that preparation for production was under way, which, however, was not promised before September. Contracts were made in June, 1918, with the Fisher Body Corporation and the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, each for 500 Capronis. There were arrangements several months ago, apparently of a tentative character, with the Standard Aircraft Corporatiton for four Capronis, of which one has been built.

There appears to be no adequate reason for this long delay in putting the Caproni planes into production. If it was due to congestion in plants selected for production, this could have been obviated by a better and wider distribution of work. This is, of course, so far as the matter of plane production is concerned. The immaturity of the Liberty motor doubtless, had its effect, but it would seem that orders for the motors sufficient to meet all appropriate demands should have been distributed in such a way that there could have been no occasion for delay in the building of planes because of the lack of orders for the engines to go with them.

POSTPONEMENT OF THE DE HAVILAND 9.

In his recommendation, on his return from Europe in September, 1917, the DeHaviland 9 was preferred by Capt. Clark, as the DeH–4 appeared to him to be obsolescent at the time the Bolling commission was in England, and the DeH–9 was designed along the same general lines as the DeH–4, but with its weaknesses, from a military standpoint, corrected. In other words, he regarded the DeH–9 as far better suited for bombing than the DeH–4. The principal distinction is that on the DeH–9 the rear man—the gun fighter—is moved back about 20 inches from his position on the DeH–4; the pilot is moved back so that he is placed immediately in front of the gun fighter; the fuel is moved forward so that it is near the engine, and between the fuel tank and the pilot is a bomb compartment.

The contracts with the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., the Fisher Body Co., and the Standard Aircraft Corporattion, originally called for DeH–9s. When, on September 22, 1917, the program, as it then stood, was submitted to Col. Bolling on behalf of the Chief Signal Officer, it called for 2,000 DeH–9s, and the reply was that the number was not sufficient and should be doubled. It may also be noted that in the same cableg ram (Sept. 22) from the office of the Chief of the Signal Officer it was stated that the first deliveries of the DeH–9 with the Liberty 12, and synchronized Marlin piston-type airplanne gun, would be made in November, 1917.

The sample machine, however, which was first received from England was the DeH–4. The DeH–9 had not yet been put into service at the front. Apparently there was no sample DeH–9 available here until at the end of February, 1918, and it seems to have been thought that progress had been made to such a degree in the developing of the design of the DeH–4 for production that it was advisable to concentrate upon the production of the DeH–4 to the virtual exclusion of the DeH–9. Consequently, in the substitution of contracts, the DeH–4 took the place of the DeH–9, and it appears that in February, 1918, directions were received from Col. Deeds and Col. Montgomery that orders for DeH–9s were to be canceled for the present, pending information from abroad.

It seems that with an adequate production program, this improved type, or its American equivalent, could have been produced here some time ago, but it has not yet been put into quantity production. It is said, however, that the DeH–9 is now "being put out of production abroad" because of the "coming in" of the DeH—9A, which is a further improvement.

RESULT.

For obvious reasons, it is not deemed advisable to make public the details of the present aircraft program. That can be stated by the military authorities whenever they think it wise to do so. For the present purpose it may be said that the abandonment of the program for the Spads left us, until recently, without any program for single-seater pursuit planes, and that also, until recently, so far as service planes were concerned, there remained a program for immediate production which was virtually limited to De Haviland 4s and Bristol Fighters.

The Bristol Fighter as redesigned to take the Liberty motor proved to be a failure and after a series of fatal accidents was discarded. The Bristol was so far removed from a machine that could carry an engine of that power that it has been admitted by high authority that it was "a very foolish thing to put the two together."

Thus, nothing is left of last fall's program for service planes save the De Haviland 4s. The course of production of these planes is hereafter stated. It appears that after the remedying of various defects, they are being successfully used as observation and bombing planes. There are certain limitations, which it is not necessary to describe, of their military effectiveness for this purpose, and machines of the later and improved types are to be provided. By reason of a lack of maneuverability the De Haviland 4s can not serve the purpose of a pursuit plane.

ENGINES FOR SERVICE AIRPLANES.

The Bolling commission's recommendations for the production of engines in the United States for service airplanes embraced the 200 H. P. Hispano-Suiza for fixed engine single-seater fighters, the 150 Gnome for rotary-engine fighters, and the Rolls-Royce for United States production only under some special arrangement for a Rolls-Royce factory in the United States. It was said that the Rolls-Royce engine was "not considered suitable for great quantity production. It also requires very skillful mechanics to keep it in commission at the front." It was added that the Renault, Fiat, Isotta-Fraschini, and S. P. A. were too heavy per horsepower to be recommended for great quantity production in the United States and that the first three mentioned had new designs under test which might prove very desirable. Special attention was directed to the development of the Bugatti engine. And this statement of the Bolling commission concluded with the observation that the developments in connection with the United States (Liberty) engine now under test "are probably the most important consideration in this question of engine production in the United States."

ROLLS-ROYCE AND SUNBEAM ENGINES—BRITISH EXPERIENCE.

There has been considerable testimony as to the feasibility of securing, in the year 1917, the early production of certain foreign engines, notably the Sunbeam and the Rolls-Royce. In order that there might be an authoritative statement of British experience, there was obtained, through the courtesy of the British ambassador, a memorandum under date of June 22, 1918, which has the authority of the British air ministry. From this it appears that when we entered the war, in April, 1917, the British had in use the following airplane engines: 160 H. P. Beardmore; 150 H. P. RAF4–A; 130 H. P. LeRhone; 130 H. P. Clerget; 190 H. P. Rolls-Royce; 150 H. P. Hispano-Suiza; 275 H. P. Rolls-Royce; 320 H. P. Cossack Sunbeam; 230 H. P. RAF3–A. The following engines at that time (April, 1917) were "coming on": 150 H. P. BR–1; 180 H. P. Viper Hispano; 220 H. P. Geared Hispano; 200 H. P. Arab Sunbeam; 220 H. P. B. R. 2; 270 H. P. Falcon, Rolls-Royce; 140 H. P. Clerget; 375 H. P. Eagle Rolls-Royce; 260 H. P. Maori Sunbeam. With respect to these engines, the memorandum furnished by the British ambassador contains the following statement:

"Of those 'in use' in April, 1917, all were good reliable engines, but it was obvious that they could not remain in the front rank for very much longer.

"Of those 'coming on' the two Rolls-Royce engines and the 180 Viper Hispano were practically certain to be a success.

"The others were undeveloped and could not have been recommended at that time; so that in April, 1917, no Sunbeam engine could have been recommended for manufacture in America, and the general opinion in England was that the Rolls-Royce was quite unsuited to American methods of production."

A further communication from the British ambassador states that what is quoted above on the Rolls-Royce and Sunbeam may be taken to apply equally to July and August, 1917. It should be added that in 1917 Col. Bolling cabled advising against the production of the Sunbeam engine in the United States.

THE HISPANO-SUIZA ENGINE.

A different situation existed with respect to the Hispano-Suiza engine, which had been used extensively abroad. In the summer of 1917 the 150 H. P. Hispano-Suiza engine was in production at the plant of the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation at New Brunswick, N. J. That company had received an order from the French Government in February, 1916, for 450 of these motors. Although the contract was to be fully performed by the late summer of 1916, there was serious delay and deliveries did not begin until March, 1917. This delay was due in large part to the difficulty of putting into production an article of very fine workmanship and material which was entirely new to American shop practice. The greatest problem in this sort of work has been the procurement of materials of proper refinement and texture. The delay was also apparently due in considerable measure to conditions which could have been remedied, and a comparatively small force was engaged on the Hispano-Suiza motor work during the year 1916, the main effort of the company at that time being motor-car production. (Since the fall of 1917 virtually all the facilities at the New Brunswick plant of the Wright-Martin Corporation have been engaged in the manufacture of airplane engines.) By September 1, 1917, 202 engines had been delivered under the French contract, and by October, 1917, the difficulties had been surmounted; in that month 117 were produced and the French contract was completed in November, 1917.

The Signal Corps placed a number of contracts with this company, reflecting changing purposes. Under date of July 31, 1917, it placed a contract for 500 of the 150-horsepower Hispano (type A). In September, 1917, a further contract was made for 500 of the same type, and this was canceled on October 2, 1917. On the latter date the company received a contract for 4,000 of the 220-horsepower Hispanos (type F), which were the 150-horsepower engines geared to high speed. This contract was canceled on November 13, 1917, and was replaced by the contract of that date for 1,000 150-horsepower Hispanos (type A). On November 20, 1917, the company received a contract for 3,000 300-horsepower Hispanos (type H), which was modified by two contracts in the present year postponing the delivery dates, the second of which (May 11, 1918) provided for the manufacture of the 300-horsepower Hispanos in Long Island City and for a further postponement of deliveries. On February 2, 1918, another contract was awarded to the company for 1,000 150-horsepower Hispanos (type A). On February 25, 1918, a contract was made for 1,000 type E or I Hispanos, and on May 25, 1918, another contract for 1,000 type E or I Hispanos was placed with the same company. Type E is Type A modified as to connecting-rod construction, magneto-drive construction, and the piston design so as to make possible the carrying of a higher compression and thereby greater power—that is, 180 horsepower at normal speed. Type I is 150 horsepower and has all the improvements of type E except the high compression.

The 300-horsepower Hispano (type H) was in an experimental stage last November, and the first deliveries now due of type H are in October. Under the contract of July 31, 1917, for 500 150-horsepower Hispanos deliveries were to begin 90 days from date of contract and determination of final details. Subsequently October 25, 1917, was fixed as the date from which the 90 days were to be reckoned, and the deliveries were actually completed in February. Under the contract of November 13, 1917, for 1,000 150-horsepower Hispanos deliveries were to be completed in April, 1918, and, with the exception of one motor, they were completed in May, 1918. Under the contract of February 2, 1918, for 1,000 150-horsepower (type A) motors deliveries were to be completed in July, and by the end of July 988 had been delivered.

The type A, or the 150-horsepower Hispano, has been used for the advanced training plane known as the JN–4H. The 180-horsepower Hispano is adapted to single-seater pursuit planes, such as the Spad or the SE–5, and is now in course of delivery.

On July 25, 1917, the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation submitted to the Aircraft Production Board a schedule for proposed deliveries of the Hispano-Suiza motor "of either direct driven or geared specifications" amounting to approximately 7,000 over and above the deliveries then due on the French contract. The offer was on the condition that "orders are placed with us or some definite arrangement made for same at once, so that we have sufficient assurance to warrant us in making the necessary capital expenditures and providing further that arrangements can be made for the Government to furnish us with the necessary working capital in excess of our present resources."

There is ample basis for the conclusion that had there been a sustained effort to produce single-seater pursuit planes, and with this definite purpose adequate orders had promptly been given so as to justify the provision of additional facilities by this company and the speedy utilization of its highest capacity engines for these pursuit planes could have been delivered in quantity through the winter and spring and large numbers of these engines would have been available by July 1, 1918, in addition to the production needed for advanced training planes and without interfering with the development of the high-power Liberty motor. This is aside from what could have been accomplished through timely arrangements made for production by other companies.

ROTARY ENGINES.

In the cable of October 5, 1917, in Gen. Pershing's name, it was recommended that "no rotary engine single-seater pursuit aeroplane" should be built here to be sent to Europe. On November 8, 1917, Brig. Gen. Saltzman, Acting Chief Signal Officer, requested the opinion of the Joint Army and Navy Technical Board as to the extent to which rotary motors should be included in the building program for airplanes and engines in the future. In response the Joint Army and Navy Technical Board replied that as "the tendency in the design of fighting airplanes" appeared to point toward two-seater fighters of maximum power, it was believed that in the general building program for the coming year "rotary engines should be considered of secondary importance." It was added, however, that in order "to anticipate improvements in the art or changes in the military situation" it was desirable that the art of building rotary engines be retained in the United States, and that for this purpose "the organization skilled in rotary engine production be preserved." Referring to the schedule of production of rotary engines, the board expressed the opinion that the order for 2,500 80-horsepower Le Rhone engines was larger than was necessary to preserve the art, and that this order should be reduced to the minimum number that would accomplish the purpose, and it was further recommended that steps be taken to preserve the possibilities of production of the 160-horsepower Gnome engine. The immediate occasion of this inquiry was the pending question whether the Government should purchase the plant of the General Vehicle Co., of Long Island City, which was manufacturing Gnome motors. This purchase was made, but the manufacture of Gnome motors was continued at this plant for a time. In May arrangement was made for the use of the plant by the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation in the building of 300-horsepower Hispano-Suiza. Additional orders have been placed for Le Rhone engines. The rotary engines have been used for advanced training planes.

THE LIBERTY ENGINE.

In the latter part of the year 1914 the Packard Motor Car Co. decided to go extensively into the development of air motors. It had received one of the Mercedes motors, used by the Germans in their airplanes, which had been imported in a racing chassis. Taking certain features from that motor and from other motors, an engine was designed in 1915, a duplicate of which was used in a racing car. This engine developed 140 horsepower at 3,600 revolutions per minute. Another model, with greater power, was completed in December, 1916, and was also used in a racing car; this was rated at 200 horsepower at 2,180 revolutions per minute. It was described in a pamphlet exhibited at the Aeronautical Show in New York in January, 1917, as "the Packard aircraft engine," exhibited "as a stimulant to the new aviation industry." The work of developing these motors had been under the direction of J. G. Vincent, then vice president of the Packard Motor Car Co., in charge of engineering. In the latter part of May, 1917, Mr. Vincent took his drawings to Washington for the purpose of laying before the Government the plan of the Packard Co. to manufacture these engines in large quantities through enlisting the aid of other automobile manufacturers who had experience in high-grade motor work. Mr. Vincent met Mr. Deeds, Mr. Waldon, and others. The design was not deemed to be adequate for the needs on the western front, and it was necessary to increase the horsepower of the motor with lighter weight per horsepower. Mr. Vincent worked in Washington in conjunction with Mr. E. J. Hall, of the Hall-Scott Co., making sketches for the purpose of improving the motor, and in a few days a new motor was designed, embodying to a considerable extent the engineering features which had been developed during the past two years of experimental work. The first efforts were directed to the development of an 8-cylinder motor, and in a few days Mr. Vincent returned to Detroit, taking the Washington sketches for the purpose of having a wooden model made by the Packard Co., and this was done. At the request of the authorities, Mr. Vincent was loaned by the Packard Co., in order that he might take charge of the engineering division of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps. The Packard Co. made a full-sized operating model, which was sent to the Bureau of Standards on July 3.

Later, about August, 1917, the production of an 8-cylinder engine was postponed and the immediate production of a 12-cylinder engine of the same type was decided upon. In developing the design for the purpose of quantity production, various difficulties were encountered. Aside from minor changes found to be necessary in the course of production, the crank shafts, connecting rods, and bearings in the first 1,000 engines were too light, creating a dangerous condition. The crank shafts, connecting rods, and bearings had to be redesigned. It was also found to be advisable to change the system of lubrication, and again it was difficult to obtain a development of radiators that were suitable for a motor of this size. As late as June 25 of this year Gen. Pershing's cable described a series of defects in the motors which had been shipped abroad, and these, it is understood, were speedily remedied.

It now appears to be conclusively established that the Liberty engine is a great success for observation and bombing planes, and for this purpose it has found high favor with the allies. It is too heavy for the lighter pursuit planes. The following statement furnished by the British ambassador with respect to British opinion of the Liberty motor was received on June 22, 1918:

"No bench tests have been applied to the Liberty engine in England, but tests in the air similar to those applied to British engines have been carried out on a DH 9–A with satisfactory results. Bench tests in France were observed by members of the British technical department and were satisfactory. The tests carried out in France were the standard French tests, and do not differ very largely from the standard English tests, except that the power output was taken with a fan brake instead of a Froude water brake, as generally used in England. The results were excellent, except that the design of crank shaft and connecting rod was found to be faulty, but this was well known and had been modified in the United States. The carburation was also found to be unsatisfactory, but is now in course of being remedied.

"The official opinion of the Liberty engine is that it is an engine which, with a natural development in the perfecting of its details, will prove reliable and up to the power and consumption standards that have been claimed. It is eminently suited for bombing and reconnoissance aeroplanes, but not for fighting aeroplanes. The number of engines actually ordered for the British Government is 980, but 4,500 are required by the end of the year. The British Government would have prepared to place an order for 3,000 at once, but at the desire of the American Government the order was limited to 980, the number which was allocated for delivery up to the end of June. Up to date 205 engines have been delivered from the works.

"The following is the text of a telegram received from the air ministry on June 8:

"'The British technical authorities have reported to the air minister that the Liberty engines have now been subjected to sufficient air experiment in England to warrant confidence in this engine. Excellent results have so far been obtained which place the engine at once in first line of high-powered air engines. Naturally, service experiment in the field is still to be obtained, but the Liberty engine will be a most valuable contribution for the allied aviation program, and the United States should develop production with every confidence.'"

The following further statement was supplied by the British air ministry under date of September 27, 1918:

"No severe bench tests on the Liberty engine were carried out in England, owing to the extensive tests in America.

"The only bench test in England was one short test at nine-tenths power for data re oil and fuel consumption. The result was quite satisfactory.

"One engine was stripped after 100 hours' flying and was found to be in good condition.

"Tests in the air have been carried out in De Haviland 9–A and De Haviland 10 machines. In these the engines have performed uniformly satisfactorily.

"The performance of the Liberty engine is at least as good as that of the Rolls-Royce in identical machines. The information officially expressed four months ago, that the Liberty engine would prove satisfactory in service, is wholly confirmed."

The facts as to production will be given later.

Fifth. Selection of contractors and distribution of work.

SELECTION OF CONTRACTORS.

For engines to be used in training planes there were orders (to June 30, 1918) for 7.950 OX-5s distributed among the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, the Willys-Morrow, and Willys-Overland Cos. Orders for the Hall-Scott engines (2,250) were placed with the Nordyke & Marmon Co. and the Hall-Scott Motor Co. The General Vehicle Co. received an order for 111 Gnome engines (100 horsepower), and the unfilled portion of this order was taken over by the Aeronautical Engine Co., which also received certain additional orders for engines of the same type when the latter corporation was organized to conduct operations at the plant of the General Vehicle Co. after its purchase by the Government. The Union Switch & Signal Co. had orders for 2,500 Le Rhone engines (80 horsepower). The orders for the Hispano-Suiza engines placed with the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation have already been sufficiently detailed (ante, p. 96). In addition, orders for 450 of the Lawrence engines (28 horsepower) were placed with the Excelsior Motor Manufacturing Co. and an order for 2,000 Bugattis was given to the Duesenberg Motor Corporation.

In the summer and fall of 1917 contracts were entered into for the manufacture of 22,500 Liberty motors, as follows:

Aug. 31, 1917, Lincoln Motor Co	6,000
Sept. 4, 1917, Packard Motor Car Co	6,000
Sept. 7, 1917, Nordyke & Marmon Co	3,000
Sept. 11, 1917, Trego Motor Corporation	500
Nov. 22, 1917, Ford Motor Co	5,000
Dec. 11, 1917, General Motors Corporation	2,000
Total	22,500

The contract with the Trego Motor Corporation was subsequently canceled. [It is understood that it has been taken over by the Ordnance Department for tanks. It is canceled so far as its relation to aircraft is concerned.] Only one engine being delivered.

For the production of elementary training planes of the type known as the JN4–D reliance was placed chiefly upon the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, which had already made planes for the British Government. Substantial orders were also given to the Springfield Aircraft Co. and the Canadian Airplane Co. (Ltd.), of Toronto. A number of small orders were placed from time to time with various concerns. The total orders to June 30, 1918, were for 3,975 of the JN4–D type.

The orders for the Standard-J training planes were distributed among the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., the Fisher Body Corporation, and the Standard corporations (Standard Aero Corporation and Standard Aircraft Corporation). The total orders were for 1,600 of this type.

For advanced training planes there were orders given to the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation (to June 30, 1918) for 919 JN–H and 479 JN6–H; to the Thomas Morse Aircraft Corporation (for 100 S4–B and 400 S4–C), and to the Breese Aircraft Corporation (for 300 Penguins).

With respect to both elementary and advanced training planes there were also various orders for spare parts.

In service planes the production of the De Haviland 4s was pivoted upon the work of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. in connection with the designing of the plane for American production, as hereafter explained. There were contracts for 8,500 of the DH–4s, as follows:

Dayton Wright Airplane Co	4,000
Fisher Body Corporation	4,000
Standard Aircraft Corporation	500
Total	8,500

The contract for the Bristol Fighters (2,000) was given to the Curtiss Aeroplane and Motor Corporation.

In view of the exigency, it was inevitable that the responsible officials of the Signal Corps intrusted with the duty of aircraft production should exercise a broad authority, virtually unhampered by restrictions, in the selection of contractors. The Aircraft Board, in which the responsible Army officers sat as members, afforded a useful opportunity for the comparison of views, but not a legal, and only to a limited extent a practical, check. There have been numerous complaints from individuals and corporations who sought contracts unsuccessfully. The extent to which activities were centered at Dayton, the profitable contract promptly given to Col. Deeds's former business associates, and the preference of a small group of manufacturers in the allotment of the large contracts created a feeling of distrust which finds frequent expressions in the record of this inquiry.

There could be no well-founded objection to a well-directed effort to standardize products for production in large quantities under conditions favoring the most economical and efficient work. So far as orders for production of planes in small quantities and various spare parts are concerned, to give an adequate statement of the facts with respect to the companies who received, or which asked and were refused, contracts would require a great variety of detail which it is impracticable to set forth. It does not appear that in the award of these contracts there was adherence to any clearly-defined principle. It is sufficient to say that in many instances the parties complaining have no ground for their complaints, save that others in no better situation obtained what the complainants were denied. For while offers or requests of some manufacturers went unheeded because of alleged lack of proper facilities or of assured financial ability, in other cases contracts were made with parties equally destitute of adequate resources. Among those whose facilities were apparently adequate, some were taken and others were left.

But aside from any question of discrimination between manufacturers, it is obvious that the exigency demanded that important and needed sources of supply should not be neglected, and in this connection, without attempting to make a comprehensive statement of other available resources, the case of the Singer Manufacturing Co. deserves special attention.

SINGER MANUFACTURING CO.

While this company had no experience in the building of airplanes, it had perhaps the largest plant in the country for cabinetwork and one of the largest veneer plants, and its facilities available for the processes demanded in aircraft production were hardly excelled in the country. As Col. Waldon testifies, "There was every reason why they should be successful in airplane manufacture." The officers of the company were not seeking contracts, but they offered its facilities to the Government, and these were not utilized. As early as July 14, 1917, Mr. Waldon, of the Aircraft Production Board, requested an interview with the vice president of the Singer Sewing Machine Co., and this was had. Later representatives of the Singer Co. visited the plants of the Curtiss Co., the Dayton Wright Co., and the Canadian Airplanes (Ltd.), of Toronto, and an interview was then had with Mr. Deeds and Mr. Waldon, on August 14. Up to that time the manufacture by the Singer Co. of 3,000 training planes had been under consideration, but it was then suggested that it should build 1,000 service planes of the DeH–4 type. Before undertaking this work the representatives of the Singer Co. desired to examine the sample DeH–4 at the plant of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. The letter of introduction to that company, however, revealed the fact that the whole proposition was still very indefinite. The letter (Aug. 15, 1917) stated:

"We are asking the Singer Sewing Machine Co. to conduct such investigations as is possible while we are making up our minds as to the part of our program they are to fulfill. When they were here yesterday we suggested that they should help in the DeH–4 production. This is not definitely settled, and they may be given some other part of the program, but we would like to have them given the privilege of an opportunity to study the details of the DeH–4, inasmuch as it represents the latest type of barge war machine from abroad."

On receiving this letter the vice president of the Singer Co. telegraphed Mr. Waldon that it was so indefinite that the trip would be postponed until it was decided whether it was desired that they should undertake the building of the DeH–4. To this Mr. Waldon replied, under date of August 16, as follows:

"We are promptly in receipt of your telegram about the indefiniteness of our letter of August 15. Since your visit we have received a cablegram which indicates that there will be a very important change in our program, in all probability causing us to change the type of machine you would build. This was the reason I stated in my answer that it was not definitely settled that you would build the DH–4. It will be in your hands, however, whether you go to Dayton and look over the DH–4 as a sample of an up-to-date war machine. The one we have in mind now that we would ask your assistance upon would be quite a little larger than this."

On August 17 Mr. Waldon telegraphed "change in program will probably make it necessary to assign a type other than DH–4." On August 20 the Singer Co. informed Mr. Waldon that they had decided to postpone their trip to Dayton "until it is more definitely settled what you wish us to do for you." In a postscript to this letter it was stated that the Singer Co. had been requested by the British Government to duplicate their order from that Government for certain airplane parts (universal joints), and they asked whether there was any objection to their undertaking this additional work. An answer was received on August 23 that this was entirely satisfactory. This additional work for the British Government required the services of perhaps 100 persons and left the Singer Co. quite free to undertake the making of planes for the Government, but no further word was received and no order was given to the Singer Co. In the light of the correspondence no explanation has been given of the failure to enlist its important resources for the purpose of aircraft production.

ENGEL AIRCRAFT CO., OF NILES, OHIO.

In view of the former connection of Mr. Harry E. Baker, the brother of the Secretary of War, with the Engel Aircraft Co., the facts with respect to its organization and its contracts with the Government should be set forth.

The company was organized about August, 1917, under the laws of Ohio. Mr. Harry E. Baker testifies that it was originally intended to have a capital stock of $3,000,000 (preferred $1,000,000 and common $2,000,000), but this was subsequently reduced to $1,500,000 (preferred $500,000 and common $1,000,000). Mr. Harry E. Baker, of Cleveland, was president and general manager. His associates in the organization of the company were Mr. Engel, vice president and production manager, and Mr. Patterson, secretary and treasurer.

Mr. Baker had taken an option in the spring of 1917 for the plant at Niles, Ohio, formerly owned by the Engel Airplane & Motor Co., and this was taken over by the new company, which, in effect, issued its preferred stock therefor, at a cost of about $225,000. The remainder of the preferred stock was sold for cash. The preferred stock was entitled to 7 per cent cumulative dividends, and, as Mr. Baker states, was to be retired at par before the common stock participated in earnings. The common stock was issued to Mr. Baker and his associates for services in promotion. As an officer of the company Mr. Baker received a salary at the rate of $7,000 a year.

On October 9, 1917, the Aircraft Board recommended that an order be placed with the Engel Aircraft Co. for spare parts for 100 JN4–D training planes, at the aggregate price of $80,827.80. At the meeting of the Aircraft Board on October 19, 1917, it was recited that the equipment division had recommended that a larger order be placed with the Engel Co., and the board thereupon rescinded its resolution of October 9 and recommended that an order be placed with the Engel Co. for spare parts for 700 JN4–D airplanes, at a total cost of $585,077.50. Following this contract for 700 sets, Mr. Baker states that there were further orders from the Government during his connection with the company for 200 sets of spares for JN4–D's, 200 sets of spares for JN4–H's, and another order of 100 sets of spares for JN4–D's, the aggregate orders being for 1,200 sets of spares at a price of about $1,000,000. Mr. Baker testifies that he ceased his connection with the Engel Co. on January 21, 1918.

The Secretary of War testifies that either before or after our entry into the war his brother (Harry E. Baker) asked him whether there was any reason why he should not go into the manufacture of a certain flying boat for the Navy, in association with one Engel. The Secretary told him that he knew of no reason why he should not. Later his brother informed the Secretary casually that they were going to make airplanes, and asked if the Secretary objected. The Secretary replied that he had no right to object, but did not wish to be consulted about it; that he had nothing to do with it. Later the Secretary discovered that the Engel Aircraft Co., of which his brother was president, had a contract with the Government, which was not a competitive contract, but one which had been given upon an inspection of the facilities of the aircraft company. The Secretary sent for Gen. Squier and asked for the facts. The Secretary regarded the situation as intolerable and directed that the contract should be canceled. Thereupon it was immediately canceled by telegraph and arrangements were made, through Mr. Eugene Meyer, jr. (acting for the Secretary), for the separation of Mr. Harry E. Baker from the company. The Secretary thought it was just that his brother should be paid on the basis of the value of any services he had rendered, but that his complete separation from the company was necessary before a contract should be regarded as possible.

Mr. Harry E. Baker testifies that in January last he was informed by telephone that all of the contracts of the Engel Co. had been canceled; that he immediately went to Washington and had an interview with Assistant Secretary of War Crowell, who told him that his association with the aircraft business was embarrassing to the Secretary of War and that he should retire from it. He said that he had no desire to furnish cause for embarrassment, and accordingly, after an interview with Mr. Meyer, he turned back to the treasurer of the company all of the stock that he had in his name and resigned as president and general manager. Mr. Baker testifies that the company paid him nothing for his stock. In addition to the payments of salary which, according to his testimony, he had received for two months at the rate of $7,000 a year, Mr. Baker says that he was paid on his retirement the sum of $15,000 in consideration of the services that he had rendered.

Being assured that the separation of his brother from the company had been effected, the Secretary notified Gen. Squier that the capacity and merits of the company were the only matters to be considered. All the contracts were immediately reinstated on the same terms. Subsequently an additional order was given to the Engel Co. for 500 sets of spares for De Haviland 4's, at an estimated cost of $2,275,000.

DISTRIBUTION OF WORK.

Quite as important as the selection of contractors and the development of adequate sources of supply, was the distribution of work so as to insure prompt and efficient production. Each type of plane requires special preparation and the demands of varied sorts of work may easily be mutually restrictive and demoralizing. A conspicuous instance of this is furnished in the case of the Standard Aircraft Corporation. This company, with its predecessor (the Standard Aero Corporation), had the unusual features of being a manufacturing corporation under the direction of two lawyers, Harry Bowers Mingle and Max J. Finklestein, of the firm of Mingle & Finklestein, of New York City. It is unnecessary to review the financial history of the two Standard corporations, with their plants at Elizabeth and Plainfield, N. J. It is sufficient for the present purpose to say that from the time of the organization of the Standard Aircraft Corporation in November, 1917, it has been the operating company, except that recently the Standard Aero Corporation has been availed of, and it has taken the plant at Plainfield for the purpose of handling fixed-price orders, the cost-plus contracts being in course of performance at the large plant at Elizabeth. Both these corporations are controlled by Mitsui & Co., a leading Japanese firm, which holds all the preferred stock and a majority of the common stock of each company. The orders which have been given by our Government to one or the other of these Standard companies exhibit an extraordinary range of types, embracing training planes of the Standard J type, 6 machines and spares of the JR–1B type for the Post Office, advanced training planes of the M Defense type, 4 Capronis, the assembly of Handley-Page planes, 500 De Haviland 4's, as well as flying boats for the Navy and various orders for small parts. The effect was to put in this plant almost every variety of airplane work, a proceeding which has no justification from a production standpoint. Mr. Charles H. Day, the chief engineer of the Standard companies, whose ability is generally recognized, frankly admits the serious disadvantage of this multiplicity of orders. He says:

"There is a natural amount of confusion in having a multiplicity of those parts. * * * The engineering personnel is limited by the number of different machines you have to produce, and the executive force is limited by the same amount. The physical layout of the factory itself is very seriously affected. * * * We have on the HS boat job made entirely our own drawings. It was out of the question to work to the drawings which were supplied us and we therefore redrew the entire job. That occupied a great amount of time of the drafting room and the engineering departments of the Standard Aircraft. Then a great amount of drawing has been necessary on the De Haviland 4, it being impossible to get Van Dyke drawings from the Signal Corps, and we have attempted to draw up a great deal of that machine, and we have redrawn in its entirety the Handley-Page machine. That involves the engineering department and the drafting department and the bill of materials department, sometimes known as the specification department, which is one of the most important we have, inasmuch as under the present regulations we are not allowed to purchase material except we bill the material. The approvals officer will not approve the materials except on the basis of a bill of materials supplied, and making the bills of materials and completing the drawings on all these different machines has been extremely difficult.

"Q. Have you had in your drawing department the HS boats for the Navy, that is the seaplane, the Handley-Page planes, and the De Haviland planes, all being worked out at the same time?—A. Yes, sir."

On the same point, Mr. Day again testified:

"The order for the De Haviland 4s is a very small order comparatively. * * * If we were to turn over our plant entirely into building the 500 De Haviland 4s and had a go-ahead on 500 De Haviland 4s, it would not last very long. We expected early in this year and were preparing to take over a large order for Capronis. That was before we had the De Haviland machines, and it was supposedly to be a thousand Capronis. That was a fair-sized order, and we expected we would have that alone and nothing else. But that was withdrawn, and the order for 700 sets of spare parts for the Bristol and 1,500 sets of spare parts for the De Haviland 9 was given us, and that was a pretty fair-sized order. That in itself would have been sufficient for some length of time, but both of those orders were recalled. The interference, so far as spare parts of machines is concerned, would have been less than the interference caused by two orders for complete machines. It has been impossible for us to obtain a large enough continued order to actually know what we were going to do and to prepare for doing it."

Criticisms upon the management of the corporation do not excuse such a state of affairs. If a manufacturing corporation is to be intrusted with work, it is manifest that it should be given the work it can handle efficiently; and if its efficiency is distrusted, there is still less reason for embarrassing it with confusing orders. On the other hand, if it is deemed capable of successful production it should have a suitable opportunity to develop it. The effect of placing such an assortment of orders, coupled with the difficulties besetting production in this new industry, has not only interfered with production, but has promoted waste, made it exceedingly difficult to maintain proper cost accounts, and has confused responsibility for delays.

Other illustrations of a poor distribution of work might easily be given; the result of it is that one part of the Government's program has stood in the way of another.

Sixth. The course of production—Delays—Misleading public statements.

It is not deemed to be necessary to review in detail in this report such delays as occurred in the delivery of training planes and engines therefor. As early as February 16, 1918, 1,733 had been delivered of the JN4–D and 683 of the SJ–1 elementary training planes. As already stated, 2,972 of the JN4–D had been delivered by June 30 and the total order for the SJ–1 (1,660) was completed by May 11, 1918. By February 16, 1918, there had been delivered 1,438 of the OX–5 engines and 1,083 of the A–7a engines and deliveries continued from week to week.

The elementary training planes of the JN–4D type seem to have been satisfactory. In connection with this phase of the execution of the aircraft program it should be said that the general average of accidents in training for all the camps in the United States, is one accident for every 3,200 to 3,600 hours of actual flying. The worst school, in this respect, is one accident for every 1,900 hours of flying and the best school shows one accident for every 4,800 hours of flying. While it is somewhat difficult to obtain comparative statistics with respect to accidents in French and British training camps, it is believed from reports from our officers serving in the English and French schools that we have about twice as much flying per accident as either of the other nations.

The condemnation of the SJ–1 plane as dangerous, because of the Hall-Scott engine, has already been mentioned. It is to be noted that as early as February 12, 1918, the Joint Army and Navy Technical Aircraft Board passed a resolution reciting the opinion of the board "that the Standard airplane as completed with the Hall-Scott engine is not a satisfactory training machine" and recommending "that if it is necessary to make further purchases from the Standard Co. of types that have been developed by them, that such machines be of the type designed for the installation of the Hispano-Suiza engine and the 150 Hispano-Suiza engines be purchased for these machines." The Standard J training plane with the Hall-Scott engine continued to be used until it was condemned in June, 1918, on Gen. Kenly's return from overseas and after his careful examination of its operation. The order of Gen. Kenly, under date of June 6, 1918, is as follows:

"1. Due to the shortage of training-type airplanes in the past it was necessary to use a certain number of Standard J–1 airplanes for training as filler-in until there were sufficient JN–4 machines manufactured for all schools.

"2. At the present time there are sufficient JN–4 machines in storage to entirely replace all Standard machines in use. The director of military aeronautics therefore desires that no more Standard airplanes be used in flying training and that steps be taken at once to entirely replace the Standard J–1 machines now in use by JN–4 airplanes. The Standard machines can be utilized in mechanics' training schools, ground schools, and any other schools where it is not necessary that they be taken into the air."

With respect to advanced training planes, it may be said that by February 16, 1918, 60 had been received of the S–B and 105 of the JN4–H. The delivery of Penguins did not begin until the middle of April, and of S4–Cs until May. There had been delivered by February 16, 1918, 121 of the Gnome (100 horsepower) and 444 of the Hispano (150 horsepower) engines. Deliveries of the Lawrence (28 horsepower) began in March and of the LeRhone (80 horsepower) in May, 1918.

SERVICE PLANES.

As already stated, the program during the period under consideration and until recently has been practically limited to the De Haviland 4s and the Bristol Fighters.

THE DE HAVILANDS.

The contracts for these planes, after the substitution of De H–4s, for De H–9s, called for 8,500 De H–4s, viz., Dayton-Wright Airplane Co., 4,000; Fisher Body Corporation, 4,000; Standard Aircraft Corporation, 500.

Under the first contract with the Dayton-Wright Airplane Co. (dated Sept. 7, 1917), deliveries of the De H–9s then provided for were to begin in November, and the entire 2,000 were to be delivered by the end of June, 1918. Under the modified contract (Jan. 17, 1918), for 1,000 De H–4s and 3,000 De H–9s, deliveries were to begin in January and to be completed by the end of July, 1918. Under the final contract (Apr. 1, 1918), substituting 4,000 De H–4s, the latter were divided into two lots of 2,000 each, the first lot for immediate production to be delivered by August 1, 1918, and the remainder to be delivered as ordered.

The first De H–4 was shipped from the plant of the Dayton-Wright Airplane Co. on February 5, 1918. It was intended for the American Expeditionary Forces in France, but it was not completely equipped; it did not have any bomb gear that would work. On February 14, 1918, the following telegram was addressed by Mr. Talbott to Col. Deeds:

"Wire received reference Secretary Redfield and Dr. Stratton. Maj. Shepler advises first 100 De Havilands to remain in this country. If so, will you recall plane shipped for foreign shipment, allowing us to substitute plane completely equipped. Progress here encouraging."

However, the plane already shipped was not recalled. The transport containing it sailed on March 22, and, on account of engine trouble in the Azores, it did not reach Europe until May 4.

Nine additional De H–4s were shipped by the Dayton-Wright Airplane Co. in February for the use of various fields—two on the 15th, one on the 16th, and two on the 17th, intended for Gerstner Field in Louisiana; one on the 21st for McCook Field (which was sent to South Field); one on the 22d for the Fisher Body Corporation; one on the 23d for the Standard Aircraft Corporation; and one on the 25th for McCook Field. Four were shipped in March—two for Gerstner Field on the 9th and 12th, one for McCook Field on the 10th, and one on the 21st was delivered to the property officer at the Dayton-Wright Airplane Co.

There were no shipments for the American Expeditionary Forces between February 5 and April 3, 1918, when four were shipped; four more were shipped on April 14 and four on April 22, and there were no more shipped for use abroad until May 2, 1918. That is to say, up to May 2 there had been 13 De H–4s shipped for our forces abroad. It was in May, 1918, that what may properly be called quantity production of De H–4s began. By the end of that month 193 De H–4s and by the end of June 529 De H–4s had been delivered by the Dayton-Wright Airplane Co. Of these 529 it appears 381 had gone to ports of embarkation, 116 to the Navy, and 32 to various destinations in this country, including training fields.

On June 25 advices were received that there were serious defects in the planes which had been received abroad. At the meeting of the Aircraft Board on July 31 Col. Arnold stated that all planes shipped to Europe by the Army which were found on arrival to have weaknesses were rebuilt at the aircraft production centers. At the same meeting Mr. Potter stated that the De Haviland planes for the Navy which had been shipped from the factory but were not yet floated should be sent back to the Dayton-Wright Co. to be rebuilt.

From June 30 to October 11, 1918, the Dayton-Wright Airplane Co. delivered 1,320 De H–4s, making 1,489 in all to the latter date.

In the contract with the Fisher Body Corporation (Nov. 6, 1917) provision was originally made for 3,000 De H–9s, the deliveries to be completed before July 1, 1918. For these there were subsequently substituted 4,000 De H–4s, of which 2,000 were to be delivered by September 1, 1918—afterwards extended to November 1, 1918—and 2,000 more at dates to be fixed. Up to June 30, 1918, no deliveries of De H–4s had been made by the Fisher Body Corporation. This company got into quantity production in August, and had delivered 452 up to October 11, 1918.

For the order of 500 De H–9s placed with the Standard Aircraft Corporation (Jan. 26, 1918), there were eventually substituted 500 De H–4s by the contract of March 28, 1918. No deliveries had been made up to June 30, 1918, and only 49 had been delivered up to October 11, 1918.

The total deliveries of De H–4s to October 11, 1918, amounted to 2,350. Of these, 1,617 had been floated, 388 were at ports or in transit, 177 had been shipped to camps and training fields, and 168 are described as being for "manufacturers and miscellaneous."

BRISTOL FIGHTERS.

The contract with the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation called for 2,000 Bristols to be delivered by August 31, 1918.

There was no definite release for production until February, and then only to the extent of 25 machines. Four hundred were released for production in the latter part of March and 400 more on April 24. As already stated, only 27 were delivered in all, and the order was canceled in July.

The total deliveries of Liberty motors (US–12s) to October 11, 1918, amounted to 9,689, of which 6,895 were for the Army and 2,794 for the Navy. Of those for the Army, 3,555 had been floated, 456 were at ports or in transit; and there had been delivered 990 to allied Governments, 260 to flying fields, 1,429 to manufacturers, etc., the remainder, or 205, being turned over to the Navy.

Contracts have recently been made for the production of the Liberty 8 (US–8), but no deliveries had been made to October 11, 1918.

MISLEADING PUBLIC STATEMENTS.

In the face of the delays in production a series of misleading public statements were made with official authority. While these statements were authorized by the Secretary of War, he states that they were issued in reliance upon information furnished by the Chief Signal Officer, Gen. Squier, and by Col. Deeds, who were acquainted with the actual conditions. It is unnecessary to review the delusive predictions and exaggerations contained in these utterances.

But particular attention should be directed to the official statement released for publication in the papers of February 21, 1918, which contained the following:

"The first American-built battle planes are to-day en route to the front in France. This first shipment, though in itself not large, marks the final overcoming of many difficulties met in building up this new and intricate industry."

This statement had its origin in a conversation between Col. Deeds and a representative of the Committee on Public Information a week or two before the completed statement was issued. A draft was first prepared and submitted to Col. Deeds, who examined it and made some corrections. The statement contained in the paragraph above quoted was not only left unchanged, but was the subject of special inquiry. Col. Deeds was asked what was meant by the "first shipment," and he replied, "They are on the water now, on the way to France." He was then asked, "How many?" and he answered, "I do not know, but I do not think more than 10." His statement in its final form was then presented to the Secretary of War, who permitted it to be issued upon the understanding that it had been verified by Gen. Squier and Col. Deeds.

[At the time this statement was issued (February 20) only one plane had been delivered for shipment to the American Expeditionary Forces, and while this had been shipped from the factory on February 5, it did not leave the United States until March 22. The only other service planes which had been delivered were five DeH–4s, which had been shipped for use at Gerstner Field, La. No additional shipments of airplanes for the use of our forces abroad were made until April 3. Actual production in quantity did not really begin until May.]

Col. Deeds admits that this statement was brought to him before its publication, and that he went through it. He examined it minutely enough to correct with his own hand one of the paragraphs following that above quoted, which gave the number of men required on the ground for every plane in the air, his correction making it 46 instead of 45. Col. Deeds denies, however, that he said in response to the inquiry upon the point that the battle planes were "on the water now, on the way to France." That he did make this statement is testified to directly and unequivocally by John W. McConaughy and Marlen E. Pew, representing the Committee on Public Information.

When Col. Deeds was examined as a witness before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, on April 2, 1918, he was asked this question and gave this answer:

"Senator WADSWORTH. Did you see, or do you know whether any other responsible officers in your aviation section of the Signal Corps saw the statement given out by Secretary Baker on February 21 before it was published?

"Col. DEEDS. No, sir; I did not see it. I do not know of anybody seeing it."

Col. Deeds admits giving this testimony. He testified that he did not then recall the paper in question.

Col. Deeds further testifies, in explanation, that when the paper was before him his information was that "four planes were on the cars en route to France," and that it later developed that only one was sent and the others were diverted to Lake Charles—that is, to Gerstner Field—for tests on radiators. The shipments to Gerstner Field, however, had been made directly from the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. on February 15, 16, and 17, and these planes had not been shipped from the factory for the American Expeditionary Forces. There is evidence, also (ante, p. 113), that on February 14 Mr. Talbott had telegraphed to Col. Deeds that Maj. Shepler advised that first 100 De Havilands should remain in this country and asking on this assumption for the recall of the one plane "shipped for foreign shipment," so that another could be substituted "completely equipped."

There is no question but that this grossly misleading statement was published on the authority of Col. Deeds and that the Secretary of War relied upon the fact that it had Col. Deeds's approval in giving it his official sanction. While this conduct of Col. Deeds does not come within the scope of the Criminal Code, it deserves the prompt attention of the military authorities.

Gen. Squier testifies that he had nothing to do with the statement that was issued for publication on February 21 and that he did not know of it before it was published. He testifies that when it was brought to his attention, he did not regard it as a proper statement to have been sent out, but that he did not institute an inquiry to ascertain who was responsible for it. It is evident that the matter called for immediate investigation and for suitable disciplinary measures, but no steps were taken either for correction or punishment.

The Secretary of War states that the responsibility for the statement clearly rested with Gen. Squier and Col. Deeds, and that he did not learn of the inaccuracies of the statement until his return from Europe in the latter part of April.

There were earlier statements of a delusive character as to the progress of aircraft production, but the particular statement to which attention has been called was inaccurate in its specific statement of facts, and its misleading character was obvious to anyone having knowledge of the actual conditions.

Seventh. Causes of delay in production.

FIRST. LACK OF KNOWLEDGE AND EXPERIENCE.

This was a fundamental difficulty affecting production in all its stages. The industry was new, and there was a lack of engineers and skilled workmen. Novel problems were encountered at every step and lack of knowledge bred indecision and confusion. Experience in other manufacturing enterprises gave no assurance of facility in this untried field. In addition, it was necessary to develop new sources of supply of needed materials, and the difficulties of the main contractors had their counterparts in the plants of subcontractors by which various sorts of material or fabricated parts were supplied.

SECOND. DEFECTIVE ORGANIZATION IN THE SIGNAL CORPS.

The duty of providing an adequate organization for aircraft production was left to the Signal Corps. It is quite clear that this undertaking was beyond the competency of the Chief Signal Officer, who had neither training nor experience for such a large industrial enterprise, and those who were brought to the task in his department failed to produce an organization which was adapted to meet the exigency.

The contracts were for production, and presupposed that the manufacturers should have an established design. The contractors agreed to produce the described machines in accordance with drawings and specifications to be furnished by the Government. In order to secure production of types of planes unknown to our manufacturers, it was necessary that the Government should create an engineering department which should settle the design and furnish adequate and accurate drawings and specifications. But this essential condition of achievement was not met.

Undoubtedly, the lack of airplane engineers was a serious obstacle. Still, there were a few in the country who had devoted themselves sedulously for a considerable time to the study of aviation problems, and it does not appear that there was a suitable effort to draw to the Government's service such talent as was available. Whether or not much assistance could have been obtained in this way is a question which can not be answered in the absence of an appropriate test. It was, however, entirely obvious that the exigency called for the most efficient organization, and that to add to inexperience the lack of a suitable organization and the confusion of a divided responsibility would inevitably lead to serious delays and threaten the entire program.

There was an engine design section established about July 1, 1917, in charge of Mr. Vincent, who had been engineer of the Packard Motor Car Co., but had no experience in the designing of airplanes; and this department did not have anything to do with the designing of airplanes as distinguished from airplane engines.

Capt. (afterwards Lieut. Col.) Virginius E. Clark, who had had perhaps as much aeronautical experience as anyone in the Army, had been in charge of airplane designing, but he was absent in Europe with the Aeronautical Commission from June until about September 1, 1917. On his return he resumed the work of airplane designing, and the Airplane Experimental Department was organized about October 1, 1917, in charge of Lieut. Col. Clark, who was put in command at McCook Field, Dayton. This organization continued until February 6, 1918. Lieut. Col. Vincent testifies that he had been arguing for an "engineering department" with the idea that it would take entire charge of engineering as it pertained to engines and planes" and "definitely straighten out" what he thought to be "an unsettled condition." By this he meant that "an attempt was being made to put planes into production in this country without having complete drawings or a complete understanding as to just what equipment such planes were to carry." But for the purpose of settling designs of airplanes and furnishing drawings to the manufacturers the Airplane Experimental Department proved to be hopelessly inadequate, and the result was that it was largely left to the manufacturers themselves to work out the designs of service planes, an undertaking for which they were ill equipped.

When the Airplane Experimental Department failed to give satisfaction, instead of strengthening it and making it adequate to the engineering work which had to be done, an additional department was created (about Jan. 1, 1918) which was called the Production Engineering Department. This department was also located at Dayton, because the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. was at that place, and there the department remained until the middle of April. It was said to be its function to supply manufacturers with engineering information, drawings, specifications, etc., from which they could produce in quantity what they were to manufacture; to specify materials, to decide upon details of design, etc. It was not, however, established merely as an aid to the manufacturer in producing according to a settled design—that is, to enable the manufacturer to cope with the difficulties which were sure to arise in the course of production, but this department was largely placed in control of the airplane design itself, which the Airplane Experimental Department had failed to establish satisfactorily. The new department was never informed or equipped so that it could perform its function adequately. It was under the general supervision of the head of the production department of the equipment division, who was inexperienced in airplane engineering or in airplane production, and this creation of another inadequate department failed to solve the difficulty.

On February 6, 1918, the Airplane Engineering Department was established in charge of Lieut. Col. Vincent, who was put in command at McCook Field. Lieut. Col. Vincent at once began to direct the efforts of the new department toward getting some well-known machines ready for production, rather than doing the purely experimental or research work, and he obtained permission from Mr. Potter to take the De Haviland 9 from the Dayton Wright Co. at South Field "and put it through McCook Field." But this new department did not have a definite function with respect to the types of service planes already under contract—that is, the De Haviland 4 and the Bristol—and these were left apparently as before, subject to the inadequate direction of the Production Engineering Department.

The consequences are easy to trace. When the model DeH–4 was received in this country it was accompanied by the English drawings. It was necessary to redesign the plane to accommodate it to the Liberty motor. The model was sent to the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., and this company which, under its contract, was to produce in accordance with drawings and specifications furnished by the Government, appears to have undertaken the work of redesigning and making the new drawings. These were made and the DeH–4 as redesigned was flown on October 29, 1917. When, later, changes were required, the company expected drawings to be furnished by the Signal Corps; the Production Engineering Department apparently expected the drawing to be provided by the company. Rapid and successful production, which demanded clearly defined responsibility, could not be expected under such conditions. About February 21, 1918, the Production Engineering Department having been unable to secure production, the work on the DeH–4 was virtually taken out of its hands and placed in charge of Lieut. Col. E. J. Hall for the purpose of a swift effort to get results. Lieut. Col. Hall proceeded to get necessary information as to equipment, developed a little organization of his own, at once built three model planes (one for the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., one for the Fisher Body Corporation, and one for the Standard Aircraft Corporation) and sought to remove as rapidly as possible the various hindrances to production. In this way production in quantity was finally attained. But this was not the perfecting of the organization, but, in substance, was a desperate effort outside the regular instrumentalities of the Equipment Division, because those instrumentalities could not be relied upon.

With respect to the development of the Bristol, similar conditions existed. When Lieut. Col. Hall had made sufficient progress at the plant of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. to warrant it, he turned his attention to the production of the Bristol, at the plant of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation. As he testifies, "They were worse than at a standstill." "It would have been easier," he says, "for me to have taken and designed the whole machine around the equipment if they had not had the material started" He found that "practically all they did was to get in a row, so that the condition when I went in there was that everybody was damning everybody else." This was about April 11, 1918.

It appears that Capt. Clark in the fall of 1917 began the work of redesigning in order to adapt the Bristol to the Liberty motor, and about the last of October the model Bristol, with a large number of drawings, was sent to the Curtiss Co. Mr. Mueller, who was the chief engineer of the Curtiss Co., states that they were unable to make the plane from the drawings, that "the dimensions would not check up," and that "it was impossible to get the machine together from the parts made from the details of the Signal Corps drawings." In January, 1918, the Production Engineering Department took over the work on the Bristol, but differences with the contractors speedily arose, and at the end of January, for the purpose of reconciling these differences, a conference was held between the representatives of the Signal Corps and of the company, respectively, and it was determined that engineering decisions should thereafter be left to the engineer of the Curtiss Co. This authority apparently was exercised for two or three weeks, but opposition developed and there was no real progress. Lieut. Col. Hall took the matter up in April and an effort was made to drive through to production. It is apparent, however, that this plane never got beyond an experimental stage, and yet 400 were released for production in March and 400 more in April. This was evidently in response to criticism of delays. But the plane as designed for the Liberty motor was doomed to failure. Had there been an adequate engineering department to settle the matter of design and make the necessary engineering tests and decisions before production was entered upon, much time and money expended in fruitless effort would have been saved.

Throughout this period the equipment division of the Signal Corps presented an organization with a host of sections and departments, with ill-defined functions, creating disorder and confusion rather than sustained, well-directed, and expert effort. There was a vast amount of lost motion. Manufacturers were brought into contact with various divisions with overlapping powers; earnest and able scientific men, who were brought into particular sections, found themselves lacking in authority or in conflict with other sections; and uncertainty, indecision, and vacillation enfeebled the entire undertaking. Military organization was another obstacle to the rapid prosecution of what was essentially an industrial enterprise. Whatever might be accomplished by such an organization in a thoroughly understood activity, it was certainly unsuited to an entirely new industrial endeavor of this sort. A mobile force in which men could readily be moved about, tested, elevated, and disposed without regard to military rank or precedent was absolutely required. The inherent difficulties of the situation were thus greatly increased by defective organization. No doubt, also, the swift creation of a large force of inspectors, without the qualification of experience in their line of work, not only opened the door to abuses but to an extent retarded production.

The situation, as it appeared to Archer A. Landon (Mr. Coffin's assistant) more than six months after we had entered the war, is strikingly shown in his letter to Mr. Coffin, dated October 16, 1917, in the course of which Mr. Landon said:

"* * * The lack of organization and continuity of responsibility is so apparent that success will be a miracle. * * * If we are to be successful, there must be fixed, from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy down almost to the office boy, a direct line of responsibility that will make every individual assume the absolute responsibility for the work he is undertaking and under no circumstances should any conflict of authority or responsibility occur. Industrial men of known responsibility and capacity for the particular work undertaken must be selected. They should be peculiarly fitted for the positions they occupy and should be responsible for their work as in civil life. * * *

"We men who have come here in an effort to assist you find ourselves very seriously embarrassed, and justly so. We are started off to do what seems to be an important piece of work, only to find that this work has been delegated to somebody else in some other department and that we are treading on other people's toes. The result is that we do not get the information we want and we do not get anywhere. They do not throw us out, but they are all adept at pulling the latest Washington game of 'passing the buck,' or else frankly resenting our appearance in the matter.

"Take the spruce situation as an example of dilly-dallying through a lack of organization. The first I knew of the spruce situation was around the latter part of July or the 1st of August. At that time it was one of your great worries. The entire aircraft program was and is now endangered by the lack of ability to get spruce; and yet from that time until now, notwithstanding repeated conferences, there was nothing done on the spruce situation, either toward closing contracts or increasing production, until October 13, when Col. Disque was sent West on the situation; a loss of time of practically three months. If this had been your own business the men would have been on their way west the day after the matter was first brought up. The only reason that there was no action in July was because we do not possess an organization of direct responsibility, and on that account these inefficiencies are possible, and they will continue to occur until such time as somebody wakes up and thoroughly organizes the work."

"This is not intended as a criticism of Gen. Squier or the other officers, but it is intended to be a very vigorous criticism of methods of organization that make such a condition possible; and I submit to you, sir, that if this same condition exists in all departments and continues to exist, we might as well submit to the Germans now, because the one way you can beat efficiency is to match it with efficiency, and efficiency can only be obtained by a thorough organizing of our responsibilities and following them through to a definite conclusion, which conclusion should be the winning of the war."

Mr. Landon, leaving the aircraft work in October, 1917, returned to it in June, 1918, then becoming chief of the production of aircraft in the Bureau of Aircraft Production. Up to that time the policy he had recommended had not been carried out. He testifies that he "could see practically no change in the organization in six months"; that is, prior to the new organization through the Bureau of Aircraft Production, which had just been instituted.

It should be understood, of course, that the complaint so emphatically voiced was not directed at the Aircraft Board, as this, as Mr. Landon stated in his letter, was "merely an executive advisory board." The responsibility lay with the officers intrusted with the duty of effecting an adequate organization for aircraft production.

THIRD. LACK OF INFORMATION AS TO THE EQUIPMENT REQUIRED FOR SERVICE PLANES.

The model De Haviland 4 was not received until about the beginning of August, 1917, and, as already stated, it was necessary to redesign it and make new drawings. But whatever delay was due to a failure to obtain a model earlier, or to the necessity of redesigning the plane, was greatly increased by the lack of needed information as to the equipment which was to be put on it. From the time the model machine, as redesigned, was completed and flown on October 29, 1917, several months elapsed before its equipment was finally determined upon. The engineer of the Dayton Wright Co. testifies that "the information which we were anxious to receive and which was necessary for production was not forthcoming until the middle of April."

There appear to have been several reasons for this. There was always the difficulty created by lack of experience in equipping airplanes for service in war, and there was considerable trouble in obtaining some portions of the equipment. But, in addition, it appears that there was a lack of exact and detailed information as to just what was required. The drawings and the specifications which accompanied the sample plane sent here were supposed to designate definitely the apparatus to be put upon the planes and its location. The testimony is that these drawings and specifications "did not check up with the actual plane," and there was resulting uncertainty as to what should be done. Communications with the other side were had frequently with regard to instruments, accessories, and various parts of equipment, but, despite this, the uncertainty seems to have continued for a long period, and there was apparently an inability to frame a definite bill of material which could be given to the manufacturer. The showing indicates either an extraordinary lack of decision on the part of those whose duty it was to decide, or an even more remarkable absence of administrative efficiency in seeking and obtaining necessary information.

About February 10, 1918, definite instructions were received from the other side as to the armament and instruments of the DeH–4, but these instructions involved serious changes in the plane. And, subsequently, there were further chances in equipment, as stated below, causing still further delay.

FOURTH. CHANGES IN DESIGN AND EQUIPMENT OF SERVICE PLANES.

The following statement, set forth in the testimony of Mr. Schoonmaker, the engineer of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., which is substantially uncontroverted by the representatives of the Signal Corps, is an illuminating description of the delays in production incident to changes in design made necessary by changes in equipment so far as the DeHavilland 4 is concerned, and also indicates the waste thereby occasioned. It will be observed that changes were made necessary not only by new requirements as to equipment, but by inaccuracies in drawings and various defects. Mr. Schoomaker testifies:

"The first sample DeHavilland machine was received on August 14, 1917. This was accompanied by an incomplete set of drawings, but with the machine as a sample and with what drawings we had at hand, we were able to complete the necessary lay-out from which to build one sample machine, which was flown on October 29, 1917. This plane was satisfactory in every detail as a machine and practically no changes have been made in the construction except where they were affected by the equipment which the machine was to carry.

"We were advised at that time, in answer to our request for information on guns, that the machine was to be equipped with the Vickers gun, and that the gun mounts would necessarily be the same as the English gun mounts. This information was requested by the Dayton Wright Co. during August, when the preliminary lay-outs of the machine were being made. At a late date we were advised that the Marlin gun would supplant the Vickers and that the Signal Corps would take care of the necessary design of gun mount, etc. The front gun-mount design was received on January 8; after a conference with Signal Corps men it was decided that this mount would not be satisfactory and, therefore, was discarded. The Dayton Wright Co. produced a design of gun mount and cartridge box which was built and installed and accepted by the Signal Corps after a firing test on January 26.

"Owing to the fact that the Marlin gun was not similar to the Vickers, a complete rearrangement of the cowling over what had already been designed was necessary. The first drawing of the Marlin gun which we received was delivered to us on February 12, but no bill of material on the complete gun equipment accompanied same. On February 26 we were requested to mount two stationary guns on the forward cowling. This necessitated a redesign of the gun mount already ordered into production, and this work was carried on by the Signal Corps. This also affected all cartridge boxes of which drawings had been made and which were released to production. A redesign of the cartridge boxes for the double gun mount was furnished by the Signal Corps on March 5. This design was not satisfactory, as the drawings were incorrect, and the pieces manufactured from them did not assemble in the machine. A new redesign was furnished by the Signal Corps on March 15; parts were made from these drawings and were released to production. On April 1 the Dayton Wright Co. was ordered by the Signal Corps to again redesign the cartridge boxes, changing certain dimensions; since that date few minor changes have been necessary, but nothing which directly interfered with the production of these parts.

"Changing the gun equipment as mentioned above necessarily changed the shell chute lay-out. The first drawing which we received from the Signal Corps for the left-hand gun chute came to us on March 5. Parts made from these drawings were not satisfactory, as they did not assemble in the machine. The Signal Corps corrected these drawings, and sample parts were made, and the Dayton Wright Co.'s drawings were released for production several days later. The Signal Corps found, however, that these samples were not satisfactory, and they were rejected, as there had been an error in the drawings. The Dayton Wright Co. redesigned the chute for the left-hand gun on March 29. Samples were made from these drawings which were satisfactory to the Signal Corps, and released to production on April 7.

"The first right-hand shell chute was laid out by the Signal Corps on March 6. Samples manufactured from these drawings were not satisfactory and did not assemble properly in the machine. The Signal Corps proceeded on the correction of these drawings, and they were released for the production of sample. These drawings were very difficult to work to, and samples manufactured from them were not satisfactory and were rejected.

"The Dayton-Wright Co. produced a new design of this shell chute on March 29, which before samples could be made and tried out it was seen that a new design would be necessary, due to the change of location of the electric generator for the electrically heated clothing. A new design was started by the Dayton-Wright Co. on March 30.

"A design along entirely different lines had been started in the meantime by some Signal Corps men at South Field on March 29, and this type was approved on March 31 by the Signal Corps and drawings were made and released to production. This design was tested out on the evening of April 2 and proved unsatisfactory. Another new design was started by the Signal Corps on April 3, which, after a few modifications, was released to production on April 11.

"The same procedure of redesign and development as was required for the shell chutes applies also to the cartridge box and shell-chute covers.

"Our first request for information on the synchronizing device was in November, 1917, but up to February 14 no bill of material or complete set of drawings had been delivered. We received on January 23 a few parts which were intended for production; however, the assembly was incomplete and the parts made would not fit the engine. We received drawings of the hand pump on February 5. During January a sample hand pump was delivered to South Field; no drawing or instructions accompanied this to show mounting and this office was never advised as to its use. When assembled on the machine in January it was found that an interference was encountered with the gasoline shut-off cocks and strainer, necessitating a redesign of these parts and the transferring of them to the other side of the fuselage. This in turn caused an interference of the spark and throttle controls, necessitating scrappage of parts then on hand and redesign of this layout.

"The first synchronizing outfit which we received caused a considerable amount of trouble and upon examination of the trigger motors it was found that practically no two of them were alike and it was almost impossible to get a pair of guns on a machine which would function correctly. The first synchronizers were delivered directly to us instead of the engine builder and they were not made so as to be directly interchangeable with the motor crank shaft, the result being that a considerable amount of hand work had to be done in the fitting up of these synchronizers.

"On April 2 it was found that the synchronizer generator did not have a satisfactory lubrication system and it was necessary to connect it to the motor oiling system. This necessitated the dissembling of the synchronizer head and welding on a special boss for the attachment of this oil line. This has been done on all of the synchronizers to date.

"Information, drawings, and bill of material for the gun sights were requested on October 19, 1917. A list of different types of sights were received on January 4, but no bill of material or drawings. Drawings for wind-vane sights were received February 6. No drawings were ever furnished on any of the sight mounts; however, the sight locations were approved February 13.

"This will recall that it was advised that the old English De Haviland be used for the mounting of guns and sights so that all of the difficulties which were likely to be encountered could be worked out on this job. Our engine cowling was held within the limit of the cowling used on the English job so that no interference would occur. On November 20 it was called to the attention of the Signal Corps that no use had been made of this machine to date, and early in the spring was shipped to Wilbur Wright Field.

"On April 6 the location of the Aldis sight was removed and changed to the left-hand side of the right gun, this necessitating a change of all the parts which had been made up for the old sight and which were already released to production.

"Our first instructions regarding the bomb-dropping gear were to equip the De Haviland machine with two rails similar to the English machine. Information had continually been requested on bombing apparatus, but no drawings could be furnisbed. On January 18 we received our first information from the Ordnance Department on bomb gear. This was merely an unlocking device and we gave space in our drafting room for several Ordnance Department men to complete their drawings for application to the machine, they being turned over to me on February 1. On going over these drawings it was found that they were not complete, and about a week later more drawings were received which assisted in production of the first model gear. The delivery of this apparatus had been sadly deficient, it being necessary to ship a large number of planes without it, as some of this is built in the floor of the fuselage and must be put in during the various assembly operations. A further change on the operating mechanism of the bombing gear is coming through, which will be incorporated possibly on the five-hundredth machine.

Information was requested during October, 1917, on the camera and camera mounts. We were advised at that time that the camera mount which the English De Haviland was equipped with would also be used on the American-made machine. On January 19 we received from the Signal Corps a camera which would not fit the English mount. As the English mount was already built into a number of our fuselages, it was impossible for us to change this part on our early shipments. A new design of mount was made by the Signal Corps and installed in the sample machine in our shop. On February 25 this was rejected by the Signal Corps and a new design started and drawings furnished on same May 27.

"The focusing lens retainers were designed at the direction of the Signal Corps for a 4-inch by 5-inch lens. The location of these was shifted several times, and the size of the lens was changed by the Signal Corps to 5-inch by 6-inch and the drawings for retainers were furnished on April 2.

"Up to February 14 we had no information on oxygen apparatus, except that it was to be part of the equipment. As late as April 6 we had no samples of the apparatus or drawings showing installation of same. Final approval of the oxygen installation was received June 10.

"Drawings for the radio equipment and first information regarding same came to us February 1. These were recalled for changes and new set issued, which were illegible. These were returned, and on February 8 a new set of drawings were received for the bonding together of all metal parts on the machine; these drawings could not be followed on a production basis. The Dayton-Wright Co. then prepared a sample machine, and drawings were made from this and accepted by the Signal Corps March 25. Radio instruments were received February 20, and installation according to Signal Corps drawings was stopped February 25 and new installation directed. The Dayton-Wright Co. prepared drawings for this installation and wiring according to the sample which was prepared.

"On March 28 the generator mount on the side of the fuselage was abandoned. A new installation was furnished by the Signal Corps, but it was found that it interfered with the landing gear strut. On April 10 the new design from the Signal Corps showing the correct location of the generator was received.

"Considerable trouble was encountered with the installation of the Holt flare lamps, as there was a misunderstanding between the Dayton-Wright Co. and Signal Corps as to who was to furnish them. The first Holt flare lights were received on February 25.

"The first navigation light samples were received on March 20, and wiring instructions for same were delivered a few days later.

"The electric generator for lighting and heating was received on March 15. The Signal Corps drawings showed the location on the side of the fuselage. This was unsatisfactory, as the generator propeller interfered with the rear flying wires of the wing structure. The Signal Corps prepared new drawings for the relocating of this generator, but these were unsatisfactory, owing to the interference with the landing gear strut. On April 9 a new set of drawings were received showing the correct location of this generator.

"Radiator and water lines were approved by the airplane engineering department, Signal Corps, on November 21 after flying test. At this time, of course, there was practically no information at hand regarding the equipment of the De Haviland plane, which necessarily added considerable weight, so that the radiators which we had ordered for production were considered unsatisfactory by the production engineering division. The radiators furnished by the Signal Corps were 1 inch deeper in the core, which necessitated redesign of the shutter assembly. At a late date it was decided to make a further change on radiator design, making it 4 inches longer. This affected the under cowling of the motor, the forward cowling, water lines, and numerous other details, entailing a large amount of scrappage and reoperation of parts.

"The Signal Corps advised that they would furnish us short radiators for our first 150 ships and long radiators for the next 100, after which we were to supply our own. A shortage of 50 radiators was encountered in the first agreement, which necessitated us going to the long radiator job 50 machines earlier, which caused a serious delay and complication in the shop.

"Drawings were received from the Airplane Engineering Division, Signal Corps, November 21 on gas and air lines. From these drawings all parts were ordered into production. All gas and air-line connections were changed by the Signal Corps and final information received on this change April 5. This necessitated scrappage of all parts on hand, and a delay was occasioned in securing necessary new material."

The delays at the plant of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. due to these changes in design also caused delay in the other plants, which were to produce De Haviland 4s, for both the Fisher Body Corporation and the Standard Aircraft Corporation were awaiting a definite design and a determination of equipment and proper drawings before proceeding to production. The Dayton Wright Airplane Co. was in advance simply because it had the advantage of the possession of the model, and it was working out the necessary drawings.

It will be observed that these changes were required in the course of production. That is, instead of proceeding with production on the basis of a given equipment, where changes in equipment would cause serious delay, and introducing different equipment in the planes subsequently produced, virtually the entire production was held up to accommodate the new demands. As Lieut. Col. Horner testifies, "We would go on changing this way and that way and let that change go through production, when it could be done without interfering with production, and if we had done it we would have had a thousand more planes on the French front to-day than we now have without any question."

It is unnecessary to review the changes in the ill-fated Bristol. They were numerous and related to the structure of the plane itself. Production was, of course, impossible while these changes were in progress. The real effect of the changes, however, in view of the result, was not to retard the production of a useful plane, but to cause an unnecessary expenditure.

FIFTH. CONDITIONS IN MANUFACTURING PLANTS.

The conditions in certain plants engaged in the manufacture of airplanes were unfavorable to production, not only because of lack of experience and the absence of mechanics trained in that class of work, but because of defective organization and want of efficiency. The Dayton Wright Airplane Co. had the difficulties inherent in a new organization, but in view of the changes that were required in the course of production it would be impossible to define to what extent, if any, production was retarded by reason of the fact that the organization was a new one. The lack of competent organization at the North Elmwood plant (Buffalo) of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation is commented upon later (post, pp. 150, 156), but in view of the cancellation of the Bristol order it need not be considered here. Whatever delay there was was in the course of an attempt to make an impossible plane. At the plant of the Standard Aircraft Corporation conditions were also far from satisfactory, but for the same reason, so far as service planes are concerned, its capacity for production was not put to a proper test. It should be added that at this plant the first Handley-Page was assembled and successfully flown within 90 days after the company had been given full charge of the matter.

There have not been lacking indications of sinister influences at various plants. The opportunities of workmen at aircraft plants to retard production or to injure material and product are quite obvious, and the necessity of keeping the plants free of enemy influences is emphasized in another part of this report. But so far as the delays in production of service planes are concerned, it is impossible in view of interrupted work and changing plans to attribute the delays in any definite measure to such a cause.

SIXTH. CHANGES IN THE LIBERTY ENGINE.

In any proper estimate of what should have been accomplished in carrying out the aircraft program it is necessary that regard should be had to the development of the Liberty motor. The airplane must have its motor, and it was inevitable that in the development of a new high-power airplane engine, with the object of securing higher power with a lower weight per unit of power, that changes would be found necessary. Needed improvements were constantly suggested by experimentation, and the number of changes looms very large in the testimony of the experienced engineers who were endeavoring to get into quantity production. It is unnecessary to attempt a review of these numerous changes, for whether time could have been saved by greater expertness is a matter of opinion, and in view of the time that has frequently been spent in the development of new types of motors, there is slight ground for criticism by reason of loss of time in perfecting the Liberty motor. The difficulties were inherent in the task and the task itself was worth while. As has been said, there was no reason why the development of the Liberty motor should have stood in the way of the production of other motors, such as the Hispano-Suiza for use in single-seater pursuit planes to which the Liberty engine was not adopted. But, so far as the heavier observation and bombing planes are concerned, the weight of opinion is that it would have taken about as long to put any other high-power motor into successful quantity production in this country, according to our methods of manufacture, as it has taken to develop the Liberty motor. The attempt to secure planes and motors through foreign production for service pending this development has already been reviewed. By pursuing different methods it is possible, as testified by Lieut. Col. Hall, that there might have been a small preliminary production of Liberty motors two or three months earlier, but, making due allowances for the inevitable course of experimentation, the Liberty motor could not have been put into large production much earlier than it was. What has been called the "immaturity" of the Liberty motor placed a time limitation upon the program for the planes that were made to take this motor, but it may be observed that by May 4, 1918, 778 Liberty motors (U. S. 12s) had been made, of which 390 were taken by the Army, and only 36 De H–4s had at that time been delivered, and no other Army planes to take this motor were available. It can hardly be said that unnecessary delays in service-plane production, caused by bad organization and lack of a settled design, were excused by unforeseen difficulties in the development of the Liberty engine; and it should also be observed that if, in the light of general experience in motor building, delay in the development of the Liberty engine was to be feared, there was the greater reason for making sure, to the full extent of ability, of the immediate production of single-seater pursuit planes for which other engines could be provided.

Eighth. Contractors' profits.

Under the various fixed-price contracts it is probable that large profits have been gained, but definite information as to their extent would not be available without a survey in detail of manufacturing conditions and costs in a considerable number of plants—an undertaking which would have been wholly impracticable in this inquiry. The profits allowed by the cost-plus contracts present a distinct question.

The justification for cost-plus contracts was found in the fact that the undertakings were novel and that the manufacturers did not have accurate data upon which to make a satisfactory estimate of the cost of production. This was conspicuously true in the case of airplanes of types with which manufacturers in this country had been unacquainted previously. For production in large quantity either new plants or greatly enlarged facilities at existing plants, as well as special tools, would be required to meet an exigency of uncertain duration, and it would also be necessary to procure the requisite labor and materials for the new undertakings in a rising market and to provide working capital for long periods; and, while motors had been manufactured here upon a large scale, the newly-designed engines for the service airplanes required such a reduced weight per horsepower and such delicacy of construction that it was felt that the enterprise had many elements of uncertainty. In these circumstances it was not an unreasonable conclusion that if contracts for the new types of airplanes and for the new engine were offered solely on a fixed-price basis, either manufacturers would not undertake the work or would insist upon high prices as a safeguard against the chances of ultimate loss. It was deemed inexpedient for the Government to undertake the manufacture directly, and it was decided to adopt the alternative of an assumption by the Government of the cost of manufacture through contracts upon a cost-plus basis. This practice, however, could not properly outlast the reasons which may have justified it at the outset. Contracts of this sort lead to waste, foster abuses, and impose an almost intolerable burden of cost accounting, in itself a hinderance to rapid production. Early in this inquiry it was abundantly shown that it was highly important to establish reasonable fixed prices whenever experience afforded a fair basis for estimates.

The principal features of the cost-plus contracts for airplanes and engines may be said to be these:

(1) The payment by the Government of the contractor's outlays for labor and materials and for the overhead charges incident to the work;

(2) The payment by the Government for special tools and certain "increased facilities" located in the contractor's plant, but owned by the Government;

(3) Reimbursement by the Government for depreciation;

(4) A fixed profit to the contractor; and

(5) The fixing of an estimated cost, or "bogey," and a division of whatever saving was effected under this estimate so as to give 25 per cent of this saving to the contractor as additional profit.

It will be observed that by this method the contractor is assured not only the payment of the cost of labor and material used in the process of manufacture, but of administrative outlays for management and supervision, and an allowance for depreciation of plant. To the extent that these payments are made promptly and at short intervals, the working capital required would be reduced. Provision has also been made for the supply of needed assistance by means of advances through the War Credits Board where these are deemed to be justified. The contractor is guaranteed a certain profit regardless of cost. This is called the "fixed profit." And finally, the fixing of a "bogie" cost was designed to counteract the temptation to wastefulness by giving the contractor a substantial share in the fruits of economy. And it may here be noted that the popular impression that under this form of contract the contractors receive the same amount of profit, however wasteful they may be, and have no incentive to avoid unnecessary outlays, is without foundation. The bogey costs were in all cases placed so high that the contractor had every reason to expect that the actual cost would be much less and that through its share in this saving the contractor would be able to derive an increased profit from economical management. It is apparent, however, that with a large fixed profit guaranteed the incentive to economy is not as strong as when the entire venture is at the contractor's risk. And particularly when interruption of work and changes in design vex production managers, and it is difficult to maintain economical methods, there may easily be bred an indifference to an excessive cost where its burden falls upon the Government. At least this is to be inferred from conditions in certain plants, and the conclusion is unescapable that the cost-plus system of contracts for the manufacture of commodities, as distinguished from such contracts for mere service, is a vicious system and is to be tolerated only during such period as it is found to be absolutely necessary to secure immediate production.

The fact, however, that a cost-plus system is deemed advisable for a time does not justify an exorbitant fixed profit. It has already been pointed out in the case of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. that the contract for De Haviland-4s originally called for a fixed profit of $875 per plane. This was arrived at on the basis of 12½ per cent of the bogey cost of $7,000. This, however, was not an actual cost and, as the event has shown, was very far above the actual cost. If it had been thought fair that there should be a profit of 12½ per cent per unit produced, it would have been a simple matter to have given this percentage of the actual cost, as the actual cost was to be ascertained in the course of the accounting, and provide for payments from time to time on account. There is no conceivable reason for giving a percentage of the bogey cost, if the object were merely to assure the contractor a profit equivalent to a given percentage of cost. The actual cost of the De Haviland-4s at the plant of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. despite all the difficulties of production and the enhanced cost of the first lot of machines produced during a period of many changes in designs is understood to be under $4,400. A fixed profit of 12½ per cent on the actual cost of each machine would have been about $550, instead of the $875 which was fixed by making the calculation on the bogey cost.

Again, in a contract for manufacturing articles at the contractor's plant, the agreed profit upon a cost-plus basis should have a proper relation to the contractor's actual investment and risk. The contractor is not only reimbursed for his outlays for labor and material but for expenses of management included in overhead charge—including such reasonable salaries of officers, managers, etc., as may properly be allocated to the Government work. There is no sacred formula by which the Government is bound to pay a profit per unit of production regardless of the time in which capital is turned over. The extent to which the Government supplies the needed working capital, either by payments on account of work and materials supplied or through advances, should also be considered. A percentage of outlays, or of a bogey cost, although small in itself, may give an exorbitant profit as applied to each unit of a large production.

SERVICE AIRPLANE CONTRACTS.

In the case of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. the paid-in capital was $1,000,000, invested in plant. Advances by the Government to the extent of $2,500,000 were authorized, and in December and January last advances of $1,000,000 were actually made. These were followed by additional advances, and the balance of total advances on June 30, 1918, was $1,405,222.57. Approximately $750,000 of the money thus borrowed from the Government at interest is represented by investment in fixed assets. The plant is exclusively devoted to Government work, and outlays for labor, materials, and overhead, as provided in the contract, are met by the Government.

The operations of this company relating to production may be said to have begun about August 1, 1917. The total fixed profit on the 400 Standard-J planes was $620 per plane, and the fixed profit on the 4,000 De Haviland 4s was $875 per plane, making a total of $3,748,000. With the saving as now estimated of approximately $2,600 under the original bogey cost of $7,000 the additional profit of 25 per cent of this saving would amount to $650 per plane, making the total profits on the De Haviland contract about $1,525 per plane. At the present rate of deliveries the contract for 4,000 De H-4s will be completed before March 1 next. The total profits on the 4,000 De H-4s would have amounted to upward of $6,100,000, and it is safe to say that, including the profit on the Standard-J planes, the company would have earned a profit of more than $6,350,000 under the original contract. This does not include whatever profits would have been made on its experimental contract or on the spares for D H-4s. It should also be added that under its contract it was provided, in substance, that at the completion or cancellation of its contract the Government should pay the difference between the cost of its plant, including real estate, building, machinery, and appliances built or otherwise acquired for the performance of the contract, less what was found to be the fair market value at the time when the contract was completed or canceled, and that in determining (through a board of appraisers) this fair market value, the need or requirement of such a plant in the neighborhood, and the probability of securing a tenant promptly, or having an established business available, should be considered as one of the important factors.

In the case of the Fisher Body Corporation, which had the other large order for De Haviland 4s (4,000), as well as an order for 400 Standard-Js, the profits would certainly not have been less. Instead of establishing a new plant, as did the Dayton Wright Co., the Fisher Body Corporation had already effected a highly efficient organization and had an established plant which required, however, a considerable expansion of plant facilities and special equipment. The net investment in fixed assets, including building, land, and machinery, which was made by the Fisher Body Corporation for the Government work, amounted, to May 31, 1918, to $860,849.05. The corporation was aided by an advance through the War Credits Board of $2,000,000, made last December. Waiting for the necessary drawings, it got into production later than the Dayton Wright Co. and up to October 11, 1918, had only delivered 452 planes. But it should complete its production of the entire 4,000 within the next six months.

As already stated, in accordance with letters obtained at the time the contracts were made with the Dayton Wright Airplane Co. and the Fisher Body Corporation, which promised an equitable readjustment if it was found that the bogey cost was too high, it appears that contracts are now being negotiated for the reduction of the bogey cost of the De H-4s to $5,000 and the fixed profit to $625 per plane. The total profit per plane with the percentage of saving (exclusive of profit on spare parts) under the new contract would amount to about $775 per plane, or $3,100,000 in all, which, with the profit on spare parts, would make the total profit on the De Havilands not less than $3,500,000.

LIBERTY ENGINE CONTRACTS.

The bogey cost, as first fixed in the contracts for Liberty engines, was $6,087. This was approved by Mr. R. H. White, of Cleveland, and Mr. Henry May, of Buffalo, to whom the propriety of the estimate had been submitted by the Secretary of War. The fixed profit as originally stipulated was 15 per cent of this bogey cost, or $913.05 per engine. Lieut. Col. Hall (who had had large experience in engine manufacture) testifies that he made an estimate about the time that contracts were being let, and told Col. Deeds that $2,400 would cover the cost of labor and materials for the Liberty engine, without overhead charges.

In December, 1917, the bogey or estimated cost was reduced to $5,000 and the fixed profit put at 12½ per cent of this sum, or $625 per engine, and the contracts with the Packard, Lincoln, and Nordyke & Marmon companies were modified accordingly. This was in consideration of further allowances for depreciation and provision for advances by the Government. In last May the contract with the Ford Motor Co. was modified by the same reduction of the bogie cost and fixed profit. The contracts with the General Motors Co. were put upon the same basis.

Even at this reduced bogie and percentage the profits allowed were very large.

By September 6, 1918—that is, within a year from the date of the contract—the Packard Co. had delivered (according to the Government's report) 3,100 Liberty 12s, and the agreed fixed profit on these amounted to $1,937,500. In the following month it produced 560, and its should complete its deliveries of the 6,000, first contracted for, not later than January, 1919, and on these 6,000 engines the agreed fixed profits would be $3,750,000. This profit it would earn within 17 months after it received the contract, and if it could have completed the deliveries as contemplated when the contract was made—that is, according to contract schedule—the profit would have been earned in 11 months. Only the fixed profit has been mentioned, as this was definitely guaranteed, but in addition to this the company was entitled to 25 per cent of its saving under the bogey of $5,000. The Government's estimate is that the actual cost of the first 600 Liberty engines produced at the Packard plant was $3,873 per engine, and that the average cost of the first 1,200 motors was thus $3,442 per engine. It would seem that the actual cost of the entire 6,000 is likely to be somewhat under $3,200 per engine. But on the basis of $3,200 there would be an additional profit, through the contractor's percentage of saving, of $450 an engine, which would make $2,700,000 additional profit, or, with the fixed profit of $3,750,000, a total profit of approximately $6,450,000 earned on the 6,000 engines, within a year and five months, despite delays in production. To this there should still be added a considerable amount for profits on spare parts on the 6,000 engines which may be estimated at upward of $1,500,000, and thus the aggregate profits on the Liberty engine (exclusive of the original development work) would reach about $8,000,000.

The Packard Co. estimated that on May 31, 1918, from the standpoint of plant values, the total investment exclusively for aircraft motor work was $11,808,404.47. This included, however, advances by the Government for working capital amounting to $2,145,568, and inventory and other items which would be represented in the cost of labor and material ultimately defrayed by the Government. The proportion of its plant, less depreciation, employed on aircraft work was estimated by the company at $5,500,000. It should also be noted that in the contract reducing the bogey cost and fixed profit it was provided that on the termination of the contract the Government should pay for depreciation upon the heat-treating building and equipment erected by the contractor for the purpose of carrying out the contract, the difference between their cost and "the value thereof to the contractor for use in its business," as determined by a board of appraisers, and that in determining this value the appraisers should be guided by the use the contractor "shall have for said building and equipment at the termination of said contract, in the ordinary operation of its business of manufacturing motor cars and trucks, and shall not include the value, if any, which the same may have to the contractor in the manufacture of further aviation motors." The Government was also to pay the full cost of facilities for testing and inspecting the engines, including the building and equipment erected by the contractor therefor, and should also reimburse the contractor for the machine tools purchased, especially for the construction of aviation engines, to be used by the contractor without rental, but to remain the property of the Government.

The contract with the Ford Motor Co. was for 5,000 Liberty engines. The company did not begin its deliveries until the 14th of June. It was estimated by its officers that deliveries would reach 1,500 in October, and that the entire contract would be completed by the 1st of December. It is behind its schedule, but between September 6 and October 4 it delivered, according to the Government's records, 768, and it may be expected that it will complete its contract for 5,000 by the end of January, 1919. Under the original contract it would then be entitled to fixed profits on the 5,000 engines of $3,125,000 and the additional percentage of the saving under the bogey cost of $5,000. With its well-known efficiency and in view of the fact that by beginning later it did not have as much difficulty as the Packard Co. had experienced, it may be assumed that the actual cost of the 5,000 engines at the plant of the Ford Co. will be less than $3,200 per engine and at the rate of $450 an engine (that is, 25 per cent of the difference between $3,200 and $5,000) its additional profits would amount to $2,250,000, or its aggregate profits on the 5,000 engines would be $5,375,000, earned by January, 1919. The plant investment required for this production certainly can not be regarded as any greater than that on the part of the Packard Co. The Ford Co. has not received advances from the Government. The Ford Co. also has a contract for 400,000 cylinder forgings for the Liberty engine on a fixed-price basis of $8.25 each; these are supplied to the other manufacturers. The contract with the Ford Co. for the Liberty engines provides that there shall be allowed for depreciation on the machinery and buildings especially acquired for the performance of the contract, in addition to the facilities already owned by the contractor, the difference between the fair cost and the fair market value as determined by appraisers at the time of the completion or cancellation of the contract.

The Lincoln Motor Co. has its special feature in that it was a new organization and established a new plant which is devoted exclusively to the manufacture of Liberty engines for the Government. It has a highly expert organization, with Mr. Henry M. Leland at the head. When the bogey or estimated cost was reduced from $6,087 per engine, with a fixed profit of 15 per cent, to $5,000 per engine, with a fixed profit of 12½ per cent, the Government made a special agreement with reference to depreciation, which is thus summarized in a resolution of the Aircraft Board:

"That the Government make an allowance for depreciation of the company's heat-treating plant equal to the difference between the cost thereof and the value to the company of the business at the termination of the contract; further, that the cost of the company's testing plant be allowed as a part of the production cost of the engines to be manufactured; further, that the machinery and equipment used by the company in the performance of the contract be depreciated 40 per cent over the term of the contract."

The Government made advances during the last fiscal year to the extent of $6,500,000; additional advances were made in July and August of $4,300,000, in order to discharge obligations and maintain a capacity of 1,500 engines a month, making the total sum advanced by the Government of $10,800,000.

The Lincoln Motor Co. had delivered, according to the Government's reports, only 580 motors by the end of June, but it had reached a production of over 600 per month by October 4, and doubtless will soon be at full capacity, so that the first 6,000 motors will probably be delivered before the end of January. For the first 600 motors the cost of production at the plant of the Lincoln Motor Co. was $3,583, which was nearly $300 per motor less than that of the Packard Motor Car Co., and it may be assumed that its average cost for the entire 6,000 will be not much, if any, more than $3,000. That is the figure which appears in the company's estimate of profit. But on the basis of an actual cost of $3,200 per motor the Lincoln Motor Co. would have earned by January, 1919 (through fixed profits and percentage of saving), on the delivery of the 6,000 motors about $6,450,000. There would also be profits on spare parts, which are estimated at upward of $1,500,000 more, making an aggregate profit of about $8,000,000. This would be exclusive of allowances by way of depreciation.

The investment in real estate, buildings, machinery, and equipment (exclusive of the special tools to be paid for by the Government, and the cost of testing and inspection facilities on which there is to be a depreciation allowance of 100 per cent) amounts to approximately $7,150,000, of which about $3,460,000 is the cost of machinery, tools, and equipment (to July 31, 1918), on which the Government is to pay a depreciation allowance of 40 per cent, in addition to profits. The entire paid-in capital of the company amounts to $850,000. At the outset the company obtained on the credit of its officers about $2,000,000, which served its purposes until it obtained the amounts needed for its plant, equipment, and working capital, through advances by the Government. It is pointed out very clearly that the company has provided an excellent plant for the manufacture of Liberty engines, and that ultimately its profit, after paying taxes, will represent only an equity in its plant, without any assured business, as it has been devoted exclusively to Government work. On the other hand, it may be said that there is a very liberal flat depreciation allowance on machinery, tools, and equipment; that the plant is a permanent one, admirably designed for commercial work, and not merely for a temporary exigency, and that there is every prospect that it can be successfully utilized. It should also be said that from the standpoint of the Government it was free to make arrangements with existing plants, and the amount of the profits it should allow should be determined accordingly.

It is unnecessary to review the original contracts with the Nordyke & Marmon Co., which is very far behind in its deliveries, and with the General Motors Co. (Cadillac and Buick plants). The profit allowed per engine was the same as in the other contracts, but the contracts were for fewer engines, 3,000 in the case of the Nordyke & Marmon Co. and 2,000 in that of the General Motors Co. The Nordyke & Marmon Co. received advances of $2,000,000. There were no advances to the General Motors Co.

The large percentage of the contractors' profits which will be taken by the Government in taxation is strongly emphasized, and, of course, what the Government takes back through taxation should fairly be taken into account But the contemplated tax does not justify an extravagant scale of profits which, even after payment of taxes, would permit an excessive return upon the capital invested, in view of the greatly reduced risks of the contractor under the cost-plus contracts.

REVISED CONTRACTS FOR LIBERTY ENGINES.

What has been said above relates to the original contracts for Liberty engines. During a recent period the contracts with the Lincoln Motor Co., the Packard Motor Car Co., and the Nordyke & Marmon Co. have been revised and put upon a fixed-price basis of $4,000 an engine.

The revised contract with the Lincoln Motor Co. is dated July 31, 1918. The former contract for 6,000 engines is canceled and superseded and the new contract provides for 9,000 United States twelves and necessary spare parts, with an option to the Government to require the production of 8,000 additional engines and spare parts. The schedule of deliveries provided for in the new contract is as follows:

Previous to Aug. 1, 1918	1,000
August	750
September	1,000
October	1,500
November	1,500
December	1,500
January, 1919	1,500
February	250

The price is $4,000 an engine. The spare parts are to be delivered on a schedule basis corresponding to a total price of $4,000 for a completed engine. The contract provides for payments by the Government, by way of amortization, upon a basis of 100 per cent of the actual cost of all testing and inspecting facilities provided by the contractor with the approval of the Government; for payment by the Government, by way of amortization, upon a basis of 40 per cent of the actual cost of the heat-treating building and equipment theretofore provided by the contractor; and payment by the Government, by way of amortization, upon a basis of 40 per cent of the actual cost of machinery, tools, and other items furnished by the contractor. It is further agreed that in case the Government shall not order from the contractor the 8,000 additional engines for which it has an option, or the contractor is prevented by termination of the contract from manufacturing and delivering the 9,000 engines contracted for and the 8,000 additional engines, the Government shall pay to the contractor a sum equal to 40 per cent of the difference between the actual cost of its plant, including real estate, buildings, machinery, and equipment built or otherwise acquired by it for the purpose of performing the contract (exclusive of any allowance of interest) and any and all payments previously made by the Government on account of depreciation or amortization. While the new contract is on a fixed-price basis, provision is made for payments by the Government within 10 days of the determination of the various items, on account of the cost of direct materials, supplies, and labor, and also for the payment monthly of amounts equal to proper ordinary depreciation, and other proper items of overhead expense not previously paid by the Government. It is also provided that in case the actual cost of manufacture shall be increased or decreased by reason of any changes in specifications or in the rates of labor, material, supplies, or equipment, varying from the rates in force at the date of the revised contract, upon satisfactory proof, the contractor shall be paid the total amount of such increases, in addition to the fixed price, or in case of a decrease the fixed price shall be reduced accordingly.

Up to October 4 the Lincoln Co. had delivered, according to the Government's report, 2,566 engines, instead of the 2,750 required by the schedule to October 1, and it is likely to be somewhat behind its schedule in the total deliveries, but its deliveries of 9,000 should be completed by March next. It may be assumed, as the company assumes in its own estimate, that the 9,000 motors can be produced on an average cost of $3,000 each, which would leave $1,000 profit per engine, exclusive of the spare parts, making a profit on the engines of $9,000,000 earned, it may be expected, by April 1; and assuming that the profit on spare parts will be 25 per cent of the profit on the motors, there would be an additional profit of $2,250,000. On this basis the entire profits earned by the company on the Liberty engine contract would be $11,250,000.

The new contract with the Nordyke & Marmon Co. was made under date of August 31, 1918. The former contract for 3,000 Liberty engines is canceled, and the substituted contract calls for 5,000 U.S.–12s and spare parts, with the option of the Government to order 2,000 additional. The schedule of deliveries is as follows:

The contract is on the basis of a fixed price of $4,000 per engine, with a provision for increase or decrease in case of a change in the actual cost of manufacture, similar to that contained in the revised contract with the Lincoln Co. The contract also contains a provision for special depreciation, which is somewhat involved and need not be set forth.

The revised contract with the Packard Motor Car Co. was made under date of September 2, 1918. It supersedes the original contract and provides for 12,000 U.S.–12s at a fixed price of $4,000 per engine, and spare parts on the basis of this price for a completed engine. It contains provision as to an increase or decrease of price in case of a change of the cost of manufacture similar to that found in the other revised contracts above mentioned. The Packard Co. agrees to deliver the articles at the rate of 600 engines a month, beginning with September 2, 1918. As the Packard Co. has delivered 3,660 engines up to October 4, 1918, the entire 12,000 will be delivered approximately by December, 1919. It is likely that the cost, distributed over the 12,000 engines, will not be more than $3,000 an engine, and at this rate the profit on the 12,000 engines will amount to $12,000,000, with probably $3,000,000 more as the profit on spares, making about $15,000,000 in all.

Under the original cost-plus contracts for the Liberty engines—that is, with the bogey cost of $5,000, a fixed profit of 12½ per cent thereon, and an additional profit of 25 per cent of the savings under the bogey cost—the total profits per engine would amount to $1,075 on the basis of an actual average cost of $3,200 per engine, or to $1,125 on the basis of an actual average cost of $3,000 an engine. It will thus be seen that the change from the cost-plus contracts to the fixed-price contracts saves the Government from about $75 to $125 (or possibly a little more) per engine on the fixed-profit allowance, and also whatever expense may be saved by the reduced requirements of cost supervision and accounting and in connection with material. Upon the new fixed-price contracts the contractor's profits, though reduced, still remain very liberal.

It is understood that it has been arranged that similar revised contracts on a fixed-price basis will be made with the Ford Motor Co. and the General Motors Co., but these had not yet been executed according to the latest information received.

Ninth. Supervision of production—Waste.

Little need be said with respect to the supervision of the production of engines. Although the numerous changes in the Liberty engine and the remedying of the defects which were disclosed necessarily involved considerable outlays, the losses due to these causes can hardly be said to be greater than would naturally be expected in the development of a new high-powered motor for airplanes. It has already been pointed out that the actual cost of the first lot of 600 motors at the plant of the Packard Motor Car Co., which was earliest in production, was as high as $3,873 per engine, and that this cost was subsequently reduced so that the average cost of the first 1,200 motors was $3,442, and that it is expected that the cost per engine at this plant will fall below $3,200. Again, the actual cost of the first lot of 600 motors at the plant of the Lincoln Motor Co. was $3,583, and it is believed that motors can now be produced at this plant at a little, if any, over $3,000 per engine. The enhanced cost of the first lots of engines may be said to reflect in large measure the expenditures which could have been avoided had there been no changes in design, but these outlays fell within the range of reasonable experimentation and can not justly be regarded as showing a lack of careful supervision.

The chief losses, which may be properly characterized as waste, have been in connection with the production of airplanes. A statement has already been made (ante, p. 15) of the cost of the Standard J–1 training planes which were condemned as dangerous in June, 1918, because of the unsuitability of the type of engine. The expenditures on the Standard J–1 planes, including the engines, to September 30, 1918, amounted to about $17,500,000, and the amount which may ultimately be saved if these planes are utilized with another engine can not now be stated.

The changes in the De Haviland 4s which have been detailed (ante, pp. 126–131) caused great additional expense which could have been avoided had there been a more efficient organization and prompt decisions as to equipment. The most serious waste, however, in connection with service planes was in the work and materials thrown away on the Bristol Fighter, which was in course of production at the plant of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation and was finally condemned in July, 1918 (post, p. 157).

Under the cost-plus contracts it was of the utmost importance that there should be the most careful supervision of production and an adequate system of cost accounting so that useless expenditures should be avoided and actual costs carefully determined. This undertaking was difficult in itself, but it was rendered even more difficult by the demand for haste and the necessity of quickly providing a large force of inspectors and accountants in a novel undertaking. Manufacturers were in constant opposition to what they regarded as unnecessarily technical requirements by accountants, and the Government representatives themselves were admonished by their superior officers not to let strictness stand in the way of production. And it could hardly be expected that this large matter of industrial supervision and cost accounting could be adequately handled under the restrictions of military organization. Moreover, not only was efficiency hampered, but the door was open to abuses, and despite the fidelity of many who sought to protect the Government, wasteful conditions were permitted to exist which were wholly inexcusable. It should also be said that a large outlay has been caused by the fact that the Army and Navy each maintains a complete staff of accountants so that, for example, in the North Elmwood plant of the Curtiss Co., where both Army and Navy work is being done, there are two sets of Government employees at work in all branches of cost-plus accounting under the respective contracts.

LABOR.

Labor conditions generally were unsatisfactory. In the labor market the Government was largely competing with itself. At the plant of the Packard Co. the labor turnover is from 400 to 600 per cent a year, which would mean 40,000 to 60,000 men coming and going in order to maintain an organization of 10,000 to 11,000 men. The larger portion of this "floating," as it is called, occurs among probably 4,000 to 5,000 men, and the testimony is that in some departments there has been a complete change about 15 times a year. Women have largely been employed in many plants with satisfactory results. The plant of the Wright Martin Aircraft Corporation at New Brunswick, N. J., is a conspicuous exception, few, if any, women being employed in the shops. The testimony is that the local labor organization has taken a stand against the employment of women, and accordingly this has not been pushed by the management.

In the case of the Wright Martin Co. also it was apparent that a very large proportion of the employees were within the draft age as fixed by the selective-service law of May 18, 1917. The records show that on August 15, 1918, 41.36 per cent, or 2,300 of the total number of employees (5,560) at the New Brunswick plant, were within the draft age, and of this number 15.83 per cent were in class 1. The report by the representatives of the Government at this plant states that the method used by the company for securing deferred classification and indefinite furloughs is as follows: When a man is employed who is in class 1 of the draft, he is given a week to "make good." If he then is found to be efficient, his foreman induces an application for deferred classification, and if this is refused by the district board and the employee is called to camp, a request is made by the company to the personnel department of the Bureau of Aircraft Production for his return on indefinite furlough. Prior to August, 1918, the operations of the draft department of the company were open to serious criticism and exhibited many irregularities. In one case a man, whose duties were such that anyone who could handle a screw driver could do his work, was drafted and immediate steps were taken to have him returned as a "motor builder." Previous to his employment by the company he had been employed as a stock clerk by a manufacturer of gowns, and he had no previous mechanical experience. In another case a man who was considered a deserter by his local board was finally located at the plant of the Wright Martin Co., where he was arrested and inducted into the Army. Affidavits were immediately presented for his return from camp upon industrial grounds, and he was returned accordingly. One who had been a clerk of a carpet company, without mechanical experience, and who had a minor assembly job, was drafted and was returned on indefinite furlough as a necessary employee. A former proof reader, a former skating instructor, and a former coupon clerk who had obtained employment at the Wright Martin plant were drafted and similarly returned. In other cases men whose work was entirely clerical secured deferred classification on industrial grounds. Cases of this sort have now been brought to the attention of the Provost Marshal General. It is stated by the Government representative that at present the draft department of the Wright Martin Co. is in competent hands, and it appears that its work is being done with a better regard for the interests of the Government.

LABOR COST.

To establish the labor cost under cost-plus contracts it was necessary that there should be proper time records and suitable provision for the identification and check of employees as they entered and left the factory. The opportunities for irregular pay rolls through laxity or connivance are obvious. The conditions in this respect at the North Elmwood (Buffalo) plant of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation were especially bad. It was at this plant (completed last fall) that the cost-plus work was done on the Bristol fighter for the Army and the HS–1 seaplane for the Navy. [The Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation has seven distinct plants—at Buffalo the Churchill Street group (including the Churchill Street plant, where training planes are made, and the plants at Niagara Street, Bradley Street, and South Elmwood, making parts for Churchill Street); the Austin Street plant, doing Navy work, including contracts for the British Government; and the North Elmwood Avenue plant. At Hammondsport, N. Y., motors are manufactured exclusively. The work, except at the North Elmwood plant, is on a flat-price basis.] There is abundant testimony, with picturesque detail, which can not be given here, to the effect that at the North Elmwood plant large numbers of employees were kept on the pay rolls when they were not needed; through an utter lack of a decent system men and women were paid when they did not work; employees were able to leave the factory without being detected and remain absent for hours while recorded as on duty; employees would ring one another's time cards; men who were without work enough to keep them busy during the day were employed overtime at increased rates; men were brought to the plant on Sundays when there was virtually nothing to do; and for many months there was such demoralization at this plant that it became the subject of contemptuous gossip among the employees and in the community. One of the inspectors for the Navy testifies that as late as July he, with others, went through the plant at night on a tour of inspection, and not only were they able to go from one end of the plant to another without being asked for their passes, but they found absurd conditions of idleness. In one room "the foreman and three men (were) sprawled out on the floor," and, as he put it, there were "slackers from one end of the plant to another."

It is urged in palliation that the cancellation of the Spad order and the difficulties encountered in the development of the Bristol created a state of confusion and that the management was constantly expecting to be able to get into production and felt it necessary to maintain an adequate force for this purpose. That the force was increased heavily at the North Elmwood plant during the early period despite the fact that there were serious difficulties with the Bristol design and the company was not ready for large production is beyond question. In October, 1917, the average number of men working at the North Elmwood plant was 578. In December this was increased to 4,142; in January to 5,970; in February to 7,029; there was a decrease of a few hundred in March and April, and an increase in May to 7,557, and in June the average number at work was 9,788. To approximately 60 per cent of its capacity this plant was either idle or working only in connection with the Bristol. The employment of men on a large scale when there was not work enough for them had much to do with the virtual destruction of the morale at the plant. But whatever loss the Government has sustained in this way is not nearly as large as it might otherwise have been by reason of the fact that a careful reaudit is in progress, which should be strictly prosecuted, and final settlement of payments awaits a satisfactory determination of actual outlays.

EMPLOYMENT OF ALIEN ENEMIES.

Among the regulations established by proclamation of the President on April 6, 1917, was the following:

"An alien enemy shall not approach or be found within one-half of a mile of any Federal or State forest, camp, arsenal, aircraft station, Government or naval vessel, navy yard, factory, or workshop for the manufacture of munitions of war or of any products for the use of the Army or Navy."

Under the authority granted by the President to the Attorney General for the administration of the alien enemy regulations, the Department of Justice developed a permit system whereby alien enemies could obtain permits to be employed within a munitions factory, including one engaged in the manufacture of aircraft, within the half-mile zone. The granting of such permits is intrusted to the United States marshal of the district, who is authorized to issue them if he is satisfied that such action will be in no respect dangerous to the community or the United States. He is required before issuing a permit to confer with the special agent of the Department of Justice in the locality, to make a thorough investigation, to get the approval of the United States attorney or assistant United States attorney of the district, and also to obtain from the employer a certificate in writing to the effect that he desires to employ the applicant, and that he is satisfied that such employment will not be to the injury of the community or the United States. Sponsors or bonds may be required, and all such permits are revocable.

It will be observed that while the precaution has been taken to require suitable investigation by agents of the Government, the cooperation of the employer, who has special opportunities for obtaining accurate information, is expected. It is manifest that unless the Government is in possession of facts showing the inadvisability of the employment, the certificate of the employer in compliance with the regulations is likely to be most persuasive.

There is considerable difference in the practice of the various companies engaged in the manufacture of aircraft as to the employment of enemy aliens under these regulations. The following illustrations will suffice:

The Fisher Body Corporation states: "We do not employ any German aliens in our aeroplane factory or in our aeroplane divisions." On May 22, 1918, Mr. Kepperley, the vice president and general manager of the Curtiss Co., gave instructions that under no circumstances should alien enemies be employed. Despite this instruction some alien enemies who had previously been employed on permits were retained in positions of importance. One of these, who began work for the Curtiss Co. last fall, was put in charge of the milling-machine department in the machine shop and became assistant general foreman of the machine shop at the North Elmwood plant. Another German subject (having a brother in the German Navy), who began to work in the Curtiss plant in February, 1917, became foreman in the welding department at the North Elmwood plant and has been at work on all the tubing work and tail units for the Bristol fighter as well as on the engine braces for the H8 flying boats. Another, who had himself served one year in the German Army and was discharged on account of wounds, was employed as toolmaker at the Curtiss plant until some time in June.

The Lincoln Motor Co. states: "It is our endeavor to employ none but American citizens or friendly aliens. We are careful and using every precaution to not employ enemy aliens." The Nordyke & Marmon Co. is equally careful. Their statement is: "At this date there are no alien enemies employed in the airplane engine division. A very few have been employed in this division from time to time, but for only short periods at a time, as it has been our settled policy from the beginning of the war to keep alien enemy employees out of our Government departments, notwithstanding the individual man might be perfectly harmless. As fast as these men have been discovered they have been discharged."

About 200 enemy aliens (including Austrians and Hungarians) are employed by the Packard Motor Car Co. About 200 enemy aliens (not Germans, but Austrians and Hungarians) are employed at the plants of the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation in New Brunswick and Newark. No enemy aliens are employed by that company at its Long Island City plant.

The Ford Motor Co. has about 250 German aliens who are employed in departments dealing with Government work. One hundred and forty-three of these are in departments in which from 20 to 60 per cent of the work done is Government work; 35 are at the blast furnace, and 61 are at the shipbuilding plant, which is doing Government work exclusively. These enemy aliens are working under special permit granted on the company's recommendation.

GERMAN SYMPATHIZERS.

The serious risk that is taken in permitting men of known pro-German sympathies, whatever their citizenship, to work in aircraft plants in any important capacity is generally recognized. The opportunities are abundant for delays and interferences in production through the action or inaction of those controlling the progress of production. It is the assumed sympathy with his nation which makes the employment of the German subject dangerous, and the danger may be quite as great in the case of one who, although not an enemy alien, is more friendly to Germany than to the United States.

There have been persistent rumors of pro-German sympathies on the part of employees of the Curtiss Co., but it has been impossible to ascertain to what extent, if any, the demoralization that until recently has existed at the North Elmwood plant of that company was due to any influence of this hostile description. The conditions that existed naturally bred distrust which was reflected in common talk, but facts warranting a definite conclusion as to disloyalty on the part of employees in important positions are lacking.

In the case of the Ford Motor Co., one of the company's employees (who formerly had been in the educational department and had represented the American Protective League) testified as to his inquiry into cases of disloyalty. The reports obtained by him exhibit utterances of employees in antagonism to the Government, insulting references to the President, and praise of the Kaiser. In an extreme case, in which the employee reviled and even threatened the President, there was a prosecution and a plea of guilty. The man was fined $300, was released, and the testimony is that he resumed work in the Ford plant. The reports were numerous, and the employee who obtained them testified that there were about 200 employees whose loyalty was seriously open to question, but how many of these were employed in Government work he could not say. So far as the Liberty engine was concerned, his investigation related to half a dozen cases in the drafting department in the Ford Co. In this department there was a serious situation which engaged the attention of the management. Its importance was manifest from the fact that the drafting department embraces the tool design and drafting room in which the drafting work upon the Liberty engine is done, and it is possible for one in that department to bring about delays, the causes of which, in view of the multiplicity of drawings involved, it would be difficult satisfactorily to trace. This department was in charge of Carl Emde. There were repeated reports of pronounced pro-German utterances by Emde. A former employee, who had left the plant voluntarily and had later been found with plans and photographs of the plant, was a close friend of Emde's and had been employed in his department. This man, it is understood, has been interned. While nothing conclusive could be established against Emde in relation to his work, the advisability of removing him from a position of such strategic importance was clear to some of the most important men in the management. A conference was held on the subject at which Mr. Ford and the factory managers were present. According to the minutes of this conference reports were read "from various members of the drafting department who were in touch with the situation, and who felt that the department was practically a pro-German institution." Several conferees expressed the opinion that Emde should be removed, and one said that in his opinion "in the very nature of things Mr. Emde could not give us everything required to assist the Government of the United States." Mr. Ford, however, was opposed to that course and overruled his associates. Mr. Ford's position and his reasons are thus set forth in the minutes:

"Mr. Ford deliberated and stated that he had heard numerous rumors, but in speaking of all he had heard there had not been one thing shown him which would make him change the present head of the drafting department. He felt that it was a time of sacrifice—that in the next few years every man would be called upon to make some sort of sacrifice, and that possibly Mr. Emde, German born, was making his sacrifice now when making drawings for the Liberty motor to be used ultimately against Germany."

This statement of attitude is sufficiently expressive and requires no comment. The proposed removal did not take place. There has been a laxity at the Ford plant with respect to those of German sympathies which is not at all compatible with the interests of the Government. In deference to Mr. Ford's view, those in direct charge of production, who were alive to the situation, have had to pursue a policy of constant watchfulness and supervision instead of being free to take the precautions which the exigency demanded.

MATERIALS.

The leading causes of waste in material were engineering changes and faulty workmanship. As material was rendered useless it was scrapped, and there is no little evidence of a lack of care in securing salvage. For the losses due exclusively to changes in design after authorized production had begun, the manufacturers can not be regarded as responsible; and these losses, while they can not be accurately computed, are undoubtedly heavy. Their extent, of course, is proportioned to the stage of production reached when changes were directed; and with respect to the service planes the history of production at the Dayton-Wright Airplane Co., the Fisher Body Corporation, and the Standard Aircraft Corporation discloses the same conditions varying only in degree as to the delay and waste caused by repeated changes.

With respect to the intelligence and efficiency of the inspection and the extent to which rejections have been on sound grounds, there are naturally differences of opinion and complaints and countercomplaints, the basis for which can not be satisfactorily determined. It is to be noted that the rejection of spruce which has gone into production has reached a high percentage. Even at one of the best plants the Government representative puts the percentage as high as 60 per cent after allowing for salvage, and at other plants the percentage of rejections was probably higher.

A poor industrial organization such as existed at the plants of the Standard Aircraft Corporation and the Curtiss Co. (North Elmwood plant) did not favor economical production, and in the case of the former company conditions were aggravated, as already pointed out, by the assignment to that company of a large number of small orders for varied work. At the North Elmwood plant of the Curtiss Co. the waste, which was incident to delay and changes, was vastly increased by irregular practices. Thus, in order to keep men busy who apparently had no proper work to do, there was excessive production of parts. A production order might be for 500 parts, but the actual production might run to 5,000 or even more of these parts until this unwarranted conduct was discovered and stopped. There is instance after instance of excessive production which served to increase the size of the scrap heap when a change made the parts useless.

Again at this plant, when a change would lead to an order stopping the production of parts, production often would continue despite the order. As an illustration, one witness testified that he had personally given a stop order on certain metal parts and found two weeks after, in going through the metal shop, that they were still making the parts, sending them through the various operations and working overtime on their production. During periods of idleness employees devoted their time to making clocks and toys out of the materials at their command in the factory. Excess material was scattered about the factory without a proper record being kept of it. And it appears that material would be sent to the scrap heap instead of being properly salvaged, in order to cover mistakes.

There was also a lack, at the Curtiss plant, of proper records of material. In the case of steel stores there was confusion between what had been supplied for the Army work, for the Navy work, and for the Curtiss fixed-price work, so that accurate accounting based on the ledger entries was wholly impossible. And in addition to other manifest delinquencies, there was an absence of proper plant protection. The situation of the company in view of its experience with both the Spad and Bristol orders was undoubtedly a difficult one, but the lack of competent industrial administration is too clear to admit of dispute and has freely been confessed.

There has been little evidence at the North Elmwood plant of the exercise of the broad powers of the Government to prevent these abuses, and the fact that conditions were permitted to continue reveals the failure of the representatives of the Signal Corps to take proper steps for the protection of the Government's interest. There was, however, such an absence of system on the part of the company in the keeping track of parts, and so many changes in the persons employed, that while there is abundance of general testimony it is practically impossible at this time to trace particular instances of dereliction to individuals in order, with suitable particularity, to support definite charges. The divided responsibility which resulted in giving the design of the Bristol so largely into the control of the representatives of the Curtiss Co. was also a source of embarrassment, and the extreme haste to make up for lost time added to the confusion. Conditions through the winter and early spring were chaotic, and the improvement that has been made since that time has been unnecessarily slow. It is fair to say, however, that recently there have been changes which promise a needed betterment in the industrial organization.

So far as the loss of the Government in connection with the Bristol is concerned, the payments already made to the Curtiss Co., according to the Government accounts, amounts to upward of $2,000,000, exclusive of advances, and, as already stated, the Government has estimated that the loss, including claims growing out of the cancellation, may reach $6,500,000 (ante, p. 16). The Government, however, has a margin of security by reason of deferred payments, and a reaudit is in progress which must be completed before a final settlement is made for materials furnished. The loose methods employed by the company should be taken into consideration and a final settlement should be reached only upon satisfactory proof of proper outlays.

OVERHEAD CHARGES.

In the course of production payments have been made on account of overhead charges upon the basis of a general estimate—that is, by taking a percentage of other outlays, which seems to be justified in the experience of the plant, as representing the overhead expense. The overhead expense embraces general administrative outlays, including executive salaries, and the theory of the cost-plus contract is that the Government pays the expense of superintendence as a part of the cost.

It is, of course, important that fair salaries should be allowed, and all exorbitant demands rejected. Reference has already been made to the salaries paid to the executive officers of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., who were at the same time the stockholders in a close corporation and divided their time with other companies from which they received high salaries. There appears to be no justification for even the temporary allowances to the Talbotts and Kettering of annual salaries aggregating $100,000, and the explanation furnished that the "relations with the contractor were somewhat delicate at first, and, moreover, the company was in crying need of cash, and any withholding of amounts due was sure to create much friction," is not convincing; inasmuch as the individuals, and not the company, got the money, and it is difficult to see how "friction" in this matter could have injured the Government. It is also stated that when the salaries were allowed in the fall of 1917, dating from August 1, 1917, it was felt that it was a matter of considerable importance "that would have to be passed by Col. Deeds, who was in charge of the Equipment Division," but Col. Deeds testifies that he knew nothing of the salaries that were paid to these officers.

It should be said, however, that these allowances, under the terms of the contract, should be regarded as tentative, and that it is within the authority of the finance department in its final settlement to adjust the matter on a fair basis. And that is the position of that department.

Even more extraordinary was the salary paid by the Standard Co. to its president, Mr. Mingle, at the rate of $63,000 a year, which is sought to be charged as a part of the cost of operations. This, however, has not been allowed. The question what would be a proper allowance has been under consideration. Several vouchers have been passed which represent merely payments on account, or payments "subject to adjustment," and it is stated that the amount of Mr. Mingle's salary thus far actually allowed is at the rate of $15,000 a year.

The adjustments of overhead expense, as are the other payments on vouchers under the cost-plus contracts, are subject to a revision of accounts and it is within the power of the finance division in the ultimate adjustment of cost in accordance with the terms of the contract to protect the Government against any claims on the part of the contractors which may be found to be unjustified.

Tenth. Special matters.

1. PURCHASE OF THE PLANT OF THE GENERAL VEHICLE CO.

In November, 1917, the Government purchased the plant of the General Vehicle Co. at Long Island City, N. Y., for $1,527,568. The purchase embraced all the real estate, building, and machinery constituting the plant, and all other assets, except that patents (other than those relating to internal combustion rotary aircraft engines), franchises, good will, cash, bills, and accounts receivable, specified securities, and all inventory assets not acquired and used in connection with the manufacture of Gnome engines, were retained by the General Vehicle Co. The company also agreed to release for the use of the Government its administrative and manufacturing organization, so that the Government might take over the plant property and organization as an active manufacturing establishment in full readiness for production. Upon a physical valuation and inspection of the books of the company by Government appraisers and accountants, showing that the price was a fair one on the basis of prices previous to the war, and upon an opinion of the Judge Advocate General as to the legality of the purchase and as to the propriety of the form of contract, the purchase was recommended by the Aircraft Board.

The advisability of the purchase, however, was doubted at the time by officers of the Government. It appears that at the outset, in formulating the aircraft program, it was supposed that the Gnome rotary engine would be a factor of some importance, and a small order for Monosoupape motors was placed with the General Vehicle Co., but in view of doubts as to the planes to be built, with which such engines would be used, further orders were not placed. Later, on word from overseas that Gnome rotary engines should be put into production, there were negotiations with the General Motors Corporation looking to the acquisition of the General Vehicle plant and the manufacture of these engines in large quantities. Before the matter was closed the instructions from abroad were changed and the proposed transaction was abandoned. The considerations underlying the purchase are stated in the recitals of the Aircraft Board in the resolution adopted at its meeting of October 19, 1917. It was stated that advices from France indicated a doubt as to the future demand for rotary engines in aviation, but that nevertheless these engines would be used to a greater or less extent for a considerable period to come; that it was desirable that "the technique of manufacture of rotary engines should in any event be studied and developed in the United States in case of need"; that the General Vehicle Co. had "the only plant and organization of substantial size in the United States equipped and organized with the necessary facilities and experience for the manufacture of such engines"; and that the present and future demand for rotary engines was "not sufficient in amount or sufficiently continuous to justify a manufacturer in the maintenance of a plant and organization adequate for a prompt supply of such engines and for the proper study and development of the technique of that type of engine."

In a previous part of this report (ante, p. 98), reference has been made to the opinion of the Joint Army and Navy Technical Board, given on November 16, 1917, that in the program for the coming year rotary engines should be considered of secondary importance, but that it was deemed desirable that the art of building rotary engines should be retained in the United States and that for this purpose the organization skilled in rotary-engine production should be preserved. While it was thought that an order which had been given to the Union Switch & Signal Co. for 2,500 80-horsepower LeRhones was larger than was necessary to preserve the art, it was further recommended that steps be taken to maintain the possibilities of production of the 160-horsepower Gnome engine. The resolution of the Joint Army and Navy Technical Board did not in terms approve the purchase of the General Vehicle Co.'s plant, nor did it express opposition in any definite way.

The actual necessity of the purchase of the General Vehicle Co.'s plant is not apparent. As soon as the Government made the purchase, a corporation called the Aeronautical Engine Co., with a nominal capital, was incorporated for the purpose of building Gnome engines at the plant and contracts were made for the manufacture of small quantities at cost without profit. This, however, did not continue long. It was found that the Union Switch & Signal Co. had mastered the art of making LeRhone engines, and although these were of a different type, it seemed that the necessity of keeping the organization in existence at the plant purchased from the General Vehicle Co. soon ceased or was very much minimized. In April last it was proposed that the plant at Long Island be leased to the Wright-Martin Co. for the manufacture of the 300-horsepower Hispano-Suiza engines, and an arrangement for this purpose was made soon thereafter, one of the reasons being stated to be "the practical abandonment of the manufacture of Gnome motors."

At the time of the purchase of this plant by the Government the General Vehicle Co. had outstanding notes amounting to $1,530,000, which were held by the Peerless Truck and Motor Corporation. The purchase price paid by the Government was substantially equivalent to the amount of these notes and thus provided for their retirement. The purchase, however, was made on the basis of the value of assets, and whatever difference of opinion there may be as to the advisability of the purchase there are no facts warranting the conclusion that it was not made in good faith or that the amount paid was in excess of the fair value of the property acquired.

2. MAHOGANY MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS' ASSOCIATION.

True mahogany is a desirable wood (ranking, in the opinion of the Government's production engineers, next to black walnut) for the making of propellers for service, or combat, airplanes. To meet this demand contracts had been made for mahogany in the fall of 1917, but with only one responsible corporation; that is, Lewis Thompson & Co. A contract with one of the companies selected was canceled because it was apparently without financial resources and could not provide a bond, and in the case of another contractor no deliveries were made.

In the beginning of January, 1918, it appeared that there was a serious shortage in the Government's supply of wood for service-plane propellers and through the War Trade Board the leading mahogany manufacturers of the United States were invited to a conference in Washington. This conference was held on January 21, and at that time, or in the later conferences, the following corporations and firms were represented: Huddleston-Marsh Mahogany Co.; Ichabod T. Williams & Sons.; George D. Emery Co. (said to be closely affiliated with I. T. Williams & Sons) and the Astoria Veneer Mills & Dock Co., of New York; Palmer, Parker & Co., of Boston; Lewis Thompson & Co. and S. B. Vrooman Co., of Philadelphia; Freiberg Lumber Co., of Cincinnati; C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co., of Louisville; Talge Mahogany Co., of Indianapolis; C. L. Willey Co., of Chicago; and the Otis Manufacturing Co., of New Orleans. At the first conference the manufacturers were notified of the Government requirements for propeller stock, their cooperation was sought, and they were asked to advise the Government of the quantity which each could furnish and the price.

The representatives of the War Trade Board suggested the advisability of an organization of the manufacturers to secure effective cooperation with the Government, and accordingly an association of the manufacturers was at once formed, which appointed a war committee composed of A. S. Williams, of the Astoria Veneer Mills & Dock Co.; C. H. Thompson, of Lewis Thompson & Co.; F. C. Leary, of Ichabod T. Williams & Sons; F. G. Otis, of the Otis Manufacturing Co.; and J. C. Wickliffe, of the C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co. The committee met at once and passed a resolution expressing the opinion that the best interests of the Government would be served by the purchase by the Government "of all Central American mahogany logs now under contract with the members of the association at a price to be agreed upon; the Government to arrange transportation of said logs; the manufacturing of the logs into lumber to be done by the mills represented by this association at a price to be agreed upon." At the same meeting the officers of the association were elected: Thomas Williams, of Ichabod T. Williams & Sons, president; R. S. Huddleston, of the Huddleston-Marsh Co., treasurer; and Charles H. Thompson, of Lewis Thompson & Co., secretary. This proposition was rejected by the representatives of the Signal Corps for reasons stated at length, which were in substance that it was deemed inadvisable that the Government should arrange for the purchase of logs directly from the loggers in Central America and Mexico in view of the unfamiliarity of the Signal Corps with the logging business, or that the Government should take over existing contracts for purchases of logs on account of the complications that might arise, or that the Government should become directly involved in log purchases. Recognizing the difficulties in the disposal of a largely increased quantity of lumber, the representatives of the Signal Corps felt disposed to pay "a higher price than prewar or existing prices for propeller stock" in order that the mahogany manufacturers might offset any loss due to the low market value of rejected material. It was then recommended by the Signal Corps that the manufacturers should make a proposition as to the price to be paid for propeller stock, and it was stated for the manufacturers that they could not quote prices on the basis of the existing Signal Corps specifications, as these were too restrictive as to the grade to be selected and permitted the Signal Corps to accept or reject the material based upon the judgment of the inspector.

It was finally suggested that the manufacturers should submit a proposition based on what are called "National Hardwood Inspection" rules (that is, the rules of the National Hardwood Lumber Association), quoting a separate price on "firsts and seconds, selects, and No. 1 common." Discussions continued between the war committee of the association and representatives of the Government, among the latter being Lieut. Ryerson, who was in charge of propeller parts in the plane production section, Joseph S. Otis, who, as the result of a disagreement, had recently severed his connection with the Otis Manufacturing Co. and had offered his services to the Government as a mahogany expert, and representatives of the lumber committee of the Council of National Defense. At the meeting on January 23, according to Lieut. Ryerson's report, the war committee of the association suggested prices for propeller mahogany according to "National Hardwood Inspection" rules as follows: Firsts and seconds $350 per M feet; selects, $320; No. 1 common, $270. After these figures were submitted a discussion of costs followed, in which Joseph G. Otis, representing the Government, and J. C. Wickliffe, representing C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co., gave their respective estimates of cost. Mr. Otis's estimate was considerably lower than the other and was contested by Mr. Wickliffe. The question of specifications was again discussed and the Signal Corps representatives stated that it would be impossible to place orders on the basis of "National Hardwood Inspection" rules, which permitted widths considerably less than those required for propeller stock. After further parley, Lieut. Ryerson stated that it would be preferable to negotiate with the various manufacturers and importers individually for the purchase of such mahogany as they were in a position to offer. It was considered that if negotiations could not be brought to a close on the basis of the prices quoted that it might be desirable for the Government to fix a price for the purchase of propeller stock and agree to provide in its contracts that after partial performance there should be an audit of costs and a readjustment of prices upon a fair basis.

After the negotiations had thus proceeded for several days the manufacturers submitted to the officials of the Signal Corps the opinion that Joseph S. Otis was not competent to advise the Signal Corps with respect to mahogany costs and suggested that action should be taken by which some one should be put in charge of the purchases of mahogany for the Government "who could develop the actual facts and be fair to the industry." Joseph S. Otis left the Signal Corps on January 29. On January 31 Henry Lockhart, jr., was placed in charge of the "Materials Department, Foreign and United States," which had the duty of procuring the materials necessary for the production of airplanes, with the exception of motors and instruments. About February 5 Henry K. S. Williams, who had formerly been in the lumber business as a member of the firm of Ichabod T. Williams & Sons (being a brother of Thomas Williams, of that firm), but had retired several years before, was put at the head of the hardwoods section, which was a subdivision of the Materials Department, and had charge of the orders for woods required for propeller stock. Shortly after, on February 25, J. C. Wickliffe, who had been for 10 years secretary of the C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co., of Louisville, and had been active as a member of the war committee of the Mahogany Manufacturers' and Importers' Association, entered the service of the Government as assistant to H. K. S. Williams in the hardwoods section. The suggestion that he should take this position was made about the middle of February in a conversation between H. K. S. Williams and Mr. Mengel, when the latter was asked if he could spare Mr. Wickliffe from his organization. On March 4, 1918, J. Edward McCullough, who had been superintendent at the mill of the George D. Emery Co., one of the members of the Mahogany Manufacturers' and Importers' Association, was made district inspector of mahogany, as well as other woods in the New York district, embracing Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and New Orleans. He was selected by S. B. Vrooman, jr., who, about February 10, was given general charge of the inspection of all propeller lumber throughout the country. Prior to his connection with the Government (he started as an inspector in December, 1917) S. B. Vrooman, jr., had been in the service of the S. B. Vrooman Co., also one of the members of the Mahogany Manufacturers' and Importers' Association; he was, and has continued to be, during his service with the Government one of the stockholders of that corporation (ante, p. 68).

Mr. Wickliffe during his connection with the C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co. had owned five shares of its preferred stock, which he disposed of some years ago. His wife owned five shares of the common stock, which were sold when he entered the Government service. His salary as secretary of the Mengel Co. had been $500 a month. His compensation from the Government was at the rate of $4,000 a year. When it was suggested that he should become connected with the Government he said that he could not afford it, but he was informed that Mr. Mengel had offered to continue his salary "as a donation to the Government during the war." Mr. Wickliffe replied that he did not like the arrangement, would not accept it without Mr. Lockhart's approval, and in any event would not consent to be paid more than enough to defray the living expenses of himself and his family. Mr. Wickliffe was paid by the Mengel Co. in addition to his salary from the Government, $250 on March 25, $250 on March 29, and $250 on April 15, a total of $750. This was subsequently adjusted on the basis of $350 for the period to April 1, and $400 was returned by Mr. Wickliffe to the Mengel Co. This was explained in Mr. Wickliffe's letter to Mr. Mengel as follows:

"628 LEXINGTON PLACE,
"Washington, April 13, 1918.

"Mr. C. R. MENGEL,
"President C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co., Louisville, Ky.

"DEAR MR. MENGEL: The Signal Corps having fixed the salary I am to receive from them at the highest figure they can pay of $4,000 per annum, I want to let you know that I think it necessary now that you reduce the amount that you are remitting me monthly to $350 per month. As near as I can estimate it, I can get by on Washington living expenses and do such official entertaining as I shall have to do on the sum of these two amounts. If I find that I can not, I shall frankly let you know the condition. But I feel that living here and doing the necessary at my present job on this figure is about the equivalent of the salary I had when I was with you in Louisville. Therefore kindly give the necessary instructions to have the remittance cut down.

"Again thanking you and the company through you, I am,

"Very truly, yours,

"J. C. WICKLIFFE."

The arrangement with C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co. was approved by H. K. S. Williams in his letter of April 24, 1918, as follows:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., April 24, 1918.

"From: Office of the Chief Signal Officer.
"To: C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co., Louisville, Ky.
"Subject: Services.

"1. In line with the request of your president, Mr. C. R. Mengel, this section desires to give you this letter stating that at the time it asked you for the services of your former secretary, Mr. J. C. Wickliffe, it was fully understood by it that you or the mahogany industry would pay him an amount of money per month over and above the salary the Signal Corps was authorized to pay him, so that the sum of these two would be sufficient to cover his and his family's expenses during his service with the Signal Corps. This was done with the full knowledge of Mr. Henry Lockhart, jr., head of the materials department, because of the fact that the hardwood section needed his services, and in view of the further fact that your offer to do this was made with the distinct understanding that he should sever all connections with your company and with the mahogany industry and assume his new duties, of course, entirely as a member of the Signal Corps organization. This section would also set forth the fact that your offer was specifically asked by you to be considered in the light of a donation to the war.

"By direction of the Acting Chief Signal Officer.

"HENRY LOCKHART, Jr.,
"Materials Department, Foreign and United States,
"By H. K. S. WILLIAMS,
"Hardwood Section."

The salary which S. B. Vrooman, jr., had received from the S. B. Vrooman Co. has been continued by that company, and when J. Edward McCullough entered the service of the Government the George D. Emery Co. paid, until the arrangement mentioned below, the difference between his Government pay and his former compensation from the company.

It was soon arranged that the Mahogany Manufacturers and Importers' Association should assume the payment of the additional compensation to Mr. Wickliffe and to Mr. McCullough. Accordingly, for the period beginning with April, this compensation was paid to both in checks from Mr. Huddleston, the treasurer of the association. The amounts were raised by voluntary contributions of various members of the association. The minutes of the association show the following action in the matter:

"The matter of the difference in compensation between the amount paid by the Government for services to J. C. Wickliffe and to Mr. McCullough and the amount of compensation previously received was discussed. The following resolution was then presented, duly seconded, and adopted by the affirmative vote of all present:

"Resolved, That such excess compensation be paid by the various members of the association in the form of an annual subscription, which is made up by various amounts subscribed by the mahogany firms, amounting in total to $5,700.

"The motion was duly made, seconded, and carried by the affirmative vote of all present that a copy of this resolution be sent to Mr. H. K. S. Williams."

Mr. Wickliffe testifies that this arrangement was made "because it was felt that it was not right for any one individual firm to pay it all." Mr. Huddleston testifies that it was "purely a question of cooperation with Mr. Mengel." Early in May there was correspondence between H. K. S. Williams and Mr. Huddleston, the treasurer of the Mahogany Association, in which a letter in the following form, addressed by Mr. Huddleston to Mr. Wickliffe, was first submitted to H. K. S. Williams and approved by him:

"347 MADISON AVENUE,
"New York, N. Y., May 10, 1918.

"Mr. J. C. WICKLIFFE,
"Materials Department, Foreign and United States, Hardwood Section, Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR MR. WICKLIFFE: A few days ago, when the heads of the various mahogany importing and manufacturing concerns met for general discussion, attention was called to the fact that by virtue of your recent appointment as assistant to Mr. H. K. S. Williams your annual income had been cut something in excess of 50 per cent.

"After a general discussion, it was agreed that it would not be fair that you stand alone the burden imposed on you by your services to the Government in this particular department; therefore it was mutually agreed that the various mahogany firms, feeling as patriotic as you have demonstrated yourself to be, will make up the difference between your former income and what you are now receiving from the Government, provided such an act would meet with the approval of Mr. H. K. S. Williams, the head of your department.

"I am pleased to advise you that I am to-day in receipt of a letter from Mr. H. K. S. Williams, approving of this transaction; so, acting in the capacity of treasurer, I will mail you each month a check for $350, beginning the month of April, which, I am informed, will make up the difference in your salary."

A similar letter was written, with the approval of H. K. S. Williams, to Mr. McCullough. Mr. McCullough was paid by the association for April, May, June, and July, at the rate of $91.67 a month. He returned to his former employment early in August. In the case of Mr. Wickliffe the arrangement continued until it was officially disapproved on August 20, 1918, by Mr. J. Gilmore Fletcher, on behalf of the Bureau of Aircraft Production, in the following letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION,
Washington, August 20, 1918.

Mr. J. C. WICKLIFFE,
Hardwood Section, 119 D Street NE., Washington, D. C.

MR. DEAR MR. WICKLIFFE: In view of the fact that the Government looks with disfavor upon your receiving from the Mahogany Manufacturers and Importers' Association your present monthly remittance, which I shall refer to here as a salary of $350 per month, I deem it best, and hereby request, that you immediately refuse to accept any further payments from that source, or any other source which comes in direct line with your duties in the Hardwood Section, the Raw Materials Department, Division of Aircraft Procurement, Bureau of Aircraft Production.

I shall at once take the proper steps to have the salary now paid you by the Government, namely, $4,000 per year, increased to $8,200 per year, and shall make every effort to expedite a decision on the point of allowing you this increase.

Yours, very truly,

J. GILMORE FLETCHER,
Chief of Aircraft Procurement.

Mr. Wickliffe immediately requested Mr. Huddleston to discontinue the payments, and accordingly there has been no payment of additional compensation since the payment for the month of July.

Early in February, 1918, arrangements were made with some of the manufacturers for the taking over of certain mahogany which had been under contract for delivery to British merchants, but the amount was relatively small. After H. K. S. Williams took charge of the hardwood section, and also after J. C. Wickliffe became his assistant, negotiations were continued with the manufacturers composing the Mahogany Manufacturers and Importers' Association for the purchase by the Government of mahogany in large quantity for propeller stock. On the appointment of H. K. S. Williams, his brother, Thomas Williams (of Ichabod T. Williams & Sons) had resigned as president of the association, and C. R. Mengel was elected in his stead. On February 14, 1918, new specifications had been adopted by the Signal Corps (No. 15028–A) modifying and liberalizing the prior specifications which had been adopted in the previous December. At about the same time (Feb. 13) the manufacturers had submitted two proposals, one under the Signal Corps specifications (No. 15028–A) at $400 per M feet for firsts, seconds, and selects, and $320 per M feet for lower grades, f. o. b. cars eastern mills (with corresponding prices for other points according to estimated freight rates), and another proposal under the national hardwood rules for specified sizes at $350 per M feet for firsts, seconds, and selects, and $280 per M feet for No. 1 common, f. o. b. cars eastern mills. These had been refused. The important difference was with respect to the inspection.

In this situation a conference was held on March 6 between the manufacturers and H. K. S. Williams, J. C. Wickliffe, and S. B. Vrooman, jr., representing the Government. The minutes of this conference show that H. K. S. Williams opened the meeting with the announcement that "it was the purpose of the Signal Corps to grant as liberal an inspection as could be given consistent, of course, with the principle that no lumber could be taken that would not make propeller blades." After a discussion of the matter of utilizing lumber which showed scattered pin-worn holes, and the opinion having been expressed by Mr. Vrooman that such stock could be used where it did not affect the strength of the board, Mr. Williams stated that he would endeavor to have the inspection department accept such lumber. This, as Mr. Wickliffe testifies, was accomplished. The minutes show that Mr. Williams "stated that Mr. Vrooman is going to be in charge of the inspection all over the country; that he will appoint verious men to do the inspecting at the various mills, and shall show them what is to be done. Mr. Williams further stated that his object in having Mr. Vrooman at this conference was that "the interpretation of the Signal Corps specifications might be as easy as such interpretation could be made consistent with the principle of accepting only propeller material, but that the Government might get all such material that it could get." Mr. Williams then requested that each manufacturer advise him of the cost of its logs placed alongside steamer at Central American and Mexican loading points, and these estimates were given.

Another conference was held on the same day between the manufacturers and H. K. S. Williams and J. C. Wickliffe, representing the Government, at which, after considerable discussion, Mr. Williams stated that he would recommend the payment by the Government of the following scale of prices on Mexican and Central American mahogany propeller stock under Signal Corps specifications No. 15028–A, as follows: $350 per M feet for firsts, seconds, and selects, and $280 for lower grades, f. o. b. eastern and middle western points, and $330 and $265, respectively, at New Orleans; and the same schedule of prices was stated for African mahogany f. o. b. eastern and middle western points. At these conferences Mr. Wickliffe was in attendance as Mr. Williams's adviser. He reviewed the manufacturers' estimates, and made calculations for Mr. Williams as to costs, and in view of his extensive experience there can be no doubt that considerable reliance was placed upon his opinion and advice. The terms of the contracts were virtually settled, in accordance with Mr. Williams's proposal, at the second conference on March 6, and these terms were subsequently approved by Mr. Lockhart. The formal contracts were not made until some time later. On March 26 the Aircraft Board recommended the execution of the contracts on the above terms for the following quantities:

For African mahogany:

	Minimum.	Maximum.
	Feet.	Feet.
Astoria Veneer Mills Dock Co.	2,000,000	3,500,000
I. T. Williams & Sons	500,000	1,500,000
Palmer & Parker Co.	600,000	1,500,000
C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co.	[1] 2,800,000	2,800,000
Talge Mahogany Co.	2,130,000	2,453,000

[1] Amended to read 1,730,000 minimum.

For Central American and Mexican mahogany:

	Minimum.	Maximum.
	Feet.	Feet.
Huddleston & Marsh Mahogany Co.	1,753,000	3,000,000
Astoria Veneer Mills & Dock Co.	1,500,000	2,500,000
Lewis Thompson & Co.	1,500,000	2,000,000
Otis Manufacturing Co.	1,000,000	2,000,000
Frieburg Lumber Co.	500,000	1,250,000
I. T. Williams & Sons	753,000	2,000,000
Palmer & Parker Co.	330,000	753,000
C. C. Mengel & Bro.	2,800,000	2,800,000

On April 16 the Aircraft Board recommended the making of a contract with the S. B. Vrooman Co. for Central American or Mexican mahogany 500,000 feet minimum and 1,500,000 maximum.

It is hardly necessary to say that it was a gross impropriety for corporations or firms, either individually or collectively, to pay additional compensation to an employee of the Government, and for the employee to receive such compensation, for services in relation to contracts and transactions in which the corporations or firms were directly and pecuniarily interested. It is not found, however, that there is any statute making this a criminal offense unless it is a case within the statute against bribery or proves to be part of a fraudulent scheme to take advantage of the Government or part of an endeavor to induce a violation of law.

The act of March 3, 1917 (ante, p. 25), making it a crime to pay additional compensation to an employee of the Government or for an employee to receive such additional compensation, only applies to such contributions after July 1, 1919. The occasion of this statute, it is understood, was criticism of payments of additional compensation made to experts in the employ of the Government where, however, the employee in the Government service was not acting in matters in which the person or corporation contributing had any pecuniary interest or motive of gain. Contributions for the support of those who have made sacrifices in undertaking war work for the Government are doubtless made in many instances, but there is no analogy between cases of this general description and payments of additional compensation to employees of the Government by those having direct pecuniary interest in the transactions in which the employee acts as the Government's agent. But under the statute against bribery (Criminal Code, secs. 39, 117) it must be proved that the payment was made or received with intent to influence the decision or action of the representative of the Government on a question which may be brought before him in his official capacity or in his place of trust or profit or to influence him to commit, aid, collude in or allow a fraud, or to make opportunity for the commission of a fraud, on the United States, or to induce the employee to do or omit to do an act in violation of his lawful duty. Whether in the present case, in the circumstances disclosed, any charge of this sort could properly be made would largely depend upon the question whether the terms and prices secured by the mahogany manufacturers were fair and reasonable or could be deemed excessive and the result of improper influence.

In view of the intimate relation of the representatives of the Government, who took part in the negotiations, to the manufacturers, it is obviously appropriate that there should be a fair and impartial examination of the transactions by a body competent to make a survey and determination of questions of costs and profits. Testimony has been given in the present inquiry tending to show that the prices were high. Lower prices under prior orders and offers are referred to. On the other hand, the manufacturers urge that in view of the peculiar conditions of the industry, the difficulties attending the procurement of logs, and the risks taken by reason of the small percentage of lumber suitable for propeller material, the prices and terms were in all respects fair; that Mr. Williams, Mr. Wickliffe, Mr. Vrooman, and Mr. McCullough took their positions simply because of the necessity of having men in their respective places who were qualified by experience, and that throughout the transactions all the persons concerned have been moved solely by the desire to serve the Government. It was manifestly impossible in the course of the present inquiry to make such a survey of the mahogany industry as to reach a satisfactory conclusion with respect to the cost of producing the required mahogany, and as to the fairness of prices and terms. This sort of investigation would require special facilities of the kind which are at the command of the Federal Trade Commission, and through its instrumentality it is believed that such a survey of the industry and a determination of fair costs and profits can be made. Upon its report as to the cost of producing the required mahogany, it can readily be decided whether there is ground for prosecution by reason of the transactions which have been disclosed in this inquiry.

AFRICAN MAHOGANY.

Attention should be called to the fact that the contracts with the mahogany manufacturers called for considerable quantities of African mahogany. It appears that prior to the war large importations of mahogany had been made from Africa. Thus, in 1914 out of total importations of mahogany logs of 70,914,000 feet, there were 31,177,000 feet of African mahogany. At the first conference with the Government representatives on January 21, 1918, as the minutes kept by these representatives show, Mr. Mengel had suggested the increased supply which could be obtained from Africa, and Mr. Leary, of Ichabod T. Williams & Sons, "described his efforts to induce the Signal Corps to use African mahogany." Offers of African mahogany were made in proposals by several of the mahogany manufacturers under date of March 6. Thus, in the proposal then sent to the Signal Corps by C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co., it was stated that his company had at Axim, Africa (on the gold coast) "awaiting steamers 3,000,000 feet of sound, fresh, logs"; and also at Axim "now in streams tributary to it and available for the June rains 4,000,000 feet, and these logs, located as they are, and from the best information we have, pretty nearly sure to be delivered at Axim on the June rains, as they were put in pretty good, safe streams by our own men in our own employ and paid by us, and put in streams selected so that they would come out on light water."

The advisability of using African mahogany as propeller material, however, was far from clear. It was not regarded as within the original specifications, but the modified specifications adopted on February 14, 1918 (No. 15028–A), stated that African mahogany (Khaya senegalensis mahogani) was approved by the Signal Corps. Despite this statement the question was not regarded as settled. On February 13, 1918, H. S. Betts, Acting Assistant Forester, in reply to a letter of Capt. Oakleaf, of the Signal Corps, stated that it was "undoubtedly true that the term 'African mahogany' without further specifying as to kind of wood would include several species which are inferior in quality for propellors," but after referring to various tests quoted a report from the Forest Products Laboratory that the African mahogany was "practically the equal of the Central American species and could be substituted satisfactorily for the latter."

On February 26, H. K. S. Williams wrote to Maj. Gray, of the Production Engineering Department, that he was "anxiously awaiting information as to whether African mahogany has been approved for use for the manufacture of propellers for battle and bombing aeroplanes." He said that he had reported the matter a number of times to his superiors and had been told to communicate with Maj. Gray, and after referring to communications he had received on the subject, he asked for a reply by telegraph. On March 1 the Production Engineering Department telegraphed its answer to H. K. S. Williams, as follows:

"This department is not favorably disposed toward African mahogany for combat propellers and does not see why it should be shipped here and then back to Europe. Can not arrangements be made to have walnut for English diverted to our propeller manufacturers and to ship African mahogany to England? There is much poor African mahogany on American market. In any event for safe use African mahogany would have to be inspected at the source to make sure that we obtained the proper varieties and proper wood. We feel further that with provision for splicing which has been adopted there should be enough of other woods available to meet the propeller requirements."

Before this was received a telegram was sent on the same day to Maj. Gray, with the signature of the Materials Department, to the effect that they were "anxiously awaiting telegraphic reply to letter February 26;" and on March 2 the Production Engineering Department, notwithstanding the statements in its telegram of March 1, telegraphed to the Materials Department as follows:

"Regarding use of African mahogany for combat and bombing airplane propellers, advise that such wood is acceptable for use in these propellers."

And on March 16 the Airplane Engineering Department (by Mr. Caldwell, on behalf of Maj. Marmon) wrote to Maj. Gray, of the Production Engineering Department, referring to tests of propellers made of African mahogany at Langley Field and McCook Field, and stated the following order of preference for propeller woods: (1) Walnut; (2) Honduras mahogany; (3) cherry; (4) African mahogany; (5) quarter-sawed poplar; (6) quarter-sawed white oak. Mr. Caldwell stated further that the following species of African mahogany were acceptable: (1) Grand Bassan; (2) Lagos; (3) Benin; also that there was an African wood similar to mahogany known as "Iroko" which had been found acceptable in the English propeller construction. On March 21 Mr. Caldwell wrote to Lieut. Col. Horner, of the Equipment Division, stating that they had definitely ascertained that the wood they had tested came from Axim, and that "this wood would be acceptable at least to the extent of three or four million feet." Mr. Wickliffe, on behalf of Mr. Lockhart, of the Materials Department, sent the following memorandum to the contract section on the same day (Mar. 21):

"It is only recently that the use of African mahogany has been authorized in the construction of propellers, and therefore the entrance of purchase request to cover the quantities of African mahogany shown in the attached proposals" (of the mahogany manufacturers) "has been withheld pending such authorization. Permission has now been received for the use of this wood and purchase requests are being sent to the priority section to-day covering the quantity of African mahogany shown in the proposals of Astoria Veneer Mills & Dock Co., Palmer & Parker Co., Ichabod T. Williams & Sons, and C. C. Mengel & Bro. Co."

In view of the heavy demand for shipping facilities, a serious question arose with the Shipping Board as to the necessity of getting in the African mahogany. In a conference between Mr. Karl de Laittre, representing the Shipping Board, and Mr. Sibley and Mr. Wickliffe, of the Signal Corps, on May 4, Mr. Wickliffe's attention was called to the lack of shipping space, and he replied (according to the stenographer's minutes produced by Mr. de Laittre):

"Yes; but this is a matter of contract. We make our contracts in good faith on both sides. It is not permissible for the Government to break these contracts; it would break the people making them. * * * We can not let these people down on the African product."

At another point in the conference Mr. Wickliffe said:

"If the timber from Africa is not brought forward, coming in June, and is allowed to deteriorate, the first part that will be hit will be the outside of the log, out of which the aircraft material comes. If we do not get this African lumber, we have exhausted every resource in walnut and cherry and in Central American mahogany. We do not yet know as to the use of quarter-sawed oak. Then if we do not get this timber we can not get any African logs before June of the following year."

Meanwhile the subject had been taken up for investigation by representatives of the War Trade Board and of the Forestry Service. Its importance lay in the fact that there was an abundance of white oak available in this country, and it developed that there was opinion of considerable weight in favor of the use of oak on combat propellers.

On June 2 a conference was held between representatives of the production engineering department, the airplane engineering department, the propeller inspection department, the propeller purchase section, and the wood inspection section of the Signal Corps. Mr. Caldwell, who had written the letter of March 21, represented the airplane engineering department. Lieut. Ryerson's memorandum of this conference contains the following:

"The question of the advisability of, and necessity for, importing African mahogany was carefully considered and it was the unanimous opinion that it would be possible to meet our present and future propeller lumber requirements from domestic or South American supplies, and that because of the difficulty of inspecting African mahogany its further use in propellers should be discouraged."

On August 3, 1918, Lieut. Ryerson, of the propeller section, having been asked for a statement of the requirements of woods for propeller stock, requested the production engineering department for "an up-to-date formal statement" as to the kinds of lumber to be specified for combat propellers in their order of preference. This brought a reply under date of August 7 from the production engineering department, through Prof. J. S. MacGregor (head of the physical testing department, school of mines, Columbia University), as follows:

"Answering your memorandum of August 3, requesting information on kinds of wood for propellers, we advise you herewith that this department has authorized the use of the following woods for combat propellers. The list is given in the order of their preference:

"Black walnut.
"True mahogany (Honduras).
"Cherry.
"Quarter-sawed white oak.
"African mahogany."

The objection to African mahogany (aside from the shipping problem) was that it varied considerably in quality and that inspection of it so far from its source would make it difficult to be sure that the right species was received. Throughout the controversy Mr. Wickliffe has expressed his views with considerable emphasis and has thrown the weight of his influence in favor of contracts for African mahogany and of the provision of shipping facilities to bring it in. In support of his position he has produced a memorandum, under date of August 23, signed by Charles Day, as special assistant to the Secretary of War, to the effect that "while oak propellers are being used with satisfactory results in connection with our training planes, they have not been adopted for planes for active service overseas on account of unsatisfactory results obtained abroad when their use has been attempted for any considerable period."

Mr. Wickliffe has also presented a letter under date of July 19 from Lieut. Hollande, in charge of wood purchasing for the French Government, in which it is said that "we are buying a very great quantity of African mahogany in France direct from our colonies"; also a letter received from the office of the British War Mission giving information to the effect that "the home authorities proposed during 1919 to use British Honduras and West African mahogany exclusively for propeller construction, cutting out walnut completely," and that demands from factories in England for propeller lumber are met "indiscriminately by the supply of either British Honduras or West African mahogany, the latter being considered as equivalent to the former for all purposes."

On the other hand, a very recent cablegram (September 28) from the scientific attaché to the American Embassy in London, in answer to an inquiry of the Research Information Service here, states that "authorities, British opinion, and practice placing walnut and Kanduranian, Nicaraguan, Cuban mahogany ahead of African. British would not use African if sufficient quantities of above were available. African used only in combination with other woods." The statement to the contrary as to British practice is said to be incorrect, and it is added: "British have not tested oak, cherry, poplar sufficiently to make comparison. American Army wood experts now here state A. E. F. satisfied with oak and have advised Washington, D. C., accordingly. Poplar has also showed up well on tests. British unable to see any justification for United States using African mahogany in view of other furnishings available."

It is understood that ships for African mahogany were finally provided. Upon the evidence, it is apparent that the matter was the subject of discussion and presented grounds for differences of opinion. The interest, however, of some of the leading mahogany manufacturers in obtaining contracts for the delivery of African mahogany is apparent, and while the efforts to induce its purchase and transportation may have been based upon the belief that the wood was better than that available here, and that the supply was needed by the Government, the matter is one which should receive consideration in connection with the survey of the industry which has been suggested for the purpose of determining the fairness of the mahogany contracts and of the action taken under them.

3. SABOTAGE ACT—GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS.

There have been occurrences in various plants indicating efforts to injure war material, or to make it defective, or to conceal defects, but on investigation it has generally been very difficult to find sufficient basis for criminal prosecution, either for lack of evidence as to the particular individual who had committed the act, or because on close examination it appeared that the condition of the material could be fairly attributed to carelessness, and evidence of criminal intent was wanting.

HAMMONDSPORT PLANT OF THE CURTISS CO.

In the course of this inquiry information was received that frequent attempts had been made to conceal defects in motors and their different parts which were in course of manufacture at the plant of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation at Hammondsport, N .Y. Evidence having been obtained as to specific instances of this practice, there was an investigation in July last before a grand jury in the western district of New York, John W. Ryan, Esq., of Buffalo, being appointed special counsel for the purpose, which resulted in the return of indictments against Lewis Longwell and Hector Bordeau, subforemen in the assembly room of the Hammondsport plant, under section 3 of the sabotage act of April 20, 1918. Demurrers to these indictments have been overruled and the cases are awaiting trial.

NORTH ELMWOOD PLANT.

In view of the conditions found at the North Elmwood plant of the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, there was a special investigation through special agents of the Department of Justice for the purpose of discovering violations of the sabotage act, with the result that evidence was brought before the grand jury in the western district of New York, John W. Ryan, Esq., acting as special counsel, and indictments were obtained in September against Richard Eastman, foreman of the propeller department; Frank Truell, an assistant foreman; and David Rogovan, a workman, under the sabotage act. On October 9 these defendants pleaded guilty and were fined $500 each.

LIBERTY IRON WORKS.

Testimony given in this inquiry in relation to alleged irregularities at the Liberty Iron Works at Sacramento, Cal., led to a special investigation in charge of John W. Preston, Esq., special assistant to the Attorney General, before the grand jury at Sacramento in September last. Considerable testimony has been taken, but no indictments have been returned.

4. CROSS-LICENSE AGREEMENT AS TO RIGHTS UNDER AIRPLANE PATENTS.

In view of claims under alleged patent rights, and with the object of facilitating aircraft production by providing for manufacture on a definie basis, a corporation was formed under the laws of the State of New York known as the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association (Inc.). This corporation entered into an agreement with its "subscribers"—that is, its stockholders—called the cross-license agreement. The Government is not a party to the agreement, but it was recommended by the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, was indorsed by the Aircraft Board, and received the approval of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

By the cross-license agreement the subscribers grant to each other licenses under all airplane patents now or hereafter owned or controlled by them in the United States, its territories and dependencies (except foreign patents and certain specified patents); the corporation is designated as the agent of the subscribers to execute licenses accordingly; each subscriber agrees that it will not enter into any agreement or arrangements whereby its privileges under United States airplane patents or inventions will be diminished or surrendered so as to exclude or restrict the operation of the agreement, and that it will not grant licenses under any such patents for use in airplanes with reference to which it is receiving royalties under the agreement, to any other person, firm, or corporation on more favorable or lower terms of royalty than those provided in the agreements, or which may become more favorable or lower during the term of the license. Under the agreement in its original form, in providing for the payments to be made by subscribers, it is stipulated that each subscriber shall pay to the corporation $200 for each airplane sold and delivered by the subscriber until the Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation and the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation (these corporations claiming to hold basic patents) had each been paid the sum of $2,000,000. A supplemental agreement has since been made modifying the provision for payments by subscribers and providing that the aggregate payments to both the Wright-Martin Corporation and the Curtiss Co. should be $2,000,000 instead of $4,000,000.

The agreement has been criticized upon the ground that its provisions constitute a hindrance to the progress of invention in the important airplane field and as being in restraint of trade. Whatever ground for criticism exists in this respect is to be found in the terms of the agreement itself, as these are quite definite and determine its operation and effect. I shall not deal with the question of the legality of the agreement, as the question was specifically submitted by the Secretary of War to the Attorney General whether the association and the agreement were in contravention of the antitrust statutes of the United States, and the opinion was expressed by the Attorney General that they were not. That disposed of the question, in the absence of a contrary decision by the courts so far as the action of the Executive department is concerned.

To the question whether the patents of the Wright-Martin Co. and of the Curtiss Co. are basic patents, and whether the payments for which the agreement provides constitute a proper compensation for the rights conferred, it would require an exhaustive examination of the patent situation to give a satisfactory answer, and this inquiry has furnished no opportunity for such examination. For this reason no opinion is expressed upon the point further than to say that, if the validity of the agreement be assumed, the amount of the payments was a matter of sound administrative discretion, and there is no ground for the conclusion that the amount as fixed in the supplemental agreement could not fairly be allowed. It is also asserted that the Government is left liable to other claimants, but this also requires an opinion upon the validity of certain patent claims which could not be dealt with in this inquiry.

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. The controlling facts and the conclusions in relation to the matters reviewed have been stated under appropriate headings. It would be impossible to restate them in a brief summary. The defective organization of the work of aircraft production and the serious lack of competent direction of that work by the responsible officers of the Signal Corps, to which the delays and waste were chiefly due, were matters for administrative correction through unification of effort under competent control. The provisions of the criminal statutes do not reach inefficiency.

It is not within the province of this report to make recommendations with respect to administrative policy, but it should be said that under the direction of Mr. Ryan and Mr. Potter there has been improvement in organization, and progress has been made in gratifying measure.

2. The evidence discloses conduct, which, although of a reprehensible character, can not be regarded as affording a sufficient basis for charges under existing statutes, but there are certain acts shown, not only highly improper in themselves but of especial significance, which should lead to disciplinary measures. The evidence with respect to Col. Edward A. Deeds should be presented to the Secretary of War to the end that Col. Deeds may be tried by court-martial under articles 95 and 96 of the Articles of War for his conduct (1) in acting as confidential adviser of his former business associate, H. E. Talbott, of the Dayton Wright Airplane Co., and in conveying information to Mr. Talbott in an improper manner, with respect to the transaction of business between that company and the division of the Signal Corps of which Col. Deeds was the head; and (2) in giving to the representatives of the Committee on Public Information a false and misleading statement with respect to the progress of aircraft production for the purpose of publication, with the authority of the Secretary of War.

3. The absence of proper appreciation of the obvious impropriety of transactions by Government officers and agents with firms or corporations in which they are interested compels the conclusion that public policy demands that the statutory provisions bearing upon this conduct should be strictly enforced. It is therefore recommended that the officers found to have had transactions on behalf of the Government with corporations in the pecuniary profits of which they had an interest should be prosecuted under section 41 of the Criminal Code.

4. The Federal Trade Commission should be requested to report upon the proper cost of mahogany for airplane propellers, to the end that upon the coming in of its report the question of the propriety of further action with respect to the transactions of the Mahogany Manufacturers and Importers' Association may be determined.

5. It is recommended that the representatives of the Department of Justice should keep in touch with the progress of the reaudit of accounts, so that it may be advised of the complete enforcement of the rights of the Government in final settlement of accounts and that the Government has been fully protected against unnecessary loss through waste and the absence of suitable factory supervision.

6. Permit me also to suggest that a special division or subdivision of the present Bureau of Investigation in the Department of Justice should be assigned to the consideration of suggested delinquencies in connection with aircraft production, so that the work already done may be appropriately followed up. In particular it is recommended that the activities in relation to spruce production, which, being largely centered on the Pacific coast, it was impracticable to embrace in the present inquiry, should be carefully scrutinized.

I have the honor to remain,

Respectfully, yours,

(Signed) CHARLES E. HUGHES.

APPENDIX B.

Report of Gen. Pershing.

NOVEMBER 20, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In response to your request, I have the honor to submit this brief summary of the organization and operation of the American Expeditionary Force from May 26, 1917, until the signing of the armistice November 11, 1918. Pursuant to your instructions, immediately upon receiving my orders I selected a small staff and proceeded to Europe in order to become familiar with conditions at the earliest possible moment.

The warmth of our reception in England and France was only equaled by the readiness of the commanders in chief of the veteran armies of the allies and their staffs to place their experience at our disposal. In consultation with them, the most effective means of cooperation of effort was considered. With French and British Armies at their maximum strength, and all efforts to dispossess the enemy from his firmly intrenched positions in Belgium and France failed, it was necessary to plan for an American force adequate to turn the scale in favor of the allies. Taking account of the strength of the central powers at that time, the immensity of the problem which confronted us could hardly be overestimated. The first requisite being an organization that could give intelligent direction to effort, the formation of a General Staff occupied my early attention.

GENERAL STAFF.

A well-organized General Staff, through which the commander exercises his functions, is essential to a successful modern army. However capable our division, our battalion, and our companies as such, success would be impossible without thoroughly coordinated endeavor. A General Staff broadly organized and trained for war had not hitherto existed in our Army. Under the Commander in Chief, this staff must carry out the policy and direct the details of administration, supply, preparation, and operations of the Army as a whole, with all special branches and bureaus subject to its control. As models to aid us we had the veteran French General Staff and the experience of the British, who had similarly formed an organization to meet the demands of a great army. By selecting from each the features best adapted to our basic organization, and fortified by our own early experience in the war, the development of our great General Staff system was completed.

The General Staff is naturally divided into five groups, each with its chief, who is an assistant to the Chief of the General Staff. G. 1 is in charge of organization and equipment of troops, replacements, tonnage, priority of overseas shipment, the auxiliary welfare association, and cognate subjects; G. 2 has censorship, enemy intelligence, gathering and disseminating information, preparation of maps, and all similar subjects; G. 3 is charged with all strategic studies and plans, movement of troops, and the supervision of combat operations; G. 4 coordinates important questions of supply, construction, transport arrangements for combat, and of the operations of the service of supply, and of hospitalization and the evacuation of the sick and wounded; G. 5 supervises the various schools, and has general direction and coordination of education and training.

The first chief of staff was Col. (now Maj. Gen.) James G. Harbord, who was succeeded in May, 1918, by Maj. Gen. James W. McAndrew. To these officers, to the deputy chief of staff, and to the assistant chiefs of staff, who, as heads of section, aided them, great credit is due for the results obtained not only in perfecting the general staff organization but in applying correct principles to the multiplicity of problems that have arisen.

ORGANIZATION AND TRAINING.

After a thorough consideration of allied organizations it was decided that our combat division should consist of four regiments of Infantry of 3,000 men, with three battalions to regiment and four companies of 250 men each to a battalion, and of an Artillery brigade of three regiments, a machine-gun battalion, an Engineer regiment, a trench-mortar battery, a signal battalion, wagon trains, and the headquarters staffs and military police. These, with medical and other units, made a total of over 28,000 men, or practically double the size of a French or German division. Each corps would normally consist of six divisions—four combat and one depot and one replacement division—and also two regiments of Cavalry, and each army of from three to five corps. With four divisions fully trained, a corps could take over an American sector with two divisions in line and two in reserve, with the depot and replacement divisions prepared to fill the gaps in the ranks.

Our purpose was to prepare an integral American force which should be able to take the offensive in every respect. Accordingly, the development of a self-reliant Infantry by thorough drill in the use of rifle and in the tactics of open warfare was always uppermost. The plan of training after arrival in France allowed a division one month for acclimatization and instruction in small units from battalions down, a second month in quiet trench sectors by battalion, and a third month after it came out of the trenches, when it should be trained as a complete division in war of movement.

Very early a system of schools was outline and started which should have the advantage of instruction by officers direct from the front. At the great school center at Langres, one of the first to be organized, was the staff school, where the principles of general staff work as laid down in our own organizations were taught to carefully selected officers. Men in the ranks who had shown qualities of leadership were sent to the school of candidates for commissions. A school of the line taught younger officers the principles of leadership, tactics, and the use of the different weapons. In the Artillery school at Saumer young officers were taught the fundamental principles of modern artillery, while at Issoudun an immense plant was built for training cadets in aviation. These and other schools, with their well-considered curriculums for training in every branch of our organization, were coordinated in a manner best to develop an efficient army out of willing and industrious young men, many of whom had not before known even the rudiments of military technique. Both Marshal Haig and Gen. Petain placed officers and men at our disposal for instructional purposes, and we are deeply indebted for the opportunities given to profit by their veteran experience.

AMERICAN ZONE.

The eventual place the American Army should take on the western front was to a large extent influenced by the vital questions of communication and supply. The northern ports of France were crowded by the British Armies' shipping and supplies, while the southern ports, though otherwise at our service, had not adequate port facilities for our purposes, and these we should have to build. The already overtaxed railway system behind the active front in northern France would not be available for us as lines of supply, and those leading from the southern ports of northeastern France would be unequal to our needs without much new construction. Practically all warehouses, supply depots, and regulating stations must be provided by fresh constructions. While France offered as such material as she had to spare after a drain of three years enormous quantities of material had to be brought across the Atlantic.

With such a problem any temporization or lack of definiteness in making plans might cause failure even with victory within our grasp. Moreover, broad plans commensurate with our national purpose and resources would bring conviction of our power to every soldier in the front line, to the nations associated with us in the war, and to the enemy. The tonnage for material for necessary construction for the supply of an army of three and perhaps four million men would require a mammoth program of shipbuilding at home, and miles of dock construction in France, with a corresponding large project for additional railways and for storage depots.

All these considerations led to the inevitable conclusion that if we were to handle and supply the great forces deemed essential to win the war we must utilize the southern ports of France—Bordeaux, La Pallice, St. Nazaire, and Brest—and the comparatively unused railway systems leading therefrom to the northeast. Generally speaking, then, this would contemplate the use of our forces against the enemy somewhere in that direction, but the great depots of supply must be centrally located, preferably in the area included by Tours, Bourges, and Chateauroux, so that our armies could be supplied with equal facility wherever they might be serving on the western front.

To build up such a system there were talented men in the Regular Army, but more experts were necessary than the Army could furnish. Thanks to the patriotic spirit of our people at home, there came from civil life men trained for every sort of work involved in building and managing the organization necessary to handle and transport such an army and keep it supplied. With such assistance the construction and general development of our plans have kept pace with the growth of the forces, and the Service of Supply is now able to discharge from ships and move 45,000 tons daily, besides transporting troops and material in the conduct of active operations.

As to organization, all the administrative and supply services, except The Adjutant General's, Inspector General's, and Judge Advocate General's Departments which remain at general headquarters, have been transferred to the headquarters of the services of supplies at Tours under a commanding general responsible to the commander in chief for supply of the armies. The Chief Quartermaster, Chief Surgeon, Chief Signal Officer, Chief of Ordnance, Chief of Air Service, Chief of Chemical Warfare, the general purchasing agent in all that pertains to questions of procurement and supply, the Provost Marshal General in the maintenance of order in general, the Director General of Transportation in all that affects such matters, and the Chief Engineer in all matters of administration and supply, are subordinate to the Commanding General of the Service of Supply, who, assisted by a staff especially organized for the purpose, is charged with the administrative coordination of all these services.

The transportation department under the Service of Supply directs the operation, maintenance, and construction of railways, the operation of terminals, the unloading of ships, and transportation of material to warehouses or to the front. Its functions make necessary the most intimate relationship between our organization and that of the French, with the practical result that our transportation department has been able to improve materially the operations of railways generally. Constantly laboring under a shortage of rolling stock, the transportation department has nevertheless been able by efficient management to meet every emergency.

The Engineer Corps is charged with all construction, including light railways and roads. It has planned and constructed the many projects required, the most important of which are the new wharves at Bordeau and Nantes, and the immense storage depots at La Pallice, Montoir, and Gievres, besides innumerable hospitals and barracks in various ports of France. These projects have all been carried on by phases keeping pace with our needs. The Forestry Service under the Engineer Corps has cut the greater part of the timber and railway ties required.

To meet the shortage of supplies from America, due to lack of shipping, the representatives of the different supply departments were constantly in search of available material and supplies in Europe. In order to coordinate these purchases and to prevent competition between our departments, a general purchasing agency was created early in our experience to coordinate our purchases and, if possible, induce our allies to apply the principle among the allied armies. While there was no authority for the general use of appropriations, this was met by grouping the purchasing representatives of the different departments under one control, charged with the duty of consolidating requisitions and purchases. Our efforts to extend the principle have been signally successful, and all purchases for the allied armies are now on an equitable and cooperative basis. Indeed, it may be said that the work of this bureau has been thoroughly efficient and businesslike.

ARTILLERY, AIRPLANES, AND TANKS.

Our entry into the war found us with few of the auxiliaries necessary for its conduct in the modern sense. Among our most important deficiencies in material were artillery, aviation, and tanks. In order to meet our requirements as rapidly as possible, we accepted the offer of the French Government to provide us with the necessary artillery equipment of 75s, one 55-millimeter howitzer, and one 55 G. P. F. gun from their own factories for 30 divisions. The wisdom of this course is fully demonstrated by the fact that, although we soon began the manufacture of these classes of guns at home, there were no guns of the calibers mentioned manufactured in America on our front at the date the armistice was signed. The only guns of these types produced at home thus far received in France are one hundred and nine 75-millimeter guns.

In aviation we were in the same situation, and here again the French Government came to our aid until our own aviation program should be under way. We obtained from the French the necessary planes for training our personnel, and they have provided us with a total of 2,676 pursuit, observation, and bombing planes. The first airplanes received from home arrived in May, and altogether we have received 1,379. The first American squadron completely equipped by American production, including airplanes, crossed the German lines on August 7, 1918. As to tanks, we were also compelled to rely upon the French. Here, however, we were less fortunate, for the reason that the French production could barely meet the requirements of their own armies.

It should be fully realized that the French Government has always taken a most liberal attitude and has been most anxious to give us every possible assistance in meeting our deficiencies in these as well as in other respects. Our dependence upon France for artillery, aviation, and tanks was, of course, due to the fact that our industries had not been exclusively devoted to military production. All credit is due our own manufacturers for their efforts to meet our requirements, as at the time the armistice was signed we were able to look forward to the early supply of practically all our necessities from our own factories.

The welfare of the troops touches my responsibility as Commander in Chief to the mothers and fathers and kindred of the men who came to France in the impressionable period of youth. They could not have the privilege accorded European soldiers during their periods of leave of visiting their families and renewing their home ties. Fully realizing that the standard of conduct that should be established for them must have a permanent influence in their lives and on the character of their future citizenship, the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association, Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army, and the Jewish Welfare Board, as auxiliaries in this work, were encouraged in every possible way. The fact that our soldiers, in a land of different customs and language, have borne themselves in a manner in keeping with the cause for which they fought, is due not only to the efforts in their behalf but much more to other high ideals, their discipline, and their innate sense of self-respect. It should be recorded, however, that the members of these welfare societies have been untiring in their desire to be of real service to our officers and men. The patriotic devotion of these representative men and women has given a new significance to the Golden Rule, and we owe to them a debt of gratitude that can never be repaid.

COMBAT OPERATIONS.

During our periods of training in the trenches some of our divisions had engaged the enemy in local combats, the most important of which was Seicheprey by the Twenty-sixth on April 20, in the Toul sector, but none had participated in action as a unit. The First Division, which had passed through the preliminary stages of training, had gone to the trenches for its first period of instruction at the end of October, and by March 21, when the German offensive in Picardy began, we had four divisions with experience in the trenches, all of which were equal to any demands of battle action. The crisis which this offensive developed was such that our occupation of an American sector must be postponed.

On March 28 I placed at the disposal of Marshal Foch, who had been agreed upon as commander in chief of the allied armies, all of our forces to be used as he might decide. At his request the first division was transferred from the Toul sector to a position in reserve at Chaumont en Vexin. As German superiority in numbers required prompt action, an agreement was reached at the Abbeville conference of the allied premiers and commanders and myself on May 2 by which British shipping was to transport 10 American divisions to the British Army area, where they were to be trained and equipped, and additional British shipping was to be provided for as many divisions as possible for use elsewhere.

On April 26 the First Division had gone into the line in the Montdidier salient on the Picardy battle front. Tactics had been suddenly revolutionized to those of open warfare, and our men, confident of the results of their training, were eager for the test. On the morning of May 28 this division attacked the commanding German position in its front, taking with splendid dash the town of Cantigny and all other objectives, which were organized and held steadfastly against vicious counterattacks and galling artillery fire. Although local, this brilliant action had an electrical effect, as it demonstrated our fighting qualities under extreme battle conditions, and also that the enemy's troops were not altogether invincible.

The Germans' Aisne offensive, which began on May 27, had advanced rapidly toward the River Marne and Paris, and the allies faced a crisis equally as grave as that of the Picardy offensive in March. Again every available man was placed at Marshal Foch's disposal, and the Third Division, which had just come from its preliminary training in the trenches, was hurried to the Marne. Its motorized machine-gun battalion preceded the other units and successfully held the bridgehead at the Marne, opposite Chateau-Thierry. The Second Division, in reserve near Montdidier, was sent by motor trucks and other available transport to check the progress of the enemy toward Paris. The division attacked and retook the town and railroad station at Boureseches and sturdily held its ground against the enemy's best guard divisions. In the battle of Belleau Wood, which followed, our men proved their superiority and gained a strong tactical position, with far greater loss to the enemy than to ourselves. On July 1, before the Second was relieved, it captured the village of Vaux with most splendid precision.

Meanwhile our Second Corps, under Maj. Gen. George W. Read, had been organized for the command of our divisions with the British, which were held back in training areas or assigned to second-line defenses. Five of the ten divisions were withdrawn from the British area in June, three to relieve divisions in Lorraine and the Vosges and two to the Paris area to join the group of American divisions which stood between the city and any farther advance of the enemy in that direction.

The great June-July troop movement from the States was well under way, and, although these troops were to be given some preliminary training before being put into action, their very presence warranted the use of all the older divisions in the confidence that we did not lack reserves. Elements of the Forty-second Division were in the line east of Rheims against the German offensive of July 15, and held their ground unflinchingly. On the right flank of this offensive four companies of the Twenty-eighth Division were in position in face of the advancing waves of the German infantry. The Third Division was holding the bank of the Marne from the bend east of the mouth of the Surmelin to the west of Mézy, opposite Chateau-Thierry, where a large force of German infantry sought to force a passage under support of powerful artillery concentrations and under cover of smoke screens. A single regiment of the Third wrote one of the most brilliant pages in our military annals on this occasion. It prevented the crossing at certain points on its front while, on either flank the Germans, who had gained a footing, pressed forward. Our men, firing in three directions, met the German attacks with counterattacks at critical points and succeeded in throwing two German divisions into complete confusion, capturing 600 prisoners.

The great force of the German Chateau-Thierry offensive established the deep Marne salient, but the enemy was taking chances, and the vulnerability of this pocket to attack might be turned to his disadvantage. Seizing this opportunity to support my conviction, every division with any sort of training was made available for use in a counteroffensive. The place of honor in the thrust toward Soissons on July 18 was given to our First and Second Divisions, in company with chosen French divisions. Without the usual brief warning of a preliminary bombardment, the massed French and American artillery, firing by the map, laid down its rolling barrage at dawn while the infantry began its charge. The tactical handling of our troops under these trying conditions was excellent throughout the action. The enemy brought up large numbers of reserves and made a stubborn defense both with machine guns and artillery, but through five days' fighting the First Division continued to advance until it had gained the heights above Soissons and captured the village of Berzy-le-sec. The Second Division took Beau Repaire farm and Vierzy in a very rapid advance and reached a position in front of Tigny at the end of its second day. These two divisions captured 7,000 prisoners and over 100 pieces of artillery.

The Twenty-sixth Division, which, with a French division, was under command of our First Corps, acted as a pivot of the movement toward Soissons. On the 18th it took the village of Torcy while the Third Division was crossing the Marne in pursuit of the retiring enemy. The Twenty-sixth attacked again on the 21st, and the enemy withdrew past the Chateau-Thierry-Soissons road. The Third Division, continuing its progress, took the heights of Mont St. Père and the villages of Chartèves and Jaulgonne in the face of both machine-gun and artillery fire.

On the 24th, after the Germans had fallen back from Trugny and Epieds, our Forty-second Division, which had been brought over from the Champagne, relieved the Twenty-sixth, and, fighting its way through the Forêt de Fère, overwhelmed the nest of machine guns in its path. By the 27th it had reached the Ourcq, whence the Third and Fourth Divisions were already advancing, while the French divisions with which we were cooperating were moving forward at other points.

The Third Division had made its advance into Roncheres Wood on the 29th and was relieved for rest by a brigade of the Thirty-second. The Forty-second and Thirty-second undertook the task of conquering the heights beyond Cierges, the Forty-second capturing Sergy and the Thirty-second capturing Hill 230, both American divisions joining in the pursuit of the enemy to the Vesle, and thus the operation of reducing the salient was finished. Meanwhile the Forty-second was relieved by the Fourth at Chéry-Chartreuve and the Thirty-second by the Twenty-eighth, while the Seventy-seventh Division took up a position on the Vesle. The operations of these divisions on the Vesle were under the Third Corps, Maj. Gen. Robert L. Bullard, commanding.

BATTLE OF ST. MIHIEL.

With the reduction of the Marne salient we could look forward to the concentration of our divisions in our own zone. In view of the forthcoming operation against the St. Mihiel salient, which had long been planned as our first offensive action on a large scale, the First Army was organized on August 10 under my personal command. While American units had held different divisional and corps sectors along the western front, there had not been up to this time, for obvious reasons, a distinct American sector; but, in view of the important parts the American forces were now to play, it was necessary to take over a permanent portion of the line. Accordingly on August 30 the line beginning at Port sur Seille, east of the Moselle and extending to the west through St. Mihiel, thence north to a point opposite Verdun, was placed under my command. The American sector was afterwards extended across the Meuse to the western edge of the Argonne Forest, and included the Second Colonial French, which held the point of the salient, and the Seventeenth French Corps, which occupied the heights above Verdun.

The preparation for a complicated operation against the formidable defenses in front of us included the assembling of divisions and of corps and army artillery, transport, aircraft, tanks, ambulances, the location of hospitals, and the molding together of all of the elements of a great modern army with its own railheads, supplied directly by our own service of supply. The concentration for this operation, which was to be a surprise, involved the movement, mostly at night, of approximately 600,000 troops, and required for its success the most careful attention to every detail.

The French were generous in giving us assistance in corps and army artillery, with its personnel, and we were confident from the start of our superiority over the enemy in guns of all calibers. Our heavy guns were able to reach Metz and to interfere seriously with German rail movements. The French Independent Air Force was placed under my command, which, together with the British bombing squadrons and our air forces, gave us the largest assembly of aviation that had ever been engaged in one operation on the western front.

From Les Eparges around the nose of the salient at St. Mihiel to the Moselle River the line was roughly 40 miles long and situated on commanding ground greatly strengthened by artificial defenses. Our First Corps (Eighty-second, Ninetieth, Fifth, and Second Divisions), under command of Maj. Gen. Hunter Liggett, restrung its right on Pont-a-Mousson, with its left joining our Third Corps (the Eighty-ninth, Forty-second, and First Divisions), under Maj. Gen. Joseph T. Dickman, in line to Xivray, were to swing in toward Vigneulles on the pivot of the Moselle River for the initial assault. From Xivray to Mouilly the Second Colonial French Corps was in line in the center and our Fifth Corps, under command of Maj. Gen. George H. Cameron, with our Twenty-sixth Division and a French division at the western base of the salient, were to attack three difficult hills—Les Eparges, Combres, and Amaramthe. Our First Corps had in reserve the Seventy-eighth Division, our Fourth Corps the Third Division, and our First Army the Thirty-fifth and Ninety-first Divisions, with the Eightieth and Thirty-third available. It should be understood that our corps organizations are very elastic, and that we have at no time had permanent assignments of divisions to corps.

After four hours' artillery preparation the seven American divisions in the front line advanced at 5 a. m. on September 12, assisted by a limited number of tanks manned partly by Americans and partly by the French. These divisions, accompanied by groups of wire cutters and others armed with bangalore torpedoes, went through the successive bands of barbed wire that protected the enemy's front line and support trenches in irresistible waves on schedule time, breaking down all defense of an enemy demoralized by the great volume of our artillery fire and our sudden approach out of the fog.

Our First Corps advanced to Thiaucourt, while our Fourth Corps curved back to the southwest through Nonsard. The Second Colonial French Corps made the slight advance required of it on very difficult ground, and the Fifth Corps took its three ridges and repulsed a counter attack. A rapid march brought reserve regiments of a division of the Fifth Corps into Vigneulles in the early morning, where it linked up with patrols of our Fourth Corps, closing the salient and forming a new line west of Thiaucourt to Vigneulles and beyond Fresnes-en-Woevre. At the cost of only 7,000 casualties, mostly light, we had taken 16,000 prisoners and 443 guns, a great quantity of material, released the inhabitants of many villages from enemy domination, and established our lines in a position to threaten Metz. This signal success of the American First Army in its first offensive was of prime importance. The allies found they had a formidable army to aid them, and the enemy learned finally that he had one to reckon with.

MEUSE-ARGONNE OFFENSIVE, FIRST PHASE.

On the day after we had taken the St. Mihiel salient much of our corps and Army artillery which had operated at St. Mihiel and our divisions in reserve at other points were already on the move toward the area back of the line between the Meuse River and the western edge of the forest of Argonne. With the exception of St. Mihiel, the old German front line from Switzerland to the east of Rheims was still intact. In the general attack all along the line the operation assigned the American Army as the hinge of this allied offensive was directed toward the important railroad communications of the German armies through Mezieres and Sedan. The enemy must hold fast to this part of his lines or the withdraw of his forces with four years' accumulation of plants and material would be dangerously imperiled.

The German Army had as yet shown no demoralization and, while the mass of its troops had suffered in morale, its first-class divisions, and notably its machine-gun defense, were exhibiting remarkable tactical efficiency as well as courage. The German general staff was fully aware of the consequences of a success on the Meuse-Argonne line. Certain that he would do everything in his power to oppose us, the action was planned with as much secrecy as possible, and was undertaken with the determination to use all our divisions in forcing decision. We expected to draw the best German divisions to our front and to consume them while the enemy was held under grave apprehension lest our attack should break his line, which it was our firm purpose to do.

Our right flank was protected by the Meuse, while our left embraced the Argonne Forest, whose ravines, hills, and elaborate defense screened by dense thickets had been generally considered impregnable. Our order of battle from right to left was the Third Corps, from the Meuse to Malancourt, with the Thirty-third, Eightieth, and Fourth Divisions in line, and to Third Division as corps reserve; the Fifth Corps, from Malancourt to Vauquois, with Seventy-ninth, Eighty-seventh, and Ninety-first Divisions in line, and the Thirty-second in corps reserve; and the First Corps, from Vauquois to Vienne le Chateau, with Thirty-fifth, Twenty-eighth, and Seventy-seventh Divisions in line, and the Ninety-second in corps reserve. The Army reserve consisted of the First, Twenty-ninth, and Eighty-second Divisions.

On the night of September 25 our troops quietly took the place of the French who thinly held the line in this sector which had long been inactive. In the attack which began on the 26th we drove through the barbed-wire entanglements and the sea of shell craters across No Man's Land, mastering all the first-line defenses. Continuing on the 27th and 28th, against machine guns and artillery of an increasing number of enemy reserve divisions, we penetrated to a depth of from 3 to 7 miles, and took the village of Montfaucon and its commanding hill and Exermont, Gercourt, Cuisy, Septsarges, Malancourt, Ivoiry, Epinonville, Charpentry, Very, and other villages. East of the Meuse one of our divisions, which was with the Second Colonial French Corps, captured Marcheville and Rieville, giving further protection to the flank of our main body. We had taken 10,000 prisoners; we had gained our point of forcing the battle into the open and were prepared for the enemy's reaction, which was bound to come, as he had good roads and ample railroad facilities for bringing up his artillery and reserves.

In the chill rain of dark nights our engineers had to build new roads across spongy, shell-torn areas, repair broken roads beyond No Man's Land, and build bridges. Our gunners, with no thought of sleep, put their shoulders to wheels and dragropes to bring their guns through the mire in support of the infantry, now under the increasing fire of the enemy's artillery. Our attack had taken the enemy by surprise, but, quickly recovering himself, he began to fire counter attacks in strong force, supported by heavy bombardments, with large quantities of gas. From September 28 until October 4 we maintained the offensive against patches of woods defended by snipers and continuous lines of machine guns, and pushed forward our guns and transport, seizing strategical points in preparation for further attacks.

OTHER UNITS WITH ALLIES.

Other divisions attached to the allied armies were doing their part. It was the fortune of our Second Corps, composed of the Twenty-seventh and Thirtieth Divisions, which had remained with the British, to have a place of honor in cooperation with the Australian Corps on September 29 and October 1 in the assault on the Hindenburg line where the St. Quentin Canal passes through a tunnel under a ridge. The Thirtieth Division speedily broke through the main line of defense for all its objectives, while the Twenty-seventh pushed on impetuously through the main line until some of its elements reached Gouy. In the midst of the maze of trenches and shell craters and under cross-fire from machine guns the other elements fought desperately against odds. In this and in later actions, from October 6 to October 19, our Second Corps captured over 6,000 prisoners and advanced over 13 miles. The spirit and aggressiveness of these divisions have been highly praised by the British Army commander under whom they served.

On October 2–9 our Second and Thirty-sixth Divisions were sent to assist the French in an important attack against the old German positions before Rheims. The Second conquered the complicated defense works on their front against a persistent defense worthy of the grimmest period of trench warfare and attacked the strongly held wooded hill of Blanc Mont, which they captured in a second assault, sweeping over it with consummate dash and skill. This division then repulsed strong counterattacks before the village and cemetery of Ste. Etienne and took the town, forcing the Germans to fall back from before Rheims and yield positions they had held since September, 1914. On October 9 the Thirty-sixth Division relieved the Second, and in its first experience under fire withstood very severe artillery bombardment and rapidly took up the pursuit of the enemy, now retiring behind the Aisne.

MEUSE-ARGONNE OFFENSIVE, SECOND PHASE.

The allied progress elsewhere cheered the efforts of our men in this crucial contest as the German command threw in more and more first-class troops to stop our advance. We made steady headway in the almost impenetrable and strongly held Argonne forest, for despite this reinforcement it was our Army that was doing the driving. Our aircraft was increasing in skill and numbers and forcing the issue, and our Infantry and Artillery were improving rapidly with each new experience. The replacements fresh from home were put into exhausted divisions with little time for training, but they had the advantage of serving beside men who knew their business and who had almost become veterans overnight. The enemy had taken every advantage of the terrain, which especially favored the defense, by a prodigal use of machine guns manned by highly trained veterans and by using his artillery at short ranges. In the face of such strong frontal positions we should have been unable to accomplish any progress according to previously accepted standards, but I had every confidence in our aggressive tactics and the courage of our troops.

On October 4 the attack was renewed all along our front. The Third Corps tilting to the left followed the Brieulles-Cunel road; our Fifth Corps took Gesnes while the First Corps advanced for over 2 miles along the irregular valley of the Aire River and in the wooded hills of the Argonne that bordered the river, used by the enemy with all his art and weapons of defense. This sort of fighting continued against an enemy striving to hold every foot of ground and whose very strong counterattacks challenged us at every point. On the 7th the First Corps captured Chatel-Chehery and continued along the river to Cornay. On the east of Meuse sector one of the two divisions cooperating with the French captured Consenvoye and the Haumont Woods. On the 9th the Fifth Corps, in its progress up the Aire, took Fleville, and the Third Corps, which had continuous fighting against odds, was working its way through Brieulles and Cunel. On the 10th we had cleared the Argonne Forest of the enemy.

It was now necessary to constitute a second army, and on October 9 the immediate command of the First Army was turned over to Lieut. Gen. Hunter Liggett. The command of the Second Army, whose divisions occupied a sector in the Woevre, was given to Lieut. Gen. Robert L. Bullard, who had been commander of the First Division and then of the Third Corps. Maj. Gen. Dickman was transferred to the command of the First Corps, while the Fifth Corps was placed under Maj. Gen. Charles P. Summerall, who had recently commanded the First Division. Maj. Gen. John L. Hines, who had gone rapidly up from regimental to division commander, was assigned to the Third Corps. These four officers had been in France from the early days of the expedition and had learned their lessons in the school of practical warfare.

Our constant pressure against the enemy brought day by day more prisoners, mostly survivors from machine-gun nests captured in fighting at close quarters. On October 18 there was very fierce fighting in the Caures Woods east of the Meuse and in the Ormont Woods. On the 14th the First Corps took St. Juvin, and the Fifth Corps, in hand-to-hand encounters, entered the formidable Kriemhilde line, where the enemy had hoped to check us indefinitely. Later the Fifth Corps penetrated further the Kriemhilde line, and the First Corps took Champigneulles and the important town of Grandpre. Our dogged offensive was wearing down the enemy, who continued desperately to throw his best troops against us, thus weakening his line in front of our allies and making their advance less difficult.

DIVISIONS IN BELGIUM.

Meanwhile we were not only able to continue the battle, but our Thirty-seventh and Ninety-first Divisions were hastily withdrawn from our front and dispatched to help the French Army in Belgium. Detraining in the neighborhood of Ypres, these divisions advanced by rapid stages to the fighting line and were assigned to adjacent French corps. On October 31, in continuation of the Flanders offensive, they attacked and methodically broke down all enemy resistance. On November 3 the Thirty-seventh had completed its mission in dividing the enemy across the Escaut River and firmly established itself along the east bank included in the division zone of action. By a clever flanking movement troops of the Ninety-first Division captured Spitaals Bosschen, a difficult wood extending across the central part of the division sector, reached the Escaut, and penetrated into the town of Audenarde. These divisions received high commendation from their corps commanders for their dash and energy.

MEUSE ARGONNE—LAST PHASE.

On the 23d the Third and Fifth Corps pushed northward to the level of Bantheville. While we continued to press forward and throw back the enemy's violent counterattacks with great loss to him, a regrouping of our forces was under way for the final assault. Evidences of loss of morale by the enemy gave our men more confidence in attack and more fortitude in enduring the fatigue of incessant effort and the hardships of very inclement weather.

With comparatively well-rested divisions, the final advance in the Meuse-Argonne front was begun on November 1. Our increased artillery force acquitted itself magnificently in support of the advance, and the enemy broke before the determined infantry, which, by its persistent fighting of the past weeks and the dash of this attack, had overcome his will to resist. The Third Corps took Aincreville, Doulcon, and Andevanne, and the Fifth Corps took Landres et St. Georges and pressed through successive lines of resistance to Bayonville and Chennery. On the 2d the First Corps joined in the movement, which now became an impetuous onslaught that could not be stayed.

On the 3d advance troops surged forward in pursuit, some by motor trucks, while the artillery pressed along the country roads close behind. The First Corps reached Authe and Châtillon-Sur-Bar, the Fifth Corps, Fosse and Nouart, and the Third Corps Halles, penetrating the enemy's line to a depth of 12 miles. Our large caliber guns had advanced and were skillfully brought into position to fire upon the important lines at Montmedy, Longuyon, and Conflans. Our Third Corps crossed the Meuse on the 5th and the other corps, in the full confidence that the day was theirs, eagerly cleared the way of machine guns as they swept northward, maintaining complete coordination throughout. On the 6th a division of the First Corps reached a point on the Meuse opposite Sedan, 25 miles from our line of departure. The strategical goal which was our highest hope was gained. We had cut the enemy's main line of communications, and nothing but surrender or an armistice could save his army from complete disaster.

In all 40 enemy divisions had been used against us in the Meuse-Argonne battle. Between September 26 and November 6 we took 26,059 prisoners and 468 guns on this front. Our divisions engaged were the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Twenty-sixth, Twenty-eight, Twenty-ninth, Thirty-second, Thirty-third, Thirty-fifth, Thirty-seventh, Forty-second, Seventy-seventh, Seventy-eighth, Seventy-ninth, Eightieth, Eighty-second, Eighty-ninth, Ninetieth, and Ninety-first. Many of our divisions remained in line for a length of time that required nerves of steel, while others were sent in again after only a few days of rest. The First, Fifth, Twenty-sixth, Forty-second, Seventy-seventh, Eightieth, Eighty-ninth, and Ninetieth were in the line twice. Although some of the divisions were fighting their first battle, they soon became equal to the best.

OPERATIONS EAST OF THE MEUSE.

On the three days preceding November 10, the Third, the Second Colonial, and the Seventeenth French Corps fought a difficult struggle through the Meuse Hills south of Stenay and forced the enemy into the plain. Meanwhile, my plans for further use of the American forces contemplated an advance between the Meuse and the Moselle in the direction of Longwy by the First Army, while, at the same time, the Second Army should assure the offensive toward the rich iron fields of Briey. These operations were to be followed by an offensive toward Chateau-Salins east of the Moselle, thus isolating Metz. Accordingly, attacks on the American front had been ordered, and that of the Second Army was in progress on the morning of November 11, when instructions were received that hostilities should cease at 11 o'clock a. m.

At this moment the line of the American sector, from right to left, began at Port-Sur-Seille, thence across the Moselle to Vandieres, and through the Woevre to Bezonvaux in the foothills of the Meuse, thence along to the foothills and through the northern edge of the Woerve forests to the Meuse at Mouzay, thence along the Meuse connecting with the French under Sedan.

RELATIONS WITH THE ALLIES.

Cooperation among the allies has at all times been most cordial. A far greater effort has been put forth by the allied armies and staffs to assist us than could have been expected. The French Government and Army have always stood ready to furnish us with supplies, equipment, and transportation and to aid us in every way. In the towns and hamlets wherever our troops have been stationed or billeted the French people have everywhere received them more as relatives and intimate friends than as soldiers of a foreign army. For these things words are quite inadequate to express our gratitude. There can be no doubt that the relations growing out of our associations here assure a permanent friendship between the two peoples. Although we have not been so intimately associated with the people of Great Britain, yet their troops and ours when thrown together have always warmly fraternized. The reception of those of our forces who have passed through England and of those who have been stationed there has always been enthusiastic. Altogether it has been deeply impressed upon us that the ties of language and blood bring the British and ourselves together completely and inseparably.

STRENGTH.

There are in Europe altogether including a regiment and some sanitary units with the Italian Army and the organizations at Murmansk, also including those en route from the States, approximately 2,053,347 men, less our losses. Of this total there are in France 1,338,169 combatant troops. Forty divisions have arrived, of which the Infantry personnel of 10 have been used as replacements, leaving 30 divisions now in France organized into three armies of three corps each.

The losses of the Americans up to November 18 are: Killed and wounded, 36,145; died of disease, 14,811; deaths unclassified, 2,204; wounded, 179,625; prisoners, 2,163; missing, 1,160. We have captured about 44,000 prisoners and 1,400 guns, howitzers, and trench mortars.

COMMENDATION.

The duties of the General Staff, as well as those of the Army and corps staffs, have been very ably performed. Especially is this true when we consider the new and difficult problems with which they have been confronted. This body of officers, both as individuals and as an organization, have, I believe, no superiors in professional ability, in efficiency, or in loyalty.

Nothing that we have in France better reflects the efficiency and devotion to duty of Americans in general than the Service of Supply, whose personnel is thoroughly imbued with a patriotic desire to do its full duty. They have at all times fully appreciated their responsibility to the rest of the Army, and the results produced have been most gratifying.

Our Medical Corps is especially entitled to praise for the general effectiveness of its work both in hospital and at the front. Embracing men of high professional attainments, and splendid women devoted to their calling and untiring in their efforts, this department has made a new record for medical and sanitary proficiency.

The Quartermaster Department has had difficult and various tasks, but it has more than met all demands that have been made upon it. Its management and its personnel have been exceptionally efficient and deserve every possible commendation.

As to the more technical services, the able personnel of the Ordnance Department in France has splendidly fulfilled its functions, both in procurement and in forwarding the immense quantities of ordnance required. The officers and men and the young women of the Signal Corps have performed their duties with a large conception of the problem and with a devoted and patriotic spirit, to which the perfection of our communications daily testify. While the Engineer Corps has been referred to in another part of this report, it should be further stated that the work has required large vision and high professional skill, and great credit is due their personnel for the high proficiency that they have constantly maintained.

Our aviators have no equals in daring or in fighting ability and have left a record of courageous deeds that will ever remain a brilliant page in the annals of our Army. While the Tank Corps has had limited opportunities, its personnel has responded gallantly on every possible occasion and has shown courage of the highest order.

The Adjutant General's Department has been directed with a systematic thoroughness and excellence that surpassed any previous work of its kind. The Inspector General's Department has risen to the highest standards and throughout has ably assisted commanders in the enforcement of discipline. The able personnel of the Judge Advocate General's Department has solved with judgment and wisdom the multitude of difficult legal problems, many of them involving questions of great international importance.

It would be impossible in this brief preliminary report to do justice to the personnel of all the different branches of this organization which I shall cover in detail in a later report.

The Navy in European waters has at all times most cordially aided the Army, and it is most gratifying to report that there has never before been such perfect cooperation between these two branches of the service.

As to Americans in Europe not in the military services, it is the greatest pleasure to say that, both in official and in private life, they are intensely patriotic and loyal, and have been invariably sympathetic and helpful to the Army.

Finally, I pay the supreme tribute to our officers and soldiers of the line. When I think of their heroism, their patience under hardships, their unflinching spirit of offensive action, I am filled with emotion which I am unable to express. Their deeds are immortal, and they have earned the eternal gratitude of our country.

I am, Mr. Secretary, very respectfully,

JOHN J. PERSHING,
General, Commander in Chief American Expeditionary Forces.

To the SECRETARY OF WAR.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS FOR PEACE.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I had expected to begin a little earlier in the afternoon, but Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S speech took longer than I expected and, therefore, I am going to ask Senators, if they will, to let me proceed without interruption until I have concluded the main argument and then I shall be delighted to answer any questions that any Senator may wish to ask. I am going to speak for a few moments in behalf of the policies and principles advocated by a distinguished American who is temporarily outside of the boundaries of the United States, as everybody in the world knows; an American citizen who has gone to Europe on a very important mission on behalf of the United States, of which he is the legal representative and spokesman. Attacks have been made upon him since he left, attacks from the rear, attacks that I think ought not to have been made, and certainly not during his absence on a perfectly lawful and entirely proper mission involving the best welfare of our Nation. To these attacks I wish to reply for a short time this afternoon.

Mr. President, on Wednesday, December 18, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and on Saturday, December 21, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], respectively, made speeches in this body in effect taking President Wilson severely to task for insisting upon the first four and the last of his celebrated 14 points, as stated by him on January 8, 1918, being taken up, considered, and agreed upon at the ensuing peace council at Versailles. Both gentlemen argued most ably and strenuously in favor of the peace conference postponing to a later date any consideration of the President's points involving secret diplomacy, freedom of the seas, economic barriers, or disarmament, or a league of nations to secure peace. Both substantially predicted failure of the President's peace proposals, and both, if we believe the reports of the newspapers, virtually served notice on the President that if the forthcoming peace treaty contained any provision on these five subjects the treaty would not be ratified by the Senate. I assume that these two distinguished Senators essayed to speak for the party that will be dominant in this body after March 4.

Mr. President, being a new Member of this body, I can not hope that anything I may say on this subject will be considered as a reply to the able speeches made by these distinguished gentlemen, and I realize that I am taking a risk of being called presumptuous in daring to oppose their conclusions; and yet, differing from the views expressed by them, as I do, believing that their premises are totally unsound; believing that their fears are wholly unfounded; believing that their opinions can work nothing but disaster to American aims and American ideals in the forthcoming conference; believing that the announcement and publication of such views just in advance of the opening of the conference are calculated to mislead our allies as well as our former enemies and to work incalculable harm to our beloved country, I can not refrain from giving to the Senate and to the country the views that I have on this vital subject.

AMERICA MUST LEAD.

On August 23, 1918, in delivering a speech in this body, Senator LODGE, among other things, said:

The United States occupies virtually a position in which she will be able to speak with a powerful voice. We seek no territory, no material gain for our country. We seek only the safety of civilization and freedom, and the assurance of our own absolute independence and our right to live our own lives and settle our own problems in our own way. There is no territory by which we could be bribed or influenced; no trade advantage by which we could be tempted. There is no personal profit which can turn us from our one great object.

These were the words of wisdom uttered by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts as late as the latter part of last summer. He seems to have changed his mind since the war has been won, and especially since the November election.

Mr. President, it is conceded by all thoughtful persons that the ensuing peace conference will be the most important gathering, the most epochal council of men that ever assembled together in the world's history. The result of this conference will either mean a permanent and an enduring world peace or it will be but the prelude and the incitement to other wars. If calm, deliberate, and disinterested counsel prevails, the world will never see again such a horrible cataclysm of war as it has witnessed since August, 1914. On the other hand, if doubt, if distrust, if national or international jealousies, or national or international greed, or a spirit of national or international injustice prevails, then, whatever the result of the council, it will be but a short time before the unavoidable happens and the nations will be at war again.

Mr. President, America must take the lead in bringing about a just peace and a righteous settlement of all the controversies in this war or which have grown out of this war, for the reasons that were so splendidly stated by Senator LODGE in that part of his August speech quoted above. I say America must lead not solely because I believe America is better than any other nation, though I do believe that, but more particularly because America is so situated that she can best take the lead. As Senator LODGE in August so well pointed out, but which views he now seems to have forgotten, she is virtually asking for nothing in this war; she is asking for no territory; she is asking for no indemnity; she is asking for nothing except the right to work out her own destiny in her own way, and that every other nation, great or small, shall have precisely the same right. Her attitude throughout this world war has been altruistic in the extreme. She entered the war with the most exalted of purposes. She entered the war in defense of her own rights on the seas and to prevent all Christian civilization, including her own, from being obliterated from the earth. Under these favorable circumstances, therefore, America is in a peculiar position that no other of the great nations is in. Each and every one of the other belligerents has selfish interests at stake. They are making demands for indemnity. They are asking restitution of territory. They are seeking larger rights, and therefore they are not in a position as America is to fight for these principles and ideals which caused America to go into the war and which have brought about the successful prosecution of the war.

WAR FOUGHT ON WILSON'S 14 PRINCIPLES.

Mr. President, these principles and ideals were expressed by our President in his message to the Congress on April 2, 1917, as a result of which the Congress declared war on Germany immediately. They were again expressed by him in an address to the Congress on January 8, 1918. This was the address in which the celebrated 14 points were set forth by the President amid the plaudits of the world. Again these principles were announced and elaborated in an address at Mount Vernon on July 4, 1918. They were further elaborated in an address at New York City September 27, 1918. At the time these various messages and speeches of the President were delivered, setting forth the great principles for which we were fighting, the war was in full blast. Each and every one of these pronouncements was immediately after its publication approved by every leading statesman in this country and by every leading statesman in Europe whose government was cooperating with us in this war. It was approved by the press of the world. Not one word of criticism, except by our enemies. Not one word of dissent, except in Germany and in Austria. Every word was a word of praise. Many Senators on both sides of this Chamber gave out newspaper statements indorsing each and every one of the pronouncements of our President above referred to. I may say right here that several of the men who have been loudest in their criticisms of the President since the war has ended and since the election in November were before that time strongest in their indorsement of every word that he uttered on the subject. Representatives of the British Government, of the French Government, of the Italian Government, all applauded these speeches of President Wilson. They were so just, so fair, so well put, so timely, that intelligent men everywhere on this side of the water and on the other side of the water immediately indorsed them, and even Germany, Austria, and Turkey, our enemies in this war, later came along and indorsed these principles and asked that the war be settled in accordance with them.

FIRST DISSENT HEARD IN AMERICA AND IN ENGLAND.

The first word of dissent, the first word of criticism, the first word of question, came after the war was ended. As I recall, it first came from certain English newspapers, and immediately opponents of the President in this Chamber came along and reuttered what those English papers and those English statesmen were saying. At first these dissents and criticisms were not open, but lately the two distinguished Senators that I have mentioned, both able and vigorous men of long service, both men of distinguished rank in the Senate—one of them a former Attorney General, former Secretary of State, and for a long time a Senator in this body, and one of the great lawyers of the country, and the other a former Congressman and a Senator for a quarter of a century nearly, and a writer that is second to none in this country, a master of the English language—these two have come forward at this time, not to uphold the principles which they formerly applauded, not to uphold and defend the head of our Government in his fight for a righteous and enduring peace, not to uphold the high ideals which our Nation has so gloriously stood for in this war, but to tear down, to disrupt, to postpone, and apparently to prevent, if possible, as it seems to me, the fulfillment of the high aims and principles for which this country went into this war.

THE KNOX RESOLUTION.

Mr. President, I desire to discuss the resolution and the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania first. The resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania sets up, in substance, that we went to war "to vindicate the ancient rights of navigation as established under international law and in order to remove forever the German menace to our peace"; that we are now entitled only to "restitution, reparation, and guaranties against the German menace." Note in both cases the Senator limits our purposes and our rights in the ensuing treaty to a disposition of the "German menace." Mr. President, if that is all that we fought for, if that is all that we went into this war for, we need not have representatives at the peace table at all. The collapse of Germany and the consequent armistice have already taken care of these things. We have already vindicated the ancient rights of navigation, and surely Germany is no longer a menace to our peace. With her navy in the hands of ourselves and allies, with her merchant marine largely in our hands, with her government in the hands of the Bolshevists, and almost in bankruptcy, with her armies worn out and defeated, with her Emperor and his son abdicated and in exile and his family scattered to the four winds, with large portions of German territory in the hands of the allies, with her entire country hemmed in and guarded by her victorious enemies, surely Senator KNOX or no one else believes that America need go to a peace conference to protect herself from the German menace. The armistice already signed guarantees everything that the Knox resolution demands except reparation, and it is well known that our Government will not ask for reparation, and even Senator KNOX argues against reparation. If we are to follow Senator KNOX's resolution, there is not only no necessity for America taking part in the conference, but she has no right to be there. She has done all that she proposed. It is true that he says we should set up new free States in "Mittel Europa" as guaranties against "a powerful nation such as Germany," and suggests that such new free States may need protection; but then again he immediately becomes hopeless of such a task and explains that we must "look for limits to the obligations which America could wisely share with Europe." How helpless and hopeless is America in her position at the peace table in the opinion of Senator KNOX.

SENATOR KNOX'S SPEECH.

The Senator, after setting forth his resolution and discussing our aims, then says:

Can we not perceive emerging from these facts a new American doctrine? I will state this great new doctrine in these words: If a situation should arise in which any power or combination of powers should, directly or indirectly, menace the freedom and peace of Europe, the United States would regard such situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom and would consult with other powers affected with a view to concerted action for the removal of such menace.

Further on in his speech he says:

If this had been the avowed and understood policy of the United States from July, 1914, it is in my judgment very improbable that the war would have occurred.

Again, he says:

Let us suppose, for example, that there should be proposed a permanent entente of the English-speaking peoples and of the French, Italians, and Japanese to enforce this peace; to consult together to maintain peace; to cooperate economically, each recognizing the other's leadership in its peculiar field, and to form a permanent committee for consultation on these subjects. The question could then arise as to whether the United States should for general purposes join in or remain outside such an entente. I think the day has gone by for the rejection on principle of our close association of this Government with governments of other countries. To dogmatize against any possible entente under any possible circumstances would be almost as unreasonable as to wish to rush headlong into some Utopian world league.

Mr. President, in these statements the learned Senator admits the necessity and the effectiveness of precisely what President Wilson is trying to do at the peace council, namely, to remove the cause of international disturbances and to prevent future wars. If the announcement of such a simple doctrine by the United States as that just stated by the Senator would have prevented the present war, the most destructive war in all history, how vastly more effective would be the same doctrine stated, ratified, and agreed upon with mutual covenants, not only by the United States alone but by all the great nations of the world. Apparently Senator KNOX not only believes in the efficacy of a world agreement to secure peace but he has a plan for it. He shows that he believes that the peace of the world can be maintained by a concert of the powers without the necessity of a world republic, which no one is advocating. The only difference between these statements and the statements believed in by the President seems to be that Mr. KNOX calls it an entente and the President calls it an association or league of nations.

SUPERREPUBLIC BUGABOO.

The Senator from Pennsylvania then sets up a superrepublic bugaboo, and by innuendo suggests that the President of the United States is negotiating for such a government to be called the league of nations, with a view to putting such a government over and above the United States of America. He points out several unconstitutional features of such a government.

Mr. President, of course we could not, under our Constitution, create such a government. Of course we could not devolve upon such other government the right that only the Congress has to declare war. Of course we could not impart to some other government the sovereignty that belongs to America, and everybody knows that the President and no one else in authority is attempting to provide such an unconstitutional league of nations. The Senator simply sets up a straw man and then proceeds to knock him down.

POSTPONEMENT PLEA.

After demolishing his straw man, after proving that we must not have an unconstitutional league of nations, which nobody is demanding, after showing that he believes in an entente of nations for the prevention of future wars, the real purpose and intention of his speech is set forth in its last paragraphs, which I here quote:

1. That the issues of the war were issues between the central powers and the allies and ourselves. The function of a peace treaty is to settle these issues.
2. The issues as to a league of nations and a revision of the laws of the seas are issues between the allies themselves and between them and each of them and all of the neutral powers.
3. I have shown conclusively that upon these latter issues there exists the widest diversity of opinion, and I have concluded that it is wise not to force upon a conference that must adjust the comparatively simple demands of the one the complexities and confusions of the other.

I am astounded at this logic of the Senator. I am one of his great admirers. I admire his mentality, his vigor, and his fairness on ordinary occasions. But it seems quite remarkable that the Senator is willing to say that the creation of a new Poland, or the establishment of a Czecho-Slav or a Jugo-Slav nation, or that the taking of territory from Germany and giving it to a neutral, or that the opening of private channels of commerce to all the world are "comparatively simple demands," while the revision of the laws of the seas or an agreement of nations to guard against wars in the future are so complicated that they ought not even to be considered. It is a strange logic, it is a strange contention, and, in my judgment, one wholly without merit. Before this peace conference is over it will be found that more time will be given, more diversity of opinion will arise about the creation of new States than can possibly arise from the consideration of any other question.

POSTPONEMENT IS WEAPON OF ENEMY DEFENSE.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania is a great lawyer. He is familiar with every phase of legal pleading and practice. This war may be likened to a great lawsuit. The only difference is that in a lawsuit the parties apply to the arbitrament of the courts. In this war the parties have applied to the arbitrament of arms. This war is a military lawsuit between all the allied nations on the one side and the central powers on the other. It has been decided by the arbitrament of arms in favor of the allies. The pleadings are all in. The proof has all been taken. The decision has been reached. The case is ready for a decree. The only thing that is necessary in this great military lawsuit is for a final decree to be spread upon the minutes of the last court, which, in this case, is the ensuing peace conference. Can it be said that any one of these points pressed by the President is not within the pleadings of the evidence? Surely the distinguished Senator would not say that the freedom of the seas is not in issue in this war, when it was one of the basic reasons for America entering the war. Surely the Senator would not argue that the preservation of peace was not one of the basic grounds of our entering into the war and one of the leading issues in the pleadings. I do not believe that he would so contend for a moment, because not only these two points but every one of the points raised by President Wilson are not only within the pleadings as a matter of fact, but they were put there in so many words by the President himself in making up America's case, and then affirmed and confirmed not only by all the thoughtful men in this country but by all thoughtful men in all the civilized nations of the world. The pleadings were specific. The contentions were pronounced. The war has been won upon them. The whole world has had notice that these were the pleadings in the case, and to my mind the decree should be as full and complete as can be had under the terms of the pleadings, under the issues that have been made up, and under the proof that is now all in. But the Senator says:

The object of my resolution is not to condemn in advance any league of nations (and least of all the existing entente, or a permanent understanding of all the English-speaking peoples) of a kind that might in time commend itself to the considered judgment of the American people. The object of my resolution is simply to postpone the larger and very disputable question of some comprehensive league of nations for that separate and very deliberate consideration that its nature demands and that an act of Congress has already sanctioned. After all, why such hurry? If a league of nations is a good thing, surely its merit will be the better appreciated after careful study.

WHY POSTPONE?

Mr. President, I do not understand this reasoning of the Senator. I do not understand this demand for a postponement of the decree. What is the motive behind it? What is the reason for it? We have won the judgment. The issues have all been decided in our favor. Why not enter the decree of record? Why should we receive a part of the fruits of victory now and postpone the remainder until some other time? I can understand always why the lawyer for a defendant desires to enter a partial decree, but I can not understand why the representative of the complainant is unwilling to take a full decree after he has obtained a decision in his favor. It can not be explained by the statement that the relief sought is too complicated. If America was strong enough, was able enough to win the fight, she has got men strong enough and able enough to secure in a decree the objects and purposes for which she fought, and it is immaterial whether the fruition of these objects and purposes is to be called an entente, as named by the Senator from Pennsylvania, or a league of nations, as named by the President of the United States.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR LODGE.

And then comes the learned Senator from Massachusetts and coincides with the position taken by Senator KNOX and elaborates upon it and says he is willing for a judgment to be entered upon nine of the President's issues, but that he positively objects to a judgment upon the five main issues at this time. The issues which the learned Senator from Massachusetts objects to a judgment upon now are the following demands of President Wilson:

1. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.
2. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.
3. The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.
4. Adequate guaranties given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.

And then the fourteenth point, which is as follows:

A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike.

The learned Senator then proceeds to take these five points up and discuss them and declare that their consideration ought to be entirely postponed at this time.

By the way, I was very much amused this morning, as I suppose a number of you were who heard the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and as well the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. The burden of both their speeches was, "What do these points mean? We do not understand them; we can not understand them; why could they not have been given to us in plain everyday English?" But, lo and behold, no less a personage than ex-President Taft came out in an article, printed on the front page of the Washington Post this morning, trying to explain what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] meant in his speech the other day. It looks as if somebody else is using language that needs explanation. According to ex-President Taft, Senator LODGE did not mean that he was opposed to a league of nations. His language surely intimated he was, but ex-President Taft construes the language and puts another interpretation on it. Somebody must have been hearing from over across the water lately. He did not mean what his language implied; he just meant a very gentle postponement of these important measures. What does a "gentle postponement" in this case mean? It means the defeat of these great principles for which our President has gone across the water. Everybody knows that in this case postponement means defeat. President Taft explaining what Senator LODGE means is indeed funny.

THE KIND OF PEACE SENATOR LODGE WANTS.

Ah, Mr. President, I wish now to quote Senator LODGE before the election as compared with the speech of Senator LODGE since the election. There is no man in this country, not even the President himself perhaps, as some of Senator LODGE's friends claimed at the time, who could have expressed the war aims of this country better than they were expressed by Senator LODGE on August 23 last. Here is what he said:

They include the restoration of Belgium, the return of Alsace-Lorraine to France, of the Italia Irrendenta to Italy, the establishment of a Jugo-Slav State, and of an independent State formed by the Czecho-Slovaks. They include also the security of Greece, the settlement of Albania and Montenegro, the restoration of Roumania, the consolidation of all the Roumanian people under one government, as well as the neutralization of the straits, the putting of Constantinople under international protection, with Greece perhaps as the mandatory of the powers to administer the affairs of the city, the independence of Armenia, the return of those portions of Asia Minor where Greeks are predominant to Greece, the protection of Syria and Palestine from the Turks, a large, powerful, and independent Polish State, the independence of Russia's Baltic Provinces, the return of Danish Schleswig to the Danes, and the neutralization of the Kiel Canal.

A splendid statement of the war aims of this country. Then, Mr. President, he goes on to say:

These physical guaranties which I have thus far suggested have but one object, and that is to hem Germany in so she can not attempt conquest in Russia or in the East, and that the Slavic populations, which she has mercilessly used in her wars, can never be used by her again.

He then says:

There must be heavy indemnities paid by Germany for the ruin she has wrought in Belgium and northern France and in Italy, and for her destruction of vessels, both neutral and belligerent, through the use of submarines.

He then suggests what disposition of German colonies shall be determined, affirming we can not shirk the world Russian question; that the Empire of China must be dealt with for our protection. Senator LODGE has changed his views since he made that August speech.

SUCH A PEACE WORTHLESS TO EVERYBODY.

There are the questions that the Senator from Massachusetts admits must be determined by the ensuing peace council. What a strange position. We must do all these things; we must readjust the maps of Europe and of Asia and of Africa, but we must take no united step to guarantee that the decree will be carried out. For instance, we must set apart a new Poland, but make no international guaranty that the new Poland will remain as we have ordained. We must make a Jugo-Slav State, but we must make no agreement to see that the Jugo-Slav nation is permitted to live and work out its own destiny. We must make a Czecho-Slovak State, but we must take no allied precaution to see that the Czecho-Slovak State might be permitted to work out its own destiny. We must mark out new boundaries for Roumania, but we must make no lasting agreement that will be binding alike upon all the nations to uphold the boundaries that we have made. We must even make a new Russia, but make no international agreement to uphold the new Russia to which we give life, and so on all down the line.

It is true that Senator LODGE says:

We are as much bound, not merely by interest and every consideration for a safe future but by honor and self-respect, to see that the terms of peace are carried out as we were to fulfill our great determination that the armies of Germany should be defeated in the field. We can not halt or turn back now. We must do our share to carry out the peace as we have done our share to win the war, of which the peace is an integral part.

We can not leave the Jugo-Slavs, the Czecho-Slovaks, and the Poles, the Lithuanians, and the other States which we hope to see formed and marching upon the path of progress and development unaided and alone.

The distinguished Senator says that we, the United States, must protect all of these States, that we must uphold them in their territorial boundaries, that we must see that they work out their destinies in their own way, but we must have no international agreement for this purpose. The other nations must not help us, we must make no contract with them to help us. How can we help them, how can we uphold them, how can we maintain them unless we enter into a formal agreement with the nations of the world setting forth the terms and the obligations thereof? It would take a standing army of 2,000,000 men.

If we follow out the doctrine of these two distinguished Senators, we give to these new nations a paper decree that anybody may break at will, for America by herself can not protect them all. We will be doing for them just what these Senators know has been done to many others—to Bulgaria, to Turkey, to Greece, to Serbia and Montenegro, and other small nations.

Referring again to my simile of the lawsuit:

If we follow the advice of Senator KNOX, we win on the pleadings and the decree, but we lose on the judgment. If we follow the additional advice of Senator LODGE, we win on the judgment, but we lose on the execution. In either event, we lose what we have been fighting for. Ah, Mr. President, if this peace council has a right to take up the various subjects of controversy that are set out by the Senator from Massachusetts, and no one questions that right, then it must follow as night follows day that some international arrangement must be made to enforce the decrees that we make in reference to these various States and as to these various questions. It will be utterly useless to write the decree unless we have the international force and power behind it to enforce it. The United States can not and should not do it alone.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. President, in my humble judgment the great mistake that is being made by these distinguished Senators, and by those who follow their lead, is that they are giving to the term "league of nations" a meaning that they should not give to it, a meaning that the President of the United States has never given to it, a meaning that no other representative of a great nation has ever given to it. Apparently they assume that a league of nations is to be a supergovernment established for the world, and that the various nations of the earth are to be merely subject States to that government. Apparently they regard a league of nations as a government with the power to tax, a government with the only army and navy on earth, and a government with jurisdiction over the earth and sea and air and over all other governments now in existence.

Mr. President, if it was desired by anybody to form such a supergovernment, I for one would never agree to it. I for one would never be willing to give up American sovereignty. I should never, for instance, be willing to give up the Monroe doctrine. I should never be willing to give up the power of America to exclude from her borders any persons whom she saw fit to exclude. I would not be willing to violate any provision of the American Constitution. In other words, I would not be willing to give up any part of American sovereignty as a nation. I would not have the right to do so under the Constitution. I have been sworn to uphold and protect and defend the Constitution of the United States. I would never besmirch that instrument or do aught against the terms of that instrument directly or indirectly.

Mr. President, there is no such purpose, as I believe, upon the part of anyone believing in a league of nations to secure peace; but what is desired is that this peace conference about to convene at Versailles shall, for the purposes of enforcing the results of this war, of bringing about a lasting peace, of securing to the peoples of each nation, great and small, the right to work out its own destiny in its own way, of securing for all nations the right to trade freely with each other and unmolested upon the high seas, of cutting down armaments to save taxes upon the people, of providing for open and aboveboard international agreements—these are the objects which we ask to be secured by this great peace conference. The whole question has been argued from time immemorial. The Senator from Pennsylvania says that all such great movements have been argued for many years prior to their accomplishment, and that is true; and so I will say to the Senator this great movement has been argued for many years and there never was such a time for its accomplishment as right now.

All nations at the table will be willing to give up something in return for that which each may want most. All want to have the right to live in peace. Surely with the great ability that will be found in this conference an international arrangement can be made by which the rights of nations shall be protected along the lines suggested by our own great President. Senators say there should be no league of nations. My reply is there is a league of nations now. Both Senators aver that, and I agree with them on this point. There is indeed no technical league existing between the United States and the other allies, but in reality and truth we find Great Britain, the United States, France, Italy, Belgium, Serbia, Roumania, Japan, and a number of the South American countries, portions of Africa, portions of Asia, all acting together for the purpose of putting an end to the autocratic, military, and inhumane power of Germany, and at the same time prohibit any nation to act like Germany has acted recently. They are all parties to the lawsuit; there is no reason why a final decree should not be made as to the rights and interests of every one of them. The league that we have already is the beginning of a splendid league. It is wholly immaterial whether we invite Germany to come in or not, or Austria to come in or not, or Turkey to come in or not, or whether Bulgaria comes in or not. None of them will have any great influence. No league of nations ought to be created out of the whole cloth, as it were. It should be simply an orderly development of the present league, which has already been created by this world war, and for the present without regard to Germany, save to destroy forever her autocratic and ambitious power. It is idle to talk about not being willing to create a league of nations when the war has already brought forth an inchoate association, and all that is necessary to be done now is to give this league, which has been cooperating without specific agreement, a definite, fixed international agreement in writing by which its future acts can be measured and enforced in behalf of the peace of the world and the freedom of all nations, great and small. The scope, powers, and duties of this league must necessarily be left to the combined wisdom of the peace council creating it. No league of nations must be created say these distinguished Senators. My answer is that it has already been created in fact by the war, and all the President asks and all that the American people ask is that the terms upon which the league has already in fact been founded, and the purposes which have already been in fact agreed to, shall be promptly ratified by the peace council, and so amplified as to make future wars impossible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In that connection and in further reinforcement of what the Senator has just said, I want to call his attention to the existence and the significance of a precedent. There is the British Empire, although it had better be called a confederacy of British Commonwealths. There is no word of written agreement binding together Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa to the home country of Great Britain, and yet when this war broke out Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa came very near outdoing the mother country herself in furnishing men, money, and munitions. That is an instance of putting moral force behind the effort to prevent war. The moral force of the British confederacy, Commonwealths—not one but five great English-speaking peoples—was behind the desire of the British Empire to enforce the rights of small nationalities and to fight the war for civilization, and they fought it.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a further fact. We speak of the United States, but it is not "this United States" but "these United States," composed of 48 States. We had no word of alliance, we had no political connection, but the minute we found that the rights of humanity and of the peace-loving peoples everywhere were being outraged we went with the forces of the English-speaking race and, together with them, we won this war. There is no doubt about that, because if we had left it to the continent of Europe, Germany would have run over the entire continent.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to the language of Mr. Wilson the other day when he referred to organizing the moral force of the world for the prevention of war and for the keeping of peace. Then I wish to call attention to our own history. When we began our existence we had just a loose confederacy of States.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I expect to dwell on that a little later.

Mr. WILLIAMS. However weak it might have been to preserve peace amongst ourselves—and we confessed that it was too weak for that—it was strong enough to unite us in opposition to foreign aggression, and always was, even prior to the adoption of the present Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the statement which he makes. It is certainly a strong presentation and in furtherance of the very idea that I am trying to suggest to the Senate and to the country.

SHOULD THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS BE POSTPONED?

It is claimed that we ought to postpone the plan for a league of nations. Senator KNOX's resolution, if passed, would so declare. Senator KNOX, in his speech, earnestly favors postponement. Senator LODGE says to attempt to form a league now would only be to embarrass the peace that we ought to make at once with Germany, and he thinks, too, that it ought to be postponed.

Mr. President, there never was a better time for America to get results than in this peace conference now about to convene. Every nation represented in that council will want something and want it badly. England will want indemnities. She will want all the colonies she can get. She will want all the warships she can get. She will want all the merchant vessels she can get. She will want all the territory that she can get. France will want indemnities. She will want restoration of territory. She will want as many colonies as she can get. She likewise will want ships, merchant and war.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment I will yield. I desire to finish this idea. Italy will want indemnities, colonies, ships, and restoration of territory. Serbia and Montenegro will want territory and access to the high seas and should have it. Roumania will want indemnities, restoration of territory, and future protection from her enemies. Belgium will want restoration of property destroyed and taken, indemnities, protection, and guaranties that will not be scraps of paper. Spain will want commercial arrangements. Japan will want many things, and so will China, Australia, and other eastern countries; and Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Russia, Siberia, and Poland will also want many things and should have them; and Poland and Czecho-Slovakia and Jugo-Slavonia and perhaps other new States will want to be upheld and protected in their new dominions. On the other hand, the United States will stand alone in wanting no material advantage of any kind, nature, or description. She will stand alone as wanting only a square deal for all. Take the United States and her fight for freedom of the seas, for equal justice to all nations, great and small, for open diplomacy, for disarmament, for a guaranty of future peace; if you take all these out of this conference, the conference will degenerate into a second treaty of Vienna, which was simply a disgraceful fight over the spoils of the Napoleonic wars. Indeed, war actually broke out again before the treaty was published. There never was such a time, Mr. President, for America to get an enduring peace and all else that she has so justly asked for, as at this time when all the other nations have selfish demands they are putting forward and when America desires nothing but the right. Postpone her demands for peace and right and justice until after the other nations have divided the spoils of war, and I doubt if enough interest could be aroused in Europe as to the President's five contentions to get a peace meeting, much less accomplish anything. No one knows that better than those who are opposing the President in his aims, both on this side of the ocean and the other.

I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. What I was about to say is not quite germane to the last utterance of the Senator, and perhaps is not very important; but I think, in the interest of historic accuracy, we ought to say that England has disclaimed any desire for the German colonies and has besought the United States to take the colonies or at least to devise some plan by which they can be administered, and has expressly stated that she did not want one single foot of territory as the result of this war.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to hear the Senator make that statement. I have not seen that publication from any official source. It is probably correct. I am glad to know that it is so; and, by the way——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is absolutely correct, with this limitation: South Africa has insisted upon her retaining Southwest Africa, which was conquered from the German Empire, just as the American colonies forced Great Britain to retain Canada when we had partially conquered it ourselves.

Mr. McKELLAR. I accept the statements that are made about the intentions of England in this controversy. I am glad to know that she has that kind of view, and I hope she will maintain it in the peace conference; and since the President's timely visit to England I believe she is going to live up to what she agreed to while the war was going on.

SECRET DIPLOMACY.

Every well-informed man knows what secret diplomacy means. Senators refer to it as if it was vague and indefinite. They even sneer at this proposal. Everyone knows that in Europe there were treaties of peace between the various nations that were generally known, and that other secret understandings as to the balance of power and various other international subjects were entered into secretly between the great nations. As an illustration of this: In 1911, I believe it was, during the Balkan wars Serbia and Montenegro won the war and won a sea front and then there was a treaty of peace, and the peace conference was held in accordance with a secret understanding between Germany and Austria and Great Britain and Italy and the peace treaty restored the status quo. In other words, to use my judicial simile again, Serbia and Montenegro won the war on the evidence and in the field of arms, but they lost on the judgment, and they failed to get that which they had fought for and won, and they still have no seacoast. Why? It was because of the secret understanding between the great powers, and this was what the President aimed at, and the only thing he aimed at, as I believe. The secret agreements constitute one of the most prolific causes of war. The doctrine is absolutely good. It should be upheld in this peace conference, and there should be no private, secret understandings, and I do not believe there will be, and I hope there is not a Senator on this floor that would vote against the coming treaty of peace because it had a provision in it patterned along the lines of President Wilson's first point upon the subject of secret diplomacy, regardless of what may be said in this debate. With all due respect, the taunting criticisms of Senator LODGE about the prevalence of secret diplomacy in this country under President Wilson's administration are wholly without foundation. No agreement has been made or even considered of which the American people and the world have not been fully advised.

The Senator from Massachusetts said, I believe, that the only secret agreements that he knew of were the secret agreements made by this administration. I am sure the Senator did not intend to suggest that secret diplomacy referred to the conduct of diplomacy in the United States. "Secret diplomacy," referred to by the President, does not mean any such thing as that; and besides Senator LODGE was in error as to the facts in this country, because under this administration there has been no secret agreement. There has been no agreement on the part of this Government that not only the American people but the people of all the world have not known; and I challenge the Senator to present a single concrete case where there has been a secret agreement made in this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that under American institutions and the American Constitution there can not be a secret agreement.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course, there can not be, and there never has been.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because every treaty and every agreement entered into by the United States must be discussed in the Senate of the United States and ratified by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course, and published to the world.

FREEDOM OF THE SEAS.

Senators LODGE and KNOX want no freedom of the seas now. It will be remembered, Senators, that Germany staked off a large portion of the seas in front of Europe and notified all nations, belligerents and neutrals, that if they sent their ships in those waters thus staked off that German submarines would sink them without warning. It was one of the very causes—indeed, the principal cause—for which America entered the war, namely, to protest against this unlawful use of the seas, and yet these distinguished Senators say that after having won the war we can not have a judgment and a guaranty that Germany shall not do so again and other nations shall not do in the future as Germany did in the past in this regard. If it was wrong for Germany to mark off these seas in defiance of neutral rights, it would be wrong for any other nation to mark off the seas in like manner. If we have a right in this decree to take charge of German U-boats and sink them, we have a right to say that no more U-boats shall be built in the future by any nation. If we have a right to say that Germany shall not stake off the seas in the future, then we have a right to say that no other nation shall hereafter stake off the seas, and we have a right to enforce that policy by this decree. It can only be done by common consent of the league which has already been inchoately formed and which needs only a constitution mutually agreed upon to keep it in effect for all time. But we must go further than that. Our own country is on the verge of becoming a great maritime nation. We should provide in this decree that not only shall the waters of the seas be free and that no other nation, great or small, shall have the right to interfere with our peaceful commerce, or the peaceful commerce of any other nation, wherever such commerce may go; that no nation shall have the right of search and seizure of neutral vessels on the high seas; that no nation shall have the right to require aught of our passenger and freight vessels as long as they are upon the high seas; and right here and now I believe that if President Wilson returns with a peace treaty providing for the freedom of the seas that there is not a Senator in this body that will vote against the treaty because of such provision.

ECONOMIC BARRIERS.

Now, Senators, it seems to me that such a provision on economic barriers in the peace terms as suggested by the President would come as a matter of course. Here are all the nations of the earth gathered together at the end of the greatest war in all history. The allies all agree. Their antagonists are all willing to agree. They can not keep from agreeing if they wanted to. It is a question of right and fair and square dealing between all of these nations that already have formed an informal league. Practically all of these nations have already associated themselves together to secure the peace of the world. We all know that in the past economic barriers have been the most prolific causes of war. There is no reason for this, and surely this great peace council, larger than ever gathered before, larger perhaps than will ever gather in the hereafter, will be the one of all councils to agree upon the removal, as far as possible, of all economic barriers to trade and commerce on the seas. This does not mean that a nation shall give up its right to place import duties or export duties. It does not interfere with the internal rights of any nation, but it merely means that an agreement shall be reached, in the words of the President, for "the removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions."

America is just beginning her career of a great maritime nation; she is just beginning to build the greatest merchant fleet that will probably ever exist in the history of the world. No other nation has more at stake; no other nation will profit more than she by the removal of economic barriers in the future. All nations should be treated exactly alike. When we send our ships on every sea, nothing will be more conducive to trade with us than for all economic barriers to be removed. I hope to live to see the day when America's trade on the ocean will be greater than that of any nation on the earth. We can only make it so by removing the trade barriers that have heretofore existed against us and take our chances with the rest of the world. What are we building this great merchant marine for if it is not to take advantage of the great opportunities that are to come to us to trade in the four corners of the earth? Surely no man who loves his country, who believes in its future, no man who votes to appropriate millions and even billions of our money to build up a merchant marine would dare to vote to put up economic barriers or permit other nations to put up economic barriers by which that trade can be done away with or even lessened.

DISARMAMENT.

Mr. President, the question of disarmament has been one that has troubled the world for years. The Czar of Russia, the Emperor of Germany, the King of England, the President of France, a Republican President of the United States, and many distinguished writers have from time to time submitted principles looking to international disarmament. It is a question that has been alive and been before the world public for a long time. The building of great navies by various nations, the maintenance of great navies by great nations, has been one of the things that has been looked upon with the greatest disfavor by thinkers of many ages. Thoughtful men of every country have desired to reduce these armaments and thereby reduce the taxes on the people of the various nations, because these armaments are expensive to a degree. The President, believing it was necessary to reduce the German armament which formerly existed and now to reduce all armaments for the benefit of the people, says that the people of all the nations should not be taxed in the future as in the past to maintain great navies, and therefore he puts this provision among the reasons why this country was at war. It was accepted then by all the nations, England as well as all the rest of them, but now this is one of the points that some people in England do not want to agree to. It is one of the points that certain Americans do not want to agree to, though Senator LODGE approved it only a short time ago.

Well, let us see, Mr. President, how it will work. Let us be fair and frank with one another. My forefathers on one side came from Scotland and the other from England. I have by inheritance not a drop of blood other than British blood in my veins. I am a great admirer of the British Nation and the British people. Blood of our blood, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh. We all admire their genius for government, their love of right, their dogged tenacity of purpose, their lofty ideals, and their splendid ambitions. We admire the English for what they have done, for what they have accomplished in the world, for what they have stood for; and for these reasons it seems to me that at a time like this we should counsel fully and fairly one with the other. We should be frank. There is not the slightest doubt that whatever England and America agree upon will be done. Their agreement alone will furnish all the power necessary. We should have the manhood to speak our minds. The only nation, perhaps, that will object to disarmament is the English Nation. Why should she? She believes it will do her no good not to agree to disarm. It will be but natural for her to agree to a reasonable disarmament rather than to contend for the maintenance of an unreasonable armament. Why? The reason is simply this: That America is going to continue to build her Navy unless England reduces hers. It might as well be understood now as any other time. There is no use postponing that question. We would be unfair and unjust to our English friends and cousins and brethren if we did not tell them frankly and fairly what we propose to do. We propose to become their friendly rivals for trade wherever we can get it. We propose to protect that trade wherever it goes; and if England wishes to continue the burdensome taxation upon her people to keep up the great navy that she has, then America will be compelled to build her Navy larger to give her the protection she is entitled to. While the war was in progress her people and her press approved President Wilson's appeal for disarmament. They should stand by their admission made at that time. I believe they will do so. England is not the kind of a nation to go back on her agreement, expressed or implied. There is no conflict between the principle of disarmament and our Navy building at this time. We must take no chances.

On the subject of disarmament Senator LODGE is specifically estopped. On August 23, 1918, he said that the peace treaty ought to provide for disarmament. Why this change? A change of policy in four months is a pretty fast change.

IS A LEAGUE OF NATIONS POSSIBLE?

These gentlemen say that a league of nations is essentially impossible; that if such a league is formed and given the power to tax, the power to decide what nations shall be taken in, with an army and navy to enforce its decisions, then it will become either a world-dictating nation or it will be simply the more productive of wars. On the other hand, unless such a central authority is given full powers, it will be a meaningless organization like The Hague tribunal.

Mr. President I do not subscribe to this doctrine. I am one of those who believe that it is possible to form a league that will be effective and at the same time not put all other nations in a state of subserviency. I recognize its difficulties; I know that the task is great, but I have faith that this peace council, composed of the great statesmen from each nation of the world, will be able to accomplish it. There have always been wiseacres in the world, Mr. President, who have said that seemingly impossible things could not be done, and yet they have been done. In comparatively recent times it was thought that it was impossible ever to chain or use the lightning, and yet now it is one of the most perfect servants of man. Less than a hundred years ago it was thought impossible to send a message by lightning, and yet to-day the occurrence is so common that its difficulty is never even thought of. It was once thought to be impossible to hear out of hearing distance, and yet to-day, through the marvelous invention of the telephone, we can hear practically all over the world. Later on it was believed to be impossible for messages to be communicated without wires upon which to communicate them, and yet to-day we have not only wireless telegraph sending messages throughout the face of the earth, whether on land or sea, but we even have the wireless telephone by which we can communicate to airships thousands of feet in the air. It used to be thought that a heavier-than-air vehicle could never be invented. It was one of the impossible things, and yet to-day, through the ingenuity of man, men not only fly through the air, but they even fight in the air, and aircraft has become one of the greatest inventions of modern warfare. And so, Mr. President, I do not subscribe to the impossibility of a righteous league of peace being organized by which wars can be prevented in the future.

Let us change the illustration for just a moment. There were Tories in this country in the century before the last who said that we never could have an American Republic like the one that we have. Why, our forefathers along about 1770 first tried a Continental Congress, and it was wholly inefficacious. Later on they tried what was known as a Confederation, and that proved to be a rope of sand; and later on it took five years of bargain and compromise and arrangement and splendid ability to consummate the present Constitution that we have. Impossible? I say, look to your own Constitution, and you can see that nothing is impossible to men who have the ability and who believe and know that they stand for the right. So I say that when this peace conference assembles next month it will be found that it can work out a plan.

NO WILSON PLAN.

Great stress is laid by Senators LODGE and KNOX and the newspapers supporting them that the President has not disclosed his plans for a league of nations to preserve peace. Senator KNOX says:

> We must know what we are to agree to, and no one has yet thought it well to tell the people of the United States what they are to agree to when a league of nations is formed.

This is true, and it should be true. There should be no plan. Mr. Wilson's plan or no other single individual's plan should go through. No league of nations that is the plan of any single individual could possibly be of any worth to the world. What would have likely resulted had Washington attended the Constitutional Convention with a cut-and-dried plan? There would have probably been no Constitution. Washington was too wise for that. So is Wilson.

Mr. President, I am not the spokesman of the President. I am not even in his confidence on this subject. I have no knowledge whatsoever of his proposals save what is published in the papers. In these public statements all he asks is that the parties to this peace conference shall form a general association of nations under specific covenants and affording mutual guaranties that all nations, great and small, will have political independence and territorial integrity guaranteed to them. In his New York speech of September 27, 1918, he added:

> That indispensable instrumentality is a league of nations formed under covenants that will be efficacious.

He has asked for no supernation. He has asked for no republic of the world, which shall control all other republics and nations, nor will he do so, nor will any other sane man do so. All the President says is that one of the specific purposes of our entering the war was to secure an enduring peace. Every full-grown man in this country knows that this is so. The President does not want another war like this or any other war at all. He believes that civilized nations can covenant to prevent war. He knows that all the allied nations agreed to do this in advance when they accepted his proposals, and he is seeking to have them live up to that agreement. It seems to me it is fair to assume that he has offered no plan, because he wants to counsel with all on the most important question of all, namely, the saving of future destruction of life and property by reason of war. He has not yet reached a final conclusion on it and can not do so. Only the council itself can, by deliberation and debate and by yielding and compromise, bring about the much-desired arrangement by which this peace can be secured for all time. If the President had gone over to attend the council with a plan already mapped out, the first ones to have criticized him would have been those who are criticizing him now for not having any plans at all. They would have declared that it was indecent for a judge to have gone to the hearing of a case with an opinion on the case already prepared in his wallet. They would have called him a world dictator. They would have attributed to him ulterior and perhaps personally selfish motives. The allied nations, too, might well have misunderstood him had he done so. But now, when he presents no specific plan, but contents himself with the principles announced nearly a year ago and then approved and applauded by the whole civilized world and asking only that the peace conference shall itself counsel together and agree upon the specific covenants and agreements to carry out these plans already agreed upon, our friends his enemies over here, our friends with selfish interests on the other side, raise a great hue and cry about his failure to disclose plans which, perforce, because not disclosed, can only be deep, dark, and sinister. According to these gentlemen, he is damned if he does and damned if he does not. Be careful, gentlemen. Sometimes it is dangerous to damn Wilson too soon. He has a way of having a California secreted about his person that is sometimes disconcerting to his damners.

THREATEN TO DEFEAT TREATY.

Much has been said about the Senate's rights and obligations and duties in connection with the forthcoming treaty of peace. Some have thought that, inasmuch as the Senate has equal rights with the President in the making of treaties, the President ought to have selected one or more Senators as peace commissioners,

This could have been done, of course, but it was not essential. Indeed, in the history of this country of nearly 130 years no Senator has ever been appointed a peace commissioner except after the Spanish War of 1898, and when Senators were appointed President McKinley was charged with an ulterior purpose in appointing them. It was stated upon the floor of the Senate in executive session, as I am reliably informed, that President McKinley appointed these three Senators in order that he might get their votes and influence and thereby secure the ratification of the treaty that he was desirous of making. There is no doubt about the Senate's right to reject or amend a treaty. The Senate can reject or amend this treaty. But will it do so? My answer is that it will not. If President Wilson sends into this Senate a treaty embodying provisions covering the five points now objected to by Senators LODGE and KNOX, namely, secret diplomacy, disarmament of nations in whole or in part, no economic trade barriers, freedom of the seas, and a league of nations to enforce peace without violating American sovereignty, there is no more doubt that this Senate will confirm the treaty than there is about the existence of the United States itself.

Mr. President, when President Wilson last winter announced the policy for which he stood, known as the 14 points, 5 of which are now objected to by the two distinguished Senators, he was applauded by men ever, where within the confines of civilization. He was applauded by the Senators in this body on both sides of the Chamber; he was applauded by Representatives in the House on both sides of the Chamber; he was applauded by the English, by the French, and by the Italians; he was applauded everywhere, save in Germany, for enunciating these very principles which it is now said we must postpone or reject; and if the newspapers are correct—I do not know whether they are correct or not—the speeches of Senator LODGE and Senator KNOX were a threat that whatever treaty of peace was made by the President in Europe, if it contained these principles, these five points, was going to be rejected by a Republican Senate when it came into being. I wish to say that I hope that that is not correct, and I want to give a word of warning, not only to our own people, but to the people across the seas: Do not pay too much attention, gentlemen, to this threat to reject the treaty before President Wilson negotiates it. I do not believe that Senators LODGE and KNOX have expressed the sentiments and wishes of even any considerable number of the plain people of this country.

KALEIDOSCOPIC CHANGE OF POSITIONS.

Mr. President, there have been some kaleidoscopic changes of views since America turned the scale and won this war and since the November election. The President made his speech containing the 14 points on January 8, 1918. The Evening Star, a Republican paper, in its issue of January 9, 1918, said:

> The President's address was approved by the leaders of both parties in Congress.

That is, the 14 points, including the 5 that the two Senators are against.

There were interviews from Senators LODGE, WADSWORTH, SUTHERLAND, and former Speaker CANNON, Mr. LONGWORTH, and J. HAMPTON MOORE, and many other distinguished Republicans—some ex-Presidents were in the number, as I recall—everyone applauding these five points that they say now ought to be postponed.

Senator LODGE said:

> It was a very able message and a very concrete proposition.

Senator WADSWORTH said:

> It was splendid.

These statements were published in the Star of January 8 and in other papers throughout the country.

The Star, after publishing these expressions, said in its editorial on that date:

> Clear in its terms and wise in its time of deliverance, the President's address to Congress to-day states the principles upon which peace, acceptable to the allied powers, may be secured.

The Washington Post then took a similar view, but now is strong for postponement. It now stands by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Pennsylvania in their advocacy of postponement and says that all these questions should be relegated to the rear. We must have only the issues of this war settled by the peace conference. But on July 5, 1918, that paper again voiced the sentiments of the Republicans upon the President's propositions as amplified in his Mount Vernon speech of July 4. In an editorial of the 5th, the Post said:

> Mr. Wilson spoke not only for America but for the allied nations and for every nation that seeks only its own and is willing to be fair to its neighbors. The robbers among nations, the powers that prey, and the rulers that secretly plot against others are the only ones that will disagree with the statement of humanity's cause and aspirations as expressed by President Wilson.

Less than six months ago this now great Republican paper was saying that the only ones that disagreed with these five points of President Wilson were the robbers among the nations, the powers that prey, and the rulers that plot secretly. But now the paper sings a wholly different tune:

> He condenses the allied aim in one sentence—the reign of law based on the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind. In order to achieve these aims predatory nations and rulers seeking to injure their neighbors must be destroyed or made powerless; settlements of all questions must be made with the acceptance of the nations concerned; and the nations must agree upon a system of mutual protection.

On August 23, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Senator LODGE thus expressed our aims:

> We are fighting, and our allies are fighting with us, for security, for independence, for the right of nations great and small to govern themselves in their own way, for organized races and peoples to have the opportunity to govern themselves in independent States, for the sanctity and observance of treaties—

He rejects it now; but listen to this statement made as late as August—> for the general disarmament of nations. How are these things to be secured? The details are really far more important than the general propositions, in which we all agree. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 23, p. 9393.)

He was for "the general disarmament of nations" then, but now he wants to postpone the general disarmament of nations to a more convenient season.

This sounds much like Wilson's language and like Wilson's policies. Further along in his speech the Senator from Massachusetts discusses Lord Lansdowne's statement, and here is what he said about it:

> Lord Lansdowne, and he not alone, appears to think that this war can be ended by a peace formulated by eminent representatives of the nations in the old way. He does not seem to have gone beyond the methods of 1815 and the Congress of Vienna. As this war is utterly different from any war that the world has ever known, so must the peace which concludes it be utterly different from any peace which the world has ever known. It can not be a peace of bargain, of give and take, and of arrangement. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 23, p. 9394.)

Less than four months ago the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts was telling the country in language that only he can use that this must not be a peace like that flowing from the treaty of Vienna, a treaty in the old way, but that new conditions had arisen. Indeed, Mr. President, in August, after this speech of Senator LODGE was delivered, many of his admirers thought his statement as to America's aims was a more perfect literary production than the President's statement, and the viewpoint of each was alleged to be identical.

And even as late as October 7, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 11160, Senator LODGE says:

> Nobody else wants more war, and the world does not mean to have more war.

Mr. President, as long as the war was being fought, as long as America was in danger, as long as the allied cause was in danger, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts never dissented from all of the 14 points as expressed by President Wilson. Our Republican friends generally upheld them. It was understood all the time that Senator LODGE upheld them, but when the war is over, when the war has been won under the leadership of the President, we find one of the first of those to criticize the 14 points is the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. But not only did our Republican friends in this country uphold Mr. Wilson's 14 points and applaud them but all the civilized nations of the world applauded them. On January 8, 1918, the Evening Star had an article entitled, "Held Magna Charta of future peace—President Wilson's war aims hailed by press of Britain," and citing the Westminster Gazette, the Evening News, and the Pall Mall Gazette. It then quotes the Westminster Gazette as follows:

> In such a world as that to which the President looks forward, with an association of nations, affording a guaranty of the political independence of all States, with open covenants, disarmament by mutual consent, and freedom as far as possible from economic barriers, this aspiration could have no terrors for the British.

And so similar views were expressed in England by Viscount Bryce and David Lloyd George and Premier Borden, of Canada, and also other leading English statesmen. The French papers took the same position. The Petit Parisien said:

> It is the finest piece of political literature of our times. It lays down the basis upon which the world, after being rid of the perpetual menace of armed conflicts, may be reconstructed.

Mr. President, what has come over the spirit of their dreams since the armistice was declared? There can be but one answer. The opposition to these views of the President came from selfish interests in Britain and in France. I do not believe they represent the real thought and mind and heart of Great Britain. I know they do not represent the real thought and mind and heart of France any more than they represent the real thought and heart and mind of this great country.

COL. ROOSEVELT'S ASTOUNDING PROPOSITION.

Mr. President, there is one other matter that I desire to call attention to—one other distinguished Republican whose views I wish to discuss for just a moment. I desire to have a word to say about Col. Roosevelt's astounding proposition.

On December 4, 1918, I read in the Washington Post an interview with Col. Roosevelt, a part of which is as follows:

"The British Empire imperatively needs the greatest navy in the world, and this we should instantly concede," said the colonel. "Our need for a great navy comes next to hers, and we should have the second navy in the world. * * * There must be no interpretation of the phrase that would prevent the English Navy, in the event of any future war, from repeating the tremendous service it has rendered in this war. * * * It is the British Navy and the French, British, and Italian Armies that have done the most to bring about the downfall of Germany, and therefore the safety of the United States. It is our business to stand by our allies."

In other words, as I interpret the statements of Col. Roosevelt, he means to say that we should concede to England the right to control the seas and agree in advance to any settlement of the war that she approves. He substantially gives to her the credit of winning the war and saving America, and some of us had been innocent enough to believe, until instructed otherwise by the colonel, that America had entered the war at the crucial moment and saved England and the other allies! And even England and France seem likewise to have so believed! What a poor opinion the colonel seems to have of the American soldiers in this war!

Mr. President, in concert with millions of Americans all over this land, I greatly admire and respect the distinguished ex-President, but, Mr. President, when he says that this great Nation of ours must take a subservient place in this world, and, in effect, look to the English Navy for aid and protection in any future war, he makes a statement to which I can never agree. It is an un-American statement; it is an unpatriotic statement; it is a statement of which he will ever be ashamed in the future, because no American, however great his former position, can assert that the American Nation should take a subservient place on land or sea to any nation on earth. The colonel is, I am afraid, allowing his hatred of the President to sour his nature and warp his judgment. Our English cousins give our soldiers the credit for winning the war. Our French friends say likewise. All the allies are generous enough to give the American soldiers the credit, but the colonel says it was the allies who saved America, and not America who saved the allies. This is a proposition which will be difficult for the colonel to prove. I say to you that American soldiers at Chateau-Thierry and at other subsequent great battles in France turned the tide and won the victory that the allies are now enjoying and which we are enjoying.

A PEOPLE'S WAR; A PEOPLE'S TREATY.

Much is being written in Europe and America just now about the rejection of the Wilson treaty before it is made. It is being argued by those who oppose Mr. Wilson that the speeches of Senators LODGE and KNOX foreshadow the defeat of the treaty in the Senate. I want to say a word of warning to our enemies about this. Do not lay too much store upon these stories. The Senate has not acted yet. The Knox resolution has not passed, and unless I am very greatly mistaken it will never pass. I doubt if the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania ever intended it to pass. I doubt if he ever brings it up.

And then, too, there is another equation that has to be reckoned with. That equation is the American people. Under the Constitution Congress, indeed, has the right to declare war, and nominally it does it. But in reality it is only done by Congress when the American people unmistakably so decree. And so it will be with peace. The American people will pass upon it, and when they do so the Senate will register their will, speeches of opposing Senators to the contrary notwithstanding.

AMERICAN PEOPLE ARE WITH WILSON.

There is no doubt that the American people favor these five demands of President Wilson. They want no secret diplomacy. No public man in this country can stand for secret diplomatic agreements when the issue is raised and live politically. And the same is true about freedom of the seas. The people may not have studied the question, but they want no interference with their rights on the seas. They want their ships to carry passengers and goods wherever they please on the seas without let or hindrance in peace or in war. They want no repetition of the Lusitania catastrophe. They want no more marking off of a dead line on the seas, as Germany did, the crossing of which dead line means destruction of vessels and loss of innocent lives. They want no more murder by lying in wait by U-boats, and these are the things they believe Wilson means when he says that he is in favor of the freedom of the seas. They want no more trade barriers to their commerce. They have had too many trade barriers lately to suit them. They have had to ask for too many visés. They have had to submit to too many regulations. They have had to ask for too many permits. They expect to have a merchant marine of their own. They expect to use it to their own commercial advantage. They want trade with all the nations of the world on the terms of equal opportunity and equal justice to all. They may not understand fully the technical meaning of trade barriers, but they believe that their foreign trade will improve when a treaty is made removing such barriers whatever they are. And then they want disarmament. Big navies and big armies are expensive. They are likewise extremely dangerous. They are dangerous in principle and deadly in practice. The plain people of the country believe that there would have been no war if Germany had not built up in the past such a great army and such a great navy. They believe that if England or France or Italy or America keeps or maintains great armies and great navies that there will be other trouble to come that will cost other millions of lives and other billions of property and other billions of taxation for the present and future generations to pay. Finally, they believe that there should be an end of war. They believe that it can be prevented by a concert or agreement of the nations now, as has been suggested by President Wilson. They believe it ought to be done now, not at some undetermined future time, as Senators LODGE and KNOX want it done, if at all. They believe that this war was fought for the holy purpose of self-defense and out of a desire to prevent all wars in the future by mutual agreement. They gave their sons for this purpose. They gave generously of their wealth to secure it. They bought bonds without stint to guarantee it. They have toiled and endured and suffered to put an end to militarism and to autocracy and to murder by wholesale on land and on sea. If President Wilson, as the chief negotiator for America under our Constitution, shall secure these things in a peace treaty that treaty will be confirmed beyond the shadow of a doubt. The immortal spirits of 60,000 American dead, their lifeless bodies moldering on foreign soil, mute but glorious sacrifices to the lofty principles for which they fought and gave up their lives, demand that there should be an end to war. The voices of millions of American fathers rise in protest against any shackles being placed upon the President to secure a treaty by which future wars can not be waged. The mothers of these splendid sleeping heroes in France, the mothers of millions of others who have offered their lives in this war, are unanimously in favor of the President's proposals. The American people want no more wars, and they want the other nations to covenant and agree with them to that righteous end.

REPUBLICANS HAVE RAISED THE ISSUE.

Mr. President, in the speeches of Senators LODGE and KNOX, leaders of the Republicans in the Senate, that party has raised an issue for the next campaign from which it will be difficult for them to escape. To be consistent they must put in their platform in 1920 that they are not in favor, at this time, of any disarmament of nations; that they are not in favor of the freedom of the seas; that they are not in favor of eliminating economic trade barriers; that they are not in favor of open diplomacy; and that they are not in favor of any league of nations which will bring about a permanent and enduring peace of the world. They want all these questions postponed. However much they may squirm, however much they may talk, this is the inevitable logic of the position that they are taking here in this Senate to-day, and have taken heretofore. Upon these issues, Mr. President, the Democratic Party will meet them with confidence. Our party will welcome nothing more warmly than for our Republican opponents to put into their platform next year the demand for the postponement or defeat of these five great and righteous proposals of the best American President who ever adorned that office.

THE PRESIDENT'S VISIT TO EUROPE.

When the President announced his purpose of going across the ocean in person to negotiate this peace treaty he was criticized for so doing. There was no reason why he should not, under the Constitution. There was no law which prohibited him from going, and as it has turned out there was every reason why he should have gone. Indeed, Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent now that there was a little coterie of men in England not really representative of England and a coterie of men on this side not really representative of the American people that had made up their minds to prevent the enactment of these great measures into a permanent peace. The President saw it, and he has gone over and taken charge of it in person, and I believe he will make good. I believe that he will have enacted into a treaty all these contentions—every one of them—and when he does he will have won a more lasting triumph than he has even won in his successful leadership of the greatest military undertaking that ever occurred in all history. Success could have only been obtained by his personal visit to Europe. In going over he may have disturbed a precedent, but he violated no law, and if he gets the peace that the American people want, as I believe he will, then he is to be commended for breaking another precedent.

PRE-ELECTION PROMISES.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senators from Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, and the distinguished ex-President, Col. Roosevelt, are justly conceded to be the leaders and the spokesmen for the Republican Party. Before the November election these leaders and the other leaders of that party throughout the land asserted on every stump and in every Republican newspaper that the Republican Party had been more steadfast in its devotion to the President, the Commander in Chief of the forces of the United States, in this war than had the Democrats. This was not true, but many people believed it. The Republicans promised the people that, if given power, they would not hamper or embarrass the President in his peace negotiations. They assured the country that they were going to uphold and stand by the President in his demands for a just and permanent settlement of the issues of the war, and yet, no sooner is the election over, than we hear in this Chamber, than we see in every Republican newspaper in the land, criticisms of the President and of his policy, which are in direct violation of the promises these gentlemen made to the American people when they were asking the people to give them power in the next Congress. Mr. President, this heckling of the President, this stabbing him in the back while he is away upon this peace mission, these attacks upon the acknowledged peace negotiator of our country while he is engaged in the country's most important business, show the insincerity of the Republican Party and show that it will merit the condemnation which that party must receive at the hands of the American people for the betrayal of the promises made by it prior to the election.

Mr. President, we challenge the Republican Party to go to the country upon the five peace proposals asked to be postponed by the two distinguished Senators, a postponement which, if secured, everybody knows will mean the defeat of those proposals.

Ah, Mr. President, the day of reckoning will come! The American people do not believe in any party violating its pledges. The Republican Party pledged itself to uphold the American Government in the peace conference and to maintain these things for which it had fought. Under the leadership of President Wilson we have won the war; and now, since we have won it, and the election is over, the Tories on this side of the water are plotting to work against America and prevent our country from getting that to which it is entitled.

Mr. President, I have already talked longer than I had intended. I have studied this question and have come to the conclusion that if we want to avoid war in the future we should stand as one man behind the President in securing for this country a league of nations, a concert of nations, of all nations, which will prevent wars in the days to come. Do not let us stab him in the back; do not let us harass him; do not let us hamper him. I appeal to all men, Democrats and Republicans, men and women all over the country, let us stand by the policies and ideals upon which we won the war. If they were good enough to win the war, they are good enough to stand by and uphold and maintain now that the war is over, so that a just and righteous and an enduring peace may come to all the world.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution, and ask its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 398) was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Whereas prior to the signing of the armistice a large number of enlisted men in the Army had been recommended for commissions and many officers had been recommended for promotion, and such recommendations were pending in the War Department when said armistice was signed; and

Whereas an order was issued by the Secretary of War which resulted in no action being taken upon said recommendations, or either of them; and

Whereas officers and enlisted men who were so recommended are being discharged from the service without said recommendations being acted upon; and

Whereas no good and sufficient reason appears for failure to act upon said recommendations, and justice and good faith would seem to require affirmative action thereon: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate whether a modification or revocation of said order is contemplated, and, if not, what reasons exist for failing to act upon said recommendations.

THE ARMY.

Mr. KING. I submit a resolution, and ask that it be read and lie upon the table. I shall ask its consideration when there are more Senators present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 400) as follows:

Whereas representatives of the United States and the allied governments will soon meet at Paris for the purpose of negotiating terms of peace between the said governments and the central powers; and

Whereas under the law providing for the present military forces of the United States, most of said forces within a short period after the terms of peace have been signed will automatically be released and discharged from military service; and

Whereas it may be necessary for the United States to maintain military forces in Europe for a considerable period after peace conditions have been agreed upon, not only for the purpose of procuring a fulfillment of the necessary guaranties exacted from the central powers, but for other proper, legitimate, and imperative reasons; and

Whereas the unsettled and confused conditions existing throughout the world require that provision be made for the safety and security of this Nation and its interests, and for such purpose in addition to the maintenance of a strong Navy an Army of sufficient strength and size should be organized: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate legislation should be enacted authorizing the organization of an Army of 500,000 men.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Do I understand that by the provisions of the draft law the period of four months is fixed within which there must be demobilization?

Mr. KING. My understanding of the draft law to which the Senator refers is that at the end of four months after the proclamation of the President shall have been issued proclaiming peace all of the soldiers, except those that enlisted regularly under the General Statutes, shall be demobilized.

Mr. PHELAN. Automatically?

Mr. KING. Automatically.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator know how many of those soldiers there are that have enlisted in the Regular Establishment?

Mr. KING. No; I do not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think it would be wise to find out how many of those there are? Suppose there are 500,000?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have made some inquiries and understand that there will not be that number. I am not asking for the consideration of this resolution now. I ask that it lie on the table and I shall bring it up at a future time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to state that the four-months' limitation applies only to the soldiers who are in a foreign country. The soldiers in the Army in continental America, I might say, or America, are to be demobilized immediately after peace is declared; and the four-months' period, as I state, has reference only to those who are serving in foreign lands.

Mr. KING. I understood that the inquiry of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] was directed to those who were overseas.

Mr. PHELAN. It was clearly the intention of the legislature to provide for immediate demobilization, and the period of four months was given in which to transport them from overseas to continental America.

Mr. KING. That is the interpretation which I place upon the statute.

Mr. PHELAN. Then it is necessary, in the event of further trouble and a need for an army of occupation or policing, to pass new legislation?

Mr. KING. I think there is no question but that further legislation is required.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I interrupt to ask the Senator if he has considered the question, or has had it brought to his attention, concerning the National Guard of the various States?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not recall just how many there are of the National Guard of the various States, but probably a number not far from what the Senator has mentioned.

Mr. KING. I think that is true; but, notwithstanding——

Mr. McKELLAR. Under a recent opinion of some subordinate officer of the Judge Advocate General's department—not by Gen. Crowder—an opinion has been delivered holding that the National Guard will be mustered out in exactly the same way that the National Army was, and that they would not be any longer members of the National Guard of their several States. I want to suggest to the Senator that I think that holding is absolutely without merit and will be overturned whenever presented to the proper authority, and that the matter of the National Guard should be considered in connection with any legislation that may be brought up, whether the Senator's bill or some other bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, unquestionably there will be need for considerable legislation dealing with the entire subject of the military forces of the United States, and also dealing with the question of the National Guard of the various States, and the relation, if any, which they shall bear to the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think there is likely to be a proclamation of peace before the 1st of next September? Is there any reason why this matter can not go over to the next Congress?

Mr. KING. I am not asking, Mr. President, for immediate legislation. I do not think that could be had intelligently. I am merely expressing the opinion by this resolution that we ought to have and will soon require a standing Army of the proportions to which I have referred in the resolution.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. KING. I ask that the following resolution be read and that it lie upon the table, and I will endeavor to call it up for consideration the next time the Senate shall convene.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 399) was read, as follows:

Whereas claims aggregating millions of dollars in compensation for damages to property and for personal outrages and destruction of life, suffered by American citizens in the Republic of Mexico, have been filed with the Department of State for presentation to the Government of Mexico; and

Whereas some years have already intervened between the commission of such damages and outrages and no progress is apparently being made toward the liquidation, settlement, and payment of such claims: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate whether or not said claims have been presented to the Government of Mexico and what steps and measures are being taken to prosecute such claims and to liquidate and settle the same, and if said claims have not been presented, then to report to the Senate what steps and measures are contemplated to be taken with respect thereto and when the department will proceed with the same.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not think there will be any objection whatever to the adoption of this resolution, but in view of the fact that there are so few Senators present I shall not ask for its consideration at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, January 2, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 30, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be upon us, O God, our heavenly Father, that we may solve the problems thrust upon us, in accordance with Thy will and good purposes. Especially guide the entente powers in solving the world-wide problems, calculated to make the world a safer place for Thy children to dwell in; and thus may the light of heaven guide us to purity, liberty, justice for all mankind. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, December 27, 1918, was read and approved.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 12863, the revenue bill, and disagree to all the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the revenue bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are several amendments which, in the opinion of a great many Members, ought to be considered by the House, so that the House may have an opportunity to agree to the amendments, such as the child-labor amendment, the amendment providing that the so-called Reed provision shall be in effect in the District of Columbia, and possibly two or three other amendments. What arrangement is the gentleman from North Carolina going to make with the House relating to those amendments?

Mr. KITCHIN. The amendments as to which it has been suggested that the House conferees accept them, or that we have a vote upon them in the House, are the child-labor amendment, the tax on contributions for political purposes, and the bone-dry law for the District of Columbia. They are the three that have been suggested in the House and by Members to me.

Mr. FOSTER. And the soldiers' monthly pay.

Mr. KITCHIN. The War Department says that ought to be amended considerably.

Mr. MADDEN. I may add, if the gentleman from North Carolina will permit, that many of the Members would like to have a separate vote on the postal-zone amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman candidly that, so far as I am concerned, I will not agree to the postal-zone Senate amendment under any circumstances, unless the House instructs me to do it, and I doubt whether the House will instruct me to do it.

On the other propositions I feel that the overwhelming sentiment of the House is in favor of the child-labor amendment and of the bone-dry law substantially as they are in the bill.

As to the tax on political contributions, I think the overwhelming majority of the House are in favor of that, with some modifications of it. As it exists in the bill, it applies to contributions heretofore made, which would be manifestly unjust; and, in my judgment, if we are going to have such a tax, it ought to be a little broader, it ought to apply to more organizations than it does apply to it as it stands in the bill.

Now, I will say as to the child-labor amendment and the bone-dry law, as the overwhelming sentiment of the House is in favor of them, I think the House can trust the conferees to agree to those amendments.

Mr. MANN. The bone-dry amendment, or whatever it is called——

Mr. SIMS. The Reed amendment.

Mr. MANN. The Reed amendment is No. 600, and the child-labor amendment is 546.

Mr. MADDEN. If my colleague will permit, I think there is sufficient justification for discussion on the tax on political contributions to require it to be brought back to the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that in any event it would certainly require several modifications.

Mr. MADDEN. It ought to be brought back.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will agree to that.

Mr. MANN. As to the first two amendments that I spoke of, will the gentleman state to the House that he will bring those amendments back in disagreement if the House conferees do not agree to the Senate amendments?

Mr. KITCHIN. Will I do what? Will I bring them back to the House?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman agree to bring those two amendments back to the House in disagreement——

Mr. KITCHIN. If we do not agree to them.

Mr. MANN. If the House conferees do not agree to the Senate amendments?

Mr. KITCHIN. As to those two, I will.

Mr. FOSTER. And what about the campaign contributions?

Mr. KITCHIN. As to the campaign contributions amendment, yes; I will bring that back.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that ought to come back. I think that is an iniquitous proposition, to tax a man for a campaign contribution.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a difference of opinion about that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think there is a gentleman in the House who would want to agree to the proposition as it is in the bill, no matter how much he believes in the justice of a tax on political contributions. There are several amendments that are required to that amendment. I understand that even the real author of that amendment does not want it to become a law in its present form.

Mr. MANN. Of course, under that amendment as it stands, if a Member of the House, such as my colleague from Illinois, has contributed to a campaign committee, where he is not required by law to do so, over $500, he would have to duplicate that payment to the Government.

Mr. KITCHIN. Under that amendment if he contributed a thousand dollars in the last campaign, under the amendment as it now stands he would have to pay the Government $500, because he had contributed $500 in excess of the $500 permitted, and he must pay the Government 100 per cent on the excess. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois would want us to agree to that.

Mr. FOSTER. Some modifications ought to be made of that, and the provision could be made much stronger and better than it is, and I think we ought to have an opportunity to perfect that amendment so as to put it into law.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will agree to bring that back.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Touching the prohibition amendment, I suppose this is the only chance that I may have to voice my objection to it. If I had the power, now or hereafter, it would be submitted to a vote of the people of the District of Columbia. That is all that I want to say about that. My understanding is, in regard to the contribution, that a member of Congress can contribute $5,000—that is the law as it now is. Frankly, I contributed $1,400, as I recollect, to my various county central committees. If this Senate amendment was agreed to, what would I have to pay?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman, being a candidate himself, contributing for his campaign, would not pay anything under this amendment.

Mr. MANN. If he had made the contribution as one contribution, under the Senate bill, he would be taxed.

Mr. FOSTER. He contributes that money within the limit of the law.

Mr. KITCHIN. In my judgment the proper way to construe that in a case like this is, suppose I am a candidate for Congress and contribute to my campaign and expend $3,000 or $4,000. I would not be taxed at all under this amendment, although it is in excess of $500. But if the gentleman from Illinois contributes to my campaign $3,000 he would be taxed 100 per cent of the amount in excess of $500. Now, if you have any tax at all on political contributions you ought to include the amounts which candidates contribute in excess of the amount authorized by law. If I am authorized by law to contribute to my campaign expenses $5,000 and I contribute $6,000, I ought to pay a tax on the excess if anybody is going to pay taxes on excess contributions.

Mr. FOSTER. If the law limits him, he would not have a right to contribute beyond that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Under existing law there is no penalty attached to it.

Mr. RUCKER. Yes, there is.

Mr. FOSTER. A year in jail and $5,000 fine.

Mr. MANN. The penalty, however, is in the statute book, but not imposed in practice.

Mr. KITCHIN. A man may run it up to $100,000.

Mr. BARNHART. The State law in some cases fixes the maximum amount that a candidate may contribute different from that fixed by the Federal Government; then, if, like the gentleman from Illinois, he contributes the maximum amount under his State law, as I did, would he be taxed for the amount over $500?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think he would not.

Mr. BARNHART. There would be a complication in these matters between the State and the Federal Government that ought to be cleared up.

Mr. KITCHIN. This amendment does not cover the contributions of candidates. There has always been a conflict in the Federal State provisions limiting the amount that may be contributed. Some States allow more than the Federal statute and the Federal statute in some cases more than the States.

Mr. BARNHART. If an Indiana candidate for Congress should contribute the amount allowed in the Federal statutes he would be in jail the next morning after election because he would exceed the amount allowed by the State law.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is plain that a good many of these provisions are not for the purpose of raising money but are legislation under the guise of taxation. I wanted to ask the gentleman if it was not the sense of the committee that such a mode of legislating should not be permitted and that these amendments should be gotten rid of?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman wants my personal views, I say yes. I do not think we ought to hang on a revenue bill under the guise of taxation real affirmative legislation. If I had my way there would be a general rule in the House and Senate forbidding it. But since there is no rule forbidding it I will take the will of the House in the conference and act according to that. I am thankful that we did not get an amendment providing for Government ownership and woman suffrage.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman think it very dangerous to pass such legislation without the care that comes from the consideration of legislation in committee?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think, while I am in favor of the bone-dry law, that it ought not to be hung on a revenue bill. They have here an appropriation for discharged soldiers; that ought not to be put on a revenue bill. Those propositions should come from the proper Appropriations Committee. The bone-dry law should come from the proper committee and be considered alone on its merits. The child-labor proposition should also come from the proper committee and be considered by that committee, but we have no rule prohibiting that, and since there is a sentiment in the House overwhelmingly in favor of some of these propositions I would not go contrary to the will of the House.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have always objected to such amendments and have not been afraid to object.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. In view of the statement the gentleman has just made, would he oppose as a member of the conference committee amendment 599 providing for a month's extra pay for officers and sailors honorably discharged since November 11, 1918?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would not object to that, but it ought to be amended as the gentleman will see if he analyzes it thoroughly. He will see that it requires amendment. I received a letter this morning from the Secretary of War saying that it requires an amendment, as it is not in proper form.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to ask the gentleman with reference to the tax in excess of $500 for campaign contributions. Who pays that tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. The man who contributes; he must give it in in the tax returns.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not understand that that is so.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will read further, he will see that it says that he must return it in the taxable return.

Mr. RUCKER. I think the plain sense of it is that the party receiving it should pay the tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will look at the bottom half of page 87 of the bill, he will find that every person required by "this title" to make a return shall state therein specifically each item, and the date of all gifts, contributions, and so forth.

Mr. RUCKER. Is there anything in the title that fixes definitely that where a man contributes more than he may contribute under the amendment hereafter to be adopted——

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; this man must make his tax return, and in the tax return this item must be included.

Mr. RUCKER. I hope the gentleman is right, but I do not believe he is.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the intention.

Mr. RUCKER. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I think, as a matter of fact, that the individual receiving the excess ought to be the one to make the return and to pay the tax on it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Also a political organization or political committee must make a return.

Mr. RUCKER. That is in the existing law. I came in while this colloquy was in progress. Is the House to express itself to-day upon this amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. I have agreed to bring the three amendments back if we do not agree to them.

Mr. RUCKER. May I ask the gentleman whether he will receive some proposed amendments that I have drafted?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I shall be very glad to receive them. I think the political-contribution proposition should not have been a tax proposition, but should have come from the committee of which the gentleman is chairman.

Mr. RUCKER. I think the gentleman is right about that as a matter of ethics and procedure, but those of us who have been trying to get legislation of this kind are glad to have it come from any source, and we shall make no question about that. The gentleman in the course of the discussion has expressed his admiration for proper procedure in legislation and also expressed some gratification that woman suffrage and public ownership have not been ingrafted on this bill. In that connection he also said the whisky amendment ought not to have been ingrafted on a revenue bill. Let me remind the gentleman that, in all probability, we would have to-day two saloons in this Capitol, as we did have for many years, if it had not been that the law which drove the whisky out of the Capitol was not brought in on a separate bill but was ingrafted as legislation upon an immigration bill, and, as a matter of fact, was voted for in derision by a good many gentlemen.

Mr. KITCHIN. It was put on as a sort of joke.

Mr. RUCKER. But it has stood there, and it has had a mighty good effect, as I know the gentleman will admit.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion right there?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. My observation is that while they do not sell liquor down in the restaurant it is quite as easy to get liquor of any kind in the Capitol as it ever was.

Mr. RUCKER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that some Members of Congress would be glad if he would give them information respecting that, privately, and I want to see the gentleman myself and have a talk with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Will the House have an opportunity to vote on the so-called bone-dry amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. I just said to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that if the conferees on the part of the House disagreed or could not come to an agreement upon the bone-dry proposition, we would come back with it to the House.

Mr. KAHN. But suppose the conferees agree to the Senate amendments?

Mr. KITCHIN. Then there would not be any coming back.

Mr. KAHN. Will there be a possibility of getting a vote upon it before it goes to conference?

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course there is a possibility, because I am asking now for unanimous consent to go to conference without taking these votes.

Mr. KAHN. If the bill should go to conference and the conferees should agree to the Senate amendment, we would not be able to get a record vote upon it here?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. KAHN. Then I shall object.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina agree to bring that amendment back to the House and give the House an opportunity to vote upon it separately?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. SIMS. Why not have a vote upon that before you go to conference?

Mr. MANN. Because we have made an agreement not to do any business to-day.

Mr. KITCHIN. And I would say further to the gentleman that the reason I do not want to vote upon it now is because we would have to wait until January 4 or 5 to get the membership here to vote upon the proposition.

Mr. SIMS. I do not object to that at all, but I want the gentleman to have the power to agree, not to go to a conference manacled and hog-tied.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman from Tennessee would not give him the power to disagree to the amendment, would he?

Mr. SIMS. No; not with my vote.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LUNN. I want to ask the gentleman if he will make the same provision he has just made in regard to the bone-dry amendment also in respect to Senate amendment No. 594, respecting the zone system?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have already said to the gentleman from Illinois that I would not agree to that.

Mr. LUNN. Then the House could not get a vote upon that amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. They could not get a vote upon the amendment if the Senate should recede.

Mr. LUNN. I think we ought to get a vote upon that, because the situation is decidedly changed from what it was when the vote was first taken. The amendment proposed is much more favorable than what many Members voted upon.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very few of the Members voted against the House proposition on the record vote, and I think three-fourths of the House are against the Senate proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. The next regular meeting of the House will be on January 2.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. Only two days will intervene between now and then, and one of those will be a holiday.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it likely the conference committee will do very much work between now and the regular meeting of the House on Thursday next?

Mr. KITCHIN. We are going to meet on the 2d, but we could not get a quorum until the 4th or 5th.

Mr. RANDALL. In view of the situation, and to relieve the gentleman of the embarrassment of having a bone-dry amendment on a revenue bill, I shall object.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from North Carolina has agreed to bring back that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. When will the gentleman bring it back? After the committee on conference has used it as a football, probably, for a week or two?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, the Senate is strong for it and——

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has just stated that no meeting of the conference committee will be held until the 2d. This House will have an opportunity to act upon this amendment on the 2d, and for that reason I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman will not have to object, because I have no idea there will be a quorum here until the 4th or——

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman will be safe.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know just what is the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table this revenue bill, to disagree to all Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, I will say to the gentleman that before he came in I have agreed that if the House conferees do not agree with the Senate amendment on the child-labor proposition, in which the gentleman is very much interested, I will bring it back, but there is going to be no doubt about the conferees agreeing to it. If they do not, I agreed with the gentleman from Illinois at his request that I will bring that back and give a vote on it, so the gentleman will be perfectly safe.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Let me get that clearly in mind.

Mr. KITCHIN. That if the House conferees do not agree with the Senate on this amendment on the child-labor proposition, the House conferees will bring it back here for a vote on it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. But suppose they do agree?

Mr. KITCHIN. Then the gentleman is satisfied.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I thought the gentleman stated he would agree to bring it back anyhow.

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The gentleman said so.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the gentleman from Illinois asked that if the House conferees did not agree on the child-labor amendment would we bring it back, and I said yes; but I can assure the gentleman——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do I understand the proposition to be that if the House conferees do not agree with the Senate conferees as to the amendment the gentleman will bring it back, or that if the House conferees do not agree to the child-labor amendment as it is in the bill it will be brought back?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The last is the one?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. With reference to the child-labor amendment, do I understand the gentleman to have agreed that in case the House conferees do not accept the Senate amendment as proposed in the bill without modification he will bring it back?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Nobody knows what the question was or heard the answer.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I heard the answer. Just to make the point clear the question I asked the gentleman was, Would he accept the Senate amendment without modification, and in the event he could not accept it without modification would he bring it back to the House? And he said he would.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What Senate amendment?

Mr. KEATING. The child-labor amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman the same question in reference to the bone-dry amendment which the gentleman from Colorado asked about child labor. Will the gentleman bring it back to the House if there is a disagreement of any kind or any change whatever?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have agreed with the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to bring it back, so as to have a vote, unless Mr. KAHN withdraws——

Mr. KAHN. I certainly do not.

Mr. KITCHIN. I knew he would not.

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LUNN. I desire to ask the gentleman if he will make the same agreement in reference to the postal zone system? It seems to me it is fair to make the same agreement in reference to Senate amendment 594, which is a very different proposition from the original one.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think there is a great deal of difference in it, but the House has gone squarely on record on the question and the Senate went squarely on record on it. It is now a law in full operation. This is a provision affirmatively repealing that law, that was put on the statute books by an overwhelming majority in the Senate and the House, and I hope the gentleman will not ask us to bring that back.

Mr. LUNN. The Senate has changed it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course the Senate has changed it. The Senate has made more than 500 changes in the bill.

Mr. LUNN. It is only fair that the gentleman should make the same agreement with regard to that amendment as with regard to these other amendments, or I will have to object.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that I will not make that agreement.

Mr. LUNN. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. Of course, the adjournment will be until Thursday.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, January 2, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we stand reverently before Thee, and submit our thought and will to Thy will. We recognize Thy right to rule. Thou art our Sovereign, our King, our God. Thy power has gotten us the victory, and we turn to Thee for Thy grace, that as we pursue the great ideals, born out of the calamities of the present time, we may have the divine guidance and blessing upon us.

We pray that Thou wilt draw us together as a people and that Thou wilt draw the nations of the earth together that we may establish a right relationship between men, based upon the revelations of Thy will concerning us. Hear us in our prayer, and bless us in the discharge of the sacred duties of this hour. For Christ's sake. Amen.

AFFAIRS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, for the information of the Foreign Relations Committee, I read very briefly from this morning's newspaper, as follows:

YANKS DRIVE ON REDS—GAIN 14 MILES IN NORTH RUSSIA, FIGHTING STUBBORNLY—UFA FALLS TO BOLSHEVIKI—LENINISTS TAKE CAPITAL WEST OF URALS; GAIN NEAR BALTIC—RIGA TERROR STRICKEN AS BOLSHEVIK ARMY APPROACHES—RED NAVY EXPECTED TO DASH TO SEA FROM KRONSTADT—SWISS LEGATION PILLAGED IN RETALIATION FOR EXPULSION OF RUSSIAN ENVOYS BY SWITZERLAND.

ARCHANGEL, Monday, December 30.

An allied force composed of Americans, Russians, and Poles yesterday advanced 14 miles southward along the road bordering the Onega River. They met with considerable resistance from the bolsheviki, but captured more than a dozen villages and did not halt until they had taken the village of Gogoli.

Starting from the village of Kalovangi early Saturday morning, American forces took the village of Prilaki, where there is a large monastery. They continued the advance in hot fighting Sunday and had not yet been halted up to late Monday. Sleighs are being used to transport the allied soldiers.

RUSSIANS FIGHT WELL.

The advance, the first attempt of the winter, was carried out under semiarctic conditions and in the few hours of daylight which obtain in this region. The village of Gogoli is approximately 80 miles south of the town of Onega and about 40 miles west of the frozen swamp which forms the allied positions along the Vologda Railroad. The road along which the allies advanced leads in the general direction of Vologda and crosses the railway line at an important strategic center, from which the bolsheviki have been operating.

An important rôle in yesterday's fighting was taken by a Russian naval brigade, which had been trained by American and British naval officers. The Polish troops who participated distinguished themselves in the early days of the fighting along the Dvina. The Poles and Russians are filled with hatred for the bolsheviki and neither ask nor give quarter in combat.

Subsequently another dispatch is as follows:

YANKS RETAKE KADISH.

ARCHANGEL, Tuesday, December 31.

American troops yesterday recaptured the village of Kadish, on the middle sector of the northern Russian front, and to-day pushed forward their lines a distance of 2 miles south of the village in the direction of Vologda.

This winter push, which was against strong resistance, was undertaken simultaneously with a movement southward by the allied troops along the Onega River. The Onega column rested to-day at the village of Gogoli.

The recapture of Kadish was marked by some heavy fighting, in which, however, the American casualties were light. This village, which is located about midway between the Vologda Railway and the Dvina River, was strongly defended, and the Bolsheviki there used the blockhouses built by the Americans and British when they occupied the town in November, prior to being driven out by large forces of Bolsheviki.

CLEAR BOLSHEVIK TRENCHES.

Beginning Monday morning with an artillery attack, the Americans advanced across the frozen Emtsa River, where their positions have for more than a month been located in icy dugouts on the bank of the stream, bordering the destroyed bridge at the crossing of the Petrograd Road. They crossed the stream and cleared the Bolshevik trenches and machine-gun emplacements on the opposite bank.

The Americans then pushed forward 2 miles to the village, fighting their way under the protection of Canadian artillery, which was able to place shells almost at will in Kadish. The fur-clad American flanking parties in the frozen swamps bordering on the road contributed materially to the American success.

To-day the Americans, Russians, and Poles on this sector are confining their efforts to strengthening their positions.

Then follows more of a like sort. I call this to the attention of the Foreign Relations Committee that they may see how widely at variance are the facts with the Government's statements when our troops were sent to Russia. I also call to their attention for their edification as well the correspondence of the representative of the New York Times, recently published in that paper, concerning his view of the situation after traveling all over Siberia. The ultimate conclusion that he reached was, in substance, that the choice must be made in dealing with Russia—at the present moment at least—between the Bolsheviki on the one side and the Omsk government of Kolchak on the other, the one representing the terror, the other representing the old autocratic tyranny.

Mr. President, I do not care whether Members of this body favor the Bolsheviki or favor the old autocratic tyranny of Russia, whether it be one or the other; but I do say that for either to shed American blood is a crime.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. ASHURST. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 206) directing the Secretary of War to investigate the claims of those citizens of the United States who since December 1, 1912, suffered damages to person or property by acts of violence committed by Mexican outlaw, revolutionary, insurgent, or Federal forces was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make, or cause to be made under his direction, a full and thorough investigation of each and all claims of citizens of the United States (which may be called to his attention by claimants or their attorneys, heirs or personal representatives) for reimbursement and damages for injuries inflicted by Mexican outlaw, revolutionary, insurgent, or Federal forces since December 1, 1912, upon the person or to the property of such claimants.

For the purpose of such investigation the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint a commission of three officers of the Army, one of whom shall be an inspector general. Such commission shall have authority to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, and to take evidence on oath relating to any such claim, and to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers in any such proceeding by application to the district court of the United States for the district within which any session of the commission is held, which court is hereby empowered and directed to make all orders and issue all processes necessary for that purpose, and said commission shall have all the powers conferred by law upon inspectors general of the United States Army in the performance of their duties. MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR JAMES.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate shall convene on Sunday, February 9, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m., to consider resolutions in commemoration of the life, character, and public services of my late colleague, Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS FOR PEACE.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, following the usual course in this Chamber, I wish to give notice that on Saturday, immediately after the routine morning business, or the first legislative day thereafter, if we are not in session on that day, I shall ask permission to submit some remarks in support of a league of nations to enforce the peace of the world and a simple and practicable method of securing such end.

COST OF EAGLE BOATS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD two articles from the Daily Iron Trade, which is published at Cleveland, Ohio, in regard to Eagle boats, and that they be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the articles were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Daily Iron Trade and Metal Market Report, Dec. 27, 1918.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT ADVANCED MORE THAN $3,000,000 FOR HENRY FORD'S EXPERIMENTAL EAGLE PLANT—FORD'S STATEMENT HE HAS TO ACCEPT PROFITS BECAUSE ACTUAL COST COULD NOT BE DETERMINED BEFOREHAND FAILS TO JIBE WITH CONTRACT—TAKES 116 DAYS TO TEST "EAGLE-1."

[This is the second of a series of articles on Henry Ford's Eagle boats, of which the Navy Department insists 60 shall be built, at a minimum cost of $33,000,000, although Navy officials themselves admit they are not needed "until the next war" and are too expensive, as regards operation and maintenance, for auxiliary or gunboat service. The profit for Ford on these 60 alone will be $1,200,000. The first article appeared yesterday.]

SPEAKING OF HENRY FORD'S EAGLES, DID YOU KNOW—

That whistles for the entire original lot of 100 were among the first pieces of equipment to be completed?

That in asking Congress last spring to create more rear admirals Secretary of the Navy Daniels explained two would be needed to take charge of fleets of Eagle boats? On the basis of the number now in the Atlantic or on the way there, each rear admiral would have exactly three and one-half Eagles to command.

That Congress heard so much concerning Eagle-1 and so little of the original remaining 99 Congressmen began referring to it as "the one great Eagle"?

Though checked, the German submarines still presented a very real menace in the fall and early winter of 1917. Of all the schemes and ideas naval officers at Washington pored over and sifted down, the one that ultimately took shape in the Eagle-boat project found the most favor. "Take the best qualities of our destroyers and combine them with the superior advantages of the 110-foot submarine chasers"—this was the formula the Navy Department evolved. The upshot was that a steel, turbine-propelled craft, about 200 feet long, 500 tons burden, with a speed of 18.5 knots, or 20 miles, and mounting two 4-inch and one 3-inch gun—the latter also to be used against aircraft—was planned. Thus were the Eagles conceived.

BUILDER MOST IMPORTANT.

Second in point of importance, but almost first in importance, was the selection of the builder. Speed, obviously, was required above all else. With only quarter-inch plates, an exceptional capacity for skillful riveting also was demanded. In these deductions civilian advice not only concurred but led. In casting over the country's industries for one that most nearly satisfied these fundamental requirements the civilian advisors hit upon the Pullman Co. The riveting on Pullman cars approached closely to that demanded on the Eagles, and the Pullman Co.'s organization was of high repute. The Pullman Co., in fact, is said to have been in a receptive mood for the contract, owing to the peculiar situation in the passenger-car industry at that time. Civilian advice is said to have been practically unanimous in favor of the car interest.

ENTERS HENRY FORD.

Just about this time Henry Ford stepped into the picture at Washington. Despite the Oscar II, the boys still were in the trenches, and Ford had learned that the force demanded to end the war must be much more substantial than conversation. This, briefly, was said to have been the situation: On the one hand was the Navy, strong in the belief it had found the ideal antidote for U-boats, seeking a man who could build its Eagle boats, build them good, and build them swiftly. On the other hand was this man from the Middle West, with a world-wide reputation for doing great things, marred only by his peace-ship error of judgment, with an organization known far and wide for its efficiency and adaptability, and with its guiding genius eager to make a material contribution to allied arms. The combination proved irresistible. Preliminary details were settled, and construction of the Eagle plant, on the River Rouge, in close proximity to the Ford blast-furnace site, was got under way immediately.

IS IN COMPANY'S NAME.

The contract is dated March 1, 1918, and, contrary to the general belief, is between the Navy Department and the Ford Motor Co. and not an especially incorporated subsidiary. For the Navy Franklin D. Roosevelt, Acting Secretary, was signatory; the Ford Co.'s agent was F. J. Klingensmith, a vice president. Edsel B. Ford was a witness. One hundred Eagles was the number specified, although it was tacitly understood the Navy might ask for more if the emergency required. In addition, 12 were to be built for the Italian Government. The hulls were to be built at the River Rouge plant, while at Highland Park much of the machinery and auxiliary equipment was to be made. Some of the boilers, for example, have been built by outside interests at Detroit under subcontract. Plans for the Eagles were the Navy's solely, it is understood, though in the course of construction Ford engineers, naturally interested, played an active part in changes and corrections.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCED ALL.

For the construction of the River Rouge plant the Navy advanced every penny. According to Rear Admiral David W. Taylor, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy, the total expenditure authorized was $3,500,000, and the sums advanced approximate that amount. The site already was owned by Ford. Some dredging had to be done, but this was accomplished largely at the expense of the Army. "River" flatters the Rouge; "creek" is the more correct designation. For sentimental reasons the River Rouge lies close to the heart of Henry Ford. The district was the one in which he was born and reared. There Mrs. Ford also was born and reared, and the Ford home at Dearborn is on the banks of the Rouge.

PLANT COMMENDED.

The main building of the Eagle plant has been highly praised. It is 1,700 feet long by 350 feet wide, glass inclosed. The method of construction experimented upon by the Ford Co.—entirely at the Government's expense—differs radically from the accepted methods of shipbuilding. The keels of the Eagles are laid upon platforms mounted upon railroad tracks. As one operation is completed, the platform is rolled down to the next gang of workmen, in much the same manner as Ford cars are built. This method of construction necessitates a novel form of launching. Completed, the Eagles are rolled out upon what in effect is a hydraulic elevator. On this they are let down into the water. This plan was believed by Henry Ford to be a great advance over the methods of shipbuilding "professionals" and is said to have been his own. The Eagle contract completed, he planned to construct canal barges, for it is, or was, firmly imbedded in Henry Ford's mind that the United States makes too little use of its waterways, and the pioneer in opening them up will meet with unlimited possibilities.

THAT FIRST LAUNCHING.

Approximately four and one-half months elapsed before the first Eagle took to the water. To Henry Ford's way of thinking, a milepost in American ship construction was passed at 6.55 o'clock on the evening of July 11, 1918. What great store was set by this, the hatching of the first Eagle and the supposed beginning of the end of submarine piracy, can be glimpsed from the account of the launching in one of the Detroit newspapers:

"Whistles blew, the crowd of workmen and some half a hundred invited spectators gave vent to a lusty cheer, and not one of them but felt at the bottom of his heart that history was in the making. * * * There was no christening of the Eagle-1 nor any ceremony whatever, but what the occasion lacked in frills it made up in efficiency and dispatch which was, after all, more becoming to the serious business at hand. For the Eagles of the United States Navy, it is calculated, are not going to observe any special ceremony about sending Kaiser Bill's U-boats to Davy Jones's locker once they get going good, and Henry Ford promises an Eagle a day when he gets into his stride.

AUTO MAKER TURNED SHIPBUILDER.

"The auto maker turned shipbuilder, with Mrs. Ford and their son Edsel, attending the launching. * * * They all express pride in the new achievement; albeit they took it rather as a matter of course. * * * From the moment an Eagle starts from the construction building until she is floating free in the river, a third of a mile away, there is not one-tenth of the noise nor one one-hundredth of the excitement that was created on Woodward Avenue the day Henry Ford drove his first automobile down that thoroughfare. But the launching of the first Eagle was just as epoch making as that first auto drive of about a score of years ago."

HULL SHOWS UP FAULTY.

The first flight of Eagle-1 from her nest in the River Rouge is said to have been as enlightening as it was disappointing. Unconfirmed rumor says she "leaked like a sieve" and had to be hurried back to her dock to keep it from sinking in the Detroit River. To put the best possible construction upon the matter, Eagle-1 leaked badly, and spot welding had to be resorted to. The veriest tyro of a shipbuilder knows that a ship is not a ship without a tight hull, and this was something with which Henry Ford's shipbuilders had failed to endow Eagle-1.

Nor was this all. It developed then or on later trial trips that Eagle-1 was top-heavy, for from water line to top of pilot house was 28 feet, and the draft of 8 feet was attained only when the fuel-oil tanks contained their 100 per cent quota of 45,000 gallons. Great difficulty was encountered in steering, for while Eagle-1 responded swiftly to her helm, the compass was abnormally slow because of the extremely large percentage of iron and steel in the vessel. The arrangement of the pilot house was found to be faulty and inconvenient. There was some doubt, too, whether the required speed of 18.5 knots could be met, though this fear was largely dissipated later. Unusual difficulty also is said to have been encountered in tuning up Eagle-1's turbine.

The summer was one long vacation for Eagle 1 on the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers and Lakes St. Clair and Huron, whereas under the Ford contract she should have been hounding down U-boats on the other side of the Atlantic. The boasted one-a-day program dwindled and shrank to about one a month. Ford workmen found shipbuilding a much more difficult art than "flivver" building. Most serious of all was their inability to rivet. Theory and practice proved to be most dissimilar, and as the summer wore on only six more Eagles were dropped into the River Rouge.

SIX ARE RUSHED AWAY.

With winter coming on and the St. Lawrence threatening to freeze up any day, Navy engineers on the ground at Detroit finally sent the first seven away. Eagle 1 left the River Rouge just one week previous to the signing of the armistice. She should have been chasing submarines in the east Atlantic a minimum of three months, according to the contract. Only Eagle 1 received anything like passable trial trips and consequent corrections; Eagles 2 to 7 were dispatched with most of their faults as they were launched. Under his contract Henry Ford should have delivered the first by August 1, 10 in August, 20 in September, and 25 in October. His accomplishment instead was a paltry seven.

As a shipbuilder Henry Ford seems to be a fair engine and machinery maker. The latest official statement of the Navy Department on the progress of the hulls is as of November 1. On that date Eagles 1 to 7 had been launched; Eagles 8 to 12, inclusive, were 75 per cent completed; while Eagles 13 to 31, inclusive, were from 40 to 60 per cent completed. As to Eagles 32 to 112 it noted: "Keels not laid, but material fabricated for about 90 boats and machinery in hand for a considerable number." This, of course, was before the program had been reduced from 100 to 60.

Concerning the machinery for these Eagles the statement of Admiral Robert S. Griffin, chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering of the Navy, as of November 22 is as follows:

TURBINES AHEAD OF HULLS.

"Turbines and gears were completed for seven boats. For 28 other boats the turbines and gears were 50 per cent completed. Material for the remaining 13 was on hand and 10 per cent fabricated.

"Boilers had been completed for 22 boats. For 20½ other boats the boiler material was ready for assembly. Material was on hand for 65½ other boats and about 35 per cent fabricated.

"Auxiliaries had been completed for 67 boats. Material for the remaining 45 was on hand and about 75 per cent fabricated."

Thus it becomes readily apparent that, ferreting out the cause of delay as it lay within the Ford organization, Detroit's most famous automobile builder was able to build turbines and boilers and auxiliaries much more expeditiously than hulls. And by far the most important single item in hull construction is riveting. Here, apparently, was one task before which the highly efficient and adaptable Ford organization bowed. As Admiral Griffin has aptly commented: "Mr. Ford found the job a little more difficult than he anticipated."

Men in the Great Lakes district acquainted with shipbuilding and its allied interests level considerable criticism at the Navy Department for pushing the entire 112 boats on paper before knowing actually how they performed in water. Here was a new design type of vessel, a new design of turbine, and the infrequent use of watertube boilers for marine purposes, while the organization that was to build them had never before tried its hand at shipbuilding. Yet the Navy ordered the cloth cut for the entire lot of 112 boats before the first one was "tried on" to see how it would fit, is the way these men view the situation. Whether the acuteness of the submarine warfare warranted this is a matter of opinion, they hold, but they refuse to class it as good practice. In a financial way the plan is proving extremely costly, for the decision to build 60 instead of 100 leaves a good many turbines, boilers, and auxiliaries and many tons of plates, all rolled to size and punched, useful for nothing but remelting as scrap.

WHAT A DOLLAR BUYS.

To compare the cost of an Eagle with any other type of Navy craft is manifestly unfair by reason of the particular benefit to be derived from each type. In view of the Navy's intention of going through with 60, or $33,000,000 worth of Eagles, it is interesting, nevertheless, to compare the value thus to be received. The ordinary Great Lakes bulk freighter, a somewhat rough but most useful and efficient type of carrier, before the war cost approximately $40 a dead-weight ton to build. To turn out such a freighter to-day would cost from $60 to $65 a ton. The trim 3,000 to 3,500-ton ocean-going freighters of canal size being built by Great Lakes shipbuilders are costing from $190 to $200 a ton. Both the Government and private builders are putting out destroyers at from $1,000 to $1,200 a ton. Eagles, which Navy officials frankly admit will not be needed until the next war and are entirely too expensive for auxiliary duty in peace time, are costing slightly more than $800 a ton. This is what the buyer of Liberty bonds and war-savings stamps is getting for his money in the way of Eagles.

For Henry Ford the whole Eagle proposition has been one in which he has had everything to gain and nothing to lose—except reputation. The contract dated March 1, 1918, between the Navy and the Ford Motor Co. in unvarnished language calls for actual cost plus $20,000 profit if the cost of each Eagle is $275,000 or more, while of any saving effected under $275,000 the company is to receive one-quarter.

THEORY AND PRACTICE.

Over his name, in the September, 1918, The World's Work, Henry Ford declared flatly:

"I will not take a cent of war profit out of the war work I am doing. * * * Everything we are making for the Government will be made without profit; I will find some way to give those profits back to the Government, for I can not prevent the profits from accruing, since it is impossible to determine in advance just what the cost of everything will be, and the prices had to be fixed in advance."

Now, the Ford Motor Co.'s contract specifically says:

"The price to be paid for each vessel to be constructed and furnished in accordance with this contract, including authorized charges therein, shall be the actual cost plus a definite sum for profit. * * *"

And the contract in another section gives what shall be considered as items of cost, and goes fully into such charges as overhead, depreciation, elements capable of alternative treatment, royalty, allowances for scrap and waste, and the like. The actual cost of each vessel will be determined, for the money to be paid Henry Ford by the Navy will be twofold and separate—actual cost and agreed profit.

Still another angle to the profit hurdles Henry Ford has been jumping is the statement of Admiral Griffin to members of the House Committee on Naval Affairs at Washington that Henry Ford himself waived all profit; that he at first actually did offer to build them at cost, but that directors of the Ford Motor Co. would not agree to this. The Ford Motor Co. is understood popularly to be Henry Ford first, last, and always, and that the directors of the company should prevail against Ford himself, especially in a matter on which he has been so bold and outspoken, is almost unheard of.

In spite of all of Henry Ford's writings and his disclaiming any desire for profit, he is assured $1,200,000 net on the 60 Eagles with which the Navy is going through and 10 per cent profit on the uncompleted portions of the remaining 40. Probably $1,500,000 will be the minimum profit that will accrue to him. Just how he will return this to the Treasury Department at Washington is something Detroit is most anxious to learn. In the past the Federal Government has distinctly refused all offers of monetary gifts to the Treasury. As a matter of fact, there seems to be only one door open to those who would reimburse the Federal Government, and that is a contribution to the conscience fund.

NAVY TO STAND BY FORD EAGLE PROGRAM, THOUGH COST IS $50,000,000 AND RETURN IS NOTHING—FAILURE OF HENRY FORD TO TURN SHIPBUILDER BEING COVERED OVER—BOATS ARE LEAKY AND TOPHEAVY—FORD MOTOR CO. PROFIT OVER $1,500,000—EAGLE-A-DAY SCHEDULE FIZZLE.

HERE IS DEADLY PARALLEL IN FORD EAGLE CASE.

THEORY.	PRACTICE.
"I hate war. I am a pacifist * * * If there was no profit in war for anyone, there would be no war. It is because people can make money out of war that war occurs. I do not believe in killing men for money to get something that belongs to some one else, whether it is money or land or the right to live in liberty and peace. That is why I will not take a cent of profit out of the war work I am doing. Liberty motors, eagle boats, helmets, tractors, ambulances, trucks—everything we are making for the Government will be made without profit; I will find some way to give those profits back to the Government, for I can not prevent the profits from accruing, since it is impossible to determine in advance just what the cost of everything will be, and the prices had to be fixed in advance. But personally I am not going to touch a dollar of war profits. My share will be carried back into the United States Treasury, and I am hoping that other stockholders will do the same. I can not think of anything worse to accuse a man of than of being a war profiteer." Henry Ford in September, 1918, The World's Work.	"Should the actual cost of each vessel in the execution of the work reach or exceed the sum of $275,000, or such revised, estimated cost in lieu thereof as shall be determined on account of changes * * * the contractor shall be paid the fixed sum for profit of $20,000 for each vessel. Should the actual cost be less than the estimated cost revised as aforesaid for cost of changes, the contractor shall be paid as profit in addition to $20,000 for each vessel, one-fourth the amount by which the such actual cost on each vessel falls short of the estimated cost revised as aforesaid. * * * Should the department desire to terminate the work under this contract before the completion of all vessels * * * it shall give 30 days' notice. * * * The contractor shall be paid for all work on vessels the completion of which shall be abandoned the actual cost thereof plus 10 per cent profit * * * collective liability of contractor for breach of guaranties and agreements as to material, workmanship, and performance shall be limited to $1,000 on each vessel." Ford Motor Co. contract with Navy.

Millions of dollars—fifty at the very least—is the price the Navy is going to pay for refusing to confess publicly the failure of Henry Ford's Eagle-boat program and abandon it.

With the signing of the armistice and the interning of the enemy's U boats in British and Italian harbors, the primary objective of these $550,000 200-foot steel craft being built by Ford has been attained.

For patrol and gunboat duty in peace time they are next to impossible by reason of their excessive maintenance and operating charges. In fact, high officials of the Navy Department themselves have admitted they will not be needed "until the next war."

But the only concession the Navy has made so far, and the only one it flatly declares it will make, has been to pare the program from 60 Eagles to 40. On the face of it this is a generous reduction of 40 per cent, but considering that the turbines, boilers, and auxiliaries for the entire 100 have been built and practically all of the plates rolled and punched, the apparent reduction of 40 per cent shrinks to a bare 10. And the $33,000,000 the Navy is to pay for submarine chasers in peace time is only the start.

NEVER HAD A CHANCE.

Whether the Eagles which Ford undertook to construct with great flourish and blare of trumpets as his chief contribution to the winning of the war, are good or poor boats from the standpoint of design is still a matter of opinion. It is fact—not opinion—that the highly-touted Ford organization crumpled when it attempted the boats, and never gave them a chance to show.

Had the late candidate for the Senate lived up to his contract, 93 Eagles would have been completed and in commission by December 15. As a matter of fact, exactly seven had been completed by that date—three being in New London, Conn., and four somewhere between Detroit and New London—and of these seven, six were rushed to the coast leaking and generally incomplete to get them out before the freeze.

Entirely responsible for this astounding delay, after giving due consideration to the handicaps under which a Navy contractor works, and blotting out whatever defects there may have been in design, is the inability of Henry Ford's mechanics to turn themselves into successful shipbuilders. On one charge alone—that of riveting—they stand condemned. The first Eagle leaked badly, and not until she was electrically welded did she become water-tight. In turbines and auxiliaries Henry Ford showed some degree of skill, but in hulls none. And this at a time when the world's greatest need was for craft for combating the submarine menace!

IS WINNER EVERY WAY.

This failure, an outstanding one indeed, has not been at Henry Ford's expense. Not one penny has he lost, not one penny will he. No matter what the outcome of the Eagle-boat program, even be it wholly abandoned to-morrow, his profits stand to run up into the millions. On every Eagle that is completed the Navy is bound to pay him a minimum net profit of $20,000. In event any of the boats are not completed he is to receive actual cost plus 10 per cent. For the construction of the Eagle plant on the River Rouge, southwest of Detroit, on land owned by Ford, the Navy advanced every dollar—$3,500,000 in round numbers. And under his contract Ford ultimately will take over this magnificent $3,500,000 works at virtually his own figure for the construction of barges—provided his maritime ardor has not been sufficiently dampened—or possibly Fordson tractors. All this in the face of his voluntarily unequivocal declaration he would not accept one dollar in war profits!

All this, combined with the Navy's flat-footed refusal to cut short Eagle construction, looms up as the biggest industrial scandal of the war, Detroit's largest business and industrial interests firmly believe. Were the war still on and the Huns' submarine still polluting the seas, Ford's nonperformance would be accepted as one of the fortunes of war. But when the Navy insists upon adhering to a type of boat that is designed primarily for sweeping the seas of U boats—which now are no more—and that admittedly is too costly for auxiliary work, then and there objection arises to throwing $50,000,000 and more into a sink hole.

WHY? DETROIT ASKS.

As Detroit views it, the Navy can have only two reasons for continuing building Eagles now that they never will combat an enemy submarine. One is that they can be assigned to a peace-time service commensurate with their cost, type, and operating expense and the other, following the lead of other Government departments, to prevent the men employed on them from being thrown out of work and to ward off financial harm from the contractor. The former the Navy itself has disposed of; the latter Henry Ford's financial standing and his oft-expressed desire to resume full peace production of Fords and Fordson tractors render untenable.

That there will be a congressional investigation of the Ford Eagle matter, Detroit business and industrial interests are certain. Sustaining this belief is the cloak of mystery with which the Navy has shrouded the Ford Eagle plant on the River Rouge. So far as publicity is concerned, a veritable no-man's land has been set up around it. And when the Ford Motor Co. refuses to talk about what it has done or is planning, then here is proof positive of something wrong somewhere, says Detroit.

From the standpoint of construction, perhaps the most serious fault to be found in the Eagles is the wretched work done on the hulls. To cite one instance, Eagle No. 1 was launched July 11, 1918, but could not start for the Atlantic coast until November 4. Most of these intervening 116 days—roughly, four months—were spent remedying the poor riveting and other defects in the hull.

STAND 28 FEET HIGH.

From the standpoint of design, critics point first to the topheaviness of the craft. From keel to top of pilot house is 36 feet, and when an Eagle's fuel-oil tanks are entirely filled her maximum draft is only 8 feet. The forward deck, on which is mounted a 4-inch gun, is not much lower than the pilot house. The 4-inch gun on the midship house is mounted equally high.

Now, while criticism of the Eagles, especially their construction or rather their nonconstruction, is widespread, it is not entirely personal. One captain of industry of the Great Lakes region, who can talk as authoritatively on ships as on other things and who has followed the Eagle matter closely, succinctly sums up the situation thus:

"The miscarriage of the Eagle-boat program is just what was to be expected; the project was foredoomed to failure. The combination of a new design of boat, new power plant, new builder, and new method of construction was unbeatable. In some ways the proposal of constructing the boats on tracks and launching them hydraulically was ideal, theoretically. In other ways, such as the attempt to do without a mold loft, it was absurd.

NO TIME TO EXPERIMENT.

"When the Eagles were proposed there was great need for an efficient means of combating the submarine. Obviously, with the peril so great the Navy should not have experimented with a new type, and above all with a new shipbuilder. The shipbuilding industry can not be revolutionized in one day or an efficient plant built, an organization created, and actual production attained in six months. In the period of the war the country was willing to stand for anything that gave even the slightest promise of being of help. But now that the U boats have been swept from the seas the only sound course the Navy can take is to stop all work on the Eagles, scrap the equipment already completed, and get out of the entire situation as quickly, financially, as it is possible. My chief concern, however, is for the men who will be ordered to sea in these Eagle boats."

Says the spokesman of another powerful Great Lakes interest:

"Henry Ford's Eagle plant will go down in shipbuilding history along with Hog Island, Bristol, and Newark Bay. Not one of these yards turned out a ship that carried one soldier or one pound of supplies to Europe while the war lasted. Ford's yard failed to turn out an Eagle that worried one submarine. All four yards were experiments, hastily conceived and illy carried out. The sooner the Eagle program is abandoned and the unused material sold the less the country's financial loss. We are willing to buy liberty bonds for the prosecution of the war, but not for such a venture as Henry Ford's Eagles."

NOTHING BUT MILLIONS.

Millions is the only financial term into which the Eagle boats can be translated. Originally estimated to cost only $275,000, or thereabouts, this figure now has been increased to $400,000. On top of this comes $112,000 each for armament and $20,000 for Henry Ford's profit. Thus the items of profit, cost of hull and machinery, and the outlay for ordnance mount up to $532,000. The changes that will have to be made on the Atlantic coast before the boats are really ready for service will easily bring the total up to $550,000 each, it is estimated. The 60 thus will stand the Navy Department $33,000,000. Bound to pay the Ford Motor Co. actual cost plus 10 per cent on all material and equipment already worked up and completed for the 40 canceled Eagles, the Navy faces another item that will run up into $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 it is believed. Maintenance of machinery alone will stand the Navy $9,000 a year an Eagle. In addition is the pay roll of the crews of 7 officers and 68 men. And the testimony of reputable Navy Department officials is that the Eagles are not needed "until the next war," and will make pretty expensive patrol boats!

AND HENRY WAS GOING TO SHOW UP THE PROFESSIONALS.

Mr. Ford has promised to roll an Eagle boat a day into the River Rouge; to the man who can make 3,000 automobiles a day this is easy.

Merely to catalogue Mr. Ford's activities in war enterprises makes an impressive showing. He is building new Eagle boats—has built an enormous plant and devised methods of turning out warcraft as fast almost as "flivvers" and by identically the same methods.

It is a far cry from the Ocar II to the Eagle boat.

He was an amateur when he started to build his first car; it was as an amateur that he tackled the problem of building warships at the rate of one a day—the Eagle boats. Professional statesmen and economists have failed to put an end to the war. Mr. Ford thinks it is time for the amateurs to step in and see what they can do.

When Mr. Ford took a contract from the Navy Department to build 200 two hundred-foot Eagle boats and get them all into the water in a year he tackled another job that all the professionals in that line said couldn't be done. * * * The whole scheme and method of construction, the plant and its equipment are exactly what some imaginative amateur striving for perfection of detail and efficiency might dream of, but which most business men would hesitate to undertake.—From Henry Ford, Amateur, by Frank Parker Stockbridge, in September, 1918, The World's Work.

THE POTASH INDUSTRY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask to have read from the desk a telegram regarding the condition of the potash industry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

OMAHA, NEBR., December 31, 1918.

Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

The Omaha papers this morning carry an Associated Press dispatch from Paris saying that Hurley, of the United States Shipping Board, intends to load all returning United States ships with Alsace potash. This violates the understanding had with the War Trade Board, that no enemy potash would be imported until peace is declared. Hurley's plan would paralyze the Nebraska potash industry and mean the loss of millions of dollars invested here. We understand the Department of the Interior is preparing a bill to protect the American potash industry. Please do everything within your power immediately to shut off the foreign importation of potash as Hurley plans until the potash problem can be worked out along equitable and just lines. If the Hurley plan is given publicity in the South it means that no Nebraska potash can be sold, because the South will expect foreign importations. I expect to be in Washington within 10 days and to confer upon a program of action with you. Until then do everything within your power to see that no foreign potash comes in. Every Nebraska company is vitally interested in this matter. I appreciate what you have done, but desire to impress upon you the very great danger to Nebraska potash of the plan now suggested by Hurley.

GEORGE A. LEE.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to state, in order to clear up the matter somewhat, that there has been some misunderstanding; that Mr. Hurley evidently, when he made that statement to the Associated Press, was not aware of the fact that the War Trade Board had issued an order that no potash should be imported into this country from enemy territory until the peace treaty has been signed.

I presume that technically Alsace-Lorraine still comes within that category. Later on no doubt we shall import potash from Alsace-Lorraine. For the present, however, it is the intention of the War Trade Board not to allow the importation of potash until the peace treaty is signed, for the reason that the potash industry has been encouraged by Government agents during the war to go to an extraordinary expense in the development and production of potash, and a large supply of potash is now on hand. The fertilizer companies are refusing to buy this potash in the hope of being able to import potash from Europe to put into fertilizers during the present season. This is utterly impossible. During this season it is holding out a false hope to the agriculturists who are depending on fertilizers; potash can not be imported for months yet to come. The order of the War Trade Board still stands, and the War Trade Board has taken occasion to send to Mr. Hurley information that that order still holds good. It would be, in effect, a breach of faith on the part of the Government, after encouraging the potash industry as a war measure to produce the potash at this time and at great expense, now to make it impossible for the companies to market their product. I think that the fertilizer companies which are depending upon securing potash from Europe at this season for their fertilizers will find that they are anticipating something that is impossible.

I wish to say in this connection, Mr. President, that I have introduced, and there is still upon the table of the Senate, a resolution which I may ask later to have considered, directing the Federal Trade Commission to inquire whether the fertilizer companies of this country have entered into a combination to refuse to buy this potash, whether those fertilizer companies have large interests in European potash mines, and whether or not European potash companies, notably those of Germany, have interests in the American fertilizer companies. I think that this is susceptible of some proof. There seems to be a combination at the present time of fertilizer companies to refuse to buy the American potash that has been produced at the urgent request and under the stimulation of the Government urging.

I merely make this statement at this time in connection with this telegram, because I think it should be known that the delay in the purchase of this potash and the delay of the fertilizer companies in putting it into their fertilizers is based on a false hope. The fertilizer companies may omit potash from their fertilizers and may attempt to substitute some other ingredient like phosphate. If they do so, they will injure the agricultural interests. They can not get European potash in time for this season. They can if they will buy American potash, which is now stored up in large quantities.

ARTICLE BY PROF. EDWIN M. BORCHARD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have a very able article by Edwin M. Borchard, professor of law of Harvard University, on the subject of the declaratory judgment—a needed procedural reform. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

LANDS IN CALIFORNIA AND MEXICO.

Mr. ASHURST. I offer a resolution which I desire to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 402) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby respectfully requested to open negotiations with the Republic of Mexico for the purchase of the peninsula of Lower California and for the purchase of that tract of land in the State of Sonora, Republic of Mexico, approximating in area 10,000 square miles and lying north of the parallel of 31° 20′ north latitude.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that I should like to have the resolution lie upon the table for the present, and I give notice that I shall address the Senate upon the subject of the resolution as soon as I may be able to obtain the floor, either on Friday or on Saturday.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I simply suggest that, in all probability, if the Senator will defer his motion until the league of nations is organized, they may distribute that territory to the United States.

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, Mr. President, I am fearful that it may be given to Japan.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF CABLES.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 401), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the subjects listed hereafter, and report to the Senate of the United States its findings and conclusions thereon, at the same time recommending such legislation as it may deem necessary or advisable:

1. Assumption by the Government of the supervision, possession, control, or operation of any or all of the telegraph, telephone, marine-cable, and radio systems.
2. The future ownership, supervision, possession, control, or operation of any or all of said systems by the Government.
3. The conditions under and the extent to which any or all of said systems should be permitted to consolidate and authority therefor.
4. Effect of the so-called Sherman Antitrust Act upon the consolidation of marine-cable systems extending to foreign countries and the advisability of modifying said act.
5. Necessity for the extension of marine-cable systems to foreign countries and effect thereof upon the commerce of the United States.
6. The sufficiency of the telegraph, telephone, marine-cable, and radio systems to meet the business requirements of the United States.
7. All other subjects pertinent to the general question of Government ownership, supervision, possession, control, and operation of any or all telegraph, telephone, marine-cable, and radio systems.

Said committee is authorized to subpœna witnesses and documents, administer oaths, and to do all acts and things necessary to the carrying out of the purposes of this resolution.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a few remarks in explanation of the resolution I have offered and its object. I do not think I will take more than five minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

AMERICAN FORCES AT BREST, FRANCE.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me that I may submit a resolution?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. NEW. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 403) was read, as follows:

Whereas reports having reached the United States and having been given currency by publication in the columns of the newspapers to the effect that unwholesome, insanitary, and unnecessarily discomforting conditions exist in the camp occupied by the American Expeditionary Forces at Brest, France: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Military Affairs be authorized and directed to investigate the same and to report its conclusions to the Senate, together with such recommendations as it may see fit to make concerning the condition reported.

Mr. NEW. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I decline to yield, if I am entitled to the floor. I wish to ask unanimous consent to make a few remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the resolution goes over under the rule. The Senator from Minnesota will proceed.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF CABLES.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, in explaining this resolution, I shall not take the time of the Senate for any extended remarks. I think the time has come for some real constructive legislation upon the question of our transportation facilities by rail, by water, as well as telephone and telegraph.

I have several times discussed the taking over of the telegraph, telephones, and cables. My object in introducing this resolution is purely to have the Congress informed as to what is necessary for the extension, development, and best operation of these facilities. I am not particularly interested in why these lines were taken over or when they were taken over. They have been taken over, and we should approach the subject of the future ownership, control, and operation in a broad-minded, business way, Nor am I going to discuss the relative advantages of Government ownership or control of telegraph and telephone land lines. It is a question, I suppose, which Congress must meet, and it should do so intelligently and act for the best interest of all of the people of the country. But one thing is sure, no one will pretend that the cable lines can be owned and operated by the Government.

Mr. Burleson will not insist on this as a permanent policy. He is too intelligent, in my opinion, and too well informed to make any such plans. Of course, I do not speak for Mr. Burleson, but that is my opinion. And there is a question of the most vital importance to the American people and to the development of our foreign commerce, and that is the extension of the cable lines. At some future time I shall present my views upon this question. For the present it is sufficient to say that those lines should be extended to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Russia, Italy, and, most important of all, to Brazil and Argentina, in South America.

I suppose the Senate understands that the only lines we have extend through Mexico, down the western coast, connecting with other lines to Argentina and to Brazil. The British Government has lines directly to Argentina and to Brazil, and that Government is pushing its commerce and its cable business to these South American countries, and an extension of our cable facilities at the earliest possible moment is of surpassing importance to the development of our commerce and relations with these Republics to the south. Then there is a question of the manufacture of cables, which should be undertaken in this country. At present we are entirely dependent upon Great Britain for the same.

I have asked the Interstate Commerce Committee to make this investigation, because it is already investigating transportation by railway, and they run more or less along parallel lines. Furthermore, it was the Interstate Commerce Committee which passed upon the resolution to authorize the taking over of the cable, telephone, and telegraph systems. It is a phase of interstate commerce of the most surpassing importance, and that seems to me to be the committee entitled to investigate it.

I may introduce a bill embodying my ideas upon this cable situation; but I think the most important thing at present is for the Congress to be fully informed of the situation and the necessities of the development and growth of this means of transportation.

There is another very important question, and that is to what extent the Government should permit the consolidation of telephones, telegraph, and cable systems. I am not going to discuss this at length, but manifestly some consolidation under Government control and supervision will be of advantage to the people. At least, it is a question which should be considered and settled. It is a serious question whether the duplication of telephone lines especially is wise, and there are questions of the consolidation of the cable lines, which I hope the committee will develop and which I shall take occasion to discuss at some future date.

What the Congress should do now is to consider this whole subject. It is of the greatest importance of any domestic question now pending for solution. It should be approached in a broad-minded, liberal manner, and a policy worked out which shall be for the best interests and meet the demands of this fast-developing country.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to reserve the right to object until I can get the floor.

Mr. WATSON. I believe I have been recognized to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I have a resolution along the same lines, with the same purport, asking that this whole question be investigated; but I intended to ask that the resolution should be referred to the Post Office Committee. It occurs to me that that committee is the proper committee to investigate the question for these reasons:

First, the Interstate Commerce Committee has before it the railroad question, which it will begin to investigate to-morrow, and which, in all human probability, will take the remainder of this session, unless we speed up much more rapidly than committees generally do. A question that is so vast and complex as this railroad question must of necessity require great time for its consideration.

In the second place, the Postmaster General has assumed jurisdiction of the telegraph, telephone, and cable systems, now has them under his charge, and is to supervise them as their sole manager. Therefore it occurs to me that under all the conditions surrounding this particular case the Post Office Committee is the proper committee to investigate this question. I do not believe we could reach it before the Interstate Commerce Committee if the Senator's resolution were to be sent there.

That is my judgment about the matter, and I want the Senator's opinion.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Indiana, I wish to say this:

When the resolution came before the Senate to authorize the taking over of the telephone and telegraph and cable lines, it went to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as a matter of course. That was the proper place for it to go; and that committee reported the resolution after declining an investigation. Now, the cables and telephones and telegraphs are not in the Post Office Department. The President was authorized to appoint some person to take charge, and he appointed Mr. Burleson. He did not appoint the Postmaster General, and they are not in the Post Office Department at all. They are still being operated by the companies, subject to the direction of Mr. Burleson.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, Mr. President, these lines and the cables affect intimately the interstate commerce and the foreign commerce of this country. That foreign commerce is dependent to a great extent upon the extension of our cable systems is an indisputable fact, and nothing is more important, and it certainly falls within the province of the Interstate Commerce Committee.

As to the matter of time, the investigations of the questions pending before the Railroad Committee—Government ownership, Government operation, permanent or temporary, and many other questions—run parallel and are intimately connected with the control of the telegraph, the telephone, and the cable systems. It seems to me the resolution should go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and that that committee should be authorized to make the investigation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I recognize what the Senator says with reference to the jurisdiction of this resolution. I think if there is any power in the Government to control this matter, it must be under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and therefore the Interstate Commerce Committee would have jurisdiction of it if we are going to investigate it at all; but the reason I wanted to ask the Senator to let the matter go by this morning is this:

In the first place, the Interstate Commerce Committee—as the Senator knows, being a member of the committee himself—will take up to-morrow the investigation of the railroad question. There are a hundred angles from which that question will be discussed before the committee. There probably will be several hundred witnesses who will desire to appear. It is going to take weeks, if not months, to conclude that investigation. The 4th of March, with the conclusion of this session of Congress, is only 50 days off. Probably when the 4th of March is past, before the assembling of Congress again, the treaty of peace will have been signed or nearing its final conclusion. When the treaty of peace is signed, so far as these telegraph and telephone lines are concerned, the question settles itself. They will go back permanently into private ownership.

I am rather inclined to believe that we will be able to face these questions and study them out, and especially the telegraph and telephone lines and cable systems, better from the standpoint of allowing them to go back to private ownership, and then consider what regulations are needed, than we will by attempting to solve the questions pending their going back.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will.

Mr. WATSON. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that the Postmaster General is so mixing up the interests and the business of the two telegraph systems of the United States and all their other interests that it will be almost impossible to unscramble them unless it be speedily done? Now, it may be a year before the treaty of peace is finally signed. Nobody knows.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state that I am more optimistic. I think the treaty of peace will be signed in a few months.

Mr. WATSON. Nevertheless, at the present rate at which the business of these two enterprises is being intermingled it will be an almost impossible thing to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I was trying to point out is the impossibility of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate considering this question and finding a verdict between now and the 4th of March.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no possibility of its accomplishment.

Mr. WATSON. There is no doubt about that at all. I think the Senator is entirely right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The railroad question is going to occupy the entire time of that committee; but as the question of investigation is of so much importance and the chairman of the committee is temporarily out of town and expects to be back to-morrow, I wanted to ask the Senator from Minnesota if he would not allow the resolution to go over until to-morrow?

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, an objection, as I understand, will send the resolution over.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not want to object.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection to the Senator objecting. I am willing that the resolution should go over until to-morrow. I wish to say one word, however, if the Senate will permit me, about this particular investigation.

I do not think this investigation will take much time. I am not so much interested in investigating the past. I believe if Mr. Burleson and a few officers of the systems mentioned and people who are familiar with this subject would come before the committee and explain their views, the committee could readily come to a conclusion as to what it may be necessary to do.

I do not believe anybody in this Government for a moment considers that the Government should own and operate the cables, or that it can do it, or that it can ever get the consent of foreign Governments, or that it would be politic to try; but I do believe that something should be done at once to extend the cable lines, and I do not think it should wait for six months or a year.

So far as the telegraph and telephone lines are concerned, quite likely when they are returned the problem will somewhat solve itself, although I do think the Interstate Commerce Commission's jurisdiction over telephone, telegraph, and cable systems should be extended to naming the conditions under which capital should be issued, stock and bonds, and the fixing of rates of cable lines, as well as the telephone and telegraph systems. Those subjects are going to be investigated, so far as the railways are concerned, by the Interstate Commerce Committee; and many of the questions are exactly the same, as they apply to the telephone, telegraph, and cable companies. But as the objection has been made, I ask that the resolution may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Along the line of his last remark, does not the Senator recognize there are vast differences presented by the question? The railroads, for instance, we all know will not go back to private ownership as they were before they were taken over by the Government; but, on the other hand, cables and telegraphs and telephone systems require no legislation to be handed back and in all human probability ought to be given back just as they were before they were taken over. The two questions present entirely different angles for the consideration not only of the committee but of the Senate. I am on both committees, so far as that is concerned, and I do not particularly care. I believe that if the resolution goes to the Committee on Interstate Commerce it will not be acted upon, and I believe also that if it goes before the Post Office Committee it will be acted upon, and what I desire is action, because I think these lines should be turned back to private ownership at the earliest possible date.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

AMERICAN FORCES AT BREST, FRANCE.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I am going to indulge the hope that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] will withdraw his objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution which I offered a few minutes ago, as I would like to make a little statement about it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I withdraw the objection. I did not understand that I was objecting to the Senator's resolution. I objected to yielding the floor, and I certainly will withdraw the objection.

Mr. NEW. If the objection be withdrawn——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object, if that may be done under the rule, until I hear the explanation of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]. It seems to me there is no necessity for this resolution until we hear the report which will be submitted by the Secretary of War.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I have no knowledge concerning the truth of certain statements made in the newspapers concerning conditions existing in the camp occupied by the American troops at Brest, but they have been made on the personal responsibility of at least one correspondent of recognized standing and character, and it seems to me that they call for some investigation on the part of this body. If that condition is as reported, it affects the comfort and the health of every American soldier who occupies that camp. I am making no charges or insinuations or anything of the kind. I am simply offering this resolution in order that the Committee on Military Affairs may make an investigation of the conditions, and make such recommendations looking to the amelioration of these conditions as the investigation may seem to warrant. I think the Senator, understanding that, will have no objection at all to the resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NEW. I think the matter calls for immediate consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has the Senator noted the comment of the Secretary of War appearing in this morning's Washington Post, showing that he has instigated by cable an inquiry into the facts there, and reciting the conditions as he saw them and as the Assistant Secretary of War saw them in this camp?

Mr. NEW. I did notice that; yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not see any occasion for rushing an investigation by a committee 3,000 miles away when the information is being cabled for and will no doubt be here very shortly.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I confess that I can not see why objection should be offered to the consideration of this resolution and to an investigation being made by a committee of the Senate. It may be true that an investigation will be made also by other authorities. I can not see why the Senate should forego not only its right, but its duty, to investigate charges of that kind simply because some one else is going to do the same thing.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have understood that the Committee on Military Affairs already has authority to make an investigation of this kind under a resolution heretofore adopted by the Senate. The Senator from Indiana is a member of that committee and will know better about it than I do. This war has not officially ceased, and that committee has been investigating, from a military standpoint, many different matters in connection with the conduct of the war. It seems to me that under the resolution under which it has been acting heretofore it could also act in this matter.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, it is true that the Committee on Military Affairs has a sort of blanket authority which may cover this case. However, I do not know positively that it does cover it, and for fear it does not I think it well to have a specific resolution covering this question. For that reason I have offered the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the resolution goes over under the rule.

WAR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, on the night of December 23, I believe it was, when the discussion was being concluded upon the revenue bill, the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] delivered a very able and instructive address. During the delivery of the address a colloquy was entered into between the distinguished Senator and myself, and it developed that there was not a full understanding between us regarding certain expenditures of the Government. The figures as given to the RECORD at that time were so at variance and, to my mind, of such importance that I think it advisable some explanation should be made at this time.

The Senator from Wisconsin was discussing the expenditures of the past with respect to what would probably be the expenditures henceforth, and I know that I was greatly impressed with the figures he gave for the reason that they indicated that the expenditures would not materially decrease for some time to come, and that those expenditures were much larger than I had been led to believe they were. The Senator said—I quote from near the bottom of page 824 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> In the fiscal year ending July 1, 1916, before we entered the war, the total disbursements were $1,040,261,082.73. In the fiscal year ending July 1, 1917, that would include some of the war expenses incurred from April 6, 1917, our total disbursements were $3,046,183,746.19; for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1918, the disbursements were $21,813,356,508.39.

Afterwards the Senator yielded to me, and I made the statement that I was not acquainted with the figures which the Senator had given, and he referred to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury as authority for the figures which he had given.

I stated at the time that the Secretary of the Treasury gave the actual expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, as a little over $2,000,000,000, and for June 30, 1918, as a little over $13,000,000,000. At the moment I was not able to recall anything in the report which might give rise to this discrepancy, but since that time I have thought it important to look the matter up, and on page 490 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury I find that the figures given by the Senator from Wisconsin are correct, if emphasis be put upon the word "all"—"all disbursements of the Treasury Department." But the distinguished Senator failed to take into consideration the large expenditures concerning the public debt. We all know that the Treasury Department has been issuing from time to time certificates of indebtedness, short-term certificates, which in turn are being taken up and being paid off out of the Treasury. Of course, the receipts from that source, as well as the disbursements, will appear in the report at the page cited by the Senator from Wisconsin.

A rather complete explanation of this situation is given by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report, which appears in the same volume on page 4. Before making the statement the Secretary of the Treasury gave the receipts and the disbursements for those fiscal years, and the totals were those given by the Senator from Wisconsin; but in explanation of that statement the Secretary of the Treasury, on page 4 of his report, says:

> An analysis of the above table for the fiscal year 1917 shows that, exclusive of public-debt transactions, the receipts for the year amounted to $1,124,324,795.02 and expenditures for the year $2,026,678,446.74, including $885,000,000 on account of the purchase of obligations of foreign Governments. From this it will be noted that, exclusive of public-debt transactions, 55 per cent of the expenditures of the year were paid from revenue receipts. If the purchase of obligations of foreign Governments is deducted from the total ordinary and special expenditures—that is, expenditures exclusive of transactions in the public debt—the result is $1,141,678,446.74, and the above figures show that over 98.5 per cent of this amount was paid for from revenue receipts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to make inquiry about what subject we are now on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are on general resolutions now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will say to the Senator that I am going to conclude in just a minute.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator is going to bring up the entire discussion——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Oh, no; not at all. I simply want to get the RECORD straightened so far as it pertains to references to expenditures as made on the night of the previous discussion. I shall not require more than a minute or two longer.

Mr. WEEKS. Very well.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The statement of the Secretary of the Treasury continues:

> A similar analysis of the table of revised receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year 1918 shows that, exclusive of transactions in the public debt, the receipts of the year were $4,180,425,155.99 and expenditures for the year $13,196,071,287.40.

That discloses the reason which brought about the discrepancy in the figures which the Senator from Wisconsin and I had in mind. I think it is wise at this juncture to call attention to the same state of affairs which will be disclosed upon an examination of those statistics with reference to the experience following the other wars referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator gives exactly the total disbursements of the Treasury Department for those years, but he does not make any reference to the amount of disbursements which were made on account of debt transactions, and while, of course, the Senator was perfectly right, as I believe, in insisting that the war expenses did not all cease with the signing of the peace treaty, yet I am inclined to believe that sufficient emphasis was not given to the question of public-debt transactions.

I notice in these statistics—I did not read the figures—that following the Civil War, in 1866, about one-half of those total expenditures were on account of public-debt transactions; and so I think the real situation can not be understood without an analysis of the figures with reference to the public-debt transactions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I desire to say just a word, interrupting the morning business only for a moment.

I shall be glad to take the criticism of the Senator from New Mexico of my figures and to make some further investigation, and when opportunity offers for a somewhat more extended reply than I could make at this time without interrupting the morning business I shall avail myself of such opportunity to make it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I merely desire to remark that I have not made these statements for the purpose of criticizing the Senator from Wisconsin, for we all know that in our labors in the committees and here in the Chamber we can not keep everything in mind. The Senator, I think, was perfectly justified in taking the total of all disbursements in the way in which he did; but it seems to me that, by doing so, perhaps a wrong impression would be obtained. The Senator, of course, knows that I would not in a spirit of criticism refer to his address. I know that he is one of the most diligent, energetic, and able Senators we have in this body.

PROPOSED PURCHASE OF CANTONMENTS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] desire to address the Senate in a few minutes, and I shall detain the Senate but a moment.

I see by the public press that the able Secretary of War is disposed to purchase all of the cantonments, to enlarge the sites, and to extend the military program and maintain it, as it were, at the war standard. I do not desire to discuss that matter at this time, but I should like to ask the able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], whether or not there are now any funds available to the Secretary of War out of which the purchase of these cantonments can be made, or will legislation be necessary before such funds can be provided?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I feel very sure that legislation will be necessary before that can be done. I know positively that no legislation has been reported from the Committee on Appropriations making available any such fund.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that in an appropriation bill appropriating money for the War Department there was an authorization to use it for other purposes than for which it was appropriated, or, in other words, it was made transferable. There are some $7,000,000,000 appropriated more than will be used by that department for the present fiscal year, and the department could, if transferable, use a part of the money to purchase the cantonments.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. My contention is that such authorization would not go to that extent. I know it was not the intention of the committee to confer any such power as that, and I do not think a close reading of the act will disclose any such authority.

Mr. SMOOT. I was of the same opinion as is the Senator from Virginia, but when the question of appropriating came up before the Finance Committee as to the amount of contracts which could be annulled the Secretary of War, as well as Gen. Lord, made the statement that there was a provision in an appropriation bill authorizing the War Department to use the money that was appropriated for a specific purpose, if not expended for that purpose, to be transferred to the credit of another account within the department.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But those were for war purposes; the war has ended, and it would be the grossest violation of good faith if the Secretary of War should take those moneys and expend them to the extent of $500,000,000 to buy these cantonments. I can not conceive it to be possible. I know nothing of the sort was intended, and I do not believe it could be legitimately done under any provision of law which has been reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator's contention is correct, but I simply made the statement I did to the Senator from Idaho, because of what occurred in the Finance Committee and the statement that was there made in relation to any specific appropriation which had been made for the use of the War Department.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I infer from the statement of the Secretary of War that he himself understands that legislation may be necessary, although that is simply an inference; it is not a statement clearly made on the part of the Secretary.

I am very glad, indeed, to have the vigorous and incisive statement of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] that no such authority, in his opinion, exists. I desire to say that if by any latitudinous construction such authority should be conferred, I trust the Secretary of War will permit Congress to pass upon that program before it is initiated. It is a matter of lasting and vital moment, and if any such authority has been given it has been given under the supposition that it would be used during the war and not after the war has ended. I hope Congress will be permitted to pass upon the program before its adoption.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from Idaho know whether or not all of these cantonments have been erected upon private land? I was under the impression that most of the cantonments, if not all, had been erected upon land the title to which had been secured by the Government. It seems to me that if all these cantonments have been erected upon private land it was a very unwise and a very imprudent thing to do.

Mr. BORAH. I am unable to answer the question of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think I can answer the question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. My understanding is that there is only one cantonment which is located upon land which is owned by the Government, and that is at Camp Lewis, where the land was donated to the Government by Pierce County, in my State.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington is certainly misinformed in regard to that proposition, for Camp Pike, in Arkansas, consisting of 3,000 acres of land, was donated to the Government for the location of a camp by the people of Arkansas, at a cost of $350,000.

So far as the other matter is concerned, I desire to say that I know as to some of the appropriations that have been made, and I do not think it is the purpose of the War Department to purchase $500,000,000 worth of cantonments without submitting the matter to Congress and without giving us a view of what the program is from now on as to what is and what shall be, and taking the judgment of Congress and getting authority to do the things that must necessarily be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed.

WAR CASUALTY LISTS.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] had announced that he would address the Senate after the close of morning business to-day, but he has courteously yielded to me to discuss briefly the casualty lists, or an investigation which was made of them by the Committee on Military Affairs. I wish to say to those who have come particularly to hear the Senator from Illinois discuss the great questions which he contemplates doing that my remarks will be brief and there will soon be an opportunity to hear him.

Mr. President, for several months there has been an increasing volume of complaints of the delay in publishing casualty lists. Not only the War Department but Senators and Representatives have been communicated with and appealed to in a great number of individual cases, many of which were of a most distressing character, and these complaints became so numerous that it seemed to be the duty of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate to give the subject consideration. There is some difference of opinion as to the advisability of considering such matters at a time when practically very little practical result can accrue. It takes the nature of a post-mortem and requires the attention and time of Senators, who undoubtedly are fully occupied in other matters; and yet my own belief is that all such matters should be fully investigated not only to determine the justification for the complaints which have been made, but to demonstrate what should not be done in dealing with such problems in the event the country ever becomes engaged in another war.

The Committee on Military Affairs finally decided to take up this question, and held its first hearing on the 3d of December. There appeared before the committee the Secretary of War; the Chief of Staff; Hon. Frederick P. Keppel, Third Assistant Secretary of War; The Adjutant General, accompanied by Maj. Lemle; and Mr. W. R. Castle, jr., the director of the bureau of communication of the American Red Cross.

During the past summer and fall the members of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate have been holding conferences with certain officers of the War Department Saturday mornings to discuss the various activities of the department, to be furnished with up-to-date information, and offer suggestions relative to the improvement of the service based on information which might come to them during the week. At several of these meetings inquiry was made by Senators in reference to the casualty-list situation, and we always received the same general reply; that is, that while the service was not satisfactory, every effort was being made to improve it; that delays were largely incident to the fact that our men were fighting with allied units, and frequently American wounded were taken to British or French hospitals; and that it was always desirable that accuracy should accompany the reports. Although these explanations seemed to be reasonable, they were not sufficient to excuse the frequent long delays which occurred in publishing American casualties. I think the officers of the War Department were thoroughly in accord with the conclusions of the Military Affairs Committee that better service should be obtained.

Of course, it is now too late to change the system which had been followed in reporting casualties, but the system has been so cumbersome and has led to such general delay in all cases, and most unreasonable delays in some, that I think it may be worth while to call to the attention of the Senate the methods used in handling the casualty situation. This general résumé of the system employed is taken from the testimony of Mr. Secretary Keppel, who went to Europe in the month of October to investigate this service and determine the causes for the unusual delays in reporting casualties.

In a word, the purpose of the system established on the other side was to keep a complete statistical record of every individual in the American Expeditionary Force. This necessarily developed a complex and involved condition. It was, in effect, a system of master cards plus finding lists, using the regiment as a unit. While the system did not completely break down during the summer months, after the 18th of July, when the casualties became heavy, it was unable to handle the situation with efficiency or expedition. However, it seemed to be too late to attempt to modify it, and that was the general plan followed in reporting casualties up to the signing of the armistice.

In answer to an inquiry, Mr. Keppel gave the following facts relative to the time required in reporting and forwarding casualties to this country: In the case of a man who died on the field of battle, it took an average of 9.68 days to start the report on its way to the central records office, located in Paris. These 9.68 days were consumed in making the company report and in investigating the correctness of that report. From the regimental headquarters the list would be started on its way to Paris; but on account of the difficulties in telegraphing American names over French lines the courier system was adopted for this purpose, and it required an average of 4.36 days for the lists to reach the central records office in Paris. There then took place another checking up of records, as a result of which the average time the name remained in the central records office was 7 days, or a total of 22 days from the time the casualty occurred to the time the name was put on the cable and sent to the United States.

In the case of wounded men, this time was materially reduced, because the man was immediately taken to a hospital and the time required to investigate his case was shortened; so that the average time required for transmitting all reports of casualties to the central office and their examination there—this including those killed on the field of battle, those who died in hospitals, and the injured in hospitals—aggregated 18¼ days before the name was cabled to the United States.

It seems to follow without argument that if there had not been delay in completing returns, by either the company or regimental officers taking time to check up every case that occurred during a battle, much greater expedition would have resulted. The natural course followed at the end of each day was for the company commander to at once report the number of casualties in his company, so that the divisional commander would know just how many men he needed as replacements for the following day. This report was immediately followed by the names of those killed and wounded. In most cases these reports could have been made in a very short time if delay had not occurred in trying to check up every individual doubtful case.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator know the cause of the delay here in the office in Washington?

Mr. WEEKS. I am going on to describe that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will cite the Senator to a case that I learned of this morning in my office. The father of a soldier had not heard from the boy since the 1st of October and made inquiry concerning the boy. The soldier's brother in France also made inquiry and ascertained that the boy had died of pneumonia in a hospital after coming out of a battle. In addition to that, he wrote immediately to his father that his brother had died, and then his father wrote me the letter which I received this morning. I telephoned to the department, and the reply was that the boy died on the 25th of October, and yet his father had not heard a word since the 1st of October from his boy. It seems to me there is some unnecessary delay in the office here.

Mr. WEEKS. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that there are literally thousands of cases similar to the one which he has described. I thought it best to describe first the situation on the other side; but I am going to take up the situation in the department in Washington.

The testimony on this subject was furnished by Mr. Keppel and was largely corroborated by Mr. Castle, who brought to the attention of the committee the fact that while he thought the system was much more cumbersome than it should have been, it had another distinct weakness in that the work was done by men who had never had any experience in card-index systems; that, generally speaking, they had had no clerical experience, and that much of the delay was due to this fact. He stated further that recently the system has been temporarily operated by English women known as the Waacs, and that this change has expedited the reports very materially.

It is pretty difficult without having direct testimony to make a comparison between the time consumed in reporting the names of American casualties to the central office in Paris and that required by other allied nations. The French Government has not published lists of casualties. The British Government has done so. The testimony submitted by Secretary Keppel, who examined the British system while he was in Europe, was to the effect that while the system seemed more cumbersome than ours, it was, on the whole, simpler. The best evidence he could obtain indicated that the British lists were published in practically one-half the time it required us to transmit our lists to the central office in Paris.

The British Red Cross has from the beginning of the war been furnishing reports to the families of British killed and wounded.

I should like to ask Senators to note that the British Red Cross was furnishing information direct, because I am going to explain why our Red Cross did not follow the same course. While the time required to get an official notice to a family of a casualty was not far from two weeks, the unofficial notice from the British Red Cross reached the family in a much shorter time.

As a further indication that there have been unreasonable delays in the machinery organized to get lists to the central office in Paris, Mr. Castle, of the American Red Cross, testified that whenever a man was reported missing the Red Cross immediately took up the matter through the International Red Cross Service in Switzerland and obtained from Germany a prisoners' list; that from the time a man was taken prisoner until a substantiated report was in the hands of the Red Cross in Washington averaged about a month, and that recently the Red Cross in Washington had been furnishing the War Department lists of American prisoners in Germany almost invariably before the men carried on the lists had been reported by the War Department as missing.

The work of the Red Cross has had a very direct bearing on this whole casualty question. It was not the original purpose of the Red Cross to take any action in the case of well men, and it was assumed that whatever action it took, except in the case of prisoners, would be supplementary to the work of the War Department. Gradually, however, the Red Cross extended its activities, and it might have been extremely helpful to the War Department if there had been proper cooperation.

When Mr. Castle returned from a trip to Europe in September, 1918, he found several hundred letters in the hands of the Red Cross written by boys confined in hospitals in France to their parents. Under a ruling of the War Department the Red Cross was not permitted to forward these letters to those to whom they were addressed until the department had made an official report of the casualty. This condition had existed earlier in the summer; indeed, as soon as the casualties commenced to come in, but it did not become acute in its effect until after the fighting at Chateau Thierry and the engagements which followed. On his return from Europe Mr. Castle again brought to the attention of the War Department—he having done so before he went to the other side—this condition, and finally, after the 27th of September, by permission of the War Department, these letters were promptly forwarded.

It was a natural impulse which led wounded boys confined in hospitals to send communications to those nearest them through the Red Cross, feeling, of course, that they would be promptly and certainly forwarded to their destination. It will be seen, however, that from early in May of 1917 until the 27th of September, 1918, there were at all times more or less letters in the hands of the Red Cross containing information about wounded or sick men, written by themselves or their nurses, which could not be forwarded to the persons to whom addressed because of this rule of the War Department, and in many cases these letters were held up for a very considerable time, as is completely demonstrated by the delays in publishing the names in individual cases.

The theory on which the order was issued, if I understand the testimony correctly, was that the department wished absolute accuracy, which, of course, was desirable; but it does not follow that such information passing through official channels, there being several different offices through which it must pass, would be any more accurate or as accurate as information obtained by the Red Cross through its individual representatives. This organization not only had representatives at American and British hospitals in France, but also traveling representatives, who were constantly visiting French hospitals. It was not practicable to have representatives at all French hospitals, there being some 5,000 of them, but the hospitals were thoroughly covered and prompt reports made to the Red Cross in this country. I shall wish to show later on how frequently its sources of information might have been used by the War Department in expediting individual reports if advantage had been taken of the Red Cross facilities.

Moreover, in such criticism as I may make of the office of The Adjutant General under the present head of that department, I do not think it can be charged that he was responsible for this failure to allow the Red Cross to send information to the parents of wounded soldiers until the official lists were published, because that order was put in operation by his predecessor and presumably with the official sanction of the department.

The fact is that the War Department's information has been frequently wrong, and as a result has caused much suffering. I shall give some specific instances later, but one example will indicate to what extent this condition has been true. During the month of August the Red Cross had in its possession the cases of over 200 men who had been reported by the War Department as missing and who had been found by the Red Cross in hospitals in France. They never had been missing and the reports to that effect were all errors. It is almost incomprehensible that this could be true when it is presumed that a complete weekly list of the inmates of all hospitals in France is furnished The Adjutant General's office, and that this has been done for many months. One of the most glaring errors shown in the lack of coordination between the War Department and the Red Cross service is found in the fact that these hospital lists were not until the latter part of November, 1918, although in the possession of the War Department, furnished to the Red Cross.

The day after I dictated what I am now communicating to the Senate I read cases which illustrate this lack of correctness of the War Department's reports in three different papers—one from New Bedford, Mass.—and these cases simply illustrate the general situation which I am trying to describe:

MARTIN GETS TELEGRAM TELLING HIM HE IS DEAD—AS MATTER OF FACT, NEW BEDFORD MAN NEVER GOT AS FAR AS FRANCE.

NEW BEDFORD, December 29.

When a telegram from the War Department was delivered at the home of Lieut. Robert Martin, 232 Arnold Street, recently, announcing his death in action in France, the telegram was received by Lieut. Martin himself.

Lieut. Martin, as a drafted man, went to Camp Devens, then to an officers' training camp in Virginia, and received his commission just before the armistice was signed; so he didn't go to France. How the War Department made the mistake has not been explained.

In the Washington Star, of the same date, I see this:

READS HE IS "WOUNDED"—MAJ. W. D. ALEXANDER, HERE MONTHS, FINDS NAME ON CASUALTY LIST.

Five months after receiving wounds in France, Maj. William D. Alexander, the son of Maj. Gen. Robert Alexander, commanding the Seventy-seventh Division, and Mrs. Robert Alexander, of Willard Courts, read in Thursday's casualty list that he had been "wounded, degree undetermined."

This is dated December 23:

Maj. Alexander was wounded on the western battle front on July 26. At that time he was a captain. In August he was ordered to return to the United States, and has been on duty in Washington since September 1.

Here is one of the same date from a far-away town in northern New Hampshire:

Pvt. Walter Sturtevant, of Colebrook, was also reported on Sunday as "severely wounded." Pvt. Sturtevant is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Melrose Sturtevant. He was wounded in the left arm during the summer and has been in a base hospital in this country for several months. He passed a Thanksgiving furlough with his parents. A part of a bone was removed from his leg and grafted onto an injured bone in the arm.

And yet he was reported wounded on December 19.

Another example will serve to show conclusively how inaccurate has been the work of the War Department in this particular. During the week ending December 14, 1918, the Red Cross received an average of 20 letters a day from parents who had been advised by the War Department that their sons had been killed on a specific date. In every one of those cases the parents wrote that they had received communications from their boys subsequent to the date given by the War Department. It seems almost miraculous that so many errors could have occurred in cases of this kind.

One of the very palpable reasons for cooperation between the two services is found in the suggestion made by Mr. Keppel that the American Army officers had no right of entry to French or British hospitals, but this right under international law is accorded the Red Cross. That is a fact well known, and it should have been at once assumed that the Red Cross would in such cases have evidence which would be of value to the War Department, and it should have been a sufficient reason for the closest cooperation between the two services.

Moreover, it should be noted that the War Department has not made a practice of reporting in the following cases: First, cases of gassing; second, cases of serious illness; third, cases of accident, unless the man is killed; fourth, cases of slightly wounded men. Many of these were brought to the attention of the Red Cross, because in such cases the men were in all probability confined—temporarily at least—in hospitals, and in many cases confined for a considerable length of time. In correspondence home his fellow soldiers report that he is wounded; no report has been furnished the family of his being wounded, and they naturally become greatly alarmed, and it has been so difficult to obtain information that this alarm frequently has continued for as many as 30 days, creating great distress and frequently disgust, which would seem to have been entirely unwarranted if the Red Cross had been permitted to have furnished this information to the families of men gassed or injured.

It should also be noted that The Adjutant General of the Army in Europe had no information of the order of the War Department prohibiting the furnishing of such information to families by the Red Cross before the official announcement of the casunlty until June of this year. At that time the adjutant general of the American Expeditionary Forces stated to Mr. Castle that it was supposed on the other side that all information which came to the Red Cross would be at once communicated to the families or it would not have been allowed to be sent over to the Red Cross, as all such reports were censored at the headquarters in Paris; so it follows that the wishes of the Army officials in Europe in this respect were not carried out on this side, but overruled by the order to which I have referred.

It is also worth noting that the War Department in sending reports of casualties to families simply state that the individual is killed or wounded without further explanation, and the department here, as far as I know, has no other information on that subject. That work has very properly been taken up by the Red Cross, and it is testified that in the neighborhood of 10,000 letters a week have been sent to the families of those killed or injured, giving the facts relating to the death or the condition of the injured man.

Another reason for delays in reporting casualties—and I nearly overlooked it—was the demand for technical accuracy which the War Department required. An example of this kind is the case of Hugh H. Blait, Company A, One hundred and fifty-sixth Regiment, who was reported missing. This name did not appear on the rolls, so it was sent back to France by the War Department for correction, necessarily requiring about a month, and this was done notwithstanding the fact that there was a "Hugh H. Blair, Company A, One hundred and fifty-sixth Regiment," who had not been reported missing, and who was the only man in that company whose name compared in any respect with that of "Blait."

According to the evidence before the committee—and it has been made public—there have been 264,000 casualties up to the time this hearing was given, December 4. There had been reported by The Adjutant General about 120,000, or—at the time this testimony was taken—total deaths of 50,928 and total wounded 69,841, showing a discrepancy with the Pershing cable reports of 7,550 deaths and 120,114 wounded.

I should like to call attention to the fact that this morning we learn that, according to the official statement made on the 26th of November by Gen. Pershing, there are yet 59,000 casualties of some kind which have not been reported to the public.

It has been repeatedly stated in the testimony given by the Secretary of War, Gen. March, and others that the names were given to the public as soon as they were received, and yet hospital lists, which must contain substantially all of the wounded, are sent to this country every week. Before the armistice was signed, November 11, the names were sent over by cable in code; that is, deaths and missing were sent in code, and it was necessary to take time enough to decipher them, but since that time they have been sent by their true names, and there has been no delay. If Gen. Pershing could report the total number of deaths on November 26, 1918, and the cables were free to send the names direct, it seems incomprehensible that now, on the 2d of January, there is contained in the newspapers every morning lists of a very considerable number of deaths. The death lists, except those which occurred as a result of wounds or disease since that time, should have reached this country as early as December 1, and should have been published within a day or two of that date. Moreover, the statement that all lists are published as soon as they are received in this country can not be accurate for the reasons I have stated, namely, that hospital lists, including wounded and sick men, are received every week, and that these lists are sent from Europe by courier.

One of the excuses made by The Adjutant General in referring to the giving out of these lists was that his force was much too small when he took charge of the bureau, there being but 100 persons in that office. That force has now been increased to 1,500 employees, and, while I may not understand the requirements in checking up lists, it will be noted that on no day has more than 7,500 names been published, which would necessarily mean that these 1,500 employees only examine and are ready to report out a maximum of five names each a day and on most days up to this time not more than two or three. One would think that 1,500 persons examining a list as it existed December 4 of about 130,000 names would have been able to have cleared up the entire roll as early as the 10th of December, or within a week's time. That would have only meant the checking up in every way necessary of about 88 names apiece a week, and I can not fail in this respect to call attention to the indirectness and the lack of what seems to be positive information on the part of The Adjutant General in giving his testimony. It should be said of course in his behalf that he was detailed to this very important and difficult position at a time when the office was overwhelmed with work, and it would necessarily require him a considerable time to become familiar with the details; yet presumably this work was organized, so that the system was in operation at the time, and it would only have been necessary for him to have changed those things which were not working satisfactorily. I can not believe, however, after hearing Gen. Harris's testimony, which was noticeable for its seeming failure to comprehend either in detail or in general what should be done to improve this service, that the change in that office during the activities of war was a businesslike or desirable step to have taken. It would seem that the former Adjutant General, who had in most respects performed his work satisfactorily, should have been continued in this important place.

Another criticism which will justly rest against the Office of The Adjutant General is the failure to answer correspondence in casualty cases promptly and frequently the failure to reply to it at all. In a great many of the individual cases I have been asked to investigate it has been stated that one or two or more telegrams or communications have been sent to The Adjutant General requesting information, and no reply has been received, and that is the testimony of other Senators.

While it is known to everyone that our local mail service has sadly deteriorated under its present management, although it has not yet sunk to the wretchedly inefficient condition of the mail service between this country and the American Expeditionary Force, it would not be possible to charge it with the responsibility for the great delays brought to the attention of the committee during the recent hearings by Senator NEW. He stated that it required about 12 days for a Senator to get a reply to a communication written The Adjutant General's Office, and to corroborate that statement he put in the RECORD these cases. He did it at the suggestion of the Secretary of War, who rather questioned the correctness of Senator NEW's statement:

A letter written by Senator NEW on November 18 in the case of Glenn L. Marshall was answered by The Adjutant General on November 30.

In the case of a letter written November 25 he received a reply dated December 2.

In the case of one written November 18 relating to one Basil Richardson he received a reply November 30.

In the case of Leroy Elson he wrote November 18 and the date of the reply was November 29.

In another case he wrote November 6 and received a reply dated November 25; and it is significant in this last case that The Adjutant General stated in his reply that "Pvt. Mark E. Dufendlach, Company I, Eighteenth Infantry, is officially reported dead July 19 from wounds received in action." I call particular attention to that, because it was necessary for the relatives of this man to appeal to their Senator in November to learn about a soldier who had died on July 19. It required 19 days to get a reply from The Adjutant General. These instances, furnished the committee by Senator NEW, were not unusual, but indicative of a condition which has consistently prevailed.

There seems to have been a failure on the part of the War Department officials to discriminate between cable reports and courier reports, and in all of the questions asked, as, for example, of the Chief of Staff, the reply has been that names were published as soon as received and checked up on this side. Undoubtedly that is true of cable reports, but it is very far from being correct as applied to reports received by courier, as is evidenced by the testimony of Gen. Harris. He states in reply to an inquiry:

> The courier reports of death come under reports on changes and casualties. All changes that occur as to the status of an officer or enlisted man are reported in these daily reports, and until you examine each report you can not tell how many casualties there are.

He went on to state that his office was not very far behind with the courier reports, and when pressed as to how far behind the office was, he said:

> I should say, to-day, less than a month.

The following colloquy took place:

> Q. I do not grasp just what that means. You said less than a month. Do you mean you are a month behind in courier reports that have been sent to your office?—A. In some of the courier reports we have not verified all the names.
>
> Q. How many names, in your opinion, have you in your office from any source which have not been reported?—A. That is impossible to answer.
> Q. Have you 10,000 or 20,000 or 50,000?—A. As I stated before, the reports come in what is known as the reports of changes and casualties, and they come in by the thousands every day, and it is necessary to count each one of those to state how many are casualties and how many are ordinary changes of duty.
> Q. Have you not the slightest idea of the number of names of deaths or casualties you have in your office that have not been given to the public or to the families?—A. I could make an estimate by giving the number Gen. Pershing has announced.
> Q. Has he sent over all that have been killed or wounded?—A. How he reaches his totals of killed and wounded he has not told us, whether by special reports from the organizations or whether he counted the names on the daily reports and change of status; I do not know. I think he may probably get them from special reports.

Q. He has reported 265,000 casualties. Have you that entire number in your office?—A. I have not.

Q. Have you anywhere seen the total number?—A. We get every few days a large package of these courier reports. Gen. Pershing is now reporting all casualties.

If the answers given to these inquiries enlightens anyone they will serve a purpose they failed to do in the case of the committee. Evidently bunches of courier reports are coming in every few days, and yet, with 1,500 clerks, it is impossible so to check these up that The Adjutant General could guess whether there were ten or fifty thousand of those names not reported; but that there are a great many is quite clear from a statement made by Mr. Castle.

Mr. Castle stated in a letter to me that "Hospital reports dated from September 15 to October 12 were given me on November 26. I did not know whether it would be worth while to have the names carded, but, as an experiment, set some girls to work. In the first 1,660 names carded I found only 60 which had been officially reported. Naturally I did not take all the names on the list, but only those who had been wounded or were very seriously ill. The rest were not worth carding at all. Of the 60 reported, 43 were reported as dead, never having been reported as wounded at all." In other words, there were a large number of hospital reports, all dated between the middle of September and the middle of October, and evidently received within two weeks of that time, because the courier would require that time to bring them over, and only 4 per cent of them had been given to the public or to the families of those interested before November 26.

It is not practicable to include in the RECORD many of the hundreds of instances which have come to the attention of Senators relating to this maladministration, but I want to give a few as an indication that they really exist. There was published in the Boston Transcript of December 8 the case of Pvt. Frank W. Coppinger, who was wounded on July 18 and who had been at a base hospital in France. His family heard from him direct about the middle of November, although the information was not sent from the War Department until a day or two before the 8th of December. When asked about this case, Gen. Harris replied:

I suppose the report in that particular case was either misplaced or lost. That is the only explanation I could give.

Another case was instanced at the hearing of a man who died at a base hospital at Liverpool, England. Reports were received by the parents of the man's death direct from a member of his command about November 1, the information evidently going through two hands on the way, which caused some delay, and a Senator was asked to corroborate the information. He requested the facts from the War Department 10 days before our hearing commenced—December 3—but had received no reply from the department on that date. In other words, a man had died in a well-known hospital, certainly as early as the 1st of November, and in the early part of December the War Department was unable to furnish information relative to the case to an inquiring Senator within 10 days.

On December 8 the Washington Post published this case—and I am taking these cases out of a large number which have been furnished me—of Charles N. Fant, a resident of this city and a member of the One hundred and twenty-first Machine Gun Battalion. He had been reported missing in action since October 4, and it required more than two months to get that information to the family of the missing man. Literally hundreds of cases of that kind might be instanced.

December 12 I received an inquiry from Cicero, Ill., made by Mrs. Elizabeth Melchert, which I will not read—it is much too long for that—but which requested information about Sergt. Fred A. Dockendorf, Company K, Fifty-eighth Infantry, Fourth Division. She stated that he was wounded August 6, degree undetermined. Since that information was furnished the family nothing had been heard from the Government, although members of the family had written constantly making inquiries. I asked the Red Cross for information in this case and received the following reply:

Here is the history of the Dockendorf case, so far as I know it: On September 20 we received a letter from Mrs. Dockendorf saying that on August 31 she had received a telegram from the War Department that her husband had been wounded on August 6 and asked us to get details. We answered on September 21 that we would inquire in Paris, and wrote again on September 27 that as no further news had been received it was probable that Dockendorf was getting on all right. In October we received in our Paris mail a list of graves, and among them was that of Frederick Aloysius Dockendorf. We did not write his wife, because we had no other facts and because, in any case, we were not allowed to do so. We did inform The Adjutant General of those names that had not been officially reported and asked him to make the notices official. He did nothing about it. We had more correspondence with other members of the Dockendorf family, particularly the sister, Mrs. Melchert. She also wrote a pathetic letter to Mrs. Wilson, who had The Adjutant General telegraph. The answer came in the course of time, but was not given Mrs. Wilson until she asked to have another cable sent. As a matter of fact, an answer to this cable was returned to the War Department, and it had been lying there for 15 days when the request was made for further information.

The War Department then found the answer to the first cable, which said that Dockendorf was wounded on August 6. Mrs. Wilson's secretary then telephoned to me asking me to cable, and I told her that we had a record of the man's grave. We had already cabled, asking to have the death verified, but had received no answer to the cable. Mrs. Wilson's secretary said that I ought to write to Mrs. Melchert, rules or no rules, and I did so on November 21. I did not write the wife, as I thought the sister could tell her more kindly. For some reason the sister did not tell Mrs. Dockendorf, who wrote me again on December 3, and I then wrote her all the facts I had. My office in Paris has since confirmed the location of the grave, which is registered with the Graves Registration Bureau, and is endeavoring to get some details of death. The case is a characteristic one.

One of the saddest cases brought to my attention is that of a man in Pennsylvania, who telephoned me on the 1st day of December that his brother was wounded on the 8th of October and taken to a hospital in Paris—he named the hospital—and that he had died on the 11th of that month. This information came to him through a letter written by the man's nurse to his mother, the letter being written on the 14th of October and received November 11. My informant then wired The Adjutant General three times for information, but received no reply to any one of his three telegrams. He then asked his Congressman to make inquiries, which the latter did, and was informed by The Adjutant General's Office that it would take three weeks to get a reply. This statement was made notwithstanding the fact that in many instances the War Department has cabled for information for others and obtained an answer within a week's time. In this case, it will be noted that the man was wounded on the 8th of October, taken to a well-known hospital in Paris, where he died on the 11th of October, and yet his family could obtain no information from the War Department as late as the 6th of December. On the 16th of December I received a communication from this gentleman, who had called me on the telephone in reference to his brother, to say that his brother-in-law had not been heard from for nearly two months and that there had been great anxiety in the family over his case, and the young wife of this soldier was so tremendously upset by the failure to get information about her husband that on the day previous she had committed suicide. The following day, or the day this letter was written to me, information was received that this man had been killed in action two months before.

It may be claimed that the real duty of the War Department and of our Army was to win the war, and no one can successfully gainsay that statement. Moreover, our troops have conducted themselves in this first requirement in a manner quite equal to our fondest expectations; but, in addition to this requirement, it was the duty of the War Department to keep stimulated not only the morale of the Army but the morale of the people at home, especially of the families of those serving on the other side, and to prevent as far as possible unnecessary distress and apprehension. You can not read the papers, or the numerous letters, or the testimony given at the hearing of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs on this subject without coming to the conclusion that there has been a failure on the part of the War Department to meet this requirement. Every Senator will undoubtedly corroborate the correctness of this conclusion. I do not say this from a desire to be critical, but I do believe that, having made an examination of the conditions surrounding this activity, it is the duty of some one to put on record the result of that investigation and to call attention to the reasons for the failure of this branch of our military service, a failure which has caused unnecessary mental suffering and anxiety on the part of many of our people.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. LEWIS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for about two hours, he said:

Mr. President, at this point, unless there is some reason that Senators have to the contrary, I should like to yield to the suggestion made to me by a Senator that there shall be an adjournment of the body. I should like to yield to such a suggestion, unless it conflicts with some other arrangement, and continue my presentation to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I gave notice last week that I would address the Senate upon this subject to-morrow, assuming that the Senator from Illinois would finish to-day.

Mr. LEWIS. It will hardly take me 30 minutes to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS. I am, however, willing to accede to the request of the Senator, with the understanding that my notice stands.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that it is for the accommodation of other Senators that I yielded, knowing that the Senator would do likewise. The time I shall occupy to-morrow I think will be quite limited. I appreciate the courtesy of Senators.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 3, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 2, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. John Murray Atwood, D. D., dean of the Theological Department, St. Lawrence University, Canton, N. Y., offered the following prayer:

God of our fathers, Father of us and of all men, Thou who hast wondrously in the year that has just passed unified the diverse people of this great Nation with a new, finer, more intelligent spirit of loyalty, devotion, and generous service, who hast armed our armies with the might of conscious right to vanquish the tyrant oppressor in his power and pride, who hast enabled our soldier boys by their unconscious heroism, our citizens by their generous service, to enrich our national life with the new and yet ever old standards of patriotism and public spirit, with grateful hearts we would lift ourselves to that height, that Heaven, where Thou art always found, and make Thy strength and Thy spirit our own. In this year upon which we are entering, presenting grave problems, involving momentous issues, in which our every act as public servants is fraught with deep significance to the Nation and the world, may we remember that always upon these uplands of noble sentiment and high resolve there is power, Thy power, O God, available and free to all, not known upon the lower levels, so that none of us need be weak or play but other than a worthy part.

And as we take up our daily task may we rely upon Thy strength, may we take counsel by means of unselfish aid and large conception of public duty of Thy spirit, and so both faithfully and humbly do Thy will, to enable this great Nation to fulfill its mission both to its own people and to all mankind. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The following leave of absence was granted by unanimous consent:

To Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, until Monday, on account of important business.

To Mr. COOPER of West Virginia, for one week, beginning Thursday, January 2, on account of important business.

To Mr. BRAND, for five days, on account of illness.

To Mr. QUIN, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BLACK, for five days, on account of illness.

To Mr. DOMINICK, for three days, on account of important business.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report (No. 882) from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 488.

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 12863) entitled "An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes," be, and hereby is, taken from the Speaker's table with the Senate amendments thereto, to the end that the said amendments be, and hereby are, disagreed to, and the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes on said amendments be, and hereby is, agreed to, and the Speaker shall immediately appoint the conferees.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this rule is to take from the Speaker's table the revenue bill and send it to conference. I think that all gentlemen appreciate the necessity of this bill entering upon this stage of its consideration at the earliest possible moment. The people of the country who are to pay the taxes that are to be raised by this bill are entitled to know at the very earliest moment precisely what they are to pay, and how they are to pay it. We all realize that this bill must eventually go to conference, and in justice to the taxpayers of this country it seems desirable that it should go to conference at the earliest possible moment. Therefore the Committee on Rules has unanimously agreed on the resolution which I have just presented.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. For a question.

Mr. MANN. On Monday last the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], asked unanimous consent to send this bill to conference, and he gave to the House certain assurances with reference to the child-labor amendment, No. 546; the prohibition amendment, No. 600; and the campaign-contribution amendment, No. 222. I respectfully ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to the gentleman from North Carolina to state whether the statement which he made on Monday last concerning the bill, if it goes to conference, as to these amendments, still holds good.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman from North Carolina desires me to yield I will do so.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to say that I will make the same assurances. I discussed it on Monday with several gentlemen after we adjourned, and they said that if I made the same assurances they would be glad to support this rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. For a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman intend to give time for the discussion of this rule?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thought I had really said all that was necessary to be said on the subject, in connection with the remarks made by the gentleman from North Carolina; in other words, I thought I had exhausted the whole subject. [Laughter.] Still I will yield to the gentleman for a further question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have a demand for time to discuss the rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield, and permit me to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from North Carolina desire me to yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would not care if the gentleman from Tennessee refused because I do not know what the question of the gentleman from Illinois is.

Mr. MADDEN. The question I am going to ask the gentleman will not embarrass the situation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield for a question, but not for debate.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if he has any views with respect to the attitude of the House conferees on the amendment of the Senate which strikes out the House provision imposing a tax on clothing, articles of utility, and household articles, where the price of the article is over $20.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know how the House conferees feel about it, but if I was going to make a guess I should think it would be very easy to convince the House conferees that that probably is a wise amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. That the Senate amendment is wise?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but I could not give the gentleman any assurance of that.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from North Carolina that I may ask him a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from North Carolina desire me to yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but I hope this will be the last one.

Mr. RANDALL. In view of the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina, notwithstanding the adoption of the rule, the conferees will not understand that it is the desire of the House for them to nonconcur in amendment 600?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Chair announced the following conferees: Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY, Mr. DIXON, Mr. FORDNEY, and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13462) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes. Pending that motion I ask the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] to see if we can not have some agreement with respect to time of general debate.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, what does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. SMALL. On this side there are requests for an aggregate of only two hours. I do not know that that time will all be consumed. How would four hours do?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I have requests totaling 2 hours and 40 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina, if I may inject myself into this matter, that I shall object to anything less than about eight hours. A lot of people here desire to talk about some matters, and I am going to insist that they have the opportunity.

Mr. SMALL. May I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that if on this side we have requests for only 2 hours and on the other for 2 hours and 40 minutes, that we ought to be able to agree on a time not exceeding 4 hours and 40 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. That would not do at all, as I understand it. I want some time on the bill, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] has already committed himself to the disposition of all of the time that he has.

Mr. SMALL. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois desire?

Mr. MADDEN. Thirty minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, permit me to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that we run along during the day with general debate, and that then we can probably come to some agreement in respect to closing it this evening.

Mr. SMALL. If we could agree upon it now, it would be much better. I would suggest not exceeding five hours.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is satisfactory.

Mr. MADDEN. May I have 30 minutes of that?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13462, and pending that the gentleman asks unanimous consent that debate be confined to five hours.

Mr. SMALL. Unless general debate should be concluded earlier.

The SPEAKER. Unless general debate should be concluded earlier than that.

Mr. SMALL. The time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Iowa and myself.

The SPEAKER. The time to be equally divided.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question, perhaps not germane, but important, nevertheless. Does the gentleman from North Carolina know whether the Committee on Rules has given up the idea of presenting a rule upon this matter of certain contracts made by the War Department?

Mr. SMALL. I am informed that, in any event, it will not be presented to-day.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rules a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly; the gentleman stands beside him.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This is a matter of exceeding importance to some constituents of mine. A very great wrong has been done them, and I am exceedingly interested in that rule in having a hearing before the House, so that these people can get some recompense for the wrong that has been done them.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that there was a hearing had before the Committee on Rules which just came from the printer yesterday, which has been distributed very generally among the Members of the House. It was at first the intention of the Committee on Rules to present the rule to-day, but it was suggested that inasmuch as there were gentlemen who wanted to read the hearings and also probably the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs it would be better to defer presenting the matter to the House until to-morrow.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the matter be presented to-morrow?

Mr. POU. I think so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is chairman of the Committee on Rules, and the committee has taken definite action on the rule. Is there no understanding as to when the rule will be presented?

Mr. POU. I had a talk with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who is the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Rules, and in so far as he and I can have any say in the matter the rule will be presented to the House to-morrow.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would say just one word more to the gentleman from North Carolina. Constituents of mine have had their land taken from them, land on which they did not even give an option, some of them. They were turned adrift and they went and made contracts for the purchase of other land. They have not received a cent for the land which was taken from them by the Government, and they have no way to meet their contract obligations. An exceedingly great wrong has been done them.

Mr. POU. The Committee on Rules certainly has no purpose to attempt to delay the matter, but it was thought by the gentleman from Kansas and myself that probably it would be better, in the interest of time, to give the Members an opportunity to read the hearings.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman's request provide for the control of the time?

Mr. SMALL. Yes. The time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13462) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Under the order of the House the Chair understands that general debate has been limited to five hours, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] and one half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY]——

Mr. SMALL. Unless general debate shall have been concluded prior to that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless general debate shall have been concluded prior to that time. The gentleman from North Carolina.

[Mr. SMALL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to digress for a moment from the bill under consideration, in order to correct an erroneous statement taken from the New York Herald's account of the Security League probe.

Recently I addressed the House on the league's charges of disloyalty lodged against 300 Members of Congress, and then made certain specific countercharges against the officers of the league. A resolution of investigation of the league, then offered, was unanimously reported by the Rules Committee and immediately passed the House by unanimous vote. A committee was appointed and the probe was started before the holiday recess.

In the Herald article I read, "Representative FREAR charged the league spent more than $1,000,000 to defeat Members of Congress, which charge was denied by Col. Lydecker."

A brief reply is all I care to offer. I have never charged the league with spending any specific amount to defeat Congressmen, nor are the league books of much value in determining amounts so used, because large expenditures to defeat Representatives, instigated by the league, were made by other associated organizations throughout the country. I did charge, and again repeat, that "Security" League pamphlets contained a claim that the league's annual expenses reached $1,200,000. This fact has been put in evidence by the committee. Lydecker now says that his books show only about one-quarter million dollars expenses in 1918. That indicates league pamphlets sought to deceive the public as to the league's importance by grossly misrepresenting its proposed expenditure. This characteristic exaggeration reaches from 75 to 100 per cent falsehood as to estimated league finances, disloyalty charges against Congressmen, and many other subjects, even down to the borrowed title of its make-believe "colonel."

One important charge made against the league has been confirmed at the outset. According to the Herald article of December 20, Lydecker stated to the probe committee that $200,000 of admitted league subscriptions came from the Carnegie Corporation and from Rockefeller. The gift of $150,000 by Carnegie recalls the old armor-plate contracts made with this Government, that were a fitting prelude to the recent Hog Island contracts, and is a further reminder that United States Steel, a source of league supply, has profited hundreds of millions of dollars from this war. John D. Rockefeller's contribution to Lydecker's league of only $50,000 looks niggardly and probably represents less than one-quarter of 1 per cent of war profits wrung from the American people through boosting the price of gasoline alone. Guggenheim, Du Pont, Morgan, and 100 other Wall Street magnates have been disclosed to be financing this junker league. That is the source of poisoned gas and easy money, used to defeat blacklisted Congressmen in 1918.

No equal bunch of colossal egotists in or out of New York can be found anywhere compared with these corporation lip patriots, who assail people indiscriminately, announce their proposed changes to the Federal Constitution, who parade their promised changes in rules of Congress affecting committee chairmanships, who pompously promise to urge "just and careful" peace terms at Versailles, who denounce 300 Representatives and numerous Senators as disloyal, and in time of war widely published their undertaking to elect a "loyal" Congress in place of those on their blacklist.

Any irresponsible fool can set fire to a powder magazine and destroy all within reach. It has been demonstrated already that during inflammable times of war when the pointing of the finger of suspicion warranted conviction in some minds, this libelous league, though a mixture of culpable legislative ignorance, falsehood, colossal egotism, and love of notoriety, and under a hypocritical cover of patriotism, published to the world false libels that were used by political opponents to besmirch Representatives generally.

Now that the war is over and the influence of hysterical pronouncements has passed, this bunch of irresponsibles with its program affecting the peace of the world and "steadying the Nation by propaganda" is only ridiculous and no longer dangerous. The probe has made reasonably certain a prediction that within six months this New York corporation will be as dead as a mackerel, except on paper. Carnegie, Rockefeller, Root, and Parker are not likely to continue in active partnership with Lydecker, Orth, and McElroy much longer. Menken, the real brains, has been kicked out. Lydecker needs no further description; Orth's relations to the Mexican sisal trust is sufficient to show whence and why our questionnaires exist; and McNutt McElroy's $10,000 salary will dwindle 99.99 per cent, to use league mathematics, as soon as this educator who "deliberately insulted" the students of Wisconsin reaches his true value. Like Huns who ruthlessly destroyed the homes of Belgians, these maligners of men and destroyers of reputations in time of war can gloat over injuries inflicted on patriotic Representatives with honored names, more treasured than gold or worldly goods, names which have been dragged in the mire by these character assassins. My own election by over 15,000 majority shows such cowardly attacks were measured at their true value.

One further suggestion regarding the Herald article that says the "probe fails to disclose anything to besmirch the patriotism" of the Lydecker Security League. No organized German propaganda during the war gave more comfort and aid to the enemy than the so-called Security League's effort to create discord at home by besmirching our people generally or to encourage the foe abroad by charging the American Congress with disloyalty. This junker corporation outrivaling anything in Prussia is the last word in un-Americanism and has been everlastingly tarred with its own disloyalty stick.

Returning to the river and harbor bill under discussion, a further statement is due in addition to the brief minority report filed for opposing the bill.

Of the river and harbor bills presented during the past five years, I have supported only one, that of 1917, carrying about $20,000,000, which contained items requested in times of war by Secretary Baker for war purposes and could not be opposed. All other bills and the omnibus public-building bill have been opposed for reasons that apply to this bill. Some of them have been defeated, others have been greatly reduced, with a total saving to the Federal Treasury of over $100,000,000, and some of the worst features have been eliminated from recent bills, but as long as omnibus bills and committee members are selected with a purpose in view of securing liberal appropriations for certain home projects bills will be objectionable and deserve defeat.

The cure repeatedly urged lies in a high-class, constructive, nonpolitical board of public works, like the Interstate Commerce Commission, with powers similar to those possessed by boards and officials in certain European countries, where local contribution is enforced against the community especially benefited by the waterway and where governmental aid carries control of rail and water rates and reciprocal duties. That alone makes possible the use of such waterways, whereas in our country, apart from ship channels, not one inland waterway out of a hundred improved by the Government is or apparently ever will be a success or a reasonable businesslike investment for the Government.

The cost to the Government for furnishing a waterway for river commerce, per ton, is not definitely settled as to method of computation, and only approximate results can be reached because the amount properly chargeable to investment is variously estimated, although annual maintenance is sure and certain. Excluding ferriage, floatable timber, and sand hauled short distances, not affected by river "improvements," the following estimates, in 1916, on the several rivers and canals named are noted in former minority views:

	Per ton.
Ohio River (excluding coal $40 per ton)	$3.00
Ouachita	8.00
Warrior and Tombigbee	12.00
Upper Mississippi	12.00
Lower Mississippi	35.00
Arkansas	20.00
Hennepin	36.75
Missouri	40.00
Muscle Shoals, Tenn	40.00
Brazos	80.00
Red	100.00
Big Sandy, Ky	350.00

SEVENTY NEW PROJECTS TO BE STARTED NOW.

The pending river and harbor bill of practically $27,000,000 contains 125 old projects, cared for under the omnibus bill, and in order to revive the spirits of insistent communities this bill adds 70 new projects, generously scattered throughout the country, a few of which are immaterial, several of which are good, and many of which are disclosed by the engineers' reports to be neither necessary nor of value to navigation. So many wasteful new projects and big appropriations for useless old projects have been inserted that the bill ought to be defeated under ordinary conditions and is indefensible in the present state of the Treasury.

On the day before this bill was reported by the River and Harbor Committee the press contained a statement that the Public Building Committee by a tie vote of seven to seven "opposed an omnibus building bill, that they declared was purely pork," and a proposed public building bill was defeated in committee. If I declared the bill before us is a "pork barrel," indignant committee members, who never opposed an item or a bill in their lives and who support anything and everything offered, would bitterly resent as a personal affront such charge, so I will not make it. I do say in a modest Christian spirit that this bill could never pass Congress but for the fact that it contained over a hundred old projects and 70 new projects, with additional surveys scattered from Maine to Mexico and to the Pacific coast, all of which bring votes to the bill. Not one item out of three, presumably, would get through if presented to the House singly, but in an omnibus bill everything goes. How far would the bankrupt Chesapeake & Delaware 13-mile item of $3,000,000 in a $25,000,000 future project get without an omnibus bill? How far would nearly a half million dollars' appropriation in the bill for the indefensible Upper Cumberland canalization $4,500,000 scheme get without an omnibus bill to pull it through? After spending $7,000,000 on the Cumberland its real commerce is not one-quarter what it was before one dollar was expended by the Government in "improvements."

How far would a round million dollars for two hopeless, insignificant North Carolina canals or waterways get without this omnibus bill to save it for such favored localities? How far would a $400,000 item get on the lower Missouri, which is used to protect private lands along the river, where commerce last year cost the Government over $50 a ton? How far would items get which cover a score of rivulets and streams that should first be insured against fire if the popular omnibus bill is abandoned?

WHAT WE PAY FOR THROUGH LIBERTY BOND SALES AND WAR TAXES.

When an existing national indebtedness, that has jumped seventeen times its prewar size within two years, with Congress about to impose a heavy direct $6,000,000,000 tax burden on the country, with a new liberty bond issue of $5,000,000,000 soon to be demanded of the American people on the plea of patriotism, while liberty bonds are selling on the New York stock market at 94 cents on the dollar, with this unprecedented financial problem confronting us the American people are asked to subscribe for more liberty bonds, with which we expect to pay $3,000,000 for a bankrupt canal, $1,000,000 for two insignificant North Carolina waterways, $340,000 for the hopeless Cumberland River project, $200,000 for the doubtful Mississippi sound project, $580,000 to divert silt from Los Angeles, $400,000 to revet private lands along the Missouri River, and through other bills several million dollars to protect private lands along the lower Mississippi, with many other projects in this bill of no greater value to real navigation.

When communities back home pound their Representatives on the back for local appropriations it is hard to resist the pounding, and when active lobbies camp in and around Washington determined to get local plums for their communities, Representatives who expect to come back to Congress are sometimes unable to act independently. This effort to get something for the locality reaches a high state of perfection when one State, that is nameless, secured a $100,000,000 nitrate plant to be built by the Government at Muscle Shoals, on the Tennessee River, and also about $12,000,000 of Government money for canalization of the Black Warrior River, which after that large expenditure is deserted and practically bare of commerce. Several million dollars more of Government funds are to be expended in buying Government boats for this deserted river. Limitless Government appropriations are also in prospect for local highways in this same State.

Such is the disposition of those who have secured enormous local Government appropriations in the past. I am using the illustration for such purpose alone. Other States and communities may be equally insistent, if not equally successful. Present legislative standards exalt those who aggressively demand Federal money for localities, until it becomes a standard for other communities, which demand generous helpings from the Federal Treasury as the price of continued public service by their Representatives.

All these weaknesses in our legislative system are encouraged by a loose Governmental financial policy. Both political parties have demanded a budget system in an effort to curtail waste, but Congress repudiates that pledge found in both party platforms. Every country of importance in the world excepting our own has adopted the budget system, yet we continue to invite enormous waste and extravagance through numerous appropriation committees that act independently, and may present omnibus bills for passage containing good, bad, and indifferent items, carrying in the aggregate all the Treasury and taxpayers will bear.

I do not care to discuss this recognized weakness in our legislative methods beyond a simple statement of fact, which is known to every Member. The war Congress has thus far placed four liberty loans with the people, aggregating $17,852,000,000. That money was secured after tremendous effort put forth by every known agency in the country, with the plea of patriotic duty, and nearly $18,000,000,000 was subscribed by the American people for war purposes.

The Secretary of the Treasury now advises us that another and fifth liberty loan is necessary to obtain $5,000,000,000 more to carry on our expenditures, while the rapidly growing revenue-tax bill must provide direct taxes of $6,000,000,000, covered by the pending revenue bill for the next fiscal year, which is in addition to the prospective loan. Our appropriations due to war in the Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, reached $36,119,536,082, and appropriations for the present fiscal year are estimated at $18,000,000,000. Such figures do not carry much significance to the average mind, and a few million dollars more or less in the pending river and harbor bill may seem of small importance.

The foregoing amounts include $8,223,540,702 loaned to foreign Governments, a considerable portion of which may be charged up to profit and loss. Hundreds of millions and presumably billions of dollars have been lost or wasted through mismanagement, inefficiency, or unnecessary expenditures from the moneys appropriated for war purposes, like the Hog Island and air-machine waste, but the American people recognize this as one of the accompaniments of war.

TIME TO RETRENCH.

Now that the war is over, a vigorous policy of retrenchment is necessary not alone as to amounts of expenditures but also as to their character. Why does the River and Harbor Committee break away from this policy of retrenchment? On July 1, 1918, the Engineer's office reported unexpended balances for waterway improvement amounting to about $55,000,000 in round numbers. By January 1, 1919, it was estimated the balance on hand would be reduced to about $45,000,000. In other words, only $10,000,000 will have been expended in the six months, with a balance in the hands of the Army Engineers of $45,000,000 at the time this bill comes before Congress. The Engineer's office presented an estimate to the committee prior to the signing of the armistice with which to make up the bill we are now considering. In these estimates $2,973,000 were for maintenance of all waterway projects during the coming fiscal year and $7,647,500 for improvements on old projects, reaching a total of $10,650,000, which, with the balance on hand and a lump sum for emergencies, cover all that the Engineers require for necessary waterway work at this time.

The Engineer's office asked for a $5,000,000 lump sum with which to meet emergencies and $250,000 covering surveys. Gen. Taylor, of that department, however, stated to the committee that the Engineer's office could safely get along with a lump sum of $1,000,000 instead of $5,000,000 contained in the Army Engineer's recommendation, which reduced that estimate $4,000,000, and also that $150,000 would be sufficient to cover surveys, which made an additional reduction of $100,000. In other words, the river and harbor bill on a war basis with these reductions would have reached only $11,770,500, an amount that would appeal to the taxpayers and those who are called upon to buy more liberty bonds at this time.

The bill before us demands $26,936,344, and, in my judgment, no possible justification can be offered under existing conditions of the Treasury for this enormous increase over the amount asked for by the Engineer's Department, and that department has always made generous requests not governed by business considerations. Under the pressure of local communities which force their Representatives to demand increased appropriations, and new projects not urged by the Engineers for war purposes, we are confronted with a bill that includes vigorous boosts in amount of old projects, some of which are of doubtful value; and about 70 new projects have been added, a few of which may be worthy and important, but which, without exception, could wait until we have adjusted our Government affairs to better meet the tremendous war obligations placed upon us. With Treasury burdens, which never before dimly approached present demands, and with $45,000,000 on hand for use in the hands of the Engineers for present construction, the committee, over protests, has adopted 70 new projects carrying $8,768,844 in initial expenditures and an aggregate of between $25,000,000 and $50,000,000 in eventual new obligations. Some of these new projects, in my humble judgment, are indefensible now or at any time in the future, and while it may be hopeless to protest against their insertion in the bill I can not remain silent at this time.

QUESTIONS TO BE ASKED OF AND BY CONSTITUENTS.

Needed projects are included in this bill, but under a reduced lump-sum appropriation Army Engineers will be responsible for expenditures, and 70 new projects may well await a careful separation of the good from the worthless.

Which one of you, my colleagues, will say to his constituents a continued tax on passenger, freight, express, and a hundred other necessities is to be used to help pay for another new $200,000 project on the deserted Government $12,000,000 Black Warrior "improvement" down in Alabama? Which one of my colleagues will go to the people of his State asking for a continuance of 3 cents postage on letters to help pay $400,000 in this bill for the deserted $20,000,000 Missouri River project, or $580,000 for Los Angeles's silt disposal? Will any of my colleagues ask his friends to support the needy Federal Treasury by investing in war stamps in order to dig out Deep Creek, or Scuppernong Creek, or Fishing, Swift, or Smiths North Carolina creeks, Murderskill, Mispillion, Raccoon, or Broad Creeks, or scores of other useless narrow creeks? Who among my colleagues, I now ask, will plead with his constituents to buy liberty bonds in order to give $1,000,000, contained in this bill, to North Carolina's hopeless inland waterways, or $3,000,000, contained in this bill, for the bankrupt Chesapeake & Delaware 13-mile canal, which the Government first helped to build originally?

Who will dare tell their constituents that this bill saddles 70 new projects on to the Treasury pay roll, many of them indefensible expenditures that will reach from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 before completion, and all to be paid by war taxes or liberty bonds? Who will say to their people back home we defeated the public-building pork barrel in committee this year by a tie vote, but with $45,000,000 on hand we surrendered to a $27,000,000 time-honored wasteful river and harbor bill when the Treasury was worse than empty? Every man must answer these questions to his constituents and to himself when voting for this bill.

We have appropriated for rivers and harbors in the past nearly a billion dollars, and the waste is notorious. Some estimates have reached over one-half of the total amount expended. Harbor improvements are generally of value, but contributions rarely are had from favored communities as in other countries. River expenditures, as a rule, have brought no commerce to deserted streams, which were covered with boats long before a dollar had been expended by the Government. We close our eyes to millions of dollars sunk in the rivers and harbors of the country, frequently for strictly local benefits, for land reclamation, for water powers, for private contractors who are primarily benefited, for drainage and silt-protection purposes, and sometimes just for money to spend under the plea that it keeps labor employed. All this is done under the pretense that general waterway commerce will be benefited.

REHABILITATING THE RAILROADS THAT HAVE DESTROYED INLAND-WATERWAY COMMERCE.

We silently watch millions of Government dollars go to rehabilitate run-down railway systems, golden streams of money taken from the pockets of taxpayers under the plea of war measures to build up rolling stock, terminals, and other necessary adjuncts of private railways; we silently accept unprecedented jumps in freight and passenger rates to unheard-of proportions, which have been imposed on the ground that more money must be squeezed out of the public to improve transportation needs in time of war.

We confront the fact that railways under private ownership have driven waterway commerce from all our inland streams and canals and that the unconscionable railway methods pursued have crushed out individual enterprise and ruined certain communities in order to build up others. But when the question of taking over railways by the Government is mooted, men in public life generally drop the subject like a red-hot poker. Our distinguished Commander in Chief, who commandeered all the railways and their employees with a brief sweep of the pen, now says he does not know what to say on the subject of Government ownership of railways—the first utterance of that kind which has emanated from that high source on any subject during the past six years of national affairs. Not to be outdone regarding the railways, the Director General of Railways, who took them over at one fell swoop, has now resigned, and in like manner leaves us stranded as to his own judgment in the matter, excepting to urge their retention for five years as a "test."

Men, in Congress and out, who first declared we will never let go of the railways, and are now urging their return, look askance at those who are not equally acrobatic in judgment. Meanwhile private railway interests are on the job 24 hours daily. They have employed the ablest counsel that could be furnished in or out of New York Security League's corporation lawyers, while the harmonious chorus of approvals through the press regarding private railway demands indicates that a propaganda for railway return to private control is becoming thoroughly organized. I am not assuming to discuss the merits of a question that presumably will be warmly debated in Congress before many months are past, nor do I assume to pass judgment in any way upon this large problem, which must be solved, but I do call attention to a phase of the subject that demands thoughtful consideration from us as legislators.

PRIVATE RAILWAY CONTROL HAS DESTROYED INLAND-WATERWAY TRAFFIC.

After long and bitter struggles with the old familiar railroad lobbyists, Congress and the States have taken from railway officials the right to impose secret rebates, or the watering of stocks, or power to ruin or reward individuals or communities, or to issue free passes or other special favors, or power to charge all the public will pay, with other familiar results of autocratic control. No longer do we stand in open-mouthed awe while locomotives whisk the private car of the fourth deputy assistant purchasing agent along the line, nor do we longer wait in the regular passenger car while the prima donna's special train is given the right of way. Safety appliances, larger wage, better equipment, and improved management have become general through strong State control; but competition, lower rates, or luxurious appointments not warranted by revenue is a thing of the past.

Whether any of these conditions will be bettered under Government ownership is not material to this discussion, but it is important to know what bearing the railway problem has on waterway transportation. No student of the subject can close his eyes to the bald fact that apart from ship channels the railways have driven commerce from our rivers by cut-throat rates, and no intelligible effort has been made up to the present time to remedy such conditions. On the contrary, the Government has placed hundreds of millions of dollars in our rivers and inland waterways with full knowledge that such waterways would not be utilized without important changes in our transportation problems. While the Government has been expending these hundreds of millions of dollars in digging channels and in canalizing useless rivers, creeks, and rivulets the railways simply wait until real competition is threatened, when the boat line is taken over by interested parties or driven out of business by cut-throat rates.

Every effort to compel railways to accept minimum rates is thwarted by the different communities that enjoy favored freight rates through a fictitious waterway competition that never exists. Every way to promote or preserve substantial waterway traffic has been throttled by private railway interests. Conceding that congestion has resulted on the railways and asserting that no fear is had of waterway competition, which is damned with faint praise, the railways have made sure that such competition would be destroyed. Confronted by this remarkable situation, our Government, under the advice of its Army Engineers and supported by a vigorous home local lobby, continually gives down a golden stream of coin to improve the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, Tennessee, Cumberland, Trinity, Arkansas, and a hundred other rivers, creeks, and rivulets that have little substantial commerce, present or prospective, and no traffic proportionate to the enormous expenditures we have made upon these waterways. Antiquated canals have been taken over by the Government long after bankruptcy has ensued, and the lock tender's dreams from one month's end to the other are not undisturbed excepting through the arrival of the monthly governmental check, which awakens him from sound slumbers.

Commerce can not be found on these streams outside of official Army engineers' reports, which in the past have been camouflaged with sand and gravel, used for river improvement, hauled short distances, whereby the average tonnage appears to be maintained, while millions of tons of logs floated long distances helps to maintain the length of haul. Due to repeated exposures in recent years this practice is being changed, but bankrupt canals and communities along the rivers and dry rivulets of the country are as hungry for Government gold and as insistent as ever before.

WASTED GOVERNMENT BOAT BUILDING AND RIVER IMPROVEMENTS.

Another remarkable fact appears when the Government, through its war bureaus, acting with little or no scrutiny or restriction, has bought boats and barges for the use of the Democratic State chairman—Goltra, of Missouri—at a cost of $3,600,000 practically for his exclusive use on the upper Mississippi, and also has built other boats for the lower Mississippi, Black Warrior, and other waterways to be rented out to Tom, Dick, and Harry at whatever terms can be had. No private capital would invest in boats for these deserted waterways nor could they profitably run if so, but a generous Government Treasury, with $18,000,000,000 in outstanding bonds, is used to finance the dreams and speculations of waterway associations and private interests, until Secretary McAdoo, on December 15, served public notice through the press that contracts executed by him for building such boats would probably be a dead loss to the Government unless Congress extends the period of Government control of railways for five years in which to test out the experiment.

All the millions spent for the improvement of these waterways and for the construction by the Government of boats for private use will be wasted, according to the Railroad Director General's opinion, unless a fair test of Government control can be had. Yet Congress and war boards, and even other Cabinet officers, in the face of this unbusinesslike proceeding, blindly continue the indefensible waste.

PRIVATE OR GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILWAYS AND WATERWAYS.

Our Government is the only Nation of importance that refuses to accept a businesslike financial budget, and in equally mysterious fashion it is practically the only Government in the world that tenaciously clings to private ownership of railways, notwithstanding that policy has resulted in the destruction of our inland waterway transportation. All important railway lines are State owned in Germany, Austria, Hungary, Russia, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Japan, South Africa, Australia, and other countries. Over one-half of the lines operated under the English flag, according to statistics, or about 53,400 miles against 33,292 miles, are State owned, and the remainder are rapidly being taken over by the Government. In France the Government operates only a limited number of its railways, but by operation of law all are to come into the possession of the Government in the course of time. This principle also is invoked by the South American and Central American Governments according to authorities that have compiled statistics on the subject. Irrespective of merits or demerits of the railway problem, Congress continually is asked to give down liberally for impossible waterways without contributions from localities, giving to the community having the longest or most powerful reach, irrespective of comparative commercial necessity or possible utility, and we are continually asked to look to Germany and other foreign Governments for justification of such course. Every student of the subject knows that local contributions are generally imposed in Europe with waterway improvements, and wherever appreciable waterway traffic exists in European countries it is generally due to exceptional conditions affecting coal or other low-grade freight that are easily distinguished from our own conditions and to a control of railway rates that is exercised abroad in favor of cheap traffic for the waterways.

INDEFENSIBLE OMNIBUS APPROPRIATION SYSTEM.

Yet we cling to antiquated omnibus appropriations where the strong pull is not ignored and where no intelligible system of public work or improvement is exercised now or is in prospect. Anyone who protests against present blind methods of giving money from the Public Treasury under the lack of system now employed is taken to task by waterway organizations that live in fanciful dreams and have their annual delightful outings and, more important than all else under the present system, are potent factors in influencing the complexion of our river and harbor bills. Puck's philosophical reflections of "what fools we mortals be" may have been inspired by a brief study of our waterway program as disclosed by river and harbor bills passed by Congress. In addition to this remarkable situation, we are now confronted by the fact that generally every dollar poured into these inland waterways is primarily for the benefit of local interests and is taken from the pockets of taxpayers through war-revenue bills or liberty loans.

Those who represent local committees are sure to feel that their project is an exception to the rule and ought to be made a charge upon the Public Treasury. But I submit that under present conditions, where no immediate necessity can be shown, it is a reckless and unjustified policy for Congress to put 70 new projects into the pending bill and thereby add nearly $9,000,000 in amount to the total, with a future burden which comes by their adoption, reaching $25,000,000 to possibly double that amount, depending on underestimates and eventual depths to be demanded.

This much I have said in a general way to call attention to the system or lack of system which is more reckless to-day than it was five years ago, when these wasteful measures were first opposed in Congress, because the Treasury burden is immeasurably greater. No Member cares to incur the ill will of his brother Member or to attack items which may have political bearing upon the Member's home constituency, and I have no purpose in criticism further than to demonstrate the weakness and wastefulness of a system or lack of system which is unlike that of any other nation on the face of the globe. The bill before us has earmarks that show to what extent our lack of waterway or public improvements will carry us. It is true that Army engineers are high-class men who have approved these projects, but a brief glance at impossible waterway projects approved in the past by Army engineers scattered all over the country illustrates their poor judgment or lack of independence when confronted or surrounded with influences that have been potent with them ever since the young cadet first received his appointment to West Point many years before. Nor is it fair or just to expect such officers, however independent or conscientious—and I do not question their high standards—to stand between hungry local communities represented by Congressmen and influential Senators on the one hand and by an unappreciative and often misguided public on the other.

The lack of a financial Government budget is sure to be a source of never-ending trouble until we get rid of a system that permits gathering together of scores of local appropriations in omnibus river and harbor and public-building bills. It is the system that is primarily at fault, and until that system is changed the only possible cure presented is by making small lump-sum appropriations, to be placed in the hands of Army engineers to meet present maintenance and pressing emergencies. With $45,000,000 in the hands of such engineers, it is submitted that the bill before us has no justification and should be defeated.

I will not discuss the items in detail, but will refer to several that to my mind call for the defeat of the proposed bill. And let me say in passing that while I do not intend to take up much of the time of the committee, I hope when some of the items are presented to discuss them in an effort to show that the Army engineers themselves do not claim they are important or necessary at this time.

Large harbor interests at New York and elsewhere can be protected by the engineers through a suitable lump-sum appropriation; and while it is not a satisfactory way of lessening the waste, it is far better than to place increased unjust burdens upon the backs of people who alone do not yet appreciate the weight of burdens already assumed.

A LUMP-SUM APPROPRIATION WILL REDUCE WASTEFUL EXPENDITURES.

I have offered a minority report which proposes a lump sum of from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 to take care of any necessary existing waterway project for the next fiscal year, and is in addition to the $55,000,000 in the hands of the Army engineers on July 1, 1918, only $10,000,000 of which has since been expended, according to their statement. I confess feeling that we are between the devil and the deep sea in placing lump sums entirely in the hands of the Army engineers, because their recommendations are often indefensible, but at least it will have the merit of reducing expenditures far below the amount named in this bill by the committee.

Take two or three projects named by the committee as a sample of the judgment displayed by Army engineers, whose recommendations appear in the pending bill. Four hundred thousand dollars is asked for in this bill by the engineers for the Missouri River from Kansas City to the mouth, a distance of 400 miles. This sum is in addition to a balance of $1,207,750 for this stretch of river which was on hand available at the beginning of the last fiscal year. On page 2820, Engineers' Report for 1918, appears the statement that $16,194,249 has been spent on this 400-mile reach of the river. Estimated at 4 per cent annual interest, this makes an annual interest charge on the Government Treasury of about $650,000, apart from annual maintenance, that in turn becomes an interest charge. On page 2919 the commerce for 1917, after deducting sand and gravel hauled about 1 mile by owners, reached just 11,743 tons, or about 39 tons a day, much of which was hauled short distances, and at an average interest cost to the Government, after furnishing the waterway, of over $50 a ton. Ninety-five per cent of the $400,000 is used for diking and revetment along the river banks, which protects private lands back of the river, although these lands make no contribution toward the cost. No boat line exists on the river and none is in prospect. A miserable waste of millions of dollars, recommended by Army engineers, after being rejected by Col. Townsend, head of the Mississippi Committee, is now a standing monument of waterway waste which these officers seek to justify by fanciful dreams of interested localities.

Again, on page 2329, the engineers report $272,870 total expenditure in past years for a small waterway from Norfolk to sounds of North Carolina, with questionable commerce, excepting one item labeled "Miscellaneous." That comprises two-thirds of all carried on the waterway and may have been hauled from 1 to 10 miles, so far as facts indicated. Such statistics are valueless in character. After the present bill was reported to the committee from the Engineers' Department a new appropriation of $250,000 was added in the pending bill, or nearly as much as has been expended during all the years that this waterway has been used. No possible justification in these times of heavy taxation can warrant such extravagance. Again, the old familiar hopeless inland waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort, on which $3,744,400 has been wasted, with a balance on hand available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, of $649,725, receives in addition $750,000 after it was submitted by the Engineers' office to the committee. The insignificant commerce on this waterway, about one-half of which is piling and logs, also indicates a further loss of nearly one-half, or 50 per cent, during the last four years, and a startling fact from the taxpayer's viewpoint is that the cost of dredging along this so-called waterway has increased 100 per cent on portions of the project within the past three years, yet the clang of the engineer's iron scoop rings merrily on as long as the scoop reaches the Federal Treasury.

Other old projects that have been continually opposed give testimony to the extravagant methods pursued under the existing system. It is impossible to remedy or curtail such expenditures materially as long as the omnibus method of appropriations continues.

EXTRAVAGANT NEW PROJECTS TO BE PAID BY LIBERTY BOND SALES.

To the burden placed upon the Treasury by large additions to old projects the committee in the pending bill has added about 70 new projects, including $3,000,000 for the bankrupt Chesapeake and Delaware 13-mile canal, that, like the Norfolk-Beaufort $5,000,000 canal, is used to take the seasickness out of the sea. This in addition to several million dollars in this bill appropriated for the Delaware and Schuylkill in the near neighborhood that have actual commerce and yearly make generous demands upon the Federal Treasury. A few hundred thousand dollars more is inserted in the bill to begin work on the hopeless canalization project on the upper Cumberland that will wipe out over $4,500,000 more from the Federal Treasury before completion, in addition to over $7,000,000 already spent upon this river with an insignificant commerce, present or prospective.

The ubiquitous Ouachita project of 360 miles of deserted river on which we have spent $3,350,150, with constantly increasing estimates of several millions, again confronts us in this bill. Three hundred thousand dollars is added for more locks under Document No. 7, Sixty-fifth Congress. Last year's report on this hopeless project shows 2,667 snags were pulled out of the stream, 428 stumps and branches were jarred from their moorings, and 1,141 other obstructions were rescued by all the engineers' force that could be spared from the European battle front. After deducting logs and timber rafted and barged, and sand and gravel, the "commerce" reached 23,689 tons, of which over 8,000 tons was marked "Miscellaneous." What further need of expert testimony is necessary to show the public the value of this project than the appearance of local legislators from both ends of the Capitol before the committee who urged its adoption? By way of commerce comparison, one joint harbor in Wisconsin and Minnesota that has had about double the expenditure given this river, alone showed over 50,000,000 tons commerce in 1917 or over 2,000 times as much.

Many similar illustrations could be furnished showing the hopeless canalization waste that is now going on all over the country through the recommendations of engineers and easy acquiescence of Congress.

The Black Warrior River, which has been ostensibly completed at a cost of over $10,000,000, with the picturesque Tombigbee gets a new $200,000 project in this bill in addition to over $200,000 annual expenditure already imposed for many locks, repairs, and salaries. But why go over the same list of old and new hopeless projects that will eternally bob up as long as omnibus river and harbor bills lead to the doors of the Federal Treasury? Among the smaller items the Mispillion Creek cut-offs on the short, "tortuous" stream are again inserted. The new appropriation carries an amount equal to all that has been spent on this stream during past years, and this is another evidence of unretrenched expenditures included in the bill. Then there is Deep Creek, that is noted for its shallow waters; New Begun Creek, which turns up again in the pending bill; Scuppernong Creek; Jones Creek; Pagan Creek; Mattaponi Creek; Raccoon Creek; Wicomico Creek; the familiar Oklawaha Creek, and shallow waters with pretentious names too numerous to mention, all of which find resting place in the pending bill and carry a total obligation reaching $25,482,534, which will presumably be doubled within the near future through increased depth of the various projects that invariably follow.

THE OMNIBUS BILL STANDS OR FALLS WITHOUT AMENDMENT.

A brief statement of the situation is offered without further argument, for I do not believe it is incumbent upon any Member to make continued protests and strenuous contests against such bills, when such opposition is resented by many different Members of the House who are interested in some particular project contained in the bill. All items will presumably remain, because it is impossible to strike out one without the collapse of all. It may be equally useless to try to defeat the bill on its merits where so many interested localities demand its passage, and it is significant that this bill with 70 new projects is being urged through the short session by our political friends who expect to surrender the legislative reins in the near future. It may be that with a short lease of political life the majority party cares little for the record made here at this time, and that record could not be made without acquiescence of others outside of the majority party, but I am content to register such opposition as may seem necessary in giving what I believe to be a brief exposition of a few indefensible items in the bill. It contains many such items, in my judgment, based on statistics furnished us by the engineers, and such items could only pass Congress through the omnibus system.

Let me conclude by saying that with $45,000,000 now in the hands of the Army engineers on January, 1919, it is a reckless legislative act to put through during this short session an appropriation bill for rivers and harbors that carries more than double the amount reported by liberal engineers as absolutely necessary.

The public-buildings bill committee, according to the public press, again refused to recommend a public building pork barrel at this session, and it was defeated in the committee by a tie vote. I will not refer to the pending river and harbor bill as a "pork-barrel" measure. I will not wound the tender sensibilities of my colleagues on the committee by using terms which seem popular in other committees and other legislative bodies, but I do say that without the omnibus feature, which permits the inclusion of many wasteful waterway projects from Maine to Mexico and on many deserted rivers and rivulets, it would be impossible to put through many of the items that are found in the pending bill. It is part of wisdom and public duty to defeat the bill and pass a substitute containing a small lump sum for present needs. For the reasons given in the minority report, at the proper time I expect to offer for passage a substitute lump-sum appropriation of $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 in place of the wasteful bill before us, which can be defeated only by such legislative action.

There is nothing further I care to say to the committee at this time, except at the proper time I desire, when projects are presented, to make some brief statements regarding a few of the projects which ought to be defeated, in my judgment, and I shall be content with that program. Heretofore, at times, I have taken a great deal of the time of the committee, and sometimes, possibly, unsuccessfully, but I have endeavored to disclose the views which I had of such bills without regard to the locality or whether they struck my own community. Let me say that the committee will bear me out in the statement that when a $2,000,000 appropriation for a project which flows past my district 150 miles I asked to cut it in two in the committee, and it was cut down to $1,200,000, and on the floor of the House I asked to have it reduced $600,000. This year this bill carries only $250,000 for 700 miles of the greatest river on the continent, and yet the waterway project on the North Carolina coast, a hopeless inland waterway, carries $1,000,000, and the Missouri River carries $400,000 at this time.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BOOHER. In stating what had been appropriated for the Missouri River the gentleman says that the Engineer's report showed $16,973,440.24.

Mr. FREAR. For this 200-mile section of the river.

Mr. BOOHER. For this project——

Mr. FREAR. I meant to say that after we have appropriated all that money, before and since this project was adopted, we have only secured 11,700 tons of actual commerce last year.

Mr. BOOHER. Would it not be fair to state in this connection that before the project that is now being carried on to improve the Missouri River there was no deepening of the channel, or snagging and dredging; that it was just simply keeping up and revetting the banks?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman wants my judgment and that of men whom I have talked to who are familiar with the Missouri River, who have navigated that river in boats, and they say that all of this money that is being appropriated at this time is valueless for navigation purposes and will only help to serve for the revetment and redyking for private lands about 500,000 acres of land along the river. The best evidence of that fact, if the gentleman will permit, is this: After all these years during which we have spent this money, to-day not a single boat line is upon the river, and we have the best navigable facilities there we have ever had; and yet once that river was dotted with boats. On both sides of the river run railways, and you will never have a boat line until you compel the railways to permit it to live.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman ought to be fair enough in discussing the boat line to tell why the boat line has left the river from Kansas City to St. Louis.

Mr. FREAR. I will suggest one boat line was built there, and I understand they had hard work to exist, notwithstanding the stock of that boat line is owned by the men who get the benefit of it by shipping their own goods.

Mr. BOOHER. Now, the fact is those boats were commandeered by the Government and taken off the Missouri River at the beginning of the war and taken south on the Mississippi?

Mr. FREAR. Presumably true.

Mr. BOOHER. But was not a guaranty made between the War Department and the owners of the Kansas City line that the Kansas City line should be put back just as soon as possible at the close of the war?

Mr. FREAR. No; pardon me, if the gentleman will permit, I want to ask him a question there. Is it not a fact that when the question was put to that boat company—Mr. Dickey and others—that he refused to guarantee the boat line would be put back, and that point was raised in our committee, and that no boat line is in prospect?

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman now tells what took place before the committee. Mr. Dickey, when before the committee, said he did not know what would be done; that he had been in the city of Washington on a war board since the declaration of war, and that he had not been back and did not know what the directors had done.

Mr. FREAR. There has been no effort by the gentleman who is now talking, or anyone else, to give the committee or give the House of Representatives a guaranty that the Missouri River boat line would be reestablished there, and $400,000 is in this bill without any hope of use of the waterway.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman remember Mr. Dickey was before the committee, and when he was asked by the chairman of the committee what arrangement was made between the Government and the boat line he replied that the boat line——

Mr. FREAR. Oh, I accept just what the committee stated. I do not want to yield any further along this line. I want to be entirely courteous to the gentleman, because he is one of the most courteous members of the committee and has been very kind to me, but I do say this that if Kansas City was sincere in the idea of putting on a boat line they would have come with a guaranty. They have had all this time since the question was raised and they have not offered it. There has not been a single bushel of grain carried from Kansas City to St. Louis on this river, and that was the proposition originally for which the project was urged. All the traffic has come from St. Louis to help out Kansas City business men, who own the stock of the boat line, and yet they will not guarantee they will put that boat line back.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman remember that the hearings show that the chairman of the committee, when Mr. Dickey was before it, asked him the question if it was not a fact that when the Government took over this boat line the Kansas City company guaranteed that they would put the boat line back on the river before the Secretary of War would permit the boats to be taken off?

Mr. FREAR. I can not say as to that. I know this, that there is no guaranty; that is, any offer that is tangible.

Mr. BOOHER. I do not know what the directors of the boat line have ever done toward restoring the boats.

Mr. FREAR. They have had notice of this situation right along.

Mr. BOOHER. Do you think they could build a line of boats since the armistice was signed?

Mr. FREAR. But they could bring back that line of boats. And what is more, the boats there are unsuitable for navigation. Notwithstanding the stockholders and the men who get the benefit of the transportation freights, they could not make it profitable.

Mr. BOOHER. But all the people get the benefit?

Mr. FREAR. But they were the ones most interested in furnishing commerce because the line carried their own goods.

Mr. BOOHER. They were the business men of Kansas City.

Mr. FREAR. Yes. I do not question their enterprise, but I do question the judgment they have exercised.

Mr. BOOHER. Would the gentleman be willing, if the directors of this boat-line company went to work now toward getting their boats built and put them on the river, to not oppose the passage of the bill?

Mr. FREAR. I would say, Mr. Chairman, unless Kansas City, or unless the State of Missouri, after we have expended $16,000,000 on this 400-mile strip of river, is willing to do something toward contributing, unless the money is not spent entirely for the reclamation of land and for revetment of this 500,000 acres, we ought to stop immediately except to maintain the channel.

Mr. BOOHER. Then, why keep the channel open?

Mr. FREAR. Providing any man is willing to take the chance of putting boats on there as they existed before a dollar was spent by the Government. And I would still keep the channel open and in better condition than it ever was before.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman knows the reason why there are no boats on the river now?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly. I think I can agree with the gentleman very largely.

Mr. BOOHER. When they had boats on the river there was no railroad up and down on either side.

Mr. FREAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOOHER. To carry out the idea presented by the chairman of the committee on his presentation this morning, the very reason they have been driven off is because there has been no freight rate between the river and the railroad.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman will pardon me. I can not agree to that. The reason it has been driven off the Missouri, off of the Mississippi, off of the Arkansas, off the Cumberland, and off the Tennessee, and practically every river is that the railroads put down a rate that was not profitable to the railroads but drove the boats out of business.

Mr. BOOHER. Then the railroads are to blame?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly, largely. That is so, according to the judgment of the Army engineers and others who have studied the cause of waterway disuse.

Mr. BOOHER. Then the gentleman, or no other man that has opposed the rivers appropriation, has ever done anything to compel the railroads not to do those very things.

Mr. FREAR. How are you going to do it when the communities object to minimum rates? We will have that tested out when the bill comes up for the ownership of railroads. Then we will see who believes that the railroads ought to be returned to private hands, provided we want to maintain your water transportation.

Mr. BOOHER. And then the gentleman would not be opposed to the improvement of this river up to a standard, provided we had some railroad legislation?

Mr. FREAR. I would like to say that—as they do in Europe—I would want to have a waterway or public works committee carefully selected, of men who have a positive program to develop, and then I would want them to make a recommendation, and not have it come from gentlemen of this community or that community as it is to-day, asking that money be given to their community. That ought not to be the test. There ought to be an opportunity to pass upon this question without reference to the different communities affected, the utility and actual commercial use of the waterway.

Mr. BOOHER. Does the gentleman believe in water transportation, anyhow?

Mr. FREAR. I do not believe there can be any question of that. I have never opposed a reasonable appropriation for any harbor or anything that carries real water transportation. Here is $16,000,000 for this one project, and no traffic there. Does not the gentleman think the Government has done its full share and that it is time for the individuals or the State to take care of the situation?

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman know that there has been less than $7,000,000 appropriated on this project?

Mr. FREAR. I do not care about that particular project. I am speaking about a river that formerly had a fleet of boats on it before one dollar was spent and has none now.

Mr. BOOHER. You are speaking of a navigable river. In the last 20 years this river has been nonnavigable, and is full of sand bars and snags, and we are trying to confine it within its banks and keep it there.

Mr. FREAR. And incidentally reclaiming 500,000 acres of land that do not give one dollar to that work, according to the report of the engineers.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman know that the men who live in the Missouri River bottom do their own levee work?

Mr. FREAR. But you are going to charge the people in the Mississippi River bottom lands one-third of the cost. Why not charge the people of the Missouri River bottom lands one-third where they get the same comparative benefit?

Mr. BOOHER. Why does not the gentleman introduce a provision of that kind?

Mr. FREAR. There would be no use. Would the gentleman vote for it? Would the gentleman vote to compel his constituents to pay one-third, as is done in the lower Mississippi?

Mr. BOOHER. We can not do it under our statute.

Mr. FREAR. Will you introduce a resolution in your legislature to have it done?

Mr. BOOHER. I am not a member of the legislature.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, I can not follow the gentleman in his changing positions. I think the evidence of good faith is shown right there.

Mr. BOOHER. The people of the South do not appropriate money for the improvement of the river. They are appropriating money for levee work.

Mr. FREAR. That is all that the Missouri River money is spent for. Over 95 per cent of the money spent last year, according to the engineer's report, was for revetment and diking, and not a dollar of that was for the dredging of the river.

Mr. BOOHER. That was absolutely necessary for the preservation of the banks of the river and to keep the river within the banks.

Mr. FREAR. Why do you insist that they shall contribute one-half in the expense on western harbors? Why not say to the State of Missouri, "You must pay an equal amount, an amount equal to what the people elsewhere pay for such improvements"?

Mr. BOOHER. We appropriate money to take care of the river and harbor.

I think the people of the West have been liberal in that regard, and I think the people of the South have been very liberal. Before the adoption of this project the people always contributed to the revetment, and in most cases one-half the cost.

Mr. FREAR. Yes. The gentleman will pardon me. He is taking up my time. He can have his own time.

Mr. BOOHER. The people of the South have been very liberal in their contributions.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman is taking my time.

Mr. MADDEN. It is all right. It is very interesting.

Mr. BOOHER. The money raised by the people of the South is used for levee purposes.

Mr. FREAR. I know.

Mr. BOOHER. The Government does not levee.

Mr. FREAR. I agree to that. I have agreed to it twice.

Mr. BOOHER. Now, the Missouri River people have to do their own leveeing, and all they ask the Government to do is to keep the river cleared out after they have got the levees built.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I have only time to say that there are a number of projects in the bill that ought to be inquired into by the House, but from what appears to be the disposition of the House as to the items I do not hope that we can break into the bill. That can not be done in this body; but, nevertheless, I shall try to perform my duty as I see it, and I shall try to do that by giving a fair discussion to some of the items in the bill. I realize that this is an unpleasant duty. The members of the committee have been very generous to me in their treatment. They have been considerate and kind, and that is saying a good deal, because sometimes they have important projects involving a great deal at stake. But I do not see how a member of the committee can do his duty when put on a committee unless he expresses his convictions fairly and frankly.

Mr. MADDEN. I got the idea from the gentleman's remarks that it was a very pleasant duty that he is performing. At least it is a very valuable duty.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I feel constrained to make a few comments at this moment which come to my mind after listening to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. These comments will be critical of the gentleman. Every legislative body and every committee and every organization of any kind serving the public interests is benefited and helped by honest criticism. Criticism is valuable. All of us are human; we are all prone to err. None are infallible, and an honest mind, seeking the truth upon any public question, ought always to be willing to listen to criticism prompted by an honest mind with a desire to learn the truth. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors is nonpartisan in its activities. Since I have been a member of the committee I have never heard the question of politics raised. For eight years since I have been a member of the committee I have never heard sectionalism suggested in any way, pro or con, regarding any items in the bill. The gentleman from Wisconsin for several years has chosen to oppose river and harbor bills, and it has been his privilege and his right to do so. But, Mr. Chairman, a man who criticizes another, who criticizes the legislation or public acts of others, ought to be sure that he deals only with the truth, and that he criticizes honestly and fairly and justly. The criticism of the gentleman from Wisconsin—and I hesitate to say so, and I say so in no spirit of personal unfriendliness—did not confine itself to the truth. Mr. Chairman, the most dangerous falsehood is a half truth. You can take any legislative conclusion about a public proposition which is based upon various reports or sources of information, and you can cull from those detached statements and facts and then parade them as representing the consensus of truth about the matter, and yet the criticism may present a dangerous and wicked falsehood.

The gentleman from Wisconsin or any other Member can criticize items in this bill and do it as a man, do it truthfully and fairly and honestly and justly, and he owes it to himself and to the House to do so. But he ought to be very sure that he predicates his criticism on the eternal foundations of truth and fairness.

This bill is not infallible. No appropriation bill which is presented to this House is beyond the pale of criticism. It is not within the limits of a democracy to be perfect in its legislation.

The gentleman from Wisconsin refers to the activities of Members for the improvement of waterways and harbors in their States and districts and imputes selfish and sectional motives to them.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I can not be interrupted now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I refuse to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SMALL. I will give you an opportunity later. The gentleman has made an indictment against the membership of the committee and the membership of this House; against the membership of the committee because he says they have brought in a bill containing appropriations for projects and improvements not in the public interest, which are wasteful, and can not be justified as an activity of the House of Representatives. He says this "wicked" bill is going to pass the House, carrying with it the indictment that the membership of this House will support a bill not in the public interest, involving a waste of the public money. It is an unfair, unjust, unjustifiable criticism of the committee and of the House. I make this expression immediately after the gentleman has concluded. I do not make it unkindly; but the gentleman has not made a criticism of this river and harbor bill creditable to a man seeking only the truth and desirous of doing only justice and fairness. I do not impute the slightest moral turpitude to the gentleman from Wisconsin. I have studied the gentleman from Wisconsin, trying to ascertain something about his mental methods. The only way I can account for them—because I do not impute the slightest lack of moral conception to his make-up—is that for some reason or other on river and harbor legislation the gentleman has great difficulty in being intellectually honest. In all truth and fairness I commend that criticism to the gentleman, with the hope that in good time he will reform.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SMALL. In just a moment. During the Christmas holidays I went home to my district and took a ride out in the country. I came by the home of a reputable colored man. He is quite a huntsman, and I stopped and spoke to him and his family. I noticed a dog in the yard. I complimented the dog, and I said, "He must be a good coon dog." "Oh," he said, "that dog is worthless." I said, "How about possum?" "No good at all." I said, "How about rabbit?" "Why," he said, "it takes him 10 minutes to run a mile. He never can catch a rabbit." I said, "What is he good for?" He said, "He is a great barker. He used to frighten the folks in this neighborhood by barking all the time, but now nobody is afeared of him, and, d—n him, I am going to kill him." [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I will.

Mr. FREAR. That is the proper place to yield. I will ask the gentleman if he remembers, in 1916, how strenuously he supported that year's river and harbor bill, how he declared it was in every respect good, and could stand any criticism, and how at the same time he criticized me very severely, and yet how 133 Members of the House voted against the bill and 20 pairs were recorded against the bill, and when it went over to the Senate men, who like myself were, possibly from the gentleman's standpoint, intellectually dishonest, took the same position that I did and as they have for several years? Is it not true that the gentleman himself, due to these long years of training, believing that the idea is primarily to get something for the community, forgets that there is another viewpoint, that of the men all over the country who pay the taxes and who object to giving $1,000,000 in this bill to waterways in North Carolina, the Scuppernong, and Beaufort, and other projects down there unless they can see some traffic to justify them and some necessity for them? Is that intellectual dishonesty? Is that barking? If so, let me say to the gentleman from North Carolina, who so willingly criticizes me——

Mr. SMALL. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. FREAR. That the gentleman at the same time is likely to make mistakes, is he not?

Mr. SMALL. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. FREAR. The question is, Is not the gentleman liable to make some mistakes of judgment in this particular case?

Mr. SMALL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FREAR. The other was simply a prelude to the question.

Mr. SMALL. But the gentleman is wrong as usual in his citation. It was not the 1916 bill of which the present chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors challenged criticism. It was the bill which was approved August 8, 1917, and I recall to the membership of the House that there was not one Member of the House who succeeded in effectually assailing or criticizing an item in the 1917 bill.

Mr. FREAR. That was the last bill?

Mr. SMALL. Oh, no; the last bill was passed in June, 1918.

Mr. FREAR. That was the bill that I supported. Every other bill has been attacked, and the votes will show it. Does the gentleman say that the bill before the last one did not have more than 130 votes against it?

Mr. SMALL. I forget the number.

Mr. FREAR. I can cite the gentleman to the vote. Does the gentleman claim that those Members who voted against that bill were intellectually dishonest?

Mr. SMALL. I have never said that. The gentleman misquotes me.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman attacks me and accuses me of being intellectually dishonest because I advocated the defeat of that bill.

Mr. SMALL. Is not the gentleman trying to get in good company without being able to qualify?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman is in as good company as the chairman of the committee, but unfortunately does not see things the same as I do, and that, of course, is his privilege as a Member of Congress.

Mr. SMALL. So it is the gentleman's privilege. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if I may divert the attention of the House for a few moments from the subject which has been under discussion, I desire to call attention to the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and if I can get through with that quickly enough I desire then to call attention to a matter in connection with discharges from the Army.

I have received almost innumerable letters from all the country complaining about the payments of allotments by the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the payment of allotments made by soldiers out of their monthly pay. Here, for instance, is one letter written by the chairman of the local board for the county of Minnehaha, S. Dak.:

[War Department, local board for the county of Minnehaha, State of South Dakota.]

SIOUX FALLS, S. DAK.,
December 17, 1918.

Congressman MANN, of Illinois,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following are a few instances of nearly a hundred cases of similar kind that have come to the knowledge of the board. It appears to this board that the way these allotments have been handled is a disgrace to the American Nation, the memory of which will remain with the returned soldier as long as he lives.

A lady came into the board office carrying two children, ages 2 and 4 years. She asked the board to obtain her allotments and allowance for her, stating that her husband had been in the Army six months and she had received one check only from the War Risk Insurance Bureau. She had a few hens, and had traded a dozen eggs that day for a bottle of milk and a loaf of bread, and that was all they had to eat. Her children were both sick; one of the children had spasm the night before. She thought it would die, but did not have enough money to notify a physician.

The board, out of their own pockets, furnished her with some money to buy food and medicine, and sent her to a physician who prescribed free of charge. Her case was then referred to the Red Cross, and afterwards she was taken care of.

Another woman appeared before the board with four small children. Her husband had felt it his duty to enlist in the Army. He had been gone since last May. In July she had received one allotment, and had received no more up to the present time. Her husband had made arrangements so that with her allotment and with the money he left her, she would be able to support herself without any assistance.

Owing to the fact that her allotments did not come she had reached the point where she could not furnish food for her children or fuel to keep them warm, so she asked the board if we could not hasten her allotment. Her case was then turned over to the Red Cross and they furnished her support.

Another instance: A mother has three sons in the service and two small children. Each of her boys is making an allotment to her. She received one allotment of $25 several months ago and has never received another one. When she reported she was without coal, her children were suffering from the cold, both from lack of fuel and the lack of proper winter clothing. The Red Cross has furnished her with the necessities of life, awaiting the action of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau.

In another case the woman came to us, telling us that her husband had been in the war for months; that they had been able to accumulate sufficient furniture to make a home; that she had been obliged to go to a hospital for an operation. Due to this she was unable to work. Due to the operation at the hospital she would have to wear a cast for a year or more; so she had been obliged to eat up her furniture, until she had eaten up all except the bed, a small oil stove, and a few cheap dishes. When she reached the point where she had no more furniture she applied to the local board to see if they could not get her allotment for her.

These are a few cases which are typical of about one hundred cases which we have had brought to our attention in this county.

Yours, truly,

D. L. MCKINNEY,
Chairman Local Board, Minnehaha County.

You know there are local boards all over the Union. The chairman of this local board cites three or four cases out of nearly a hundred cases in that one county under that one local board.

Here is another letter:

2605 FOURTEENTH STREET NW.,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1918.

Congressman MANN.

MY DEAR SIR: I note the talk in Congress of soldiers' pay and allotments.

Here is a case in our own family: Pvt. William A. Mason, Company E, Three hundred and eighth United States Infantry, American Expeditionary Forces, has been abroad nearly a year. He made an allotment to his mother-in-law, a poor woman, to take care of his baby not yet a year old. His wife died at its birth. This mother has never received a cent of the allotment, and we have been helping to take care of her and the baby, as she is very poor. I have another similar case, but have mislaid his name and address. Something should be done about this case. I know of several others.

Very sincerely,

MRS. JEWEL KENNEY.

That letter is from the mother of the widow of former Representative Brown, of West Virginia.

Here is another case:

DECEMBER 14, 1918.

Congressman MANN.

MY DEAR SIR: The inclosed is a copy of a postal card I received in August. My son had made a "home allowance" and was on his way to France when this came. How could he then attend to it? The Red Cross rooms here are full of people daily who want information about money due them which they don't get.

Yours, truly,

F. A. M. BURRELL.

This is the notice:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

You will no longer receive checks from this bureau for the voluntary allotment which the bureau has previously sent you; but if the enlisted man, who has already been notified of this discontinuance, desires to continue this allotment, he will do so through the "Quartermaster General's Office, Washington, D. C.," if he is enlisted in the Army; the "Navy Allotment Office, Washington, D. C.," if he is enlisted in the Navy; the "Paymaster, United States Marine Corps Headquarters, Washington, D. C.," if he is enlisted in the Marine Corps, or the "Captain Commandant, Washington, D. C.," if he is enlisted in the Coast Guard.

If you correspond further in regard to this matter you should write to the enlisted man or to the office mentioned above, according to the service in which he is enlisted.

Do not write the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, as it no longer has charge of this particular case.

C. F. NESBIT, Commissioner.

It was a very natural inquiry to make where a soldier had signed his allotment, then after he had been sent to France and his parents notified that they could not receive the allotment unless the soldier signed a new allotment, with the mail in the condition it was going to the soldier! An appreciative Government is exemplified by these two departments.

Here is another case:

Hon. J. R. MANN,
Member of Congress, Second District of Illinois,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MANN: On the evening of March 12, 1918, my son Lawrence Jencks, in company with 500 other soldiers, left Chicago, Ill., on a special train for Kelly Field, South San Antonio, Tex. His address while there was Lawrence Jencks, First Training Brigade, Line 367, Section G, Kelly Field No. 1, South San Antonio, Tex. While there I received a letter from him stating that on April 5, 1918, he had applied for an allowance of $15 per month to be deducted from his monthly earnings and paid to me.

He was sent "oversea," arriving in France the first part of July, 1918. His address now is Pvt. Lawrence Jencks, 115 Field Hospital, One hundred and fourth Sanitary Training, Twenty-ninth Division, American Expeditionary Forces, American Post Office 765. He informs that $15 has been deducted from his monthly pay since April 1, 1918, and I have not received one cent of this voluntary allowance made by him. This money has been held up somewhere. He informed me by letter that September 10, 1918, the paper was again prepared in France and sent to Washington, D. C., stating that the first paper was either improperly filled out or it was claimed to be lost. His number is 1148514.

He has been over nine months in the service, of which time he has been in France over five months and part of the time in actual service on the firing line. The world's war has been fought and (thank God) won by the allies. Old empires have been torn asunder. New kingdoms have been formed, the Kaiser's crown is now waiting for the melting pot, great ships have been built and launched, billions of dollars have been spent, great enterprises have transacted enormous amounts of business, yet the War Risk Insurance Bureau fails to give me an accounting of where this soldier's dearly earned $15 each month deduction is and why it is not sent to me as requested by the one who earns it.

They claim the soldier failed to make any allowance to me nor any other person. If that is true, then why do they deduct $15 each month and not give an accounting of it to him?

I remain, very truly, yours, JOHN W. JENCKS.

They knew enough about it to deduct the amount from his pay, but not enough about it to pay it to his mother.

Here is another one:

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
Republican Leader of the House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My son made me an allotment in September, 1917. I received one month only, which I was obliged to send back to the soldier because he was not getting any salary.

My son was discharged June 5, 1918, and sent home sick, after serving nine months at Camp Logan, Tex.

September 5 he was commanded to send back the uniform he had worn home (which was in rags and not worth 50 cents) under penalty of having kept Government property. Of course I returned it at once.

Soon after he returned, and I fully understood military rules and regulations, I was instructed to apply at the War Risk Insurance Bureau, operating at 1307 Stock Exchange Building, Chicago, and was informed by Mr. McGuire I would receive a check from Washington in a very few days for the amount of allotment.

That was last June, nine months after he enlisted, which makes over a year and three months, and still nothing; their latest instructions are that the case is closed so far as that office is concerned, and now I must apply to his commanding officer or the Paymaster General of the United States Army. I have written the Paymaster General at Washington, but no reply. What do you think of such treatment, and how many more who are worse off than we, no doubt, are receiving the same treatment? This may cause trouble when the boys are all demobilized. What would you advise further in my case?

Thanking you in advance for any interest you may take in our behalf,

Very respectfully, yours,

Mrs. NELLIE HENNESSEY,
3847 Osgood Street, Chicago, Ill. (first apartment).

Very enterprising in requiring him to return a worn-out uniform, a request that was promptly complied with, but not very enterprising when it came to paying the mother of the boy returned home sick the compensation which Congress had provided she should receive.

Here is another letter which came to me. I do not guarantee the truthfulness of the statements which are made in it, although I have received information outside of the letter from what I may say were responsible parties, making similar statements:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 14, 1918.

REPUBLICAN FLOOR LEADER MANN: You were correct in your statement on the floor of the House relative to the War Risk Bureau. If you wish to uncover a scandal, would suggest that an inquiry be made regarding the present method of "investigating" compensation, allotment, and allowance cases. The investigation has now been placed in the hands of the Hopper-Holmes (Inc.), New York City, who have agents throughout the United States. These agents receive a fee of $1 for each case "investigated," and their investigation leaves the family of the soldier helpless, for if in their report they suggest a cut-off the family is cut off from all allowance. This is a money-making scheme. The investigation has gradually been taken from the hands of prominent citizens in the different localities and preference is given to these agents. In some cities the Hopper-Holmes Co. make from $400 to $500 per week. It is most interesting to note that John King, vice president of the Hopper-Holmes Co., has been appointed Deputy Commissioner of the War Risk Bureau. He can retire a millionaire. It is also interesting to note that the compensation cases are also to be placed in the hands of these agents. It will be months before the soldiers will receive one cent for injuries received. The clique who expect to get rich from the investigation end of the bureau are King; his man Friday, Effner, "efficiency director"; and Jones, superintendent of agencies.

Thousands and thousands of soldiers' families would have starved were it not for the Red Cross—ask the Red Cross regarding this. The Red Cross knows, as well as the employees of the Investigating Bureau of the War Risk, the deplorable conditions now existing. The War Risk Bureau started out right, but has ended wrong. Mr. Eugene T. Lies, superintendent of the United Charities, Chicago, well versed in family needs, secured a competent corps of social investigators, but they were never appointed, as political debts had to be paid, and political hacks secured appointments as field investigators. Mr. Lies resigned in disgust. He was recommended by the Red Cross. The scheme was later concocted to place the work into the hands of the Hopper-Holmes Co., and thousands and thousands of cases were shelved awaiting an elaborate scheme of mail investigations by the Hopper-Holmes agents. As a consequence thousands of families are in need, allotments have been cut off unjustly, and there are nearly 600,000 compensation cases awaiting investigation by the Hopper-Holmes Co. while the above heads haggle over the wording of the inquiry blanks. Had competent field investigators been appointed months ago—a large force, irrespective of political pull—and sent out throughout the country the suffering would have been alleviated. An elaborate system of mail investigation by the Hopper-Holmes Co. and a few local men in the rural sections is now in the hands of the above "heads" and it will be months before the soldiers will receive a penny. In the meantime they are cut off of the $30 pay and discharged on the community to become beggars.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand that there is a reference in that letter to official organizations as formed under the law?

Mr. MANN. It is about the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is there any person connected with the War Insurance Bureau, any agent or person mentioned in the letter?

Mr. MANN. It is so stated here. The statement is made here, I have not verified it—"John King, vice president of the Hopper-Holmes Co., has been appointed deputy commissioner of the War Risk Bureau." That statement was made to me the other day by a Member of the House, who said that he knew it.

Mr. ELSTON. If the gentleman will yield I would like to corroborate his statement. On my recent visit to California I received in my law office there a postal card from what I believe to be the War Risk Insurance Bureau—I am not so sure about that—in which the name of some applicant for allotment was noted and a request to investigate it was made, and an offer of $1 for investigation. It was returned by me with the statement that I could not undertake it. Later on two or three more postal cards arrived in the office, and I gave instructions to return them. I mention that to show that investigation of that kind was going on through some agency and not through official sources.

Mr. MANN. I thank the gentleman. I have another letter here.

UNITED STATES GENERAL HOSPITAL NO. 30,
Plattsburg, N. Y., December 11, 1918.

Representative MANN, of Illinois:

We soldiers who have been invalided home from France certainly do appreciate your earnest efforts to produce for us our long overdue back pay. This is the fifth month since I have received any pay but $20 casual, and many of the boys are a great deal worse off than I am, for some of them have from 8 to 10 months' pay coming to them. Have been on this side since October 24th, and that time intervening seems to me plenty to straighten out records and pay me what is due.

This is from a Chicago soldier.

Mr. SIEGEL. I want to say to the gentleman that I had a case last week where the soldier had received nothing for 11 months.

Mr. MANN. Every Member of the House has many of these cases. I am mentioning these, for I want to put them in the RECORD.

Here is a letter where the allowance had been made by the Government and the party was notified that it was taken away:

CHICAGO, ILL., December 26, 1918.

Mr. JAMES R. MANN,
Member of Congress, Second District of Illinois.

DEAR SIR: I beg a few moments of your most valuable time to explain a situation which has arisen which I deem is more than unfair and am in great hopes that you may be able to adjust this matter for me.

My son, Clarence Raymond Ballard, Seventy-sixth Field Artillery, Battery B, at present in the base hospital at Vichy, France, joined the colors as a volunteer in April, 1917, and in due course landed in France and fought in all the prominent battles in which our boys so gallantly gave their all for Old Glory, finally being gassed severely.

Now, I am a hard-working man, and my petty weekly income of $25 supports myself and ailing wife, who is continually under a physician's care and to which I can prove.

Being 54 years of age, and while we have about $500 in bank, which is all we have left of $1,000 which my wife received from an accident, you can easily see how it keeps me striving to pay doctor bills and live.

The point of my subject is this: I can't pay back this money that we are requested to do; I don't think it is at all right. We are in need. And, again, my boy (in a letter received to-day) says he hasn't been paid in six months. And then if his lungs are affected we want to help him; we must.

On the original papers we signed for this allotment the papers said the allotment to us was O. K. Now, about four weeks ago, along comes another paper asking how much we had in bank, and I did have about $700 then. It also asked if our boy was the sole support. I answered, "No; but he helped us wonderfully."

Can you picture my situation, Mr. MANN, with an invalid wife, me making $25 a week, our allotment stopped, and a wounded hero about to return, with Uncle Sam owing him six months' pay and threatening not to pay him unless we return this blood money?

I don't think this is justice to me or my boy. Do you?

I trust I am not boring you with my trouble, but my daughter suggested me to write to you, as you was a great admirer of her deceased husband, Mr. William Van Bergen, who used to live in Parkside.

Hoping you may enlighten me with fair news, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

MARK BALLARD,
5147 Lake Park Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

This is the notice inclosed:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, December 16, 1918.

Mr. MARK BALLARD,
5147 Lake Park Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

SIR: You are advised that the award of $17.50 per month—$7.50 allotment, $10 allowance—effective December 1, 1917, granted you on the application of the above-named enlisted man, has been revised, giving you $7.50 per month, $7.50 allotment, $——— allowance, effective the same date.

Checks totaling $192.50 for the period December 1, 1917, to October 31, 1918, were issued to you under the original award. This resulted in an overpayment of $110 on October 31. After deducting $7.50, the amount due you for November, your account shows a balance of $102.50 due the United States on November 30.

This amount should be refunded by money order or draft drawn to the order of the Treasurer of the United States and mailed to the office of receipts and disbursements, Bureau of War Risk Insurance, Washington, D. C., with this letter or a copy thereof.

The regular remittance of $7.50 per month will then begin with the December payment, a check for which will be issued in January, 1919.

Respectfully,

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
DEPUTY COMMISSIONER—ACCOUNTS,
By H. S. A.

In this case the man was asked, I suppose properly, whether he had any money in bank, and he replied that he had $700. His wife had recently met with an accident for which some one was responsible, and she had been paid $1,000 in settlement of the claim on account of the accident, but she was required to be under the care of a physician, and because he had the $700 in bank, which was rapidly going out for physician's fees, the allowance which had been made to him was taken away. As his son is soon expected home, in the hope of getting his health back, it does seem rather hard not only to take the allowance away from him ,but then hold up the allotment of the soldier's pay until the allowance has been paid back.

Here is another letter, which is written at Camp Grant, dated December 22, 1918:

Hon. JAMES R. MANN.

SIR: I am taking the liberty of addressing you a letter, knowing that you have interested yourself in the soldier and his welfare. I was blown up by a high-explosive shell at Fismes, on the Vesle River, at the battle of the Marne, August 12. I brought with me from Orleans, France, a supplementary service record, showing that I had been paid July 2 to this day the sum of $20. I have been discharged from the hospital, returned to duty, and shipped to this camp without any records or papers. Men who have not been out of the country are being discharged by the hundreds daily.

Personally I have my position in the Cook County Board of Review waiting for me and would like to get out and at it. We are laying here doing nothing but eating and laying around, and there is no reason why we should not get a supplementary discharge until our papers are located and saved the trouble of laying here for possibly months, and I appeal to you, in behalf of my comrades and myself, to see what you can do in our behalf.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What does he mean by a "supplementary discharge"?

Mr. MANN. He means that the Government lost his papers while he was in the hospital, and because the Government lost his papers while he was in the hospital they now propose to hold him up until the Government finds the papers, and he means that they might give him supplementary papers enough to discharge him. Good God! He is there in the Army an enlisted man, and the stupid men up here in charge of the War Department who lost his papers propose to keep him idle and useless at Camp Grant until, through some long-winded process, they find where the papers are. Nothing could be more silly. Here they refuse to pay these men or fail to pay them the money that is due to them while they are in France or in the Army here. Our Government refuses or neglects to pay the allotments to the dependent parents. They lose the records of the men and then refuse to let them go back to their private work, where they have positions waiting for them, because the stupidity or carelessness of somebody connected with the Government service somewhere has caused the mislaying of some papers.

Here is another case dated December 11, 1918, a letter addressed to me at Washington:

I desire to ask whether it will be possible for you to do me the great favor of obtaining the immediate release by furlough or honorable discharge of Pvt. Hugo M. Goodman, Sixtieth Infantry, Headquarters Company, Signal Platoon, American Expeditionary Forces. If this is to be done at all, it must be done by cable at once. I personally will pay for the cabling and other expenses attached to same.

The boy's mother is gradually passing away from cancer, and the boy is her only son, and she is constantly craving for him. Please advise by wire at my expense if any other method can be quickly pursued to obtain his immediate release.

Thanking you in advance, I am,

Yours, truly,

D. HIRSCH (the soldier's uncle).

P. S.—If necessary, I will also pay his voyage expense.

Mr. Chairman, although I knew the War Department had no heart, and they had issued notice that they would consider no applications, personal, for discharge, I asked the War Department if they could not, in view of the fact that the war was over and the boy had done his service, and that his mother was dying from cancer and wanted to see her boy again—if the Government could not have the heart to let him out. And here is the cold-blooded answer I get from Gen. Harris, The Adjutant General:

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In response to your communication of December 21, 1918, relative to the discharge from the Army of Pvt. Hugo M. Goodman, Sixtieth Infantry, Headquarter's Company, Signal Platoon, American Expeditionary Forces, I beg to advise you as follows:

With respect to soldiers now overseas no definite policy with regard to their return to their home station has been formulated. When a state of order has been restored overseas and the military situation has improved to such an extent as to justify the withdrawal of American troops, the War Department will adopt the most effective and speedy means to hasten the return of all soldiers to the United States at the earliest practicable date, and the policy to be adopted in connection therewith will be published for the benefit of all concerned. Until then it will be impracticable to entertain requests for the discharge or return to the United States of individual soldiers.

Regretting that I am unable to advise you more favorably, I remain,

Very respectfully,

P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

Mr. GARNER. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. MANN. December 27, 1918.

Mr. GORDON rose.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have only a minute left. What is the matter? First, the War Department neglects to pay the soldiers, it neglects to pay the allotments, it loses the papers of the soldier, and then, when asked if it could not possibly, under the most distressing circumstances, let a man out of the Army who is no longer needed, we have the reply that they have not got the time to think about it—to go to the dickens! It is the most impertinent method and assumption that I know of in the Government service. They deserve a lashing, and every Member here ought to give it to them. Something is the matter. I do not know whether it is the Regular Army or some one connected with the Secretary's office, but I do know that these men, who risk their lives abroad, and their families want at home, who are willing to remain on the fighting line as long as may be necessary, ought to be treated with some sort of common decency. [Applause.]

If they would spend more time up there at the War Department doing things, instead of telling people that they could not do them, they would accomplish a great deal more than is being accomplished now. About half of these departments are putting in their time finding reasons for not doing something. Give me the man in any branch of the Government who finds a way to do something, instead of occupying his time in finding a way not to do it. Secretary Baker ought to take some of these men up there and wring their necks until they find out how to work. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I address myself to the two propositions pending before Congress having for their purpose doing something to alleviate the condition of discharged soldiers. I regard those measures as being wholly inadequate, outrageously inadequate, and I feel that the attention of the House and the country ought to be called to them. One of the measures has already been reported favorably to the House by the Committee on Military Affairs and is now awaiting action. The other is found in a Senate amendment to the revenue bill. The substance of each of them is to give to the men who are discharged a niggardly one month's pay as a gratuity, as a reward for the services which they have performed.

The war is over. We must now turn our attention from the problems of war to those of peace and reconstruction. The problem of war was simple; it was merely how to exert the greatest possible force. The problems of peace and reconstruction are complex and so difficult that they challenge the highest statesmanship.

It is now upon us to consider how we may restore our country and make good its awful losses in spiritual and economic values, in human life and suffering, and in lowered standards of liberty, freedom of speech, and action.

The first and most pressing need is to take care of our discharged soldiers, to restore them to civilian employment, and to make good, in some small way, the financial injury which they have sustained. It is now nearly 60 days since the armistice was signed; 4,000,000 men are to be returned to civil life; already over 500,000 have been discharged; yet no adequate plans to care for them have been brought forward. Statesmanship seems indifferent. Amazing as it may seem, these discharged soldiers are being sent to their homes penniless and with no provision for their future welfare. Something must be done at once.

Such measures as have been proposed are pitifully inadequate. The War Department seems content with a proposal to give each discharged soldier a month's pay. This proposal comes first to the House in a Senate rider amendment to the revenue bill, as follows:

That all officers and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps serving the United States in the war against Germany who have been honorably discharged from the service since November 11, 1918, or who may hereafter be honorably discharged, shall be paid one month's salary in addition to the regular pay heretofore authorized.

The revenue bill including that amendment has been submitted to the committee of conference between the two bodies, and I venture the prediction that it will not become a law inside of 30 days, perhaps for 60 days, and there are Members who have regretfully come to the conclusion it may not become a law at all. While it is being considered by the conference committee, unless in the meantime the House shall pass some measure for the relief of the soldiers, they will be sent back home with nothing in their pockets except their little final pay, not enough to buy a second-hand suit of civilian clothes—back home to the old folks jobless, having made a great sacrifice for their country. In spite of this situation, this danger that the American people may show themselves unappreciative in such an emergency, to this time we, the Representatives of the people in Congress, have done nothing and will do nothing unless we act on this bill.

The subject also comes up in the House in H. R. 13247, a bill favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, in which it is proposed—

That every officer, Army field clerk, member of the Army Nurse Corps, and enlisted man who was serving in the Army of the United States on November 11, 1918, shall be paid a gratuity equal to one month's pay at the rate which his grade and length of service on that date entitled him. Payment of this gratuity shall be made to officers, field clerks, members of the Army Nurse Corps, and enlisted men of the Regular Army as soon after the approval of this act as practicable, and to all others entitled to it upon their honorable discharge.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not the gentleman believe the trouble is we are trying to legislate to-day by riders?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think that is a serious trouble. But I will say this—that by rider or otherwise immediate action should be taken; and if it can only be had by the rider, let us have the rider.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not the gentleman think we will gain time by considering these different propositions on their merits and should put the revenue bill through on its merits?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not know, but it is better to do it by a rider than not at all.

The committee's report shows that this bill was sent down from the War Department. Presumably it came from the General Staff, for true to precedent it is liberal toward the officer class and niggardly toward the enlisted man. It gives to each officer and soldier a gratuity of one month's pay, which runs down the scale from the general, who would receive $833, to the humble private in the ranks, who will receive only $30. That ornament to Washington society, the swivel-chair major, will get $250, while the worn private who bared his breast in the Argonne will not get enough out of the bill to buy him a suit of civilian clothes. Among officers there is not only discrimination on account of rank but on the basis of "grade and length of service." There is discrimination among enlisted men based upon each petty stripe and step in the service. Officers and men who were overseas when the armistice was signed, although they never saw the battle line, are preferred over their equally worthy fellow soldiers at home. Even field clerks, who are civilians, will get $100, while the fighting private will get only $30. In short, the bill is a mass of arbitrary and unjust discriminations.

I can not imagine what principle is back of this discriminatory bill unless it be that its authors are trying to follow the text, "For he that hath to him shall be given, and to him that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath." The bill is an insult to the private soldiers who have served their country. [Applause.] It were better to give them nothing at all than to discriminate against them in favor of their officers. A private soldier would be justified in casting back into the face of Congress the beggarly pittance offered him, as an affront to his pride and sense of justice. Congress will not win gratitude by such a measure. To the contrary, it will be received with contempt and in disgust.

A REPUDIATED PRINCIPLE.

Another measure of similarly discriminatory nature came before the House in the compensation—pension—bill in October, 1917. It was then proposed to compensate disabled officers and soldiers and the families of those who might lose their lives, upon the basis of the rate of pay they received. This vicious principle was repudiated by the House by a vote of 139 to 3. I had hoped that such a vote would show so clearly the sentiment of the House that no bill carrying this vicious principle would again be presented. But at the first opportunity up comes this bill. It seems that armies are built on lines of caste and inequality, and those in authority can not be made to comprehend that the American Army as now constituted is an army of equals and must be dealt with according to principles of justice and democracy. The General Staff must get out of its mind the conception of the soldier as a professional and comprehend once for all that ours is an Army of American citizens who have left civil pursuits not from choice but of necessity to give their services in defense of our country. The caste system is out of place in such an army. The social gulf between officer and man has no real existence. The idea that the pay that officers and men receive while in service is the fair measure of the Republic's debt of gratitude is false to its roots and must not be countenanced nor respected. The highest officer has made no greater sacrifice than the humblest soldier. He has no greater claim upon the Nation's gratitude. If a gratuity is to be given, it must be equal and given to all alike, else it would be an insult to our principles.

The amount which would be required to carry out the provisions of this bill is estimated at about $154,000,000, of which the officers will receive $38,500,000 and the enlisted men will receive about $113,000,000. This includes not only noncommissioned officers, who receive from $36 to $75, but the vast mass of privates, who will get only the flat sum of $30. If the same appropriation was equally divided among officers and men each would get about $47 as his share. This would be a mere trifle, but at least could be defended on the ground that an equal amount was given to all.

NO BASIS FOR DISCRIMINATION.

Upon what theory this bill proposes to discriminate in favor of officers and against enlisted men I can not understand. The officer has had the best of it all along the line, the best clothing and food, the most leisure, the greater opportunity to distinguish himself, more chance to get his name mentioned in the dispatches, and for promotions, social pleasure, and all that goes with military rank. The sweating and the digging, the night vigils, the cold, the exposure—this has been the lot of the private. The hardships of actual battle, of course, are fairly equal, and I would not to a hair's weight take away the credit that is due our officers for their splendid service, but in camp life—and always nine-tenths of service must be in camp—the officer has a fairly acceptable time of it. But the private bears the drudgery, monotony, and hardship—even when off duty he is not at ease, but must salute, and salute, and salute every little officer that he chances on. From the standpoint of a former soldier I want to say that the hardest thing of a soldier's life to endure is the sense of his social inferiority. I would rather be a major general on a private's pay than a private on a major general's pay.

The bill can not be defended on the theory that the earning capacity of the officer class and enlisted men was different in civil life. A multitude of officers were little better than boys when they went to the training schools. Many were just out of college and had no earning capacity. Many had never earned a dollar in their lives. The enlisted men, as a rule, are more mature. Many were taken from good jobs and paying positions. Many were skilled workmen or good farmers. So that in the vast majority of cases the enlisted man before entering the service had a greater earning capacity than the boy who became a second lieutenant and perhaps has now been advanced to captain.

Again, this bill gives the preference to the least needy class—the officers. They as a rule belong to the professions or are men of education and training, who will have the least trouble making a living after they are discharged. Many of them have relatives and friends of wealth and influence who will help them into paying positions. Many of them have technical training and their jobs are being held for them. On the other hand, a multitude of privates are unskilled or are mechanics, whose jobs at home have long since been filled and who have no rich or influential fathers to hold them up while they hunt work. They will be compelled to get jobs at once upon being discharged. They will have to take whatever kind of work they can get and be self-supporting from the start. They especially need help so as to relieve them of having to plead for work or to scramble for the job of some other worker. Officers, especially of higher rank, receive good pay. Their necessary expenses are not large, and many have been able to lay aside tidy sums out of their pay. The private has saved nothing—he has no reserves.

THE PROBLEM OF THE HOUR.

The discharged soldier needs help, and needs it now. It is the most pressing problem of the hour, and calls for immediate attention. Already 30,000 a day are being released, and soon the number will greatly increase. Realizing the urgency of the situation, on December 5, 1918, I introduced the following bill:

A bill (H. R. 13255) for the relief of discharged soldiers and sailors.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be paid to each honorably discharged enlisted man and officer of the Army and Navy who may have served not less than 60 days between April 6, 1917, and January 1, 1919, the sum of $180 in six equal monthly payments as a gratuity, the first of such payments to be made at the time of his discharge or within 30 days after the approval of this act where such enlisted man or officer has been heretofore discharged, payments to discharged soldiers to be made under the direction of the Secretary of War and to discharged men or officers of the Navy under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy; Provided, That a total of not exceeding $180 shall be paid to any discharged soldier or sailor irrespective of the number of times discharged.

SEC. 2. That all and such sums as shall be necessary to make the said payments be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

This bill is now before the Committee on Military Affairs. I could hardly expect them to report my bill in preference to the bill which has been sent down to them from the General Staff.

The initiative of Congress is not yet sufficiently restored to admit of that, I think.

Mr. McKENZIE. I have listened to the gentleman's speech with a great deal of sympathy, and I think the gentleman has a pretty good idea about it, but I would like to ask how he comes to determine upon $180; by what process of reasoning did the gentleman arrive at the fact that he thinks we ought to pay $180?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not stick to $180. I made it as much as I thought Congress would agree to, and as little as I thought it would be decent to give. I would give more. I fixed it at $30 a month for six months, which is the pay that a private soldier gets, intending to give discharged soldiers six months in which to hunt jobs. The idea was to give them an amount which would pay for some sort of board for six months; that is what I had in my mind.

Mr. GORDON. I was just going to ask this in reference to what the gentleman stated. As I understand, my colleague bases it upon six months' pay for a private soldier, making them all of equal amount?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Putting all upon an equality.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know how much that will amount to?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; it will amount to less than $600,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Does it make any difference what it amounts to if it is the right thing to do?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It might make some difference to the taxpayers; but I will say to the gentleman from Texas that if we are to waste any money raised for the running of this war let us waste it on these boys who have gone into the war. [Applause.]

My bill would treat officers and men alike, and give to each $30 a month for six months after discharge. This, of course, is inadequate, but at least it is fair to all and will hold the soldier up until he is able to become self-supporting.

The necessity for relief for the discharged soldiers is universally recognized. Measures for that purpose are being adopted by many of the important countries of the world. Great Britain gives each discharged soldier one month's pay and rations, family allowances for one month, and one year's insurance against unemployment. I am informed that Italy gives a gratuity of from one to six months' pay, depending on length of service. France has appropriated a billion and a half francs to be divided among her discharged soldiers. Canada proposes to teach her discharged soldiers farming where they desire it and to place them on farms and to give them a start with a loan up to $2,500. Australia has appropriated $200,000,000 and, as I am informed, proposes to lend as much as $2,000 to start a soldier off as a farmer. In the United States vague plans for utilizing waste lands for soldiers have been mentioned, but nothing definite or adequate has been proposed. The proposal of the department's bill to give a gratuity of only one month's pay is the least adequate that has been offered by any country. In great America, richest and strongest of them all, it is proposed to do the least of all. It would be a shame to be so niggardly.

The subject of giving help to discharged soldiers has two sides—its sentimental side and the side of justice and sound common sense. As a mere testimonial of the Nation's gratitude to those who have defended American honor in the war a liberal gift to each discharged man would be proper. Every American is thrilled with pride by the splendid quality of our troops, by their patriotism, courage, and self-sacrifice. Nothing is too good for them. No soldier should be discharged with the fear that his sacrifices are not appreciated. The great warm heart of the Nation should be opened to him. He should be made to know that we value his nobility and will ever cherish and remember his heroism.

IMMEDIATE ACTION NECESSARY.

But, on the other hand, the side of this matter that most appeals to me is the stern necessity that something must be done. Few enlisted men save any money. Nearly all of them have made allotments and taken insurance. They have saved nothing, and will be discharged penniless. We will see them hunting work. Many of them will not find it at once. They will gather in the cities, and after a little while it may be that at the street corner some hero—a real hero of Chateau-Thierry or Belleau Woods—may stand in his ragged uniform and beg the passer-by for a meal. Such an instance would be a shame to America, and if it could be charged to Congress would be a disgrace to the legislative branch. Much suffering and destitution among women and children will inevitably occur unless our soldiers are given some money on discharge, for many of them have dependent families who have been living off their monthly allotments.

It is nothing but justice to give the soldier a substantial gratuity. Many of those who stayed at home have enjoyed great prosperity. Some have made immense fortunes. Wages as a rule were greatly increased. The soldier has lost the job he had before he went into service. He may have a hard time to get as good a one. There will be delay, and he will be idle until he finds work. We should do something to compensate him for his lost position and for the idleness which will follow on his discharge.

A SERIOUS LABOR SITUATION.

One of the most serious sides of the discharged-soldier problem is its effect upon labor conditions. With the 4,000,000 men now in service thrown on the labor market demoralization will follow. Unless the situation is carefully handled, a labor panic will result. There will follow great industrial and social unrest, with possibilities of disaster. We must bear in mind that several millions of men and women heretofore engaged in the production of war supplies and other war work are losing their positions. They will have to seek new work, and many are now unemployed. When the war work is finally stopped, as it must be during the next few weeks, there will be a surplus of labor even without the discharged soldiers. With all these added to the labor supply the condition will be most serious, perhaps critical.

Even without taking the discharged soldiers into account, a statement issued by the United States Employment Service on December 14 shows that the demand for labor is declining fast, and already a surplus is found in many places. The only thing that can prevent a disruption of labor conditions is the fact that our workers have accumulated some reserves and can wait a few weeks for employment without suffering. By their savings they are enabled to protect themselves from being forced to take whatever job they can get at any price that may be offered them. But the discharged soldier has no reserves. He will be thrown at once on the labor market. He will have to have work immediately. Turned loose penniless, many will soon be starving and will be compelled to take anybody's job that they can. A starving man can not demand fair wages and conditions. He is compelled to yield to the pressing necessity of the moment. The labor organizations of the country have not sufficient resources to enable them to hold up millions of discharged soldiers for longer than a few weeks. As I see it, if we are to prevent a complete disruption of the labor situation, attended with the greatest hardship and peril, Congress must make provision for the maintenance of soldiers for a reasonable time after their discharge. It thus becomes not a matter of sentiment, generosity, or gratitude but of stern economic necessity that we make provision for these men.

A REMEDY FOR DISCONTENT.

The whole world is warworn and exhausted. Europe is prostrate to a degree that few in America comprehend. Anarchy threatens nearly every nation of Europe. Our captains of industry understand this and they have fears for themselves. They are carrying on a vigorous propaganda against "bolshevism," as they call it. They seek to cry it down by mere words and to restrain it by the strong arm of the law. I think I can see a better way to deal with discontent than by preaching at it or calling a policeman. Bolshevism has causes—hunger and despair. We must remedy the causes instead of trying merely to suppress the delirious cries of those sick with the disease. It will test the stoutest patriotism of the soldier to be discharged penniless after having offered his life for his country, to find himself jobless and starving in spite of his best efforts to get work, and to look around and observe that while he was far away in the battle trench profiteers, war contractors, and captains of industry have heaped up their millions out of the opportunities that the war gave. The best remedy for the discontent that it is feared that a discharged soldier may feel is to help him back into a job and to care for him while he honestly looks for work—to restore, to make him whole economically, to make him understand the lively and lasting gratitude of his country. This purpose can not be achieved by turning the soldier loose penniless, nor even by giving him the pittance of a mere month's pay. He must have something substantial. He must be maintained for several months, so as to give him a fair opportunity to find his proper place in the labor world.

Work is yet being done on war contracts; it is said that they have not been stopped because of a desire not to do injury to contractors and to the labor employed. Many millions are being spent in this way. It is said also that soldiers will be held in service so as to keep them from flooding the labor supply. Millions will be spent in their maintenance, equipment, and pay.

I am told it costs over $50 a month to keep a soldier going; that is, the upkeep and maintenance of all kinds. Why should we keep him in service, at a cost of $50 a month, when we might turn him loose and let him get at some useful work and identify himself with society?

Why not apply the millions that are being spent in these ways to the direct benefit of the soldiers? Why not discharge them now and give them their pay after discharge, just as though they were in service? It would be a fairer and more economical use of the money.

The American soldier has shown himself a hero. We come out of this war with a new confidence in our ability as a people to defend ourselves. Our citizen soldier has shown himself the full equal of the professional European soldier. Untrained boys from the farms and shops have mastered the famed Prussian Guard, and the luster of American arms will shine far into the future. We have made war on war, and we are the victors. Every humanitarian and patriot hopes there may never be another war. But as we indulge this hope, let us not forget the duties of the present hour, one of the first of which is to see that our discharged soldiers and sailors are properly cared for. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. This is not a very pertinent question and you may not want the answer to go into your speech. I am prompted to ask it from what you have said about the labor conditions following the war. What do you think of the wisdom of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy to employ those men in the construction of an enormous Navy, which will employ several hundred thousand men after we get the ships built to run it, and also the recommendation of the Secretary of War, as reported in the newspapers, that he favors the completion of all these Army cantonments, which would require the employment of thousands of men annually to keep up? Do you think that would be a wise thing?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to try to give an answer that will be respectful to the Secretaries of the Navy and War. The gentleman may perhaps have observed me long enough in the House to realize what I mean when I say that I think the proposition for an enormous Navy is an "enormity." Statesmanship is bankrupt when it can plan no better use for men than putting them to doing something absolutely useless in order to keep them busy. The great problem of the world now is to produce food—food and clothing and the common necessaries of life sufficient for the suffering millions of mankind. It is a poor thing to do to take a man away from producing the necessaries of life in order to have him produce anything else. There is plenty of useful work that needs to be done; the great problem of the world for the next two years is to get food and clothing and the common necessaries of life. Every man who can work ought to be put to doing something useful in the production of these common necessaries of life. If I had control of the matter, instead of building fleets which will be "enormities" when built, instead of consuming valuable materials and the toil of men's hands in the construction of useless cantonments, I would put men to providing things that the people of the world are crying for, that would relieve hunger and suffering. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of War recently stated before the Senate Military Affairs Committee that it was intended to keep 32 divisions, or over a million and a quarter of men in Europe notwithstanding the war is ended. The Chief of Staff also has recently made a statement to the effect that preparations had been made by the War Department for the discharge of only 824,000 men of the Army on this side. To say that the people at large were surprised and even astonished at these statements is putting it mildly. The country had been expecting that all not enlisted for a definite term would be discharged as soon as possible after peace became an established fact, even though it had not been officially proclaimed. It seems, however, that what might be called a joker crept into the selective-service bill, whereby instead of being enlisted for the duration of the war the soldiers were taken during the period of the "existing emergency." The "emergency" then "existing" is over, but the language permits the President to put any construction he desires upon it. Under it the men can be kept not only during the war but for an indefinite period after peace has been proclaimed, and apparently it is the intention of the officers in command to retain in the service some of the organizations which have been longest enlisted. The effect has been not only to fill with gloom the hearts of thousands of patriotic citizens who were the first to offer their services by volunteering or being in the National Guard, but to plunge into despondency thousands of others who thought that peace would bring the return of their loved ones and relief from the burdens of war.

I know it is claimed that a fair and reasonable construction of the words "existing emergency" would make them apply only to the duration of the war. Such I feel sure was the intent of Congress and under no fair construction could the words possibly be construed to cover a period beyond the declaration of peace. Whatever emergency may arise after that event, or has recently come into existence, it is not the one which existed at the time the selective-service act was passed. Clear and plain as this is, it is equally clear and plain that the War Department has no intention of so construing it. Every move now made shows that it is the intention to keep a great army in Europe for an indefinite period.

Mr. Chairman, this is simply conscription in time of peace, and I am utterly opposed to it in so far as any such army is made up of the drafted men. The War Department has the power, but it has no right to detain indefinitely these men. They were not drafted for the purpose of maintaining an army in Europe after peace has been declared, or even after it has been settled. Nor is the situation much less burdensome and oppressive on this side of the ocean. Many men are being held simply for ordinary work, although the administration refused to draft men for what is known as our war industries. The War Department is now using the drafted men in all sorts of occupations, from that of a common laborer and mechanic to that of a clerk, with no restrictions whatever upon the hours of labor, and paying the men not one-quarter what they would receive in the Government shipyards. The greatest complaint, however, arises from the detention of those who have nothing to do.

Mr. Chairman, for what purpose is this great Army to be kept in Europe? For any benefit to this Nation? No! We have over and over again disclaimed any intention of exacting either indemnity or territory. Is it to establish some position as a world power without any benefit? The name is not worth the price. Is it to gratify the personal ambition of some one who wishes to direct the world's affairs? Heaven forbid. Is it to enforce upon Germany the terms of peace? Germany lies helpless and prostrate. If its army has not surrendered it has passed under the yoke; given up its artillery, its aeroplanes, its machine guns; surrendered the iron ring of fortresses which protected the frontier; abandoned the greater part of its organization, except what is necessary to maintain order, if indeed it can maintain order. Its boasted navy came out of port only to raise the white flag and now lies idle under guard of our Navy and its associates. Its great organization, once a model of efficiency, has been shattered so that it can not be restored in a decade. Instead of having one united purpose its people would turn what arms they have left upon each other, and machine guns have begun their deadly rattle in Berlin itself. If Germany should attempt to resist, in a short time, without firing a shot, the blockade would starve her into whatever humiliating and abject submission the allies chose to demand.

It must be then that it is intended that the Army which is to be kept in Europe will be used for reconstruction and policing purposes, and some even say that it is the intention to police Russia. Mr. Chairman, to my mind no more dangerous folly could be attempted than to undertake to police a country which is 7,000 miles in extent from Petrograd to Vladivostok and 2,000 miles in extent from north to south. All the hosts of the allies could not do it. Every nationality resents foreign dictation. The best remedy for Bolshevikism is to let the people endure for a while the pangs of its poison. Nothing else will cure them. It may be that we owe something to our allies in the way of helping them to obtain the indemnity that is due from Germany. I have no objection to our furnishing a small force for that purpose, but I do object to our soldiers being used for reconstruction work in Europe. What would this mean? It would mean that our soldiers would be used in rebuilding roads, in restoring towns, in manual labor which could be better done by Chinese at $10 a month, whose subsistence would not cost half what is required for our Army. I protest as vigorously and firmly as I can against our farmers, our mechanics, our railroad men, our clerks, being used to wield the pick and shovel, or wheel a barrow, when this work can be done much cheaper by others, and if I mistake not will be sought by thousands from the famine-stricken regions of Europe. Is it men they want? They can get them in any number from all parts of a starving continent.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman for a short question.

Mr. McKENZIE. Has the gentleman from Iowa studied and looked into the powers under the Constitution of the United States that would enable the Commander in Chief or any other authority in this country to conscript men into the Army and then send them into a country at peace with us?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is a very important question, which I wish I had time to discuss. It merits a great deal of attention, which I regret to say I am unable to give to it in the time that has been allotted to me.

What is the situation on this side of the ocean? Every Member of this House has received many pitiful appeals from dependents who are suffering by reason of a soldier's absence. There are thousands of soldiers whose only hope of redeeming the business which they were compelled to leave on entering the Army is in an early discharge. There are hundreds of thousands idle and useless in the camps on this side for whom jobs are waiting at home. Some of these jobs must be filled at once, some can not be, but failure to fill them will cause far more loss than the amount of salary attached. Active, energetic, vigorous young men are burning their hearts out as they see their dependents suffering, their business ruined, their occupations gone, while they are merely handling a pick or a shovel for an hour or so a day or aiding in supplying food to others as idle as themselves, if indeed they do anything at all. It is not surprising that deserters are numerous. On the other hand, there are many who do not know what to do with themselves when discharged, and a large number that would be glad to continue in the Army service if they knew they were to be sent to Europe.

It is true that the War Department has issued orders that in cases where the soldier has dependents in distress and in some other special cases the soldier may be discharged upon application made through his superior officer; but in practice so many difficulties have been interposed that months will intervene before any action is taken and in many cases meritorious applications are curtly refused. Some lieutenant, even some sergeant, holds up the whole proceeding. It lies in some pigeonhole for months and nothing whatever is done.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I have had some difficulty of the kind the gentleman is suggesting. I would like to know what objection there can be to making it mandatory upon the subordinate officer, instead of giving him simply permission to discharge the man? I have had many cases of soldiers in which jobs are waiting; farms are going to rack and ruin, and yet I can not get the men discharged. What objection could there be to that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. None. I am going to advocate that in what I have to say further. It should be mandatory; but, instead, my understanding is that the order has gone forth not to discharge any man where he is of any use.

In the face of this situation we are informed, so far as we can get information from the War Department, that about a million men on this side and more than a million on the other side of the ocean are to be retained for an indefinite period, the duration of which, short or long, has apparently not been considered. In other words, of nearly 4,000,000 men that were in the Army at the close of the war, less than one-half are to be discharged. Much has been said with reference to the problems of reconstruction and the difficulties likely to be met in attempting to solve them. Elaborate plans have been offered with a view of determining what course should be taken in anticipation of conditions that it is believed will or may arise. I would not underrate the importance of these subjects or deny the necessity of their consideration, but the most vital question before Congress, and the one most pressing, most in need of immediate consideration, is the question of the discharge of our soldiers. You can not reconstruct until you get the soldiers back home.

The economic waste involved by the present situation is staggering. It cost the Government a thousand dollars per annum for every enlisted man before the war; since then his wages have been more than doubled; the cost of his subsistence and equipment must also be nearly double what it was in 1913. Capt. Daly, testifying before the Military Committee, said that while the war was going on the total cost of the Military Establishment was $6,000 per man annually. I think it is safe to say that the annual cost for soldiers, not commissioned, is now not less in this country than $2,000 per annum, and probably more. In Europe, I should judge it was nearer $3,000 per annum than $2,000. In my judgment, preparations ought to be made for the discharge of at least a million and a half more men than is now planned. I say preparations, because it requires time to perfect the system, and, as I shall undertake to show, the present system is utterly wrong. If we should still hold 2,000,000 men, the rate of expense will be little, if any, less than $5,000,000,000 a year. Gentlemen will say that this number of men will not be kept for a year. I answer that they will unless preparations are made at once for the discharge of those not needed. Bear in mind also that the loss of billions to the Government is probably equal, if not exceeded, by the loss to the men themselves, whose business or property is going to waste, or who might be producers instead of consumers.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Reverting to the idea that it might congest the labor situation, we have all heard that suggested, and therefore it is contended soldiers should not be discharged until after that matter was assured. Does my colleague think that the soldier who is in France, chosen as he was, and considering the rank that he occupied at home, would have any difficulty in being placed back in his own position without any interruption whatever to the labor situation?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think so. I am sure it would not be the case in my district, and I do not think it would be in the gentleman's district.

Mr. FESS. It would not. And when you refer to those who are here, who have not gone over, those who came under the second man-power bill, which went down in age to 18, would not a large proportion of those be of school age, who would continue to go to school if they could secure their discharge so as to enter upon their schooling?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; thousands are wanting to return to school.

Mr. FESS. That is one of the most distressing features of the situation, so far as my district is concerned. Those boys want to get out and return to school.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With pleasure.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there not a general order also that prohibits the presentation of an application because of a desire to finish school work?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I could not say as to that. In the Navy that is not the rule. In the Army I believe it is, but can not speak positively.

Mr. DOWELL. In the Navy they are discharged for the purpose of attending school, but does not the reverse hold with respect to the Army?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. I am informed that the Army adopts a different rule.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With pleasure.

Mr. PLATT. The Army orders do not include discharge for purpose of education. That is one thing that, it seems to me, we ought to advocate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; and consequently they do not get discharged. The rule should be otherwise. I trust it will be changed.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. With reference to the question raised by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], I will say to the gentleman that I have had recently reports from the United States Employment Service which show that there is already a surplus of labor in many parts of the country and that that surplus is gaining rapidly since the armistice was declared.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again? Would the fact of a congested labor situation be a justification of keeping our soldiers in Europe away from their own jobs in order to keep men at home employed at abnormal wages?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think it would produce such a situation, but, in any event, it would not justify keeping in Europe our soldiers, who have been doing the fighting, in order to employ some one at home. Our first consideration is for the men who have borne the brunt of battle and the burden of service.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? I do not want to take the gentleman's time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I might have it extended.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman's time can be extended.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to yield to the gentleman, but I want to get to the solution of this question.

Many imagine that the wealth of the country has been increased by the reason of the inflation of the currency and consequent rise in prices, but the real wealth of the country can only be increased by the production of articles and commodities of value. The most of these men here, if discharged, could be now producers; as it is they are forced to be parasites on the country, and the economic loss runs up into millions every day.

It is said that the War Department is now discharging men as fast as possible. This may be true as to those it intends to discharge, but both method and practice are at fault. The system is wrong, and while it relieves conditions in some places, in others it is of no benefit, and in some cases it is positively damaging. Thousands are released who are perfectly willing to serve, thousands held who are nearly driven insane by a desire to get back to their families, their work, or their business. We know everywhere of enlisted men recently taken into the draft who have a great desire to go to Europe. The story is published, I know not how truly, that some of those who have been discharged in this city are still here, having carelessly spent their allowance for return to their homes, and that some of them have even solicited aid. While this is going on we know of others who have aged and dependent parents, sick and needy wives, opportunities that will soon be lost for entering business, and incomplete school years to be finished now, if finished at all, and other cases of the greatest hardship, which were willingly undergone as long as the Government needed the service of these men, but which now naturally raise a rebellious feeling in the minds of those who are unnecessarily and needlessly detained. The present system is nothing less than an outrage.

Unless action is taken at this session a million and a quarter men will be held across the ocean for an unknown period, extending, in all probability, through the year, according to the plans of the War Department. I grant that there must be an army of the allies to hold the principal German forts and towns until the indemnity is settled and other provisions of the treaty of peace complied with. This army necessarily must remain in Germany several years. I assume that this country will be expected to furnish, and will furnish, a portion of it. I shall not now discuss at length the number which we should provide, but I am opposed to our furnishing any great army for that purpose and believe the force should be made up largely of the Regular Army. If we kept even 500,000 men in Europe, it would cost over a billion annually. Of course, the armistice provided, and the peace treaty will probably provide, for the cost of the army of occupation being paid by the German Government, but the bills against Germany are mounting to ten times what it could pay if it had its peace organization, and while that country is disorganized, its workers demoralized and rebellious, and its business at a standstill the money or property can not be obtained from it for payment. Moreover, Belgium and France have a prior claim for tens of billions.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I regret I can not.

Mr. STEVENSON. I just want to ask one question. I never interrupt you lengthily.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Very well, I will yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. My question is this: Is not the expense of occupation a preferred claim, and will not that be paid before they begin to pay the claims of the different Governments?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman has kept track of the amount paid—one installment has already been paid—he will understand that it will not cover one-twentieth part of what the expense will be. The payment will be only for that small part of our forces which is actually in Germany.

Serious as is the financial burden which the present plans impose, a more serious and important matter is involved—that of justice to the soldier. The injustice done by the present haphazard method of discharge is so gross as to amount to actual oppression; yet the remedy is easy. A new army for operations abroad should be formed, called the "Army of Occupation." This army should be made up by voluntary enlistments from the Army as now constituted (except the Regular Army), or outside if others desired to volunteer. Instead of sending home those who want to stay in Europe or wish to go there from this side, a new army should be made up, which, in my judgment, should not exceed 500,000 men, with such of the Regulars as are available. This matter should not be permitted to drift along. If action was commenced now, it would be a month or more before a bill could be passed, and several months before it could be put in operation. I have, for the purpose of forming a basis of discussion, introduced a bill embodying the principles which I have set forth. I do not claim that it is perfect in its details. Doubtless the Committee on Military Affairs and the War Department aided by their superior experience would find details, and possibly essentials, that should be modified or defined. But what I seek, what all of us should seek, is action, and we should not sit idly here while unnecessary hardships are inflicted upon those who have done so much for their country.

We need, too, more systematic action at once on the part of the War Department for expediting the discharge of men who are specially needed at home. As the situation is now, all sorts of difficulties are liable to meet the private who desires to present his application. Orders should be posted in each camp, so that inferior officers will not prevent their making application or delay the submission of applications made. If such orders are not issued, Congress should take action at once.

There can be no defense of conscription in times of peace, but the keeping of men in Europe or on this side against their will at this time can be classed as nothing else. There is neither excuse nor necessity for it. It will not meet with the approval of the people, and any party that favors such a proposition is certain to hear of it again in the future. Why should there be any delay when each day means so much to the soldier and the country?

I know there are some that will say that the plan can not be carried out, that it will involve reorganization of the Army. It will not involve the reorganization of the Regulars or the Marines, which ought to constitute the great bulk of the force to remain in Europe. As to the remainder of the Army, it ought to be, and if any attention is paid to the desires of the people, it will be reorganized. I have no patience with that spirit which says that this work can not be done. It was done at the end of the War with Spain, when an Army of Occupation was organized to remain in the Philippines. Of course the number of soldiers retained was small compared to the number which may be kept now, but the number of officers and the means of doing the work were correspondingly small at that time. What is needed is action and resolution on the part of Congress. If we sit here waiting for plans to be prepared by the War Department, no one knows how long it will be before action is taken. The present burdensome, unnecessary, and grievous conditions will not be borne by the public. They ought to be and must be remedied by Congress, which should resume its proper functions and take the initiative in dealing with this great problem.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that after a war that has cost the world a total of $400,000,000,000, as generally estimated, and I know not how many millions of lives, because they are not all yet numbered—if that the end of this war, after a sacrifice of money and property that would have made a perfect paradise of the world; after the sacrifice of the best blood and lives of so many patriotic citizens, both of this country and of Europe; if at this time the end of it all is that we are to keep an army ten times, or twenty times, as large as we ever thought of before this war, then it is the greatest failure that ever occurred in the history of the world, notwithstanding the glories of our victories. The world has been horror-struck by the calamities, bloodshed, torments, and suffering of this dreadful war. I can not believe that any nation that has felt its full destructive power has any thought of ever entering into another such a one. Such a proposal at this time would produce a revolution that would hurl from power those who suggested it. And yet we seem to be proceeding as if the war was likely to commence over again within the next year.

I believe some blessings will come from this dreadful conflict. The greatest blessing that we would receive from it would be that the world might be delivered forever, as Lloyd George has advocated, from conscription in time of peace, from great armies, from the great burdens connected with them, and that hereafter the energy and the spirit of all nations might be devoted to restoring and upbuilding the world and promoting the happiness and comfort of mankind instead of to the instruments of death and destruction. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

A bill (H. R. 13443) to provide for the organization of an army to be used abroad, known as the Army of Occupation, and the discharge of enlisted men in the military service not included in the Regular Army. (Introduced Dec. 19, 1918.)

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the necessity growing out of the war with Germany of maintaining an armed force in Europe, that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment and to organize and equip a force of not exceeding 10 divisions and to officer such force in the manner provided in the third paragraph of section 1 of the selective-service act approved August 31, 1918, the organization thereof to be the same as that of a corresponding organization in the Regular Army, and that such force shall be known as the Army of Occupation.

SEC. 2. That enlistments in the army of occupation may be made by any enlisted man now in the military service of the United States, except those in the Regular Army, and when such enlistments are made the soldier so enlisting shall be discharged from the service for which he had theretofore been enlisted.

SEC. 3. That the period of enlistment shall be during the period of occupation by the armed forces of the United States of European territory, not exceeding three years, and only such men shall be enlisted as are eligible for enlistment in the Regular Army.

SEC. 4. That the army of occupation when organized shall be used for the purpose of occupying or holding such territory in Europe as the President may direct, and as soon as practicable after the ratification of a treaty of peace between the United States and the Government of Germany all other enlisted men not serving in the Regular Army shall be discharged, after having, in the case of those not in the United States, been first returned to this country.

Mr. SMALL. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I have but 20 minutes, and in those 20 minutes I would like to cover the world.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], who has addressed the House this afternoon, is one of the ablest and bravest men in the House. In his remarks he suggested that the Government pay to each discharged soldier six months' salary. His remarks have impelled me to direct what I have to say to the same subject, although I intended originally, when I asked for time, to speak of the international situation.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has made reference to Bolshevism, just as the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], who mentioned Bolshevism. It seems that it is impossible to deliver an address now on any public question without using two words, "Bolshevism" and "reconstruction." Any fool proposition goes under reconstruction and any new idea is opposed as Bolshevism. The hypocrite, the sycophant, the coward, the man who follows the mob, the defender of selfish and unclean interests who would preserve everything that is vile in the present society, all of them dread every new thought and every new idea. They speak of Bolshevism as if they knew what it was, as if it represented the very incarnation of all that is evil, as if it was hell let loose; and whenever any new thought is advanced, whenever a suggestion is made urging that we learn something from the sacrifices of the last four years, immediately we are met with the retort, "Oh, you are advocating Bolshevism." When the President of the United States in one of his letters used the sententious phrase that the returning soldier will not tolerate industrial serfdom, one of the New York newspapers inquired editorially, "Where did the President get that Bolshevik phrase?" When the recently elected Democratic governor of New York, in a long and rather interesting message to the legislature of that State, suggested in somewhat vague terms a number of things that ought to be done in the direction of social legislation, a political opponent, as a sort of a reply to the message of the governor, said, "We should not cater to any Bolshevistic tendencies." He saw in the modest suggestion of the governor for minimum-wage legislation for women and children and health insurance the coming of the dreaded Bolshevism.

I have no time to take up the subject. I wish I had. It is a new word. It is a new bugaboo. It is something new to threaten people with; and since socialism has been recognized as a legitimate theory, and since the socialist movement has compelled statesmen and politicians to borrow its raiment, to borrow some of its thought, and some of its philosophy, those that are interested in combating the advance of socialist thought have conjured up a new horror—that of Bolshevism.

Now, to come down to the proposition to give each returning soldier $180, I would vote for it if nothing better could be had, but it would not satisfy me. It is not what we want. You can not acquit yourselves to this generation; you can not perform your full duty to the millions of men who have fought in Europe, notwithstanding the fact that Roosevelt says that the most of them did not understand anything at all about the 14 points of President Wilson—you can not acquit yourselves to these men by offering them a tip at the conclusion of their service, by giving them a gratuity, by giving them a couple of dollars. It will not do them any good; it will not do society as a whole any good. The war is supposed to have been fought that the world be made free; that nations may be made free democracies. There can be no such thing as a free nation or a free people or a great people or a great nation unless the individual man and the individual woman who compose the community are free to live a full life, are free to develop intellectually, physically, spiritually, unless the social structure of society gives them that opportunity. Every other form of democracy is a fraud. Every other form of government which does not give to the great majority of the people an opportunity to develop individually is not a democracy, no matter by what name you may call it. The great sacrifices that have been made by the world will be of no avail unless we realize this fundamental truth. The democratic elements of Europe are awakening to certain hopes. They have suffered more and they have learned more than we.

Let us not deceive ourselves. Although the war is over the fight for genuine democracy is by no means over. Even the feudal system is not yet dead.

But the hope is growing that as a result of this war the individual will be placed in a position where he will have a share in the control of the means essential to sustain the life of a civilized man. To give to the discharged soldier a few dollars as a donation, as a tip, as a gift, does not mean to make an effort in the direction of improving his economic condition or of securing him an opportunity to earn a livelihood. It certainly does not tend to make him more dependent upon himself or less dependent upon others. It does not help to make him more free. Long before we entered into the world war and ever since we have entered it I have insisted that we take up the problem of unemployment. Again and again have I asked that a study be made of the subject of social insurance.

I have been insistent in urging it; you have been insistent in disregarding it. There will be discontent. Do not make any mistake about it; you can not shout it down; you can not suppress it. A fool order against the red flag will not allay restlessness. Calling everything "Bolshevism" will not stop it. You may suppress the emblem but you can not suppress the discontent. You can not stifle the craving for a change, you can not suppress the desire on the part of those who have faced danger to get some genuine reward, not in the form of a humiliating gift but a reward in seeing the world around them get to be a better world.

You must take up the problem of the returning soldier as part of the problem to improve the economic condition of the masses. You must think not only of the soldier but of the now employed whose jobs the returning soldiers will take. Assume that all employers will be patriotic—I question their patriotism, for I know that every time the Washington profiteer doubled his rent he doubled the size of his flag—assume that every time a soldier will ask for his former job he will get it, what about the man or woman whose job the soldier will take? We could not trust the great magnates of industry in the time of war, when the call for sacrifice should have appealed to all, but the Government had to take hold of them, curb them, and control them. If we could not trust them in times of war, when the patriotic appeal is so strong, how can you trust them in time of peace? How can you permit them to go unchecked and unregulated by the public conscience?

The problem, then, is how to provide employment for all, how to use the governmental agencies which we used during the war for the purpose of promoting war industries, how to use the very same governmental agencies at least during the period of transition until society becomes normal again, if it ever will become normal, to prevent general unemployment. At least during this period of transformation, during this life of transition, let the governmental agencies, which exercised a curbing influence on capital in time of war, continue, so that we may provide unemployment insurance to the soldier and impose upon him the duty of getting employment, and if he can not get it from a private employer have the Government run various public works and even industries, if necessary, so that he may obtain employment. Let there be no giving of gifts, let there be no idleness and compensation for idleness, let the principle be embodied in life that he who does not work has no right to live. Unfortunately that principle does not apply on top of society to-day. Establish the system of unemployment insurance, provide for Government works, provide, if necessary, that the Government should run some of the industries now in private hands. Let the people learn how to run industries. I know that the Government running of industries to-day is not the most economic or efficient way of doing things, but the people must begin, the people must learn to control and own industries. See the failure of the policy of the Democratic Party to curb the trusts and to destroy the trusts. That has failed. You know that, and the Democrats were themselves compelled, at least so far as foreign exports are concerned, to permit the trustification of the foreign export branch of industry and commerce. You can not destroy a trust, you can not destroy a monopoly, because concentration and efficiency are laws of industry. Instead of breaking up large industries, which are in their nature monopolies, which are, in their very nature, of national scope, instead of breaking them up and destroying them and stimulating artificial competition, which can not exist, it is the duty of statesmen to teach the people to utilize every advantage of modern efficiency, to utilize every advantage of concentration, to utilize those advantages for the great masses of the people. Let the Government take up one industry after another, taking up first the most suitable industries, so that the worker will know that he owes a duty to society to work and to be useful, and that in return society owes him the duty of a wage which will enable him to live a man's life.

If we can not learn this in spite of the great sacrifices, I do not know whether we will ever learn anything. We have been fed with phrases, phrases, phrases—fighting for democracy, making the world safe for democracy, and what not—no indemnities, but reparation, self-determination of nations, but with the provision always that the little nations will not be permitted to determine their own life but that the big fellows will tell them how they shall exercise this right of self-determination, how they shall be cramped in. Then we have been told that of course this is the last war; but we find that in order to make sure that it is the last war we are going to increase our fleet, also to make sure that all armaments have been done away with. [Laughter.] We are in sympathy with the democratic instincts of the great masses of Russia, we are told, but we are also told that we will keep an army there, Constitution or no Constitution, declaration of war or no declaration of war, and when the soldier gets back, then our Secretary of the Interior, we learn, will appoint a commission to investigate the problem of recovering swamp lands. The soldier will be taken directly from a French trench to a swamp in Arkansas. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD].

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, of course you have observed that the Ohio wets have employed a very able-bodied lawyer, who has instituted legal action to test the constitutionality of the prohibition amendment to our Federal Constitution, based upon the recognized fact that the joint resolution submitting the prohibition amendment to the States was not adopted by two-thirds of the entire membership of Congress. The prohibition amendment was adopted by two-thirds of the Members voting, or two-thirds of a quorum. This is a matter of deep interest to all the people of all the States, especially Pennsylvania.

The language of the Constitution on this question is as follows: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution," and so forth.—Article V.

Article II of the Constitution provides in case of the ratification of a treaty-making power of the President as follows:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur," and so forth.

In case of the election of a Speaker of the House, section 3 of the Constitution provides, "That a majority of a quorum can do the business of the House of Representatives." Under this section it was decided in 1808 and again in 1879 that the Speaker can be elected by a majority of a quorum.

The fact that the Federal Constitution contains one provision for doing the legislative business of Congress, and another provision applying only to the Senate for the ratification of a treaty, and still another provision for submitting a constitutional amendment indicates that the framers of the Constitution regarded these specified functions of Congress as vitally different. And students of the Constitution are now claiming with some show of reason that the framers of the Constitution regarded the submission of a constitutional amendment as the most important of all the functions of Congress. Hence it is provided that two-thirds of both Houses of Congress shall be required to submit an amendment to the States for ratification. This question, however, has never been decided by the Supreme Court. It is reported that the Supreme Court of Minnesota has decided that an amendment to the State constitution of that State was not legally adopted because it was submitted to the people by two-thirds of a quorum of the legislature and not by two-thirds of all members elected. And the language in the State constitution of Minnesota is of the same purport as in our Federal Constitution. It will be conceded that there is no function of Congress of more importance or moment than an amendment to the fundamental law. And the fact that the framers of the Constitution, after a full debate, made three distinct differences in language touching the jurisdiction and powers of Congress will be used by lawyers more or less critical and wise that when the Constitution provides that both Houses must have a two-thirds vote to submit an amendment to the Constitution it does not mean two-thirds of those present nor two-thirds of a quorum, but two-thirds of the whole membership elected by a majority vote of the whole American people. If two-thirds of a quorum could submit a constitutional amendment, let us see what might happen. The present House of Representatives contains 435 Members; a quorum is 218, and two-thirds of 218 is 146. This is 72 less than a majority of Members. Evidently the framers of the Federal Constitution never intended to frame a provision in the organic law that would allow 146 Congressmen, or 72 less than a majority of Members, to submit an amendment. It is a reasonable claim that this great body of the wisest and most experienced statesmen and scholars of that epoch framed a provision in the Constitution intended to include all the representatives of all the people of all the States.

THE SUPREME COURT CAN DECIDE EITHER WAY.

As all the people of the States are interested in this constitutional amendment, it will attract universal interest when this case goes to the Supreme Court for final judgment. While it was not intended by the framers of the Federal Constitution that there should be any power in the United States greater than the Constitution, experience has demonstrated that supreme power is lodged in the Supreme Court—jurists appointed for life. The power with final jurisdiction to either nullify or approve a law of Congress or a constitutional provision is greater than the Constitution.

The Constitution provides that all tariffs shall be universal throughout the United States, but we have now one tariff for the States, another for Porto Rico, and still another for the Philippine Islands, and the Supreme Court has decided these tariff laws as constitutional. Hence the conclusion is inevitable that this is a case where the Supreme Court may decide either way.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the American people were greatly delighted when the wires flashed the news throughout the world that the war was over, that the armistice was signed. I happened to be in Chicago on that day, and witnessed a scene such as I never saw before, and such as probably no one will ever see again. There everyone in the city assembled within the space of a mile square, and they hugged and kissed each other, they blew horns, they climbed on top of street cars, the girls directed the cab drivers to go where they wanted to, they did not pay any fares, they entered the stores and took all of the noise-making instruments they could find, and everyone was full of joy because the war was over. Since that time everyone has been wondering why it is that we do not get our soldiers back home, and thousands of letters are received every day by Members of Congress, asking them to assist in bringing these boys back to the homes where they can help to provide for those who have deprived themselves of every necessity of life in order that they might prove their patriotism to the country in its hour of need. Every appeal that is made to the Army commanders, represented by the Secretary of War, or to the Navy commanders, represented by the Secretary of the Navy, for the release of the men tells that every obstacle with which it is possible to surround an application for discharge must be overcome, that every hurdle must be jumped, before the man can obtain his release. The first order purported to authorize the commanders in the camps to release the men upon their own applications. Then the order was modified to require three affidavits from prominent citizens in the neighborhood to certify to the need of the release either for industrial or for family reasons. Then comes the further edict that if this application, verified by these affidavits, is not considered favorably by the commander an appeal can be taken to the headquarters in Washington, and when Members of Congress appeal to the authorities and call their attention to the necessity and importance of releasing these men, they are told that Members of Congress need not apply, that they have no standing at court, that their word is of no avail.

I had a case this morning in the Navy in connection with which I applied for information caused by a letter coming from the mother of six children, five of them too young to work, she herself a widow, sick, unable to work herself, with a boy in the Navy, in connection with whose services an allotment was made nearly nine months ago, not one dollar of which has been paid to the widow whose five children at home are unable to assist in helping to maintain the family. The answer I received after giving all these facts in the case was that the man must apply to his commander and the commander himself would investigate the necessity and importance of letting the man out of the Navy. I requested to know whether or not the facts as stated by me, because they were stated by me, would be any prejudice in connection with the man's discharge, and the man to whom I talked said it would have no influence toward getting him discharged. I submit that this is an indignity that no Government official has the right to impose upon any family a member of which has volunteered to defend the flag. [Applause.] While all this is going on and our men are suffering as they are at Brest, France, waiting for transportation home, sleeping in the slimy gutter, eating in the slime of the slime, as reported by responsible newspaper men who have been there and seen the case, we are told that they have no rights, while officers of the Army are riding around in Government-owned automobiles everywhere throughout Washington, driven by men in uniform, paid by the American people whose sons are still sleeping in the slime of the sluiceways of France, otherwise known as detention camps or rest camps. It is an outrage upon justice, and these men ought to be called to account. I stood on the corner of California Street and Columbia Road this morning for 15 minutes waiting for a street car, directly opposite the Wyoming Apartment Building, and there lined up in front of the Wyoming Apartment Building at 10 o'clock, mind you, were five Government-owned automobiles with five drivers in Army uniform waiting, I suppose, for the second lieutenants who are living at the Wyoming in order that they might take them to the important business which they have to transact in the department, but which was not sufficiently important to take them out of their nests before 10 o'clock in the morning. [Laughter.] And this is going on everywhere throughout this city, and I suppose throughout the Nation wherever we have Army officers. Why should the Government of the United States transport these men around in state while the other men who have given everything they have to the Government in its hour of need are compelled still to continue to serve and sleep in the gutter when they ought to be discharged? This is a shame; it is a disgrace; it is a crime for these men to be permitted to use Government property under such circumstances. We have spent $25,000,000,000, as I understand it, so far, actual expenditures. We have appropriated over $36,000,000,000.

How much of it has been appropriated for automobiles in order that these men may ride around in luxury I do not know, but there ought to be an investigation of it. The time has come when the American people are not going to sit idly by and permit it. The mere fact that a man is a commissioned officer in the Army gives him no more right than the ordinary man, and the ordinary man who pays the taxes when he understands the facts will not submit to that kind of iniquity. Oh, but the use of these automobiles is not confined to Army officers, for I have seen automobiles owned by the Government taking the wives of Army officers and their sisters, perhaps, maybe their mothers, out on calling trips. I saw one yesterday going to three different places picking up three different women, taking them around to call on their neighbors, and how many more were engaged in this kind of business I do not know, and each one of the automobiles that you find doing this sort of business is being driven by a soldier. Why do not these soldiers get their discharge? They want to be discharged. They have other occupations at home which they would like to fill, but of course it would not be as convenient for the officers whom these men drive around if the men were permitted to retire to private life, because they would be compelled to drive their own machines, and that would be an arduous job for an officer in the Army to perform, especially those officers in the Army who hold these swivel-chair jobs in Washington.

Is there a time coming when the American people through the Congress of the United States will dare to speak? That is what I want to know. If I have my way there will be a time, and this matter will be investigated with all other such methods; for I do not believe it was ever the intention of the Congress of the United States to appropriate money indefinitely, in lump sums, to be used for any such purpose or in any such way.

And then we have, for example, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, which is a stench in the nostrils of every man that has anything to do with it. We have a new man recently appointed to the job. He starts out right. He wrote a letter to every Member of Congress, in which he said that he was going to do the best he could to clean it up and that he wants the cooperation of the Congress. God speed him on his way. I want to help him. [Applause.] I want to help any man who wishes to do the right thing.

I wrote him a letter and told him he was assuming a great task, a responsible job, and that he was taking something that had taint on it, but that I hoped he would be able to remove the taint. And the best way, I said to him in my reply, to remove the taint was to remove a lot of the people who were standing in each other's way down there and make room in the offices of the War Risk Bureau for those who were there to do work. There is no room for them in which to work now. That is the reason we do not get results.

Why, I have cases which I could enumerate if I wanted to go into details that would make your hair stand on end, cases where the families of soldiers who had been wounded, some with one leg off, some with both legs off, some with both arms off, some with both eyes out, who have not been able to get a dollar for 11 months, notwithstanding the fact that allotments have been made.

And the men themselves have not been paid. They have been wounded. They have been taken to the hospitals. They have been treated, and God knows how, in some cases. We whose families have given their blood to the Nation are going to insist upon decent treatment for those who yet remain. We can not afford to ignore the situation.

Why, a trainload of wounded soldiers came into Chicago the other night. There was no one there to meet them. They had to find their way to ambulances or conveyances of one kind and another the best they could in order to get to hospitals. The President of the United States said in a speech a short while ago at Chaumont, France, to the American soldiers, that the American people were waiting for an opportunity to acclaim the returning soldiers, whereas all the returning soldiers that have ever come have been obliged to do so unheralded and unacclaimed and transferred around every place where an opportunity might be had for the American people to see them and acclaim them to some camp somewhere, unseen and unheard—no acclaim, no plaudits, no encouragement. And of these men I talk about as landing in Chicago a week ago—five of whom, at least, I know—one was transferred to Camp Dodge, in Iowa; another was sent to French Lick Springs, in Indiana; another sent out to Fort Sheridan, Ill.; and another one sent somewhere in Kentucky, and so on, and each one of these five men was transferred six times in a week to different places in the country, though they were unfit to travel. They were men wounded almost to death, and still they were transferred from place to place and from pillar to post, with no consideration shown them anywhere.

Mr. LONDON. On what theory was that done?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not tell. But that is why it costs so much for transportation for the Army, why it costs so much to demobilize.

I saw a case of application for $12,000,000 made to the Naval Committee, and now being considered by it, for demobilizing men to be discharged from the Navy. They said it would take all the $12,000,000, perhaps more; because, they said, when they discharged men from the Navy they paid their way to the nearest station or to the station from which they were enlisted. But my experience is best illustrated by the case of a young chap named Conway, who enlisted in the Navy from Chicago. He enlisted to-day, say. He was sent to the Great Lakes Training Station. He sent me a telegram, and I sent him one in reply. Before my telegram reached him he was down at Newport. And by the time I got a telegram to him at Newport he was at some other place. He was at Pensacola, Fla., if there is a station down there, or to some other place there; and I could not send telegrams fast enough over the wire to reach him, because he was transferred so often and to places so far apart. And that is what they do with the money you give them. I got a telegram this morning from Chicago which was sent to me on the 31st day of December. To-day is the 2d of January. That was the 31st of December, one at about 9.30 in the morning and the other at 12.30 afternoon, and I got them this morning just before 11 o'clock. So I think we had best commence to send our telegrams by mail. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman engage to say that the Burleson telegraph can not catch up with the McAdoo railroads? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I can not tell how they manage it, but somehow or other since the Government took control of the telegraph lines it takes me on an average of three days to get a telegram from Chicago.

But I was speaking about the rate at which we move these young men from place to place. The next thing that happened was that the young man was sent over to Italy. I was informed that he was on his way to Italy. Now, you can not get much naval knowledge into the head of any man, no matter how smart he may be, if you are moving him around on trains day and night and taking the money out of the Treasury of the United States to pay his expenses.

When I called up to-day for somebody to see what could be done about getting a young chap out of the Navy who has all the responsibility of a great family on his hands when he is free to act, they said, "There is no chance on earth to get anybody out of the Navy. We are only letting the men out that we want to let out. We have decided to let 10 per cent of the men out; 70 per cent of them are asking to get out."

But we fought for "democracy," and now we have got it. [Laughter.] We fought for efficiency, and we have got the worst inefficiency that I ever saw. We fought in order that the world might be free, and yet we are trammeled as we never have been before; we are bucked and gagged. We can not get a reply from anybody in power anywhere.

I called up the Navy this morning. They shunted me off to eight different telephones before they could find a man who could speak to me about the thing I wanted to talk about. It took me two hours, and then they said he was not the man I wanted at all; it was the first man that I had got hold of. [Laughter.] How are you going to get efficiency out of such conditions? I hope the time will come when we are at peace. They say we are still at war. The Chief of Staff says he is not going to demobilize the Army in the American camps; that we are bound to keep 10 divisions of combat men in the American camps; and when I ask them why, they say, "We do not know what is going to happen."

We have over on the other side about 1,900,000 men who have not been sent away. We have here still about 1,200,000 in the camps, and they say they are going to keep 450,000 of these men permanently, as far as we know. What right have they got to do that? Who authorizes it? Are we going to stand here and permit it? Are the American people going to be satisfied with that sort of thing? Are we forever to continue to heap loads of taxation on the backs of the American people to conduct this inefficient method of government?

That is what I ask. Does anyone reply? No one replies, not even those up at the other end of the Avenue. When I tell them that the American soldier is sleeping in the slime-filled camp at Brest, France, the Secretary of War says, "I will wire over and find out about it." When you want information here you can not get it. The papers are full of the social activities in Europe in which the President of the United States is engaged, but when I tried to get a cable about a man who had lost both legs over there I could not get the cable, and when we finally did get the cable message over there we could not get a reply. In God's name, is it more important to use the American cable to exploit the social activities of the people of Europe and the President of the United States than it is to find out the condition of men who have been crippled for life while fighting for freedom and so-called "democracy"? [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MANN. My colleague made a reference to the policy of the War Department about discharging soldiers, which is so very pat and interesting that I wish he would tell us a little bit more about that, if he can, and the great delay about getting men out who have jobs waiting for them.

Mr. MADDEN. What I did this morning was to call up the Chief of Staff, in response to several inquiries that I had. The Chief of Staff was busy in consultation with the Secretary of War and I did not get an opportunity to speak to him. Maj. Swing, the son-in-law of the Chief of Staff, his private aide, was put on the wire, and I asked him to give me the latest order that had been issued by the War Department connected with the discharge of soldiers. I said that I did not want him to act as he did before on an occasion when I went up there, when he said he would send the desired information down in two hours and did not send it down at all. [Laughter.] I waited for three weeks, and at the end of that time I went up and told him what I thought about him, and I said that if this had been an important military order it might have lost the war; but as it was, being a matter pertaining to an ordinary Member of Congress, it did not amount to much; but he must understand that he was a military man, obeying orders and filling requisitions, and that he must do it promptly. He said the determination of the department was not to discharge troops in America, but keep the men in the camps. I asked him how many divisions, and he said, "Ten divisions." That means 450,000 men. But they say they are discharging men at the rate of 30,000 a day. I do not know whom they are discharging, for everybody that I have applied for a discharge for has been turned down, and nobody in my neighborhood or anywhere in my district, so far as I have been able to discover, has been discharged. I do not know where they are discharged from or where they are to go after they have been discharged.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand there is a naval regulation recently issued providing for the discharge of not to exceed 10 per cent?

Mr. MADDEN. That is so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman state when that was issued?

Mr. MADDEN. I got this from the hearings of the Naval Committee only a few days ago. When the commander of the Bureau of Operations was before the committee they asked him the question, "Why are these men not discharged?" He said, "We need 350,000 men in the Navy. We have 500,000 men there now. Applications have been made by 70 per cent of the men for discharge. We have adopted the rule that not more than 10 per cent of the men can be discharged." If a man is in the radio service or some such thing as that, he can not be discharged at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I know the gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly. I want to tell the truth.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Navy has issued a regulation permitting commanding officers to discharge 20 per cent of those who enlisted for the war and 10 per cent of those who enlisted for four years, although their terms of enlistment have not expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I am only telling what I read in the hearings before the Naval Committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. The orders have been issued and copies of them have been sent broadcast. I suppose the gentleman received a copy. I know I did.

Mr. MADDEN. Twenty per cent of the men who volunteered for the period of the war?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. And their term of enlistment, when they volunteered, was for the period of the war and six months thereafter.

Mr. MADDEN. The testimony given by the commander of the Bureau of Operations before the Naval Committee will disclose that the men were rather led to believe, without having been told so, that they were only enlisted for the period of the war, but as a matter of fact they were enlisted for four years; and while the officer said they did not intend to convey to the men that they would be released at the end of the war, the men themselves understood that they would be released. That is what they said.

Mr. BARKLEY. And I am advised by the department that in all such cases they are being treated as if they had enlisted for the period of the war and are not being held.

Mr. MADDEN. Ten per cent of them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Twenty per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman think all these 70 per cent who have applied for discharge ought to be discharged?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know how many ought to be discharged. I do not want to denude the Navy of the men it needs, but I think where a good case is made out the men ought to be discharged.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree with the statement, but the Navy Department has left the decision of these cases to the commanding officers, who are in touch with the men.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I know they have, and at the same time have given them rigid orders not to permit more than a certain small percentage of the men to get out of the service.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to have about two minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] has no more time, I have some left. How much does the gentleman want?

Mr. MADDEN. About three minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I just want to add to what I have already said, that while we have been fighting for democracy, and while we are all happy that we won, and happy over the things that we hope democracy will obtain, I was wondering, when I read the story of the banquet given by King George to the President of the United States, with $13,000,000 worth of gold plate upon the table, with all the guests walking backward and waving their wands and kotowing to Mrs. Wilson and the President of the United States, whether that was the character of democracy for which we fought. [Applause.] I wish for the President of the United States the greatest possible success in his endeavor to accomplish the object for which he has gone to Europe, for, God knows, America wants peace. We are a peace-loving people, but I hope that while he is fighting for the simplicity of life, in which we know he believes, that he will not lead the American people to understand that he is likely to be led away with all the gold plate, while the eyeless, legless, armless men who have given everything they have in the world that we might be free and live the simple life that we have lived from the foundation of the Government, that he will not allow the false gods in European nations to tear the ideals away from that simplicity, and that we will continue to live under a democracy that means equality to every man whether high or low, rich or poor, powerful or humble. We won the fight for democracy; let us live democracy and not enter into the sacred precincts of any institution where they who surround us must pay obeisance and wave the magic wand in order to please our fancy before they leave the room. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Iowa to say that he either had exhausted his time or that there were no further requests.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has used all his time.

Mr. SMALL. I have no further requests on this side, and I ask that the Clerk commence reading the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums of money be, and are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of the public works hereinafter named:

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13462, the river and harbor bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WELTY for three days on account of illness.

To Mr. IRELAND, at the request of Mr. MADDEN, leave of absence to the 15th of January, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech made by the Hon. WILLIAM S. VARE, a Member of the House, before the City Business Club of Philadelphia on the 9th of December, on business and political conditions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I have had a number of inquiries in regard to the matter of proceeding with the river and harbor bill to-morrow. We are ready and anxious to proceed, but I understood that notice has been given of a contested-election case being taken up.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Elections gave notice before the holidays that it would call up the contested-election case to-morrow. While I have not talked with any member of the committee to-day, I know it is the expectation of the people interested that the case would come up to-morrow.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman from Illinois says he has information that it will be called up to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. No; I have not information that it will, but I have information that gentlemen interested in it expect it to be called up. The Delegate from Alaska expects it to be called up to-morrow.

Mr. SMALL. I am informed that if called up it would interrupt the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. It would. It is of the highest privilege.

Mr. SMALL. If it is not called up, Mr. Speaker, we will proceed with the river and harbor bill. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 3, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting the annual report of the operations of the Federal Farm Loan Board for the fiscal year ended November 30, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1624); to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 3, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek the light of Thy divine truth upon the problems that confront us this day. We have found from all our experiences that human wisdom is not sufficient for human life. Thou hast given to Thy children the revelation of Thyself. We pray that Thou, who didst command the light to shine out of the darkness, wilt manifest forth Thyself upon the path of human progress and lead us to accomplish the divine will. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of expenditures for the fiscal year 1918, out of the funds appropriated for the survey, construction, and maintenance of roads and trails within or only partly within the national forests, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have those cablegrams, and will send them to the Secretary's desk. I have indicated by pencil the limited parts of them which I desire to have printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PRESIDENT TO STOP AT QUIRINAL PALACE.

ROME, December 2, 1918.

President Wilson will reside in the Quirinal Palace on his visit here, occupying the royal reception suite, it was announced to-day.

[From the Washington Times.]

MRS. WILSON WILL GET PARIS GOWNS.

NEW YORK, December 1, 1918.

Without departing from her "made in America" principles, Mrs. Woodrow Wilson is to have several new Paris gowns, it became known here to-day.

A Fifth Avenue dressmaker sailed for France on the steamer Rochambeau, taking with him trunks containing materials from which Mrs. Wilson's gown will be made.

[From the Washington Times.]

BIG PALACE OF PRINCE MURAT IS MADE READY FOR PRESIDENT—A CLOSET FOR 50 SUITS OF CLOTHES—BATHROOM 30 FEET SQUARE—DINING TABLE TO SEAT 35 PEOPLE—DINNER SERVICE OF PURE GOLD—TELEPHONES IN EVERY ROOM—FRENCH TROOPS TO STAND GUARD.

(By Henry G. Wales, I. N. S. staff correspondent.)

PARIS, December 12.

Final details of making the residence of Prince Murat ready for the occupancy of President and Mrs. Wilson were completed to-day. Telephones have been installed throughout the mansions, even in the dressing rooms and bathrooms, and the electric lighting system has been improved.

President and Mrs. Wilson will dine at an inlaid mahogany table large enough to accommodate 35 guests. The princess left behind the celebrated gold dinner service for the use of the presidential party.

A beautiful gondola-shape bed was set aside for the President.

Mrs. Wilson will sleep in a canopied bed of pink brocade with pink tapestries. Mrs. Wilson will have the services of Georgette, the personal maid to Princess Murat.

CAPACIOUS CLOSETS.

The dressing rooms in the President's suite have closets big enough to hold 50 suits of clothes and 100 pairs of shoes, not to mention the space for hats.

The commodious closets in Mrs. Wilson's dressing quarters will accommodate 100 gowns, 200 pairs of shoes and slippers, 50 parasols, 50 fans, and other accessories of the feminine toilet.

The carpets on the floors are nearly an inch thick. Especial care was taken with the lighting system. The lights do not shine direct from the bulbs, but are shaded with globes of soft tones.

In the parlors are great candelabras with myriads of crystals dangling from them.

LARGE BATHROOMS.

The bathrooms are 30 feet square, containing movable tubs.

There are more than 3,000 glasses in the pantries with which to serve upward of 60 different kinds of beverages.

Cooks and waiters for the presidential party were provided by the French ministry of foreign affairs.

The grounds around the mansion—a couple of acres in extent—will be heavily guarded by French troops. An electric lighting system has been established so that the guards can signal to each other. Sentries will patrol the vast lawns all the time.

All the wonderful paintings and priceless tapestries which were removed during the bombardment of Paris have now been restored. When the first lady of the land becomes the temporary chatelaine she will be surrounded by magnificent surroundings of the days of the Louis—with the added attractions of open plumbing.

PRIVATE APARTMENTS.

The private apartments of President and Mrs. Wilson are on the second floor. They are reached by an impressive white marble staircase from a white marble entrance hall. The walls along the stairway are of varicolored marble, except the top landing, which is a vast sheet of mirror.

Opening off the central hall comes, first, a small private study. It contains a charming inlaid desk, where the President may continue his work facing a wonderful painting of Cupid and Psyche, almost filling the entire wall above the bookcases.

Next comes a large library, decorated in crimson damask. In it are many paintings and busts of Napoleon.

Adjoining the library is the President's sleeping apartment, which is also filled with innumerable relics, engravings, and paintings of the famous Emperor. The most striking feature of this room is a wonderful empire bed. All the furniture consists of equisite examples of the empire period, though the charm necessarily is broken by the anachronism of a typical American desk telephone on the empire stand near the bed.

Scarcely perceptible panels in the walls of sage-green broeade at both ends of the bed lead with the old alluring secrecy and charm characteristic of all well-regulated French palaces into Mrs. Wilson's apartments where Mme. La Presidente will make herself at home in the midst of soft, French gray walls, gray satin hangings, brocaded cupids, and garlands of golden hue.

GOLD AND GRAY.

The colorings throughout are of gold and gray. The bed with its graceful gilt canopy, draped with gray and yellow brocade, has a panel of fairylike filet lace as a background to the canopy at the head.

Easy chairs and a chaise lounge of brocade invite relaxation from social strain. A perfectly appointed writing table stands between two long windows which overlook the rear of the beautiful park that surrounds the house to the extent of a city block. This is in the heart of Paris.

Off the presidential bedchambers are large dressing rooms and bathrooms. The President's is done in ivory, his wife's in French gray. These, happily, are all in the 1918 period of comfort, luxuriousness, and sanitation.

There are unique collections of porcelains, ivory, prints, and paintings in the charming boudoir.

Small family salons and a dining room are on the same floor. The general color scheme is crimson. The walls are of brocade and the carpets are velvet.

On the ground floor the formal apartments are ornate with crystal chandeliers, mirrors, tapestries, and paintings, among which are many Greuze heads. The ballroom, grand salon, huge state dining room, and kitchens are all of regal proportions.

The third floor is reserved for other members of the family suite. Besides bedchambers, it contains offices and various workrooms.

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 2, 1918.]

ALLIES REGRET WILSON COMES TO PARIS AS A DELEGATE.

It is impossible to deny that the unfavorable impression created by the action of the President in appointing himself to be one of the actual delegates of the United States to the peace conference at Versailles which has been created among his fellow countrymen, even among those who have been his warm admirers, is generally shared abroad, especially among those foreign friends of the United States who have shown the greatest enthusiasm about his visit to Europe.

That he should come to Europe as the President of the United States and as the Chief Magistrate of the American Nation; that he should accord to the people of France and of Great Britain the opportunity of paying signal honor to the people of the United States in the person of their elected ruler; that he should be enabled to see with his own eyes the scenes of hideous German devastation and outrage in France and in Belgium; that President Poincare, King George, King Albert, and King Victor Emmanuel, as well as their premiers and foreign ministers, should have the advantage of meeting him in person and of discussing all pending issues privately with him was one thing. But that he should attend the conference at Versailles as one of the mere delegates seems to them to be a derogation of the dignity and of the prestige of his lofty office.

EMBARRASSING TO ALLIES.

None of the three Kings just enumerated nor yet the President of the French Republic will be seated at the council table of the conference at Versailles, although they are to be in Paris throughout the duration of the congress. They will be represented at its board by their premiers, by their foreign ministers, and by their plenipotentiaries, and will not, therefore, be exposed to contradictions and even recriminations at the sessions of the congress, which could only prove injurious to their prestige and to the respect due to their illustrious office.

For President Wilson to insist upon a seat at the council table as a self-appointed delegate of the United States is extremely embarrassing to the Governments of France and Great Britain, whose one thought has been to accord to him sovereign honors, and in that way to honor the Nation which he represents and of which he is the chief. They foresee all sorts of contretemps, not the least among them the one that if he attempts to impose upon the congress at those of its sessions at which he is present some of the ideas and views upon which he is known to have set his head he is certain to meet with opposition so strenuous that sight may be lost of the fact that he is the President of the United States instead of its mere delegate to the congress.

FEAR DISPUTE MAY MAR VISIT.

Even the President's closest friends and adherents admit that he does not relish opposition to his projects and that he does not brook easily contradiction; is, in fact, disposed to resent it. It is therefore feared that all the efforts on the part of the entente governments and nations to render his visit a success and to overwhelm him with enthusiasm, with hospitality, and with honors will be frustrated by the acute differences which are likely to develop at the council table of the congress.

There is yet another matter. In all former international congresses of this kind the presiding officer has been the premier of the country in which the conference took place. Prince Bismarck was the president of the international congresses of Berlin in 1878 and 1884. Prince Clement Metternich was the president of the congress of Vienna in 1814–15. Premier Beernaert was the president of the international congress of Brussels, and at the international congress of Algeciras some 10 years ago, where former Ambassador Henry White represented the United States, the chair was taken by the then prime minister of Spain.

WILL HE YIELD CHAIRMANSHIP?

According to all precedent, therefore, the presidency of the peace conference at Versailles belongs to old Premier Clemenceau, since it is France on whose soil the congress is taking place and who is playing the rôle of hostess to the other nations of the entente in the matter. But how can Woodrow Wilson, who, in addition to being the principal delegate of the American Nation, is also the President of the United States, be content to yield the "pas," to accord the first place, and to submit to the rulings of one who is not, like himself, the ruler of a great nation, but only its prime minister?

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 14, 1918.]

EUROPE WILL EXPECT WILSON TO BE FREE WITH GRATUITIES.

President Wilson while abroad will be required to spend a considerable sum of money in gratuities.

In the first place, he will be expected to leave with the president of the municipal council of Paris, with the lord mayor or with the chairman of the county council of London, with Prince Colonna, the mayor of Rome, and, if he goes to Belgium, with the heroic Mayor Max, of Brussels, sums amounting to at least $10,000 each for the poor of their respective capitals.

The tips to the servants and to the people of that class at the Elysee Palace and at the Maison Murat in Paris, at Buckingham Palace in London, and at the Quirinal in Rome will also total up a pretty large sum.

The custom of the various Presidents of the French Republic when paying state visits to foreign rulers and of monarchs when returning these visits has been to intrust a lump sum to one of the principal dignitaries of the palace for the purpose. The sums vary, according to the importance and means of the ruler, and whereas Emperors of Russia have given as much as $20,000 and even $30,000 for a few days' stay, other monarchs have been content to donate $10,000 for the purpose.

If my memory serves me aright, President Poincare left with Gen. Count Freedericz, the minister of the imperial household at Petrograd, a sum of $20,000 for distribution among the domestic servants on the occasion of his last visit to the court of Czar Nicholas II in the summer of 1914.

PRESENTS FOR DIGNITARIES.

Nor is this all. There are the dignitaries of the court in London and Rome and the officials of President Poincare's household and the Government officers more especially concerned with the visit of the Chief Magistrate of the United States to be remembered. These, in the case of the interchange of visits between European rulers, are usually satisfied by means of orders and decorations, of which there is always a great distribution on such occasions. But since President Wilson has nothing of the kind at his disposal for such purposes, he will be expected to give gold and silver cigar boxes, cigar cases, cigarette cases, pieces of jewelry in the shape of scarfpins, etc., and handsomely framed and autographed portraits of himself.

Until the last decade of her reign Queen Victoria would not permit the officials of her court to accept any foreign orders of knighthood, and the result was that continental rulers entertained by her at Buckingham Palace, Windsor, or Osborne were restricted to distributing gifts of jewelry among the court dignitaries or else pieces of statuary. The former were more highly prized, since they could be converted into cash.

KAISER GAVE BUSTS OF SELF.

The former Kaiser was wont when he went off on state visits to fellow monarchs to carry along with him huge cases of marble busts o' himself, varying in size. He would distribute as many as two or three dozen of them on any one occasion of this kind, and to-day they must be a drug in the market by reason of their quality, their lack of artistic merit, and the execration in which the personage whose features they portray is everywhere held.

The United States is regarded abroad as the richest country in the world. Every American is supposed to be rolling in wealth, and assuredly the loans to the various foreign governments and the amounts subscribed on this side of the Atlantic to the many funds for the relief of suffering in Europe in connection with the war have gone far to strengthen this impression. Much will therefore be expected of President Wilson in what are, after all, nothing more nor less than tips.

70,000 YANKS AT BREST LIVE IN MUD SWAMPS WHILE AWAITING SHIPS—INADEQUATELY SHELTERED AND INSUFFICIENTLY NOURISHED—DISGRACE TO AMERICA—"PONTANEZEN," PLACE OF CONCENTRATION, IS CALLED A CRIME—MEN NEAR TO REBELLION—THEY PLEAD FOR REDRESS—CAMP A SEA OF MUD THIGH HIGH—RATIONS FROM GARBAGE CANS AND COFFEE FROM ASH RECEPTACLES—FOOD IMPOSSIBLE AND YET NOT ENOUGH TO GO AROUND—RESPONSIBILITY NOT WITH A. E. F., BUT MAY BE TRACED TO WASHINGTON—NOT VISITED BY PRESIDENT WILSON.

George Rothwell Brown, of the Washington Post staff, arrived in the United States on the Mauretania last Monday, after four months spent on the battle fronts and in the capitals of the allied nations. He has obtained, at first hand, a vast fund of information concerning the war, which will be given to readers of the Post in a series of articles, the first of which, dealing with the condition of American soldiers in Camp Pontanezen, at Brest, appears below:

"WORST PLACE ON EARTH," GEN. BUTLER CALLS CAMP AT BREST HE COMMANDS.

An officer: "You ought to go out to Pontanezen—it's a crime."

A surgeon says: "Anything may break out in this camp; anything."

Brig. Gen. Butler, United States Marine Corps, commander of the camp: "It's the worst place I have ever seen anywhere on earth, and I have traveled all over the world."

(By George Rothwell Brown.)

Seventy thousand American soldiers are awaiting transportation home at Brest under living conditions of such intolerable wretchedness and misery that one marvels at the patience and discipline that keep them from breaking into open rebellion.

Insufficiently nourished and inadequately sheltered from the elements of a Breton winter, they are enduring with dumb fortitude a state of affairs that is a disgrace to the Government. Seventy thousand helpless sons of the Republic which they went across the seas to save are mutely pleading for redress of the great wrongs to which they are being subjected and under which they and their officers, who are suffering with them, are helpless in the face of a system that has broken down.

PERFORM HEAVY MANUAL LABOR.

Seventy thousand men, many of them concentrated near the seaport at this place, fresh from the battle fields, and the great majority of them the undeveloped youth of the Nation, are obliged to perform heavy manual labor beyond their strength at a time when a grateful people should be extending to them not merely cheers and laudations but the more substantial rewards of valor, comfort, and rest, and recreation.

The concentration camp where these splendid American boys are kept like wild beasts is 3 miles from Brest, over one of the bleakest roads in Brittany. It covers an area of about 1 square mile—between 600 and 700 acres of swamp. Some of the men are living in rude barracks buildings of wood, but by far the greater part are under canvas. Most of the tents are old and thin and poor in quality and leak continually under the pouring rain which falls steadily in Brittany at this season of the year. Out of 120 of the tents which I visited, less than 30 had board floors, and in those that did the boards were right on the ground and water soaked.

NOT A DRY SPOT IN CAMP.

None of these tents is ditched, and the splendid men whose exploits the people at home are complacently applauding are obliged to put their bedding rolls down in the mire on the bare ground that is continually flooded. There is not a dry spot in this camp—not one.

I have seen mud in the front-line trenches and thought I knew what mud was, but I realized that I had never known what mud was until I visited this miserable place of suffering. The mud in many parts of this camp is not merely knee high, it is thigh high. Every company street is a river of mud, which flows over into the tents, covering the men and the rude bed rolls in which they sleep with greasy black slime. The officers wear rubber boots that reach to the hips, and so do all the men who can obtain them.

TASK TOO HARD FOR MEN.

Walking through the company streets of the camp is in itself an arduous labor, for one becomes continually mired, and has to exert all his strength to pull a foot out of the ooze and set it down in another place. There are practically no "duckboards" in the camp, owing to the scarcity of lumber, and where there are "duckboards" they are out of sight, for the resistless mud has overflowed and covered them.

In an effort to bring some order out of the existing chaos the soldiers have been put to work like common laborers. It is a heart-breaking sight to see them struggling under tasks too hard for them to perform, carrying heavy timbers on their backs, patiently, as yet, but with the fires of a consuming wrath smoldering in their breasts, which burn with indignation and resentment.

RATIONS FROM GARBAGE CANS.

The men are fed in a number of rough cook sheds, marching in single file, each man carrying his own mess kit, into which the cooks ladle out portions of the rations from large zinc garbage cans. Each man carries his mess kit with him all the time, and must keep it clean himself. The floors of the cook sheds are slippery with mud that flows in from the outside and is tracked in by countless feet. There are enlightened States in this Union whose sanitary laws compel farmers to keep their hogs better than the United States Government is keeping its patriotic soldiers here.

With grim humor the Army calls this place a "rest camp." God save the mark! Its name is "Camp Pontanezen." That is a name that is going to be heard frequently in the future, for these men now suffering there are coming home some day, and mighty will be their wrath and loud their cry for justice upon the heads of those incompetents who are responsible for what they have endured.

RESPONSIBILITY NOT ON A. E. F.

I do not know who is to blame, but I think that the responsibility should not fairly be placed upon the "A. E. F." Some day I expect to see it traced straight back to Washington.

These 70,000 men—there will soon be 100,000 unless the thing is stopped—are the victims of incompetency and blunders. They were concentrated at Brest before any adequate plan for their reception had been worked out. There are German prison camps in France, that I have inspected, that are models of sanitation and cleanliness. There isn't a German prisoner in France who has been subjected to the conditions our own sons and brothers are here forced to endure.

To make this camp habitable 16,000,000 feet of lumber are needed immediately. It is not there. Nobody knows whether it ever will be there. Down at St. Nazaire are 6,000,000 feet, but though heaven and earth have been moved, the lumber hasn't.

HEALTH OF CAMP GOOD.

The health of the camp at present is good, for the men have come there from the front, or from other camps, where they have been toughened and hardened by a fine outdoor life. I spoke to one of the surgeons about this. He shook his head.

"The health of the men is good now," he said, "but I dread to think what may happen within a month."

"Do you mean an epidemic?" I asked.

"Anything may break out in this camp," he replied; "anything."

As I was going into this camp I stopped an officer. "What do you call this place?" I asked him.

CALLS THE PLACE A CRIME.

"I call it a crime," he answered, and passed on down the road.

An officer said to me at luncheon at the little Café Marine in Brest: "You ought to go out to Pontanezen, it's a crime."

A soldier on the boat in which I crossed stopped me on deck and ask : me if I had been to Pontanezen. I told him I had. "Isn't it a crime?" he asked, and I agreed with him. That is precisely what it is—a crime—and the men responsible for it should be dismissed from the service of the Government. If I had a brother who was responsible for Pontanezen I would disown him.

I spent a day at this place and am writing from first-hand information. Nobody told me—I saw. I ate there—or tried to. With two officers I took a mess kit and stood in line and marched through the slimy kitchen and obtained my portion of the "chow."

FED AS CATTLE MIGHT BE.

I received in my plate a piece of corned beef a little larger than my fist, some rice, some thick gravy, and a spoonful of boiled cabbage. As we passed out in a constantly moving line, the men being fed as cattle might be, I seized a piece of bread—white bread of good quality, but dry and without butter. Outside, in the open air, under the pouring rain, in a narrow alley between two kitchens, I stood knee-deep in the mud while my cup was filled with coffee from a large zinc ash can.

Provided then with food, the officers and I passed into the officers' mess room, a long room lined with rows of rough board tables. The soldiers eat their meals outdoors in the rain, standing up. We sat down on benches and began to eat. There was no table cloth on the table, no butter, no salt, nothing but the bare boards.

COULD NOT EAT THE MEAT.

I found that of my piece of corned beef a piece about the size of three fingers was fit to eat. The balance was unpalatable fat. I could not eat it, and I was hungrey, too, for I had gone without my breakfast to visit this camp. Neither could the officers eat their meat. They said that the cabbage was an innovation, a real treat, the first green vegetable of any kind that had been served for a week. We tried the cabbage and found it almost raw, but managed to eat most of it.

The rice was only half cooked, and we passed it up. I then tried the coffee and found it so nauseating that I could not drink it. Now, I have frequently eaten soldiers' rations at the front, where our men have been well fed. I can eat rough fare and enjoy it. But I could not eat the stuff they serve the men at Pontanezen and that they call "food."

NOT ENOUGH FOOD AT THAT.

After dinner, which was served in the middle of the day, each of us washed his own mess kit in a large can of water. By the time 50 men had washed their greasy pans in that can of water—well, they had to wash them there, that's all!

Not only is the food at Pontanezen poor in quality and badly cooked, but frequently there is not enough of it. One night, just before I left Brest, there was a sizable revolt at camp for this reason. The commanding officer was summoned, heard the complaints of the men, and ordered the cooks to prepare another meal—the evening meal—to be ready at 8.30 o'clock. This the hungry men ate in the rain, in the dark.

NOT VISITED BY WILSON.

Now, in order to have a chance to file past the cooks and receive their portion of this mess of food three times a day, the men, these same boys of ours who have been fighting our battles for us 3,000 miles away from home, and their officers, who are sticking by them, are obliged to stand knee-deep in mud, in the pouring rain that falls every day, for an hour or two hours and a half. No wonder they call it a crime.

There was never any plan for this concentration camp. They did not tackle the job in time. President Wilson did not visit this camp, and, so far as I know, did not learn of the plight our men are in. He was too busy with receptions when he was in Brest.

YANK'S BEST CHRISTMAS.

After four months in France, my second visit there this year, I sailed from Brest on the Mauretania on Christmas eve. The next morning on deck I sat down beside a wounded soldier. With a grin he wished me a "Merry Christmas," and I felt ashamed of myself, for I had forgotten what day it was.

"I'll tell you," he said, "this big old boat that is taking me home is the best Christmas present I have ever had, and this is the happiest Christmas I have known in all my life."

I glanced down from the golden wound stripe on his arm and saw that his right leg had been amputated above the knee, but the joy of a supreme happiness was shining in his eyes which sparkled like the sea.

"MAURETANIA" A CHEERFUL BOAT.

This ship was full of wounded, the badly wounded, the armless and legless, and there were boys in the wards downstairs with limbs intact who will never walk again, for they had been shot through the spine. But the Mauretania was a most cheerful place. There was never a word of complaint from the wounded boys who hobbled about the decks on their crutches, and in the wards below I never heard a moan or a sigh. They were homeward bound! They gamely accepted their fate as patriots and philosophers.

That is the kind of manhood we have sent to France to fight for us and our liberties. Are boys like these entitled to something better than this cesspool at Pontanezen, that the Government calls a "rest camp"? I'll say they are. And are the American people, who have poured out their billions with such generous hearts, entitled to more than this for the treasure they so lavishly spent? I'll say they are.

"WORST PLACE ON EARTH."

This camp at Pontanezen is commanded now by Brig. Gen. Butler, United States Marine Corps, a fighting soldier who in previous wars won two congressional medals of honor. He should have been with the fighting marines on the front in this war, where doubtless he would have won more honors, but that is another story—a Marine Corps story. He is a splendid type of efficient soldier, who recently took command of the camp and is working night and day to try to solve the problem that confronts him. I said to him:

"General, this camp at Pontanezen is the worst place I have seen anywhere in France."

"Mr. Brown," he replied, snapping his jaws, "it's the worst place I have seen anywhere on earth, and I have traveled all over the world."

GORGEOUS SCENE AT BANQUET—ALL ROYAL FORMALITIES OBSERVED AT KING'S DINNER TO WILSON—LAVISH DISPLAY OF PLATE—GOLD SERVICES WORTH $15,000,000 ARE BROUGHT FROM PALACE VAULTS FOR OCCASION—WORLD PEACE A KEYNOTE—KING EXPRESSES HOPE OF AVERTING MORE WARS—PRESIDENT POINTS TO DUTY OF NATIONS.

LONDON, December 27.

No more regal setting had ever been arranged in Buckingham Palace than that which greeted President Wilson and Mrs. Wilson when they were escorted into the banquet hall to-night for the state dinner.

Every royal formality which has attended epochal occasions at the palace for two or three hundred years was carried out before and during the banquet. President Wilson with Queen Mary led the procession into the dining hall, preceded by officials of the palace, splendidly costumed, bearing wands and walking backward and make obeisance to the guests.

Immediately behind the President and the Queen came King George and Mrs. Wilson. They were followed by members of the royal family.

At the head of the table 12 persons were seated, with King George in the middle. President Wilson sat at the King's right and Mrs. Wilson at his left. To the right of President Wilson was Queen Mary, and then the French ambassador, Princess Christian, the Spanish ambassador, and Princess Patricia, daughter of the Duke of Connaught. At Mrs. Wilson's left sat Princess Mary, the Italian ambassador, Princess Beatrice, and the Japanese ambassador, in the order named. The American ambassador, John W. Davis, had the first place at a side rectangular table on President Wilson's right.

Prior to the dinner President and Mrs. Wilson were escorted from their apartments to the great white drawing room, where the royal family had gathered with their other guests. These guests were presented to President and Mrs. Wilson, and the dinner party immediately proceeded to the dining hall.

BANQUET HALL A SCENE OF SPLENDOR.

The scene as the guests proceeded to the hall was one of splendor. In the dining salon was a great collection of solid gold plate and huge gold ornaments valued at $15,000,000. These had been brought from the vaults for the occasion. One of three buffets contained pieces of plate too large or otherwise too cumbersome for use. These included one piece of great size taken from the wreck of the Spanish Armada.

In color the gold-laden table blended with the decorations in the hall, which are white and gold, with crimson carpet and upholstering to match. The crimson effect was further carried out by the exclusive use of poinsettias as floral decorations. In the balcony at the end of the room was a military orchestra. It was not hidden from view by floral or other decorations. The attendants were in full state dress, which was heavy with gold lace.

The banquet hall, which is 200 feet long by 75 feet wide, was approached by the guests through a state hallway approximately a block long, richly furnished and decorated with paintings and porcelain. The banquet hall occasionally is used for banquets and other purposes and has a throne at one end.

The main table was arranged so that the backs of President Wilson and King George were toward the throne.

The permanent decorations seemed strikingly simple when compared with the regal table. The only art on the walls was one Cobelin tapestry. On each side six cut-glass chandeliers hung from the extremely high ceiling, but for the banquet to-night 128 candles in gold candelabra, each surmounted by a pink silk shade, were used. Other light was obtained from fancy wall fixtures.

HALBERDIERS IN ATTENDANCE.

The general body of the guests preceded the royal family and the presidential and ambassadorial guests into the banquet hall. They rose and remained standing while the main guests and the hosts entered in procession. Heading the procession was the lord chamberlain and the lord steward and other officials in state regalia. Yeomen of the guard in red Elizabethan costumes and with halberds were in attendance.

Queen Mary wore a cream-colored gown of silk with a long train and a tiara of diamonds and many other jewels. Mrs. Wilson's dress was black, with spangles, and was made at the White House. She wore very few jewels.

The military and naval officers were in service uniforms and wore their swords. The ambassadors were in full ambassadorial uniform. President Wilson and Ambassador Davis wore the usual formal American evening clothes. The British civilian guests wore court dress and the insignia of many orders.

In his address of welcome to the President and Mrs. Wilson, King George expressed the hope that some plan might be devised by which the risk of future wars might be averted.

The President in his reply said that he had consulted the spokesmen of the British Government and those of France and Italy and that he was glad to say that he had found them to be in accord with his views as to the duty of the nations.

TWO MILLION CHEER WILSON—ENTHUSIASM FOR PRESIDENT THE EXPRESSION OF GRATITUDE TO AMERICA—ACCLAMATION IS HEARTFELT—INTENSITY OF POPULAR DEMONSTRATIONS SURPASSES EVEN THOSE OF "ARMISTICE NIGHT"—FLOWERS STREW HIS PATH—RAIN OF ROSES AND VIOLETS UPON HIS CARRIAGE—ENTERTAINED AT A STATE LUNCHEON.

(By Charles A. Selden.)

PARIS, December 14, 1918.

President Wilson arrived in Paris this morning, and the inhabitants of the city, with hosts from outside, made the most of their long-awaited opportunity to give expression to their feelings of gratitude to and admiration for the first citizen of the United States.

There were no "ifs," "buts," or "ands" about the tumultuous and joyous reception accorded by the populace.

For a week the tone of the Paris press has been, "We are glad you are coming, Mr. President, but hope that you won't insist on our doing what we don't want to do at the peace conference."

There was none of that attitude in the public demonstration, no reservation whatever. On the contrary, Paris was madly enthusiastic in its greeting to the first President of the United States who ever came to Europe. They did not care for a moment what the peace ideas were in the uncovered gray head which bowed its way through the famous thoroughfares of Paris, lined with tens of thousands of French troops holding back hundreds of thousands of French people.

To these Parisians the man whom they cheered and threw flowers at was simply the man who had sent the American troops which had saved this same Paris from capture by the Germans no longer ago than last July. So the reception was one of gratitude and affection, without a shade of political thought or significance.

There were neither Socialists nor Royalists in that crowd, only grateful Frenchmen and Frenchwomen, happy to see the one man on whom they could concentrate their devotion and thanks for what America had done since April, 1917. It was the same with the soldiers as with the civilians. Except for the guns and uniforms of the more than 50,000 police who lined the 5-mile route there was no difference between the fighters in the front and the men and women banked up behind them from the sidewalk level to the housetops and the tree tops.

French Army discipline is elastic enough to let the soldier express his human emotions even on duty, so these soldiers joined with the rest in cheering the Commander in Chief of the soldiers who fought at Chateau-Thierry and in the Argonne.

Everything was in the President's favor. Even the weather is worth mentioning, for the quality of it was almost rare for Paris at this time of year as is the visits of an American President. Not only did it not rain, but small patches of the sky were actually blue. Previously the only blues in Paris this winter have been horizon blue of the French uniform and the blues of the Americans who want to go home.

The presidential train reached the Bois de Boulogne station at exactly 10 o'clock. One could get the first emotional thrill out of the very slowness with which the locomotive, draped with an American flag, moved into the station to bring the door of the Wilson car to an exact halt at the red-carpeted platform, where President Poincare and Mrs. Poincare and Premier Clemenceau stood to greet the nation's guest.

The President was the first man out of the car, looking remarkably well and happy. The platform greetings were very brief and informal. Five minutes later the Presidents of the French and American Republics, sitting together in an open carriage drawn by two horses, began their drive, which will remain always as an historic and moving episode to the city of episodes and pageants.

Following them in the second carriage were Mrs. Wilson, Miss Wilson, Mme. Poincaré, and Mme. Jusserand. And after that were not more than a dozen other carriages, containing civil and military dignitaries of France and America. Ambassador Sharpe rode with Premier Clemenceau. Gen. Bliss was in a carriage ahead of Gen. Pershing. Secretary Lansing rode with M. Pichon, the French minister of foreign affairs.

At the station a young woman in the peasant costume of Alsace got through the lines, and carried a big bunch of roses to the President's carriage. A group of schoolboys did the same thing, and loaded Mrs. Wilson's carriage with violets.

Violets were the flowers of the day. The Champ Elysées was covered with bunches which were thrown at the Wilson carriage, but fell on the pavement.

The only break in the miles of French troops was a two-block stretch of sidewalk on Avenue de Bois de Boulogne, which was filled by wounded American soldiers from a near-by military hospital. Chairs and boxes had been placed for them.

These were the first men wearing American uniforms whom Wilson saw in Paris. Of course, no American troops were under arms or participated in any way in the reception.

But every American soldier off duty and every American civilian in Paris was somewhere in the line to cheer the chief of his or her own country. We knew how the British felt the other day when King George rode down the same avenue.

A detour was made from the Champ Elysées to cross the Seine over the Alexander III Bridge, which recalled another historic pageant when Paris outdid itself to honor an absolute ruler in the person of the Czar. Then the party came back across the river through the Place de la Concorde, by the Church of the Madeleine, and on to the palace of Prince Murat, who was there standing at the entrance to welcome the President to what is to be his home during his stay in Paris.

Paris simply can not and will not work on such occasions as these. It was so the other day for King George, and a little later for the King and Queen of the Belgians.

To-day and to-morrow have been officially declared fête days for the capital, and, without making comparisons, it is safe to assume that the city will break all its wonderful records in a tumult of hospitality.

Paris is more or less accustomed to kings and czars. The people of little more than middle age recall when France had an Emperor of her own, but this is the first time, of course, that Paris ever entertained an American President, and Paris loves a novelty as well as to greet the head of a friendly State.

VICTORIES WOULD BE VAIN, POINCARE TELLS WILSON, IF GERMAN ATROCITIES WERE TO REMAIN UNPUNISHED.

PARIS, December 14, 1918.

Speaking at the luncheon to President Wilson given at the Elysée Palace to-day, President Poincare said:

"Mr. President, Paris and France awaited you with impatience. They were eager to acclaim in you the illustrious democrat whose words and deeds were inspired by exalted thought, the philosopher delighting in the solution of universal laws from particular events, the eminent statesman who had found a way to express the highest political and moral truths in formulas which bear the stamp of immortality.

"They had also a passionate desire to offer thanks, in your person, to the great Republic of which you are the chief for the invaluable assistance which had been given spontaneously, during this war, to the defenders of right and liberty.

"Even before America had resolved to intervene in the struggle she had shown to the wounded and to the orphans of France a solicitude and a generosity the memory of which will always be enshrined in our hearts. The liberality of your Red Cross, the countless gifts of your fellow citizens, the inspiring initiative of American women, anticipated your military and naval action, and showed the world to which side your sympathies inclined. And on the day when you flung yourselves into the battle, with what determination your great people and yourself prepared."

LAW TO BAR PRESIDENT FROM PEACE CONFERENCE DISCOVERED.

WASHINGTON, December 4, 1918.

Widespread interest has been aroused at the Capital, especially in the two Houses of Congress, by the discovery or, rather, the resuscitation of a law on the statute books which reads as follows:

"Hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law to do so."

This law was enacted March 4, 1913, and is certain to be invoked by those who are forming an indictment against President Wilson for having abandoned Washington and his constitutional duties while Congress is in session, to go as a self-appointed delegate to an international conference to which he was not formally invited and without the sanction or, indeed, the approval of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] yesterday referred to the very great difficulty of obtaining information from those in the military service. Hundreds of telegrams and letters come to me asking for tidings of members of the family in the military service. The Navy Department is the only place I have found human sympathy and prompt action, and I gladly testify to it. My communications with the Navy Department authorities have been satisfactory, so far as I have had any occasion to invoke their services. They have readily cabled and used every facility at their command to locate the members of the naval service who have been abroad, and have done so to the very limit of their ability.

It has been impossible to obtain the information of casualties or a word from long absent, unheard-of soldiers in the foreign service. Sleepless mothers pray for relief from their anxiety, and the careworn faces of despairing fathers haunt the days. Whether their sons are in the hospital sick or wounded or dead in a foreign grave, it is the highest duty of Government to end their suspense. Parents do not dread the death or wounds which they know are inevitable in war, but the delay by inefficiency and bureaucratic martinets is silently killing the mothers of the country. I am constantly told the cables are overworked with accumulated messages, and we must wait. So we do, but while we wait these parents, as well as Senators, read from 6 to 15 columns of cabled news minutely describing the President's reception in the various capitals of Europe. The cables inform us in great detail of the gowns and headgear of queens, princesses, and Mrs. President. The latest dress design known to Paris is worthy of a cable. Even it is noted that Mrs. Wilson wears an aigrette among other ornaments of the hat.

My recollection is that in the safety-to-birds act the one growing this desirable aigrette token is protected in our country by an act of Congress.

I have no objection to this news, but I do want first the mothers who are awake nights informed of whether their sons are dead or in a hospital with wounds or well, and then I am willing for the cables to be used for all news purposes afterwards.

The cable likewise describes the palace of Prince Murat. We are told in detail of closets for 50 suits of clothes, 30-foot square bathroom, a 35-seat dining-room table, dinner service of pure gold, telephones in every room, inlaid mahogany table, gondola-shaped bed, canopied with pink brocade and pink tapestries, the services of Georgette, the personal maid of Princess Murat, the ladies' closets large enough for 100 gowns, 200 pairs of shoes and slippers, 50 parasols, 50 fans, and other feminine accessories, delight the American people and give to anxious parents information so desired. More than 3,000 glasses, we are further informed, load the pantries of this palace, serving more than 60 different kinds of beverages.

I am reading this at the risk of being accused by my distinguished colleague [Mr. LEWIS] of doing it for political purposes. I wish the information for my next door neighbor's wife, whose three sons have not been heard of for months, before the cables groan with such messages.

The interior finish of the private apartment is cabled in full. I forbear to quote it all. The splendor is stunning to an unsophisticated American. The President's private study occupied in this palace contains a charming inlaid desk where the President may work facing a wonderful painting of Cupid and Psyche, filling almost the entire wall above the bookcases. The library is decorated in crimson damask. It contains many paintings and busts of Napoleon, with numerous relics of that deceased gentleman. An empire bed is described, tapestries, brocaded Cupids and panels of fairylike fillet lace, with unique collections of porcelains, ivory, with carpets on the floor nearly an inch thick. The servants' staff, with a guard of French soldiers, is described. So much for Paris.

In London the overloaded cables convey to us, while sorrowing anxious mothers wait, the regal splendor of the honors done the President. We are informed, with great particularity, December 27, 1918:

Every royal formality which has attended epochal occasions at the palace for two or three hundred years was carried out during the banquet. President Wilson with Queen Mary led the procession into the dining hall, preceded by officials of the palace, splendidly costumed, bearing wands and walking backward and making obeisance to the guests.

I want less obeisance and more information about the absent soldiers in the hospitals or in the field.

January 1, 1919, at Brest, France, an eyewitness says 70,000 American soldiers are awaiting transportation home under living conditions of such intolerable wretchedness and misery that one marvels at the patience and discipline that keep them from breaking into open rebellion. Insufficiently nourished and inadequately sheltered from the elements of a Breton winter, they are enduring with dumb fortitude a state of affairs that is a disgrace to the Government. Seventy thousand helpless sons of the Republic which they went across the seas to save are mutely pleading for redress of the great wrong to which they are being subjected and under which they and their officers are helpless in the face of a system that has broken down.

That is why the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], in his timely remarks a few days ago, indulged in a very needed criticism.

Correspondent Brown in the article quoted states that the mud in many parts of this camp is not merely knee high, it is thigh high. The men are fed from food ladled out of large zinc garbage cans. While no doubt they are clean, the mental suggestion connected with them is far from appetizing. The food is badly cooked and unpalatable. The sanitary conditions are threatening. A surgeon at the camp says, "Anything may break out in this camp."

The place is called a crime.

I wish to compare the zinc garbage cans, out of which the American soldier is fed, with the $15,000,000 solid-gold plate service and the inlaid mahogany table from which the President and Rear Admiral Grayson are feasting in London.

It was to prevent such scenes as this that Congress required the Executive's duties to be exercised at the seat of government by the act of 1790. By the act of March 4, 1913, it was further provided that the President should not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international conference without first having specific authority of law to do so. Both of these essential acts have been violated in letter and spirit.

I am willing to hear explanations of Senators at any time, whether the President is absent as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy or as the civil Chief Magistrate of this Republic, in which capacity, or both, he is now absent, in flat defiance of an act of Congress approved March 4, 1913, as well as the older act of 1790. Martial law has not been declared upon any of the soil of this Republic, the civil laws are still in force; no reason exists for suspending the laws of the land. Martial law can not be declared unless the facts justify it. One of such facts would be an invasion by a public enemy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, what is the date of the act of Congress referred to by the Senator?

Mr. SHERMAN. The 4th of March, 1913. It is found in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved on that date. Both of these essential acts have been violated in both letter and spirit.

The cables have been burdened with useless news. Sleepless mothers have been crowded off the wires in this foolish and cruel display of un-American adulation abroad.

We are further informed that the tips expected to be paid by the President at the several palaces where he is lodged and entertained in Paris, London, Rome, and Brussels will run from $10,000 to $30,000 each for the parasites who walk backward making obeisance to guests and other useless appendages of European pomp and circumstance. These tips would pay many cable messages to anxious mothers and be of some real service when drawn from the Public Treasury supplied by taxes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to inquire of him whether the information which has been published under the guise of cable dispatches describing the reception of the President, the character of the house which he occupies, and so forth, was really sent during the period of time that the President was there, or whether these dispatches are not written by correspondents, sent in advance, and then released under the guise of cable dispatches.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are reported as cable dispatches.

Mr. THOMAS. I know they are.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no way of penetrating the secrets of the editorial room.

Mr. THOMAS. In the case of many papers, matter appearing as dispatches is composed in their editorial sanctums.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Associated Press is a reputable news-gathering organization; I have always found it to be reliable; and it reports these matters as cablegrams.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I do not dispute the fact; I am simply inquiring as to whether or not the Senator had verified the facts. Of course, the Associated Press is a reputable concern; but I am informed upon very good authority that a great deal of the stuff that we read in the newspapers as cable dispatches consists of communications of correspondents previously made and released upon the occasion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know the date lines are those of Paris and London and the matter purports to be cabled. The Senator can, by communicating with the Associated Press or the International News Service, the Hearst Agency, find out whether these are bona fide cables or whether they are fabricated in the offices of the several newspapers. I think they are bona fide.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; of course, I can do that; but my purpose was to ascertain whether the Senator had done it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not investigated it in that particular. I have investigated in other particulars, Mr. President, matters in which I have been personally interested, especially in connection with information I have been trying to get as to wounded soldiers and sailors through proper avenues in the department, and at other times, at my own expense, paying for the cablegrams myself. I find ordinarily that the cables are reported accurately going to newspaper offices or these news-gathering agencies like the Associated Press. When I have failed in other particulars, I have found truthful reports in press agencies. This is corroborative evidence and ordinarily, in dealing with any established agency where they have told me the truth in other particulars, I take the date line and the subject matter and like matters of news gathering as being truthful. I take it that these reports, Mr. President, are worthy of credence, at least until they have been controverted and proven not to be so.

LORD BRYCE'S VIEWS OF A PEACE LEAGUE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed a brief extract, which I am going to take the liberty of reading, as it bears upon our debate. I hold in my hand the volume of Essays and Addresses in War Time, by Lord Bryce, as everyone knows, one of the most eminent statesmen, historians, and publicists now living. The last essay in the book is concerning a peace league, of which he is a very strong advocate, but he realizes that, while everyone desires the peace of the world, there are differences of methods. The whole essay is well worth reading, and I should be glad to have it all printed in the RECORD, but I do not want to interfere with the copyright. So I am going to ask leave to read his summing up, and I think that it gives a very good idea of what those who have thought about the league of nations mean and what they understand by it.

Lord Bryce says:

"It may be convenient to sum up in a few propositions the reasons for creating a peace league and the essential features which it ought to possess:

"1. The prevention of future wars will be, after this war has ended, one of the supreme needs of the world.

"2. War can be prevented only by substituting for it methods of arbitration and conciliation as the means of settling international disputes.

"3. Arbitration and conciliation can not succeed unless there is compulsive force behind them.

"4. Compulsive force can be secured only by the cooperation and combination of peace-loving nations, i. e., by a league to enforce peace.

"5. Every member of such a league must undertake to accept arbitration or conciliation in any controversy it may have with another member.

"6. The league shall undertake to defend any one of its members who may be attacked by any other State which has refused to accept arbitration or conciliation.

"7. The league will require four organs for its action: (a) A tribunal to arbitrate on justiciable controversies; (b) a council of conciliation to inquire into and apply mediation in non-justiciable controversies; (c) a representative conference or congress to amend, develop, and codify international law; and (d) an executive authority to decide on the time and methods of applying (and to supervise the application of) measures for compelling disputant States to submit to arbitration and to allow time for conciliation before resorting to hostilities.

"8. The methods of enforcement may be either the use of economic pressure or the use of armed force, or both, as the executive authority may determine.

"9. The league shall adopt any measures it finds to be practicable for bringing about a general reduction of military and naval armaments.

"These may be taken as the chief points on which most of those who have been advocating the project in Britain and America are agreed. Other points of importance, but on which some difference of opinion exists, are the following:"

These are the points of importance which those who favor the league are not agreed upon:

"(a) What shall be the principle regulating the admission of States to a peace league?

"(b) Shall all the members of the league (great and small) have equal powers and responsibilities, or, if not, how shall these be distributed?

"(c) How shall the persons to serve on the tribunal of arbitration and on the council of conciliation be chosen?

"(d) Shall the executive authority of the league consist of persons representing the governments of the States who are its members, or how otherwise?

"(e) Shall the council of conciliation have power to act when it sees dangers which threaten peace looming up, without being invoked by a disputant State?

"(f) Shall the league have a standing army and navy, or shall it obtain its necessary forces by summoning the contingents of the States (or of the greater States) when the need for military action arises?

"(g) Shall a decision to apply compulsion (economic or military) require the concurrence of all the States who are members of the league, or, if not, what majority shall be required?

"(h) Shall force (economic or military) be applied only to compel the acceptance by disputant States of arbitration or of conciliation (as the case may be), or also to compel such States to obey the judgment of the tribunal of arbitration, or the recommendations of the council of conciliation, as the case may be?

"(i) What methods are to be resorted to for securing a reduction of military and naval armaments?

"(j) To what extent may the diplomacy of the States composing the league continue to be conducted secretly?

"(k) Are the States composing the league to be at liberty to make separate treaties with one another?

"(l) Are tariff duties on imports and the fiscal relations generally of the States composing the league to fall to any; and if so, to what extent within the scope of the league's action? In particular, are preferential duties on imports to be deemed incompatible with the successful working of the league?

"Such a list as this, incomplete as it is, of problems to be solved in setting up some machinery for averting war shows how immensely difficult is the task."

And yet Lord Bryce has omitted one important point. There is one nation already that has said that one thing to be settled in the league must be that there shall be no race exclusion.

I merely desire to print these extracts, for I think, coming from such a source, they deserve the attention and examination of the Senate.

Mr. President, I also ask leave to have printed, without reading, two extracts which I have made from a book by Mr. H. G. Wells, the well-known and brilliant novelist, called "In the Fourth Year." The book is written in support of the league of nations, of which he is a very ardent advocate; and he is a man widely read and who always writes most interestingly. I will read only a single paragraph from it, because I think it is well for the Senate to consider some of these directions in which the league of nations goes, according to its supporters, when they logically carry it out.

Mr. Wells says:

"How far may the supreme court of the world attend to grievances between subject and sovereign?

"Such cases are highly probable, and no large, vague propositions about the 'self-determination' of peoples can meet all the cases. In Macedonia, for instance, there is a jumble of Albanian, Serbian, Bulgarian, Greek, and Roumanian villages always jostling one another and maintaining an intense irritation between the kindred nations close at hand. And quite a large number of areas and cities in the world, it has to be remembered, are not homogeneous at all. Will the great nations of the world have the self-abnegation to permit a scattered subject population to appeal against the treatment of its ruling power to the supreme court? This is a much more serious interference with sovereignty than intervention in an external quarrel. Could a Greek village in Bulgarian Macedonia plead in the supreme court? Could the Armenians in Constantinople, or the Jews in Roumania, or the Poles in West Prussia, or the negroes in Georgia, or the Indians in the Transvaal make such an appeal?

He goes on to argue in behalf of it, and I ask that those extracts may be printed. I think they deserve attention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"IN THE FOURTH YEAR."

(By H. G. Wells.)

"That council of the league of nations will be a tie as strong, we hope—but certainly not so close and multiplex—as the early tie of the States at Washington. It will begin by having certain delegated powers and no others. It will be an "ad hoc" body. Later its powers may grow as mankind becomes accustomed to it. But at first it will have, directly or mediately, all the powers that seem necessary to restrain the world from war, and unless I know nothing of patriotic jealousies it will have not a scrap of power more. The danger is much more that its powers will be insufficient than that they will be excessive. Of that later. What I want to discuss here now is the constitution of this delegated body. I want to discuss that first in order to set aside out of the discussion certain fantastic notions that will otherwise get very seriously in our way. Fantastic as they are, they have played a large part in reducing The Hague tribunal to an ineffective squeak amidst the thunders of this war.

"A number of gentlemen scheming out world unity in studies have begun their proposals with the simple suggestion that each sovereign power should send one member to the projected parliament of mankind. This has a pleasant democratic air—one sovereign State, one vote. Now, let us run over a list of sovereign States and see to what this leads us. We find our list includes the British Empire, with a population of 400,000,000, of which probably half can read and write some language or other; Bogota, with a population of a million, mostly poets; Haiti, with a population of a million and a third, almost entirely illiterate and liable at any time to further political disruption; Andorra, with a population of four or five thousand souls. The mere suggestion of equal representation between such "powers" is enough to make the British Empire burst into a thousand (voting) fragments. A certain concession to population, one must admit, was made by the theorists. A State of over 3,000,000 got, if I remember rightly, two delegates, and if over twenty, three, and some of the small States were given a kind of intermittent appearance. They only came every other time, or something of that sort; but at The Hague things still remained in such a posture that three or four minute and backward States could outvote the British Empire or the United States. Therein lies the clue to the insignificance of The Hague. Such projects as these are idle projects, and we must put them out of our heads; they are against nature; the great nations will not suffer them for a moment.

"But when we dismiss this idea of representation by States, we are left with the problem of the proportion of representation and of relative weight in the council of the league on our hands. It is the sort of problem that appeals terribly to the ingenious. We can not solve it by making population a basis, because that will give a monstrous importance to the illiterate millions of India and China. Ingenious statistical schemes have been framed in which the number of university graduates and the steel output come in as multipliers, but for my own part I am not greatly impressed by statistical schemes. At the risk of seeming something of a Prussian, I would like to insist upon certain brute facts. The business of the league of nations is to keep the peace of the world and nothing else. No power will ever dare to break the peace of the world if the powers that are capable of making war under modern conditions say "No." And there are only four powers certainly capable at the present time of producing the men and materials needed for a modern war in sufficient abundance to go on fighting: Britain, France, Germany, and the United States. There are three others which are very doubtfully capable: Italy, Japan, and Austria. Russia I will mark—it is all that one can do with Russia just now—with a note of interrogation. Some day China may be war capable—I hope never, but it is a possibility. Personally, I do not think that any other power on earth would have a ghost of a chance to resist the will—if it could be an honestly united will—of the first-named four. All the rest fight by the sanction of and by association with these leaders. They can only fight because of the split will of the war-complete powers. Some are forced to fight by that very division."

"And now let us consider what are the powers that must be delegated to this proposed council of a league of free nations if that is really effectually to prevent war and to organize and establish and make peace permanent in the world.

"Firstly, then, it must be able to adjudicate upon all international disputes whatever. Its first function must clearly be that. Before a war can break out there must be the possibility of a world decision upon its rights and wrongs. The league, therefore, will have as its primary function to maintain a supreme court, whose decisions will be final, before which every sovereign power may appear as plaintiff against any other sovereign power or group of powers. The plea, I take it, will always be in the form that the defendant power or powers is engaged in the proceedings 'calculated to lead to a breach of the peace,' and calling upon the league for an injunction against such proceedings. I suppose the proceedings that can be brought into court in this way fall under such headings as these that follow: Restraint of trade by injurious tariffs or such like differentiations, or by interference with through traffic, improper treatment of the subjects or their property (here I put a query) of the plaintiff nation in the defendant State, aggressive military or naval preparation, disorder spreading over the frontier, trespass (as, for instance, by airships), propaganda of disorder, espionage, permitting the organization of injurious activities, such as raids or piracy. Clearly all such actions must come within the purview of any world supreme court organized to prevent war. But in addition there is a more doubtful and delicate class of cases, arising out of the discontent of patches of one race or religion in the dominions of another. How far may the supreme court of the world attend to grievances between subject and sovereign?

"Such cases are highly probable, and no large, vague propositions about the 'self-determination' of peoples can meet all the cases. In Macedonia, for instance, there is a jumble of Albanian, Serbian, Bulgarian, Greek, and Roumanian villages always jostling one another and maintaining an intense irritation between the kindred nations close at hand. And quite a large number of areas and cities in the world, it has to be remembered, are not homogeneous at all. Will the great nations of the world have the self-abnegation to permit a scattered subject population to appeal against the treatment of its ruling power to the supreme court? This is a much more serious interference with sovereignty than intervention in an external quarrel. Could a Greek village in Bulgarian Macedonia plead in the supreme court? Could the Armenians in Constantinople, or the Jews in Roumania, or the Poles in West Prussia, or the negroes in Georgia, or the Indians in the Transvaal, make such an appeal? Could any Indian population in India appeal? Personally I should like to see the power of the supreme court extend as far as this. I do not see how we can possibly prevent a kindred nation pleading for the scattered people of its own race and culture, or any nation presenting a case on behalf of some otherwise unrepresented people—the United States, for example, presenting a case on behalf of the Armenians. But I doubt if many people have made up their minds yet to see the powers of the supreme court of the league of nations go so far as this. I doubt if, to begin with, it will be possible to provide for these cases. I would like to see it done, but I doubt if the majority of the sovereign peoples concerned will reconcile their national pride with the idea, at least so far as their own subject populations go.

"Here, you see, I do no more than ask a question. It is a difficult one, and it has to be answered before we can clear the way to the league of free nations."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to say a single word, if the Senate will permit me, before I take my seat.

I have introduced these extracts—the one from Lord Bryce's book deserves especial attention—because I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the enormous difficulties involved in a league of nations. It is very easy to say "a league of nations," "a league to keep the peace of the world"; but what is that league to be? Nobody in authority has told us yet. They have been content to use the words "league of nations"; but if anyone will take the trouble to look over the passage I have read he will see what vast questions are opened up by the league of nations.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] have found fault with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and myself and said that we were engaged in making an attack on the President, in preventing unity, and in trying to make party capital. Incredible as it may seem, there is nothing of that kind in what I, for one, am trying to do, nor, I am sure, in what the other Senators are trying to do who are discussing this question.

Mr. President, the ambitions or the fate of Presidents or presidential candidates, the fate of political parties, are infinitely small compared to what is before the Senate as part of the treaty-making power. We are concerned here, not with the fate of men or parties; we are concerned here with the settlement of questions which involve the peace of the world. We ought to approach it in the most careful spirit, in the most solemn attitude of mind, for a mistake may lead to greater evils than those we seek to cure. My own belief is—and it is the one point I feel strongly about now—that these questions of the league of nations, or the freedom of the seas, or future international law, all of the utmost importance, should follow and not precede the peace with Germany.

The days are going by and nothing is done to make peace with Germany. No man can tell what will happen from day to day. The situation is perilous in the highest degree. I am no alarmist; but the fact is, the war is not over, and it will not be over until peace is made. Every day makes it more difficult to make such a peace as we ought to make with Germany in order to prevent her breaking out again upon the world. I feel that our first duty is to act in the living present, to bring peace to the world in the year 1919, before we undertake to make a peaceful world in the year 2000. That is the duty that seems to me imminent now, and the one that we ought to attend to first.

But, Mr. President, these questions are of such magnitude, of such importance to the whole of the world and to civilization, that I think we may well lay aside all talk of the trivial matters of personal ambitions or party fate. It makes very little difference who is President or what party wins in this country, compared with the fact that we have to deal to-day with a question that affects millions of human beings and in which the peace of the world is at stake.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. At this point I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senator now says that his whole contention was that we should have peace at once, and that in his presentation for postponement he merely meant to say, or I assume he meant to say, that these other questions which would occupy time should be postponed. I ask the Senator if, in the speech he made but a few days past, on December 21, 1918—the speech he now would vindicate against the assaults made upon it—the eminent Senator did not then say, referring to the peace that we are now trying to adjust—

> Physical guaranties which when taken would make signatures to treaties negligible can alone assure a durable peace with Germany. I do not need to rehearse what those physical guaranties should be, for I have stated my views upon them more than once to the Senate, and I think there is general agreement upon them not only in the Senate but among the American people.

And then did not the Senator say that this peace should involve the following:

> The restoration of Belgium, the return of Alsace-Lorraine to France, of the Italia Irredenta to Italy, the establishment of a Jugo-Slav State, and of an independent State formed by the Czecho-Slovaks. They include also the security of Greece, the settlement of Albania and Montenegro, the restoration of Roumania, the consolidation of all the Roumanian people under one government, as well as the neutralization of the straits, the putting of Constantinople under international protection, with Greece perhaps as the mandatory of the powers to administer the affairs of the city, the independence of Armenia, the return of those portions of Asia Minor where Greeks are predominant to Greece.

I ask the Senator if he feels that these matters which he presents, together with our entering into Russia, and giving it some consolation, if not sympathy—does the Senator assume that these matters that he urges should be entered upon now in this peace would take less time in their disposition, in view of the past conflict of 40 years over them, than the mere agreement among the people for a league to establish some form of peace?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to vindicate my speech. I did not know it had been assaulted, and I care very little whether it has been or not. That is exactly what I said. I pointed out the question that must be settled as part of this war in order to get peace and prevent Germany from breaking out again on the world. I said that those questions were enough, to begin with, to take all the ability and all the courage and all the strength that all the nations could bring to bear; that those were the questions that we must settle first; and that we ought not to take up questions not essential to the peace with Germany until we have made the peace with Germany.

I think the proposition is clear.

Mr. LEWIS. I merely wish to suggest to the able Senator, if he felt as he does this morning—that we should have immediate peace, or we know not what would break out, he has such apprehensions—that these suggestions that he presented then, as I respectfully contend, as a duty of the United States, would have involved a length of time so extending as to make impossible that immediateness which he feels now is so essential to prevent the breaking out of that which he says we know not. The Senator must see that, apparently, the length of time that would be taken in his proposition far exceeds that that could be possibly involved in the mere peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. That amounts to saying that we must not have a peace with Germany at all. The point I made was that there should be a peace made with Germany, and those are the points that will have to be dealt with in order to make peace with Germany, whether they take a short time or a long time. If you throw those points away, you make no peace with Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I present a petition from members of the faculty of Clark College, of Worcester, Mass., praying for the establishment of a league of nations. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I also present resolutions of the Worcester Branch of the League to Enforce Peace, of Massachusetts, signed by many of the leading men of that city, who are well known to me, favoring the entrance of the United States into a league of nations. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I also present a petition signed by Hon. Andrew J. Peters, mayor of Boston, Right Rev. William Lawrence, bishop of Massachusetts, and other citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the inclusion of the severed Provinces of Poland in a free and independent Polish state. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I present a telegram, including resolutions from citizens of the United States of Lithuanian origin, in regard to affairs in Lithuania, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

BOSTON, MASS, January 3, 1919.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

A protest resolution voted upon by the Lithuanians at a mass meeting, all parties being represented, held January 2, 1919, in Lithuanian Hall, on E Street, South Boston, Mass., we, the Lithuanians of South Boston and vicinity, hearing that the Polish Army threatens to take Vilna, the capital of Lithuania, met in Lithuanian Hall January 2, 1919, and decided that whereas Lithuania since prehistoric times embraces the Baltic coast as a separate country and nation, whose language and customs have nothing in common with those of Poland; whereas Lithuania having been for a long time an independent nationality and since 1772, when Russia and Germany enslaved her, Lithuanians have not ceased to fight for their rights; and whereas this war was waged for the freeing of enslaved nations, therefore a great wrong would be done to the people of Lithuania if some other foreign nation would be permitted to thrust itself into Lithuania. Protesting against the imperialistic steps of the Poles, we beseech the United States to use its influence so that this attempt of Lithuania's adversary be checked and the Lithuanians be permitted to have their own government. We further ask the United States Government, which so generously aids other war-suffering nations, to lend a hand in behalf of the starving people of Lithuania.

MIKUS PETRAUSKUS, Chairman.

Mr. LODGE. I also present a telegram embodying a resolution from the American Association of the Greek Community of Chicago, Ill., in regard to the admission of Greece to the congress of nations and the consideration of those things that interest Greece and the rights of small nations, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

CHICAGO, ILL., January 2, 1919.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was adopted by the American Association of the Greek Community of Chicago, composed of American citizens of Greek origin or descent, in mass meeting assembled the 27th day of December, 1918:

Whereas the rights of small nations are to be given consideration by the congress of nations; and

Whereas no nation has suffered more in the past than has Greece, in that many of her people have long suffered under the Turkish, Bulgarian, and Albanian rule and tyranny; and

Whereas portions of former undisputed Greek territory now under said Turkish, Bulgarian, and Albanian rule should be part of Greece for historical, racial, social, and ethnological reasons; and

Whereas the return of these unredeemed parts of Greece to her will forever settle one of the disturbing elements in the Balkans: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Members of the House of Representatives and Senate be requested to do all in their power to bring the matter before the congress of nations, so that the ancient wrongs suffered by Greece may be righted.

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF THE GREEK COMMUNITY OF CHICAGO,
By PAUL DEMOS, President, 105 West Monroe Street.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Trades and Labor Council of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying that action be deferred on the prohibition amendment until after April 7, 1919, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 321, International Molders' Union, of Saginaw, Mich., and a petition of Local Union No. 244, International Molders' Union, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called civil-service retirement bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Rotary Club of Muskegon, of the Woman's Club of Mount Pleasant, of sundry citizens of White Pigeon, and of sundry teachers of the public schools of River Rouge, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the establishment of a department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of Local Union No. 999, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, of Ionia, of Custer Lodge, No. 958, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, of Jackson, and of the Michigan State Grange, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the five-year extension of Government control of railroads, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Lumbermen's Association of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the return of the railroads to private ownership, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CALDER. I present a resolution from the City Council of Buffalo, N. Y., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY CLERK'S OFFICE,
CITY AND COUNTY HALL,
Buffalo, December 14, 1918.

To whom it may concern:

I hereby certify that at a session of the council of the city of Buffalo, held in the city and county hall on the 11th day of December, 1918, a resolution was adopted, of which the following is a true copy:

FROM THE MAYOR.

No. 1. BUFFALO, December 11, 1918.

I am in receipt of a communication from the Aerial League of America in regard to plans now working out by the United States Post Office Department for the extension in the immediate future of the aerial mail service throughout the country. It is pointed out in this connection that six months of daily aerial mail service between New York and Washington have shown that aerial mail can be carried on schedule time, regardless of weather conditions, even with small, single-motored planes. It is further stated that when planes of two or more motors are used aerial mail lines can be operated day and night under any conditions.

It is desirable, of course, that Buffalo be included in any new system of aerial postal routes which may be put in operation by the Government, and in order that there may be no delay in making known the city's wishes I recommend that the city clerk be directed to communicate at once with Senators WADSWORTH and CALDER and Congressmen DEMPSEY, SMITH, and WALDOW, setting forth Buffalo's desires and the manifest advantages of including this city in the new service.

Received, filed, and recommendation adopted.

Ayes, Bagley, Buck, Heald, Kreinheder, Malone—5.

Noes, none.

And I further certify that said resolution was signed by his honor, the mayor of said city of Buffalo, on the 14th day of December, 1918.

Attest:

[SEAL.] D. J. SWEENEY, City Clerk.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to an article in the Washington Post of this morning which is significant:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 3, 1919.]

SWEDEN EXTENDS SUFFRAGE—ALL MEN AND WOMEN GET BALLOT—PLURAL VOTING ABOLISHED.

Sweeping electoral reforms effected in Sweden, providing the "most extended universal suffrage for both men and women, irrespective of taxability," are described in a cable dispatch received yesterday by Swedish Minister Ekengren from the foreign minister at Stockholm.

The reforms are expected by legation officials to have far-reaching effect on the political complexion of the Swedish Diet, making probable a democratic majority of Videlicet liberals and labor-party members in both houses. It may also be effective, it is explained, in forestalling any tendency toward bolshevism.

Since 1909, in the lower house of the Diet, such a majority has existed, but in the upper house there has been a constant conservative majority. The majority in the lower house always has been almost entirely proally. Whatever pro-German tendencies that have existed in Sweden, it is said, have been confined largely to the conservatives.

The lower house has been based on direct and personal manhood suffrage, but the upper house was elected indirectly by provincial assemblies elected by communal suffrage, with plural voting by companies and associations.

The chief change now abolishes plural voting, the right to vote being purely personal.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that 12 countries have admitted women to suffrage during the year 1918.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is not the regular order, which has been called for.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator if they have any watch fires burning at the capital of Stockholm?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think they have. I think that is a very poor policy; but, notwithstanding that fact, people ought not to be deprived of their rights, ought not to be deprived of a proper exercise of what the Declaration of Independence says is the right of all mankind by reason of the fact that a few people do not adopt methods that are suitable or conducive to the passage of the measure.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think it is exactly fair that Senators should get up here and talk on matters contained in a petition and at the same time deprive others of a like opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for. Reports of committees are in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment:

H. R. 13035. An act to amend section 4 of chapter 5 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," approved July 9, 1918, and to make said amendment retroactive; and

H. R. 13366. An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions.

Mr. BECKHAM, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4773) for the relief of D. C. Darroch, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 632) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2418) for the relief of James Russell, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 202) requesting the Commission of Fine Arts to submit to the Congress certain suggestions, reported it without amendment.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 205) permitting the loan of aircraft motors and aircraft material to educational institutions under certain conditions, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 631) thereon.

STANLEY MITCHELL.

Mr. OVERMAN. On yesterday I introduced the bill (S. 5260) for the relief of Stanley Mitchell, and inadvertantly it was referred to the Committee on Claims. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 5261) to legalize informal or defective orders for war supplies and materials, to provide for the cancellation of orders and contracts, for the reimbursement of contractors and manufacturers, for the adjustment of claims on canceled or partially filled contracts and orders, and to provide relief for contractors pending final determination, to report it with amendments.

Verbally, I should like to report that this bill differs materially from the bill which has already been reported in the House and raises an important issue which I shall at an early date bring before the Senate. The bill provides for the creation of a commission to hear and to determine, promptly and informally, claims of contractors and manufacturers for war supplies whose contracts have been or may be canceled by the Government. This commission is to be appointed by the President, and is to consist of one representative of the War Department, one representative of the Department of Justice, and one representative of the business interests of the country, who shall have no interest direct or indirect in war contracts. This commission is to promptly hear and consider claims based on these contracts and make awards as rapidly as possible, under rules which it shall provide. It is to be allowed to appoint regional boards of inquiry, which are also to be composed of three individuals, one representing the local business interests, one representing the Department of Justice, and one representing the War Department. When the commission, which is to sit in Washington, has passed upon a claim and has made an award, if it is accepted by the contractor, that is to be the final settlement of the case, and the money is then to be paid over. If the contractor declines to accept that award, he is to be privileged to withdraw 75 per cent of the amount of award, and then, within a limited time, prosecute his claim for the balance in the Court of Claims.

The object of this legislation is to settle as rapidly as possible the claims for damages which have arisen out of the making of several thousand contracts, which, unfortunately, in many cases have been made in violation of law, mere verbal orders in some cases, and in others written orders by officials not authorized to act. This legislation provides for the validation of all such contracts where they are made within the scope of the authority given by Congress, where they are made in good faith, and provides for the reimbursement of manufacturers who have gone to expense in changing the machinery in their factories in preparing to undertake Government work, even where Government work has actually not been delivered. I present this report and ask——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. This bill is of vital importance, as has been stated by the Senator from Nebraska. A bill providing for a similar purpose but differing from this bill has passed the House. It will necessarily have to go to conference. The Senator from Nebraska has explained the purposes of the bill so clearly, which comes by unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs, that it occurred to me he might ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think, in view of what is on the program to-day, it might be a mistake to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill, but at an early day next week, after it has been printed, I shall ask for its consideration.

Mr. LODGE. Is it the Senator's intention to substitute this for the House bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was not aware the House had already passed a bill. I think that is a mistake. I think it has merely been favorably reported.

Mr. WEEKS. I was informed that the House has acted on the bill, though that may be a mistake.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I think it has not.

Mr. LODGE. I think the House has acted favorably on the bill. I believe the matter is of great importance, and I hope that the Senator will press the bill at the earliest moment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall do so, but I think it ought to be printed first for the information of the Senate. I desire that the bill as reported by me now verbally be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator expect to follow that up by early action?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall, at the very earliest possible moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very many contractors are in the condition described by the Senator, and I earnestly hope the bill will be acted upon promptly and favorably. Many people in Chicago and elsewhere are in precisely the position described by the Senator. They have furnished merchandise and have carried out their contracts; but find through some informality or lack of authority upon the part of the officers of the Government they are unable to legally collect in the absence of some legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the bill could be passed in a few minutes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am willing to make a request for the immediate consideration of the bill. I think, however, that it is important that it first be printed, and I shall ask for its consideration either to-morrow or early next week. I renew my request that the bill as reported by me be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill as reported is as follows:

A bill (S. 5261) to legalize informal or defective orders for war supplies and materials, to provide for the cancellation of orders and contracts, for the reimbursement of contractors and manufacturers, for the adjustment of claims on canceled or partially filled contracts and orders, and to provide relief for contractors pending final determination.

Be it enacted, etc., That where during the present war and prior to November 12, 1918, officers or agents acting under authority of the Secretary of War have placed orders or made contracts with manufacturers or contractors for war materials or supplies, the procurement of which has heretofore been authorized by Congress, and any of said orders or contracts has been partly or wholly performed, or expense has been incurred by the manufacturer or contractor prior to the 12th day of November, 1918, in preparation or partial execution of said contract or order, the fact that any such contract or order or agreement has not been made in the form or signed in the manner required by law shall not invalidate the same if it was entered into in good faith and lacked only the sanction of a contract in legal form. Nothing herein provided, however, shall be held to validate any contract, order, or agreement given or made by an officer or agent of the War Department not legally qualified or authorized to give a formal legal contract, nor to permit an officer to make such contract with any company, corporation, or firm in which he has, or had at the time, directly or indirectly, any interest.

SEC. 2. That in all cases as above included it shall be lawful to make payments under the terms of the agreements or orders so made or given to the extent that performance thereof has been made or supplies thereunder have heretofore been received and accepted by the United States, provided that payment in such cases shall not exceed the fair value of the supplies or materials delivered to and accepted by the United States.

SEC. 3. That in case of the cancellation, suspension, or annulment of any contract or agreement by the Secretary of War, or officers or agents acting by his authority, and in cases where no property or supplies have been delivered to and accepted by the United States, or where only partial delivery and acceptance has been made, contractors shall file with the Secretary of War within 60 days after the passage of this act any claim for remuneration arising out of the discontinuance, cancellation, or suspension of such contract, agreement, or order, property itemized and set forth. Said claims shall thereupon, together with such notations and information as the Secretary of War may cause to be attached to them, be promptly filed with the commission to be hereinafter created.

SEC. 4. That for the adjustment of all claims arising out of the cancellation of contracts, orders, and agreements for supplies or materials of war, as described in the foregoing paragraphs of this act, there is hereby created an adjustment commission to be composed of three members, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, one representing the War Department, one representing the Department of Justice, and one representing the business interests of the country, none of whom shall be interested in any contracts with the Government or [having] have an interest in any firm or corporation having war contracts, who shall hold their offices for one year and receive as compensation a salary of $10,000 each. It shall be the duty of said commission [to] promptly to examine and pass upon all claims for compensation and reimbursement arising out of cases as set forth in this act for supplies furnished, expenses necessarily incurred, or materials purchased under faith of contracts in legal form or orders received from officers and agents of the Secretary of War as heretofore set forth.

SEC. 5. That in each case, as soon as the commission has made an award, the contractor shall be entitled to receive the same upon giving receipt in full of all demands against the United States arising out of the transaction, or if the contractor is not satisfied with the amount so awarded he shall be entitled to receive, and shall receive at once, 75 per cent of the amount that has been awarded him, and he shall thereupon be entitled to appeal the case to the Court of Claims, which is hereby given jurisdiction to hear the case and render final judgment in such sum as may be [necessary] required to reimburse the contractor for expenses necessarily incurred in good faith in the partial performance of the contract or order above referred to or in preparing for the same.

SEC. 6. That in no case, however, shall any award either by the commission or the Court of Claims include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies received and actually delivered to the United States, and a remuneration for expenses necessarily incurred in preparing to perform said contract or order so canceled.

SEC. 7. That the purpose of this act being to secure prompt settlement of claims, the commission is authorized to make its own rules and regulations and to hear and determine the issues informally and promptly upon presentation of the case. The commission is authorized to appoint, under such rules and regulations as it shall prescribe, one or more regional boards of examiners to serve in such districts throughout the country as the commission shall fix and determine, to investigate and determine the facts concerning claims, legal or equitable, that may be presented as herein prescribed. The members of such board shall be composed of one representative of the War Department, one representative of the Department of Justice, and one from the business interests of the region, none of whom shall have any interest in the contract, directly or indirectly, and receive no compensation, save and except such per diem compensation as shall be fixed by the commission. Whenever the commission shall refer to any such regional board of examiners any claim, they shall proceed informally to hear the parties, take the proofs, and return the same promptly to the commission with their recommendation thereon.

SEC. 8. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the reasonable expenses of said commission, to be paid out upon the warrant of the chairman, who shall be chosen by the commission from among their own members, and approved by the secretary, who may be selected by the commission, and who shall receive a salary of not exceeding $5,000 for the period of one year, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be determined by the commission.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to legalize informal or defective orders for war supplies and materials; to provide for the cancellation of orders and contracts, for the reimbursement of contractors and manufacturers, for the adjustment of claims on canceled contracts or orders, to provide for the partial payment of awards pending final determination, and for the creation of an adjustment commission.

IMPROVEMENT OF HIGHWAYS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 200) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture certain war material suitable for improvement of highways, to be distributed among the several States, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I approve generally of the purposes of the joint resolution, but it seems to me that until a treaty of peace has been signed it would not be well to disturb the properties now in the custody of the War Department and which were essential to the proper prosecution of the war. In view of that, I think I shall have to object at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to state to the Senator that this resolution applies to certain materials delivered for road purposes, not now needed by the War Department, such as spades, picks, shovels, and other articles, for which the War Department can have no possible use; but I understand it is the purpose of the department to offer the material for sale, in which case, as everybody knows, it will be sacrificed. So I thought it would be the best possible disposition to transfer them to the Agricultural Department, where they might be used for the purposes of road construction. That is all the joint resolution provides for.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it seems to me, with the proposition we have of spending $500,000,000 on cantonments and three great training fields, which, I understand, we have, of 125,000 acres each, that if we are going on with these things it is rather early to give away our road-making material.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well, then, if there is objection the joint resolution can go to the calendar.

Mr. LODGE. I do not object to the purpose of the joint resolution, but I think that we ought to have some knowledge about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to ask unanimous consent in this connection to have printed in the RECORD a short statement which I have in support of this joint resolution, and also a short statement prepared by Gen. Coleman Dupont, who is one of the leading road engineers of this country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statements referred to are as follows:

PLEA FOR ROADS AT HOME.

The war showed what the national strength could accomplish in the swift construction of rapid-transit highways and the use thereon of rapid-transit vehicles.

The Nation trained its Engineer Corps and sent them to Europe equipped for the quick construction of roads. The part which the United States took in the decisive campaign was rendered possible by the use of automobiles and motor trucks over rapid-transit highways.

Now that the war is over the question arises, Are not highways as vitally important for the conduct of peace as they were for the conduct of war? With half the world going to bed hungry every night and millions doomed to starvation, is not the swift construction of the highway to the acre that produces as urgent a necessity as were the roads in the battle zone? And if the need is as urgent should the Nation slacken its effort or permit its road-building equipment to be sold or dissipated? Should it not rather increase its efforts in this direction and proceed with the construction of highways at home on a scale commensurate with the importance and urgency of the need?

It is for the Congress of the United States to answer these questions. Measures are pending designed to meet the situation, three of which are as follows:

1. Joint resolution 200, authorizing the transfer from the War Department to the Department of Agriculture of all available dispensable and suitable war material for distribution to the highway departments of the several States for use on the highways.

2. Senate bill 5088 increasing the present unexpended appropriation of about $60,000,000 for road purposes by the addition of $125,000,000 for expenditures to June, 1920, and $100,000,000 a year thereafter for four years. It is also proposed to increase the appropriation for national-forest roads of $1,000,000 a year on the present 10-year road-building program by a sum sufficient to construct 17,000 miles of forest roads, which the Government has already planned and which are necessary in order to utilize the vast resources of the national forests. The estimated cost of these roads is $50,000,000. Amendments to the present road act freeing it from undesirable limitations are also planned, one of which will enable the Government to construct at its own cost links in important highways which could not otherwise be constructed.

3. House bill 13308 carries an appropriation of $1,000,000 for an extension of the motor-truck Parcel Post Service. This is an increase from the $300,000 provided in the last Post Office appropriation bill, which also authorized the War Department to transfer to the Post Office Department motor trucks for which it had no further use. Under last year's appropriation 27 motor-truck routes were established, all but one of which were operated east of the Mississippi River. The results, even in the initial stage, are such as to warrant an increase in the number of routes and their extension to the trans-Mississippi region, where rail and water facilities of transportation are altogether inadequate. The proposed transfer of 10,000 motor trucks from the War Department to the Post Office Department renders it possible to make a great extension of this service at a minimum cost. It is proposed to increase the appropriation for this service to $10,000,000. To store these trucks would cost $600,000 a year. To dump them on the market would be disastrous. To turn them loose to aid agriculture in the movement of farm products to the consumer would be statesmanship. To adopt such a policy would be but to follow historic precedent.

Why not turn loose every available bit of material no longer needed for war purposes to assist agriculture at this critical moment by the swift construction of roads and the speedy movement of farm products? There must be a vast amount of such material, for the Engineer Corps were sent abroad fully equipped and the war stopped so suddenly with the national effort at a maximum that much material must have been awaiting shipment in this country. There must be surveying instruments, tents, cots, blankets, mess outfits, dynamite, road machinery, horses, harness, wagons, autos, and fleets of trucks. Is it good business to sell these for a song when the Government is about to enter upon a greatly enlarged road-building program at home and must otherwise go into the market and purchase new equipment?

Senate bill 5088 has the approval of President Wilson and Secretaries Houston and Baker. The proposition not to lessen the national endeavor in road construction now that peace has come, but merely to transfer the scene of action from Europe to the homeland is but the response to a universal demand. The public rejoices to see the trophies of war now being brought back from Europe. Equally popular will be the sight of the machines that built the United States road to the Rhine at work building connecting highways from Canada to the southern boundary and from the Atlantic to the Pacific through every State in the Union.

[From Motor Life, June, 1918.]

THE HIGHWAY PROBLEM—CENTRALIZED AUTHORITY NECESSARY TO THE DEVELOPMENT OF NATIONAL HIGHWAYS.

[By Gen. Coleman Du Pont, chairman board of national councillors, National Highways Association; member State Highway Commission of Delaware:]

A nation is rich and successful and prosperous not in proportion to its natural resources, the timber in its forests, the agricultural land which can be cultivated, the minerals or oils in its mines or wells but in proportion to the amount of these resources which have been or can be developed.

Few countries are more blessed with natural resources than Mexico, yet Mexico is anything but prosperous.

The United States is often heralded as the richest country in the world. Had we developed all our natural resources to their fullest extent, we should be richer than all the other nations of the world combined.

The one underlying factor which affects all development of natural resources, which is at the bottom of all business, the foundation of credit, the pedestal of commerce, the rock on which prosperity stands, is transportation.

This country was hardly a nation until its East and West, its North and South were connected with railroads. It was the railroad which made southern reconstruction possible and which, 60 years after a war which left the South prostrate, has developed the Southland to its present prosperity.

The United States has run the gamut of encouraging, fostering, helping, neglecting, and hindering the railroads, and now, for a time, is owning and coddling them. But farseeing men are beginning to believe, as enthusiasts and dreamers have believed for years, that the future of transportation does not rest entirely with the road of steel, though it is important, but largely with the road of stone. The past decade has developed a new factor in transportation which has as yet received scant consideration from the Government. That factor is the motor truck, and it has taken a world war to make Uncle Sam, as an entity, recognize a need which hundreds and thousands of his citizens have been screaming at him for years.

That need is roads.

The United States has never had, and has not now, a road policy. It has dallied with the road question, thrown sops to road enthusiasts, played with the highway problem, and now, for the first time, is beginning to think seriously that it has other angles than local ones, other governmental uses than the provision of one more means of gaining votes. True, the United States maintains as a part of the Department of Agriculture an Office of Public Roads, which has done excellent work. There is also a Federal aid law in existence by which the National Government proposes to aid the various States build certain roads. Many States have been more farsighted than the parent Government, and have provided their citizens with good roads, well laid out, properly maintained, which have added greatly to the prosperity of their citizens.

But as a nation the United States has no road policy, recognizes no road question as such, and pays only desultory attention to constructing and maintaining its land highways, while devoting millions to waterways, and, in the past, millions to railways.

That this state of affairs must eventually come to an end is obvious to any who will follow to their logical conclusion the causes which have produced the small road mileage which the Nation possesses. The road question was first agitated when the bicycle came into popularity. But the bicycle was not a commercial factor of sufficient power to make any headway against the fact that a Nation-wide system of good roads would cost not millions but billions of dollars. The automobile came, small, weak, inefficient, and unable to negotiate rough roads, either with comfort to the owner or profit to the merchant, and the good-roads demand began to make itself heard. Then the motor truck was developed, and the demand for roads over which it can travel economically and efficiently is becoming louder and more insistent, with the result that many States have given heed, and such road systems as those of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Maryland, and Ohio have resulted.

The Nation, as a Nation, has done nothing. Had the development of railroads been left to the individual States to foster, should we have a transcontinental line? It seems improbable. Had the States in this time of stress been left to work their legal will upon the carriers, had the railroads been left to continue competition as the primary moving force of their commercial life, would this country have solved its transportation problem of war materials and men?

If the Nation can grasp and solve one angle of its transportation problem, for the sake of war efficiency, is there any reason why it can not grasp and solve that other and equally vital question of roads and trucks?

From a military standpoint roads are sharply divided into two classes. First, the road which serves the Nation as an aid, a feeder, of its railroads, which takes the burden of the short haul from the steam train, which saves time and money and roundabout routes for the shipper. Second, the road which serves as a distinct military factor for the transportation of men, munitions, and supplies, primarily for mobilization, and possibly for actual combat in the—to-be-hoped unlikely—event of invasion of these shores.

At the present time the United States is concerned only with the first angle. Yet an invasion is always a possibility, though not a probability now. Three, even two, years ago it was a possibility, but not a probability that we should be drawn into the world war. We elected a President who had kept us out of war and barely six months later backed him to the utmost when he said we were at war. As roads can not be built in a day, and as mistakes in road planning are tremendously expensive to make, it is certain that, simply because the need of highways for defense purposes is not a present need, it would be foolish to ignore this possibility in any competent, well laid-out scheme of national road building.

Neglecting for the moment the creation of roads, or the improvement of existing roads, for purely defensive purposes, the pressing need of good roads for full utilization of motor trucks for war purposes is vital. The passenger car can negotiate bad roads if it must. The motor truck can not do so, with any degree of efficiency or profit. We have steel rails for cars simply to get a smooth passage for the wheels of freight and passenger vehicles. It is as impossible for a heavy motor truck to operate economically or efficiently over rough and bumpy roads as for a railroad to carry much freight over a poor roadbed.

We have borrowed heavily from England and France in war experience. It took England years to come to conscription—we did it in months. England and France developed their air resources slowly as the war progressed—we began a gigantic air program with the war less than three months old. We have taken our allies' experience in troop training, in officer making, in trench fighting, in ordnance and field equipment—but what have we done to equal their road and truck development?

Trucks—yes, in quantity. But trucks for French roads, trucks for foreign service. We even proposed to put our trucks on freight cars to carry them from the factories to the ships, because—well, because the roads of this country are such apologies for real highways that, in prewar days, no one thought of trying to deliver a motor vehicle over the roads on which it must be run.

The fact that we had not cars and engines enough and that every line of steel rails to the coast was almost hopelessly congested changed this. Our trucks are running over roads from factory to coast and, so far from being hurt by it, our drivers, at least, are gaining valuable experience. But, though the war trucks are standard and able to bear the most severe usage, they can not carry the load or make the speed here which they can do and will do upon the roads of France.

Years ago England and France solved the highway problem by the creation of national road systems. These roads were built by the nation and maintained by the nation for the use of the nation. Not all roads, by any means, but a comprehensive system of roads running through all important centers, gridironing the country with ready means of communication. To these main roads local communities and the smaller political units built feeders, exactly as in this country, in the "good-road States," counties and towns appropriate money and build feeder roads to connect their localities with the State system.

Had it not been for her system of roads France would have been at a great disadvantage in her war work. Possessing a solid foundation of many good roads at the beginning, France keeps them up and repairs them as they are damaged. The motor truck is as vital behind the lines to the French as the wonderful system of railroads to the German frontier—a system developed by military brains of keen and clever vision long before the motor truck came into existence—is to the Germans.

So far we have done absolutely nothing. Those who point to the fact that we have a highways transport committee of the Council of National Defense do so without any real knowledge of what that committee is or does. It has done all and more than it was expected to do. It has worked faithfully and well and produced results, but its function has never been a road-building function—it is not concerned with the laying out of a system of roads, nor the building of a single foot of highway.

It has developed plans and put into operation agencies, looking to the utilization of roads which already exist. It has routed the war trucks and encouraged State councils of defense to work for motor-truck development. It has educated chambers of commerce and boards of trade to the need for a load-clearance bureau in commercial centers that no motor truck moves "light" over the roads. But what can one small committee, no matter how able, of an organization which is purely advisory in character, such as the council of defense, do toward solving the road problem? As well say we need not have a Quartermaster Department to supply soldiers with clothes because women are knitting socks.

The road problem of this country, from any angle—commercial, economic, social, military, defense, political, agricultural—is not a local issue. It can not be solved by the States. If every State in the Union should have as good a State road system as Massachusetts, national roads would still be a problem. When a man builds a path in his garden he builds it to go where he wants to walk, not where his neighbors wish to walk. When a town builds a road it builds it where the town wants it, not where the next town is best served. When a county builds a road it runs from one end to the county seat, not to serve the next county. When a State builds a road system it connects its important cities and makes it easy for its own denizens, without much thought for the man across the State line. When the United States builds roads, as a Nation, it must solve its difficulties by building a system which considers the country as a whole, not as a collection of political units with voters who must be placated.

It is customary to consider the road question from a viewpoint from which one man can see the horizon. Most road propaganda begins and ends with one road. We hear much of the Lincoln or the National Old Trails Road or the National Defense Highway of California. Every one is a worthy road, a road which ought to be what it is not. But the road question as a road question is infinitely bigger than any State, any single road, any single association of people banded together to "get" a certain highway.

The motor truck is to do for commerce what rural free delivery did for the mail. It will make it possible for the farmer and the merchant readily to exchange their respective commodities. The motor truck is to do, in the coming half century, what the railroad did in the last half century. The steam train took a thousand isolated communities, loosely knit under one government, and made them one in fact. The motor truck is to take a million farms and bring them into close touch with the city; it is to take a million merchants and bring them customers which they never knew before. It is to cut down the high cost of food, by cutting the greatest item of that cost—transportation.

Just before the war it cost more to ship a ton of wheat from farm to railroad than to ship the same ton from New York to Liverpool. It cost more to deliver freight from station to farm than to ship it from factory to station. And roads or the lack of them was responsible.

The road question, the truck question, is a national question. It has two great subdivisions—(1) where, and (2) what kind?

Neither question can be answered in a hurry. But both can be answered and must be answered soon. If we are not to see the greatest boon which science and invention have given to transportation restricted and made of small account by a penny-wise, pound-foolish policy, a narrow-gauged, peanut-politic viewpoint which wants to spend public money only where local benefits will bring local applause.

"Where?" is not difficult to answer. Everywhere eventually, but in the beginning a national road system must consist first of one, then two, then three or more great transcontinental roads from east to west—then half a dozen north and south lines. Later must come connections and additions and interstate roads, until we have perhaps 50, perhaps 100,000 miles of first-class, high-grade roads running from State to State, not merely, as with our present 100,000 miles of good roads, in circles within States.

"What kind?" The road builder has answered in a dozen ways in years gone by and is still changing his conclusions. MacAdam was years ahead of his age and years behind this one. The builders of the Appian Way knew more about building a road for a motor truck than MacAdam, strange as it may appear. It is the general opinion among road builders—an opinion greatly quickened and altered by the war—that the light stone road, be it surfaced or oil treated in what way you will, is not the road to build in the face of the avalanche of motor trucks that is coming in the next few years. The motor car brought oil to the road as a necessity. The water bond, which worked so well with iron tires and iron-shod hoofs, is useless against the suction of the pneumatic tire. But the oiled stone road that holds the 3,000-pound car with ease will not carry the 5-ton truck and last.

There is to be a great revolution in road-building methods. The railroad has found that for heavy traffic it pays to use the heaviest steel rails and finest wood for ties, the best of broken stone, and plenty of it, for ballast. No railroad stops at the price per mile nowadays. Once built and well maintained the road will earn dividends.

We still look upon a highway which costs $5,000 a mile as an expensive road, and $10,000 a mile as a boulevard for cities. Yet the road of the future, the road which the motor truck will use without hurting it, the roads which the National Government must build as a national system, will cost twenty, thirty, perhaps fifty thousand dollars a mile. If the latter, and a national highway system of 50,000 miles is contemplated in a 20-year building program, then the total cost reaches $2,500,000,000.

The cost of such a road program would be distributed over at least 20 years (all the engineers in the country could not build such a system in less time) and the roads would pay dividends as fast as built.

It is difficult to consider the subject and not drop to local angles.

If you see the problem as a national question, if your experience or your knowledge leads you to view the motor truck as the ultimate transportation means for all except long hauls, if you see in it a coming commercial revolution, then you, too, must enlist in the national road army. You must become one of those who believe that Uncle Sam can not afford for his own sake, as well as for the sake of us, his children, much longer to delay in taking up and solving, as only he can solve, the road question—the question which is greater than the railroads, infinitely greater than the Panama Canal, and which, the war disposed of, must be the most pressing economic problem which this country has to face.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 5279) to authorize the resumption of voluntary enlistments in the Regular Army, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 5280) authorizing retirement of members of the Army Nurse Corps (female); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 5281) to donate one German gun to the city of Morganton, N. C.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 5282) to amend subdivision 8 of the act to amend the naturalization law approved May 9, 1918; to the Committee on Immigration.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) admitting into the United States 35 puncheons of Gordon's sloe gin, ordered by E. La Montagne's Sons, of New York, before the passage of the food-control act prohibiting the importation of distilled spirits, the delivery of which was delayed on account of war conditions until after that act went into effect; to the Committee on Finance.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill which comes to me from the War Department to appoint any officer who now holds, or during the existing emergency has held, the grade of general or lieutenant general for the period of the emergency only to the same grade in the Army without such limitation of tenure, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 5278) to appoint any officer who now holds, or during the existing emergency has held, the grade of general or lieutenant general for the period of the emergency only to the same grade in the Army without such limitation of tenure was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In connection with the presentation of the bill I desire to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of War, as I am introducing the bill at his request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 21, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Under the provisions of section 3 of the act of Congress approved October 6, 1917, the President has appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, certain officers of the Army to the grades of general and lieutenant general. These officers, in order of rank, are:

Gen. Peyton C. March, Chief of Staff of the Army.

Gen. John J. Pershing, commander of the American Expeditionary Force, France.

Gen. Tasker H. Bliss (retired), former Chief of Staff, now military representative of the United States at Versailles and a member of the Peace Commission; has the brevet rank of general.

Lieut. Gen. Hunter Liggett, commanding First Army, American Expeditionary Force.

Lieut. Gen. Robert L. Bullard, commanding Second Army, American Expeditionary Force.

These officers have performed tremendous tasks involving the greatest responsibility in a manner which reflects credit upon themselves and upon the country and entitles them to permanent recognition. I believe that the sentiment of the country is strongly in favor of such recognition. At present the commissions of these officers as general and lieutenant general, while in the Regular Army, are for the period of the emergency only. I recommend that their commissions be made permanent, with the proviso that when any one of these officers vacates his commission the office shall lapse. The Judge Advocate General has prepared a draft of a bill which will accomplish this purpose, and which I inclose for the consideration of your committee.

Sincerely, yours, NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Senator GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Chairman Senate Military Committee,
United States Senate.

COST OF EAGLE BOATS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 404), which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and is hereby, directed to make an investigation of the so-called Eagle boats, of the contracts made for said boats with the Ford Motor Co., and of the character and construction of said boats.

COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. VARDAMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 405), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senate resolution 374, instructing the Committee on Manufactures to make inquiry into the coal situation, its production, transportation, and consumption, to require the attendance of necessary witnesses, the production of books, documents, papers, etc., be, and it hereby is, amended so as to authorize the employment of counsel to assist in the inquiry aforesaid.

ALLOTMENTS TO SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS.

Mr. SPENCER. I offer a resolution requesting certain information, and, if there is no objection, I ask for its adoption at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 406), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested, if not inconsistent with public service, to inform the Senate as to whether allotments made by soldiers in accordance with the regulations for those dependent upon them and payable in the months of August, September, October, and November last, have been paid, and if not, how many remain unpaid, and how soon the amounts due in the month of December may be expected to be paid.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator who introduced the resolution whether it refers to allotments made from salaries of soldiers to their dependents or to the salaries of the soldiers themselves?

Mr. SPENCER. The resolution refers to allotments which have been made by soldiers out of their salaries for their dependents.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, I would suggest that the request should be made to the Secretary of the Treasury. I understand that the War Risk Bureau is under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LODGE. It is under the Treasury Department.

Mr. SPENCER. My information is that the War Risk Bureau is under the War Department.

Mr. THOMAS. No; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SPENCER. I may be wrong. I will amend the resolution in the way the Senator suggests.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not object to the consideration of the resolution, but I suggest that it be amended by inserting the words "Secretary of the Treasury" instead of "Secretary of War."

Mr. SPENCER. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT'S GUILDHALL SPEECH.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to some remarks lately made by the President of the United States at the Guildhall in London, which I consider a complete and very noble answer to all that has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts on that subject. I ask unanimous consent to have this speech printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none. The matter referred to is as follows:

WILSON SAYS TASK OF NATIONS IS NOT YET COMPLETED; ANXIOUS FOR PEACE WORK TO BE STARTED—IN SPEECH AT GUILDHALL PRESIDENT WARNS THAT SOLDIERS FOUGHT TO END OLD ORDER—MUST MAKE VICTORY'S RESULTS PERMANENT.

LONDON, December 28.

The text of President Wilson's speech at the Guildhall this afternoon follows:

"Mr. Lord Mayor, we have come upon times when ceremonies like this have a new significance which most impresses me as I stand here. The address which I have just heard is most generously and graciously conceived, and the delightful accent of sincerity in it seems like a part of that voice of counsel which is now everywhere to be heard. I feel that a distinguished honor has been conferred upon me by this reception, and I beg to assure you, sir, and your associates of my very profound appreciation, but I know that I am only part of what I may call a great body of circumstances.

"I do not believe that it was fancy on my part that I heard in the voice of welcome uttered in the streets of this great city and in the streets of Paris something more than a personal welcome. It seemed to me that I heard the voice of one people speaking to another people, and it was a voice in which one could distinguish a singular combination of emotions.

TASK NOT YET FINISHED.

"There was surely there the deep gratefulness that the fighting was over. There was the pride that the fighting had had such a culmination. There was that sort of gratitude that the nations engaged had produced such men as the soldiers of Great Britain and of the United States and of France and of Italy—men whose prowess and achievements they had witnessed with rising admiration as they moved from culmination to culmination.

"But there was something more in it, the consciousness that the business is not yet done, the consciousness that it now rests upon others to see that those lives were not lost in vain.

"I have not yet been to the actual battle field, but I have been with many of the men who have fought the battles, and the other day I had the pleasure of being present at a session of the French Academy when they admitted Marshal Joffre to their membership.

MARSHAL JOFFRE'S WORDS.

"That sturdy, serene soldier stood and uttered not the words of triumph but the simple words of affection for his soldiers and the conviction which he summed up in a sentence which I will not try accurately to quote but reproduce in its spirit. It was that France must always remember that the small and the weak could never live free in the world unless the strong and the great always put their power and their strength in the service of right.

"That is the afterthought—the thought that something must be done now; not only to make the just settlements—that, of course—but to see that the settlements remained and were observed and that honor and justice prevails in the world. And as I have conversed with the soldiers I have been more and more aware that they fought for something that not all of them had defined, but which all of them recognized the moment you stated it to them.

FOUGHT AGAINST OLD ORDER.

"They fought to do away with an old order and to establish a new one, and the center and characteristic of the old order was that unstable thing which we used to call the 'balance of power,' a thing in which the balance was determined by the sword, which was thrown in on the one side or the other, a balance which was determined by the unstable equilibrium of competitive interests, a balance which was maintained by jealous watchfulness and an antagonism of interests which, though it was generally latent, was always deep-seated.

"The men who have fought in this war have been the men from the free nations, who are determined that that sort of thing should end now and forever. It is very interesting to me to observe how from every quarter, from every sort of mind, from every concert of counsel there comes the suggestion that there must now be not a balance of power, not one powerful group of nations set up against another, but a single overwhelming, powerful group of nations, who shall be the trustees of the peace of the world.

MUST MAINTAIN PEACE.

"It has been delightful in my conferences with the leaders of your Government to find how our minds moved along exactly the same line, and how our thought was always that the key to the peace was the guaranty of the peace, not the items of it; that the items would be worthless unless there stood back of them a permanent concert of power for their maintenance. That is the most reassuring thing that has ever happened in the world.

"When this war began the thought of a league of nations was indulgently considered as the interesting thought of closeted students. It was thought as one of those things that it was right to characterize by a name which, as a university man, I have always resented. It was said to be academic, as if that in itself were a condemnation—something that men could think about but never get. Now we find the practical leading minds of the world determined to get it.

EAGER TO GET TO WORK.

"No such sudden and potent union of purpose has ever been witnessed in the world before. Do you wonder, therefore, gentlemen, that in common with those who represent you I am eager to get at the business and write the sentences down? And that I am particularly happy that the ground is cleared and the foundations laid—for we have already accepted the same body of principles. Those principles are clearly and definitely enough stated to make their application a matter which should afford no fundamental difficulty.

"And back of us is that imperative yearning of the world to have all disturbing questions quieted, to have all threats against peace silenced, to have just men everywhere come together for a common object. The peoples of the world want peace, and they want it now, not merely by conquest of arms but by agreement of mind.

FORCED TO BREAK PRECEDENT.

"It was this incomparably great object that brought me overseas. It has never before been deemed excusable for a President of the United States to leave the territory of the United States; but I know that I have the support of the judgment of my colleagues in the Government of the United States in saying that it was my paramount duty to turn away even from the imperative tasks at home to lend such counsel and aid as I could to this great—may I not say final—enterprise of humanity."

AMERICAN FORCES AT BREST, FRANCE.

Mr. NEW. I ask for the consideration of the resolution which I offered on yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 403), as follows:

Whereas reports having reached the United States and having been given currency by publication in the columns of the newspapers to the effect that unwholesome, insanitary, and unnecessarily discomforting conditions exist in the camp occupied by the American Expeditionary Forces at Brest, France: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Military Affairs be authorized and directed to investigate the same and to report its conclusions to the Senate, together with such recommendations as it may see fit to make concerning the condition reported.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I understand that the War Department is about to furnish some information with regard to the subject matter of the resolution of the Senator from Indiana. I think therefore that we can make time by postponing the consideration of the resolution until that information can be received. For that reason, and for that reason only, I object to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is entitled to consideration. That is the present difficulty.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, Mr. President, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THOMAS. On that motion I ask for a division, Mr. President.

The question being put, on a division the motion of Mr. THOMAS was agreed to; and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS FOR PEACE.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, some days ago I announced in the Senate that on the first legislative day convenient I would submit some remarks replying to certain criticisms of the eminent Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and particularly from the eminent Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Had I been present when the Senators made the observations to which I shall address myself now, I would have made such reply as I felt they justified at that time. I was ill when one spoke, and happened to be at my home in Chicago when the other addressed the Senate.

Mr. President, these announcements that one Senator will reply to another Senator are merely given, as I understand, that the Senator to whom the reply is addressed may have notice, be present if he chooses, and pay heed by any form of opposition or contradiction he desires to indulge as against the views of the opposing speaker. It is oftentimes, I believe, regarded, however, something of a courtesy to the Senate that those interested in the particular subject to which that Senator shall address himself may be present if they so incline. Out of respect to that courtesy Senators have invariably yielded to those who have made the announcements. For this concession to me, I express my appreciation to those who do so in my behalf.

Of course, views expressed by Senators upon questions that are now prevailing are not generally, sir, in the direct and complete line of reply to all of the matter urged by any other Senator, such as applies to legal argument, or in the general discussions of economic subjects in forums or lyceums, or, indeed, upon the general hustings. There are always, apart from the general discussion, some few things to which men have addressed their soul's conviction. Wherever these are assailed, or even opposed, those who advocate them come to the defense for two purposes. One is that the subject itself may be clarified and understood from all the points that can be addressed to it. The other is that the advocate may vindicate his convictions by disclosing such matters as justify his previous expression, or that negative and dispose of the assaults made upon it. That, sir, is the particular office, so far as I assume at all, that I enter upon now.

Sir, it may be recalled that I addressed this body some weeks ago at some length when I opened the discussion—opened it in the sense that I merely preceded other Senators—covering the doctrine of a league of nations as an agency to establish peace in the world. I there, Mr. President, set forth—as you will recall, sir, having honored me at that time with your presence as Presiding Officer, as you are honoring me now—past history, as it came to my mind and as I had gleaned from industry, touching organizations of that nature as far back in point of time as I felt appropriate. I there went into the whole field of the proposal as I understood it. I set forth the plan as I felt it could be now devised and executed.

I anticipated certain objections which were then urged to the system, and some I replied to, particularly those which had been expressed by eminent Senators on the floor. This opposition being led on the Democratic side—led in the form of chief spokesman up to the present time—by the capable Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and led on the Republican side by the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. President, at this particular occasion I wish to make refutation, possibly not entertaining in the manner of their presentation because partaking of a legal phase, to the positions which have been taken by Senators on the floor by questioning the feasibility of the President's undertaking, the other charging it to be one in violation of the ethical duty the President owes the Senate, and accusing it as being undertaken by him in direct contravention of what the eminent Senators have said was a privilege which the Senate enjoyed, first, to have these matters submitted to it for advice and consent.

Then, sir, I wish to allude to the position taken by these eminent Senators, and to demonstrate what I here most respectfully insist that the very argument they offer as opposition, instead of disproving the practicability of the design assumed, demonstrate its feasibility and its necessity.

Mr. President, at the outset let this be understood: That I am not aware of any particular plan of conceit devised in the mind of the President or of his supporters to be presented in a proposal and executed in completeness, separate from some other one's views, in furtherance of the object. It is not methods specifically upon which the President, I fancy, has any pride of opinion; it is not specific systems of administration in arriving at a conclusion in which there is tenacity of intention that will not brook amendment from any friendly source that would tender it.

Then, sir, the object in view is the obtaining of some form of consent between nations who will contribute their service, their time, and their purpose to the principal object of procuring some kind of an agreement among these people upon which there can be based the assurance of peace among the civilized nations of the world, upon which there may be constructed some form of an arrangement or organization through which all disputes arising between intelligent men and Christian peoples might be heard and disposed of without being rudely submitted to the bloody arbitrament of war with its desolating results. Sir, for want of better description of the design it is designated as a league of nations to effect peace.

Then, sir, to achieve the object announced is the sole purpose of the President. To prevent the repetition of these unspeakable calamities, these indescribable horrors, these unnamable atrocities, to which civilization has at last descended, and in the name of Christianity perpetrates and endures, is alone the purpose to which the President bends his energies, and which, as I sincerely believe, the heart of his country indorses. Yet, sir, there arises opposition from this floor, as from other places, stimulated, as I am compelled to charge, by no motive of aiding the President, with no purpose of tendering some scheme or policy as a substitute to achieve the same end in view, but with the single object, as everyone must behold who views the transition of late, of serving petty political partisan purposes. These, to my judgment, sir, are too rude to have been intruded upon a discussion touching so solemn a subject as the universal peace of mankind. From Senators, such as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who constitutionally feel that the success of the enterprise, however far it may go, transcends a fundamental theory of government, which will work, as they insist, a greater evil to the country in its final results than the benefits to be enjoyed—there we can understand a basis of opposition. But for myself I can not understand, far less adopt as excusable, a basis which in itself has the sole purpose of confusing the undertaking that it might fail and embarrassing the purpose in order that it may be defeated, discrediting the President that he may stand humiliated before the world—all in order to capitalize the wreck of the project for political advantage in party contests; but, sir, I can no longer conceal to myself, nor could I be true to my emotions, if I did not express that such seems the intended object from every source disclosed. Sir, if I am correct in this conclusion, I denounce the purpose as unworthy of its authors as it is cruel to the project.

Sir, then, do we marvel that we find in the foreign papers touching, for instance, the speeches of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], something as follows:

> The Paris newspapers have published summaries of Mr. KNOX's remarks, and much oral comment has been made on the obvious difference between President Wilson and his fellow commissioners on the one hand and leading American Senators or the other.
> It is pointed out by those aware of the condition of mind of the American delegates that it is perhaps not appreciated in America what great stress is laid by European statesmen on differences of this character. By some the situation is regarded as placing the President in the light of not having the support of his own countrymen.
>
> The President is encouraged in his attitude by the knowledge that Lloyd George and other members of the British ministry heartily favor the league of nations as a method of preventing future wars.
>
> * * * * * * *
> In face of this, however, the fear exists that the course outlined by Mr. KNOX, which is construed as that of the Republican Party in the Senate, will encourage the opponents of the league.

Then, sir, in another able paper from abroad, we read this, referring to the speeches of the Senators to whom I have alluded:

> The manner in which this and similar news dispatches from America are "played up" by certain papers here is indicative of how closely French opinion is watching for the slightest sign of lack of support for President Wilson in his own country.
> It is impossible to overemphasize the fact that the President's delicate course in the next few weeks may be imperiled, if not actually wrecked, by unconsidered opposition along partisan lines or loose discussion of the alternatives of his outlines on world peace.

Mr. President, I do respectfully contend that the concurring assaults by certain leaders of the Republican side upon everything that President Wilson has attempted in Europe, and in refusing to approve anything undertaken, discloses a conspiracy to discredit him and to defeat any design he enters upon by giving the European negotiators to understand that the Senate is opposed to the President. That it objects to his measures and that it is speaking with the power to revise, reverse, and repudiate him. The object is to prevent the President from accomplishing anything. The purpose of this is that when these assailants have dishonored his errand and defeated his objects they may then cry to the American public: "The President is a failure—his mission is a failure—his failure has made America ridiculous, has lost for the United States all the fruits of the war, and made a mockery of the sacrifices of blood and lives of its children."

This would make the presidential issue, and this, I charge, is the political purpose of certain eminent leaders who assail with constancy of time and method everything the President is doing to secure peace and to bring forth full results from the victory obtained by the United States in her participation with the allies. Mr. President, I do not object to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—or Mr. KNOX, of Pennsylvania—qualifying for the support of Col. Roosevelt and his following for the nomination for President by first catching the expression of opposition of the colonel, and then echoing "so say we all of us," but I do object to the country being deceived as to the design, and the President of the United States dishonored by false patriotic pretenses to accomplish the purpose.

Sir, I offer proof of this charge by calling to the attention of the American public that not one of these gentlemen who have criticized each course of the President and condemned each action and the omission of any action has ever approved any one thing the President has undertaken or expressed since he began his mission in Europe. Nothing he has said has received their indorsement. Not even a wish for a successful journey through which his life might be preserved from the perils of the sea has been voiced, nor speech or line of his addresses in praise of his own country, her history, or her noble sons, has ever received indorsement; nor one expression of gladness or pleasure for the welcome, the cheer, and the reception given him in behalf of America. Nothing he has attempted but is condemned; nothing he has spoken or entered upon has been praised or indorsed. Surely the American public will not be deceived as to the meaning of this remarkable spectacle. Surely they will recall that in no venture heretofore in the whole history of America, where our President has dealt with foreign representatives, whether upon foreign soil, in our own continent, or by negotiations, but what there has been some expression of encouragement and approval of something that particular President had undertaken in behalf of this country. The American public must reflect upon the reason of this remarkable exception that is presented in the record and conduct, actions and speeches of admitted leaders of the party called Republican in their attitude to this particular President and to the great and responsible undertaking he has assumed.

Mr. President, I now charge that the views of the distinguished Senators who made the assault upon the policies of the President, opposing what he is doing, and demanding him to do other things that he is not doing, are in direct opposition to the views that these same Senators have expressed upon similar subjects upon previous occasions. I now charge that the assault is for the purpose of convincing the European negotiators that if they accept the position presented by the President, the Senate will overthrow it. By this it is presumed that the European negotiators will take license to defeat the President in what he proposes, and can put their reasons for doing it on the ground that they are serving interests of the American people represented by the Senate which are opposed, as they will say—as shown by the views of the Senate—to what the President proposes—"mark the devious track of error's way."

Mr. President, this brings me, then, directly to the point of the first accusation. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] by his criticism would have the country believe that the President of the United States had violated some established law that was a part of the organization and institutions of the Republic in not submitting to the Senate the different movements he was taking with a view of bringing about a league and the doctrines he was presenting. The Senator would have the country assume that the President was now violating acknowledged precedents and committing an offense against the dignity of this body and its rights. The Senator would have the Nation believe, and from his honored and experienced place he would instruct it to believe, that the failure of the President first to seek advice in consultation with the Senate in the entry upon the subject matters he has gone upon was an indication of a despotic nature, an indifference to the rights of the body compatible only with a dictator or a tyrant.

Mr. President, it is here, sir, that I wish to assert that no one knew better than the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts—and I trust he may conclude his lunch early, which he is taking in the room below, and do me the compliment of hearing some views that I shall address to his utterance, of which the learned Senator, I believe, has notice. Of course I am not complaining that my eminent friend cares to take that which is more stable than that which I could "feed out"—I was about to say—and let me follow consecutively—that none knew better than the able Senator that the position he took would mislead the people of his country and guide them to the belief that the President of the United States is violating his duty, and incite them to believe that the President was ignoring the people's representatives in a matter in which the law imposed on him a contrary obligation. No one knew more than the distinguished Senator that the effect of his charge was to invite Europe and the peace commissioners to believe that such was the course of the President and that for such in this body he was looked upon as visiting contumely upon the Senate.

No one knew more than the astute Senator that that would at once induce to the minds of the commissioners abroad to reflect that, with an attitude of mind on the part of the Senate produced by such conduct of the President, an opposition to whatever he attempted to do in the Senate was so certain as to assure its defeat. The whole policy of the distinguished opponents, barring a few, is to have the purpose, as I view it, of infusing into the minds of the negotiators in Europe the belief that whatever the President shall undertake will be defeated here; that he is discredited in his own country, and that his proposals if adopted will be repudiated by the Senate. Therefore, cui bono—what good—why do anything? But it did more, and its purpose went further. It was in its effect to license his opponents in every part of the world in any kind of opposition they would brood and authorize them to any form of contention it would be to their profit to present.

Then, sir, to this object or to this effect the Senator from Massachusetts in his speech proceeds to make the assertion that the President has violated some duty due to his Government in not bringing the Senate at once into consultation in connection with these diplomatic affairs he has initiated, and at every step and every utterance demanded communication with the Senate before he reaches a conclusion or presents one. The Senator in his speech proceeding to make this assertion as to the right of the Senate and the wrong of the President when interrupted by the alert Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], seeking information, and the following transpired:

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin if what he has is different.

Said the Senator from Massachusetts in his speech of December 21. Then the Senator from Wisconsin read a quotation that was then in his hand from the work on Constitutional Government in the United States by the President, as follows:

One of the greatest of the President's powers I have not yet spoken of at all—his control, which is very absolute, of the foreign relations of a nation. The initiative in foreign affairs, which the President possesses without any restriction whatever, is virtually the power to control them absolutely. The President can not conclude a treaty with a foreign power without the consent of the Senate, but he may guide every step of diplomacy; and to guide diplomacy is to determine what treaties must be made if the faith and prestige of the Government are to be maintained. He need disclose no step of negotiation until it is complete, and when in any critical matter it is completed the Government is virtually committed. Whatever its disinclination, the Senate may feel itself committed also.

Then it was that the Senator from Massachusetts, replying to the mere quotation which the Senator from Wisconsin read, said, in subtle satire—

Let timid souls then take courage and be cheerful.

Now, no one better knew than the Senator from Massachusetts—I except the Senator from Wisconsin, who has been very busy upon the committee to which the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] referred a moment ago, which must have occupied every minute of his time—no one, I say, knew better than the Senator from Massachusetts who insinuated the suggestion that there was something radically wrong and presumptuous in that assertion by the President in his earlier work as historian before he was President in describing the power of the President in international affairs—that the writer Wilson was absolutely correct. There is no better scholar to be found in government anywhere than my distinguished friend, the senior Senator from Massachusetts. No one could have known better than he that the part of that extract quoted was not Mr. Wilson's invention, but was a part of a quotation from John Marshall, uttered before he was Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is the centralized doctrines of government stated by Marshall, I must insist, that has ever been the key to the political progress of the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Sir, I regret that the senior Senator from Massachusetts remains absent from the floor. I should be glad if some one would call him from his solitary isolation behind the cloak-room doors and again let him know I would welcome him to hear me from the inside of the Chamber, rather than as a "peek a-boo" from the side room.

Mr. President, I now, sir, wish to say that I not only oppose the views of these eminent Senators, as voiced by the Senator from Massachusetts, but here I assert another doctrine, sir, omitted by them, but which I do not feel they will contest when it is mentioned. It is that as to matters upon which the President of the United States is now engaged the Senate has nothing whatever to do. The President is neither called on to communicate them nor to take their advice, to be guided by their judgment, or to be deterred by their threats of repudiation. The President of the United States as he is now situated still stands as the Commander in Chief of the Army. Until peace is absolutely declared, the protocol agreed upon, and an understanding for the withdrawal of the Army is reached, he remains as Commander in Chief arranging the protocol of peace. In this he is neither subject to this body in the beginning of his arrangement nor at the end. It is not, sir, until he has made an agreement that reaches the dignity of a treaty and which puts obligations upon the United States in some form that he is called upon to submit his action or its result to this body at all. While he, sir, is negotiating as Commander in Chief he is serving in his sole province, and performs an office which he by law conducts according to his judgment and discretion as the circumstances of each case justify and call for.

Mr. President, referring for the moment, then, sir, to this quotation from the President, which is taken exception to by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts—

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to yield a little later if the Senator wishes to interpolate me on this point, when I reach the end of the citations in support of it.

Mr. KING. It was as to the point that the Senator had just discussed, and, if he has concluded it, I wish to ask a question, but if the Senator prefers, I will not do so.

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield to the Senator in a moment at a point where I think he can address his interrogatory without interfering with the consecutive order of the citations, and then from those probably there will be the light thrown upon the matter concerning which he expects to ask.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in his speech of condemnation of the President's course, proceeded to say, Mr. President:

In the present unparalleled situation the right of the Senate to advise as to a treaty becomes a solemn, an imperative duty.

The Senator refers to and then itemizes many treaties which have come before the Senate which the Senator says the Senate has refused to ratify, and has held without action. Many others have been vitally amended, he says.

The allies should not be kept in the dark as to the views of the Senate, nor should the Senate keep silent as to its own opinions or as to the wishes and demands of the American people.

Says the Senator:

I repeat that I should be glad if those debates could be supplemented by some definite resolutions expressing the views of the Senate tersely and simply on some of the most important points. Whether the Senate will take such action—although I know that we have very definite opinions—I can not tell, because there seems to be a feeling among some Senators that it is an act of intolerable audacity for the Senate even to suggest to the Executive that it has opinions which ought to be considered. Personally I do not share that view. It appears to me more becoming to an autocratic government or to a dictator than to the constitutionally representative democracy which has thus far made the Government of the United States so successful and which has raised the country to the peak of greatness to which it has attained. But if the Senate is not ready to take action as a body, which I earnestly hope they may determine to do, I desire at least to express my own views of the situation.

Mr. President, it is at this point that I wish likewise to express the view of the Senator from Massachusetts of the situation when this exact question as to whether Congress had the right to give its view to the President to be followed in diplomatic matters was before this body in January, 1917, upon a resolution presented by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. The Senator from Massachusetts then opposed the position he now assumes. The resolution, sir, was to approve the President for his message, and to tender the President the advice and approval of the Senate upon it. The peace message, presented in many forms, many doctrines—now urged by the President—among which was the suggestion of a league, the establishment of small nations aspiring to individual existence, and the general theory of a democracy as it should apply to those lands when resuscitated from war.

The Senator from Massachusetts opposed that resolution, and in his opposition the Senator said that which the President of the United States had quoted in his book—part of it—from John Marshall. Here is what the Senator from Massachusetts then said, when the resolution was presented by a Democratic Senator on this side to approve Wilson, and to give him instructions preparatory to the confirmation of whatever might happen in that peace arrangement for which we had tendered our good offices. The Senator from Massachusetts—I read from page 833 of volume 54 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 4, 1917—says:

My objection to this resolution, Mr. President, is that there is no occasion whatever for it. The President is intrusted with the care of our foreign relations. Negotiations are in his hands. He is conducting them. When he needs our cooperation and assistance he should lay before us all the facts which have guided him.

Well, sir, who should better know when he needs it than the President himself? Who, sir, is the one to feel that need but the President himself? And to whom, sir, shall it be left to say when that need arises but the President himself?

Then says the Senator from Massachusetts:

But until that time comes the Congress of the United States ought not to project itself into the field of negotiations and thrust itself forward into the dangerous field of European politics.

Mr. President, when that time comes; yes. Therefore we must assume that when that time comes—that is, when the President needs the counsel of the Congress or when in his judgment it is necessary; when it is appropriate—he will submit his request; but, as the Senator from Massachusetts so wisely then said, until that time comes the Congress should not project itself upon his foreign negotiations. Yet the able Senator from Massachusetts will now have the country understand that because the President of the United States, in January, 1919, in Europe, is following his advice given in January, 1917, at Washington, he commits a great offense to the decencies of the situation, to the amenities of this body, and to the rights of the country. Mr. President, I do not demand of men that they be consistent with their expressions; I only demand they be consistent with their sincerity.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is well sustained in his view as in 1917 he expressed it. In support of my doctrine I may be pardoned for imposing upon the Senate a few citations. I call attention to Crandall's Compilation upon Treaties, referring to John Marshall's speech in the House of Representatives March 7, 1800:

To the President is intrusted the exclusive power of communication with foreign States. "The President"—

Mark the words, sir—the President's expression in his book, which the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts would have assumed to have regarded as wholly original as an assumption of Wilson—

The President is the sole organ of the Nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations.

Mr. President, then, sir, I call attention to the following:

"Agreements involving the military power of the President": The executive power is by the Constitution vested in the President. He is also the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. As incident and necessary to the exercise of these powers, as also of the power of negotiation, temporary arrangements and administrative agreements are frequently made by the President with foreign governments, which are not submitted to the Senate for its approval.

Then quoting John C. Spooner, a former eminent and learned Senator of this body:

It—

The conduct of foreign relations—involves intercourse, oral and written, conferences, administrative agreements and understandings, not included in the generic word "treaty," as used in the Constitution. All treaties are agreements, but all international agreements and understandings are not "treaties."

Now, Mr. President, we turn for a second, sir, to Willoughby upon the Constitution, volume 1, reading a short passage from section 198 upon the distinction that I present to the body:

This power, then, of the President to enter into international arrangements free from the necessity of obtaining the subsequent approval of the Senate may be treated under the following heads:

1. His power inherent in him as the Chief Executive and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

* * * * * * * *

The term "protocol," as used in international law, has ascribed to it several meanings. * * *

1. As describing the records of the meetings of commissioners for the negotiation of a treaty. These records, though, of course, not parts of the treaty finally entered into, are often of value. * * *

2. As describing an agreement reached between the foreign offices of two countries, which has been reduced to definite written statement. * * *

The most common use to which protocols in this sense are put is in fixing the general terms in which a final treaty—especially a treaty of peace—is to be negotiated. A recent example of this is the protocol of 1898 providing for the appointment of a commission to negotiate the treaty of peace with Spain.

The constitutional authority of the President without consulting the Senate to enter into protocols of agreement as the basis for treaties to be negotiated is beyond question and has repeatedly been exercised without demur from the Senate.

Mr. President, it is this point to which I now wish to call attention:

The able Senator from Massachusetts alluded to an article he himself had written—and if I recall that article, as I think I do, it was in September, 1902—contributing, as he often does, the fecundity of his pen, if we may so speak, to Scribner's Magazine. The article was to designate the articles or treaty upon which the Senate of the United States had a right to be heard and had been consulted upon. The able Senator included this article in his address the other morning, and presented it as a record of the conduct and doings of the Senate of the United States, and would, if it were left alone, have presented to the country that there were no exceptions to that which the Senator from Massachusetts presented. It would have left the country to deduce from the document printed and to be further printed, because the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], I see from the RECORD, moved the privilege of having more copies of the document printed for the use of the Senate—that the rule there set forth was universal and uniform, without exception, and that anything to the contrary—conduct of any President dealing in international matters—was a violation of the fundamental law of our land.

What were they? They were the references to different treaties that have been negotiated from time to time and submitted to the Senate ultimately for its confirmation. But, Mr. President, the notable exceptions, applicable specifically to the case in hand, were omitted by the distinguished Senator in his discussion here on the floor. It is these, sir, which I respectfully bring to the attention of the Senate, that their application may now, sir, be understood.

Mr. President, I ask now to impose upon the Senate the specific instances occurring in our Government exactly parallel to the one in hand. I mean as literal precedents established for the guidance of Presidents—under our laws and Constitution—and by which President Wilson is guided, and under which he acts and is vindicated.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McLEAN. While the Senator is on that subject, may I interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I yield. I owe it to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to yield to him, but I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. May I interrupt the Senator long enough to call his attention to the fact that the President of the United States has expressed himself very freely upon this subject. He has anticipated precisely the situation which now seems to trouble the Senator from Illinois and his colleagues.

Mr. LEWIS. Nothing troubles the Senator from Illinois as to this matter, I may add.

Mr. McLEAN. And he has prescribed a method by which the Senate may defend itself against the encroachments of a too self-sufficient Executive.

I call the Senator's attention to Mr. Wilson's work on Congressional Government, not Constitutional Government, and I read from page 232:

> The greatest consultative privilege of the Senate—the greatest in dignity, at least, if not in effect upon the interests of the country—is its right to a ruling voice in the ratification of treaties with foreign powers.

And on page 233 he continues and says:

> His only power—

That is, the only power of the President—> of compelling compliance on the part of the Senate lies in his initiative in negotiations, which affords him a chance—

And I should like the Senator from Illinois to mark this language—> affords him a chance to get the country into such scrapes, so pledged in the view of the world to certain courses of action, that the Senate hesitates to bring about the appearance of dishonor which would follow its refusal to ratify the rash promises or to support the indiscreet threats of the Department of State.

And again,

> The Secretary of State may confer with its chairman—

That is, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations—

> Or with its more influential members. But such a mode of conference is manifestly much less than a voice in the deliberations of the Senate itself, much less than meeting that body face to face in free consultation and equal debate.

And here we have the remedy prescribed by the President himself:

> There seems to have been at one time a tendency toward a better practice—

That is the practice which I have quoted and which has been condemned by the President.

> In 1913 the Senate sought to revive the early custom, in accordance with which the President delivered his messages in person, by requesting the attendance of the President to consult upon foreign affairs.

I think, Mr. President, we may safely assume that the President will adhere to this view, this advice which he gave when his intellectual processes, I may say, were unencumbered with millenial visions or world-wide political aspirations, and that all in due time he will indicate that an invitation from the Committee on Foreign Relations to appear before that committee and disclose his purposes and intentions before he commits this country will certainly be most agreeable to him and that he will not think of speaking for this country or committing it to any terms of peace or league of nations until he has at least given the Senate an opportunity to review his position.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I trust that other Senators may indulge the same confidence in the President of the United States being both sensible and consistent as does the Senator from Connecticut. I would only hope, sir, that with the belief in such a view some of them would have avoided the exhibitions of other attitudes that so debase, as I see it, sir, the patriotism of men.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, in that connection will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, we all understand that by the provisions of the Constitution the President has the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties. I should like, in order to get the Senator's views, to have him state to the Senate when the right of advice on the part of the Senate begins. That is to say, is the treaty to be completely formulated without the Senate having any right to advise with the President with regard to it?

Mr. LEWIS. I say here to the Senator, the right of the Senate to advise is a privilege. I have no doubt that any President would be glad to have it. But the meaning of the Constitution is that when a treaty has actually been made by the President in the discharge of his privilege in the control of our foreign relations, then, and only then, is he obligated by law to submit it to this body, for the reason, as the Senator must readily realize, that the Constitution invests in this body the privilege to advise and consent to a finished thing—the treaty.

If it were called on to advise and consent as to each given moving particle, we never would reach a conclusion of anything, because the different steps would be intercepted without the knowledge of the other thing that may be in the mind of those participating, and which, when done, might have removed the very objection which the Senate might have urged against that part that alone was presented for its consideration.

If the Senator will endure with me for a while, I will quote himself as evidence fortifying this position I take.

But I now ask the Senator's attention to the history, sir, which, as I said, the able Senator from Massachusetts had omitted; that as Commander in Chief the distinction is, in the negotiation of peace from that which applies as President of the United States in the ordinary treaty, in the civil undertakings of our country.

> On January 20, 1905, there was signed at Santo Domingo City, by Commander A. C. Dillingham, United States Navy, and Mr. Dawson, the American minister, on the one part, and by the Dominican minister of foreign affairs on the other, a protocol under which the United States was to guarantee the integrity of the Dominican territory, undertake the adjustment of foreign claims, administer the finances on certain lines, and assist in maintaining order. As it was stipulated that the arrangement should take effect February 1, the inference was widely drawn that there existed an intention to treat the protocol as a perfected international agreement without submitting it to the Senate. Such an intention was soon afterwards disclaimed by the administration; but the incident resulted in the raising of the broad question as to the power of the President to enter into international agreements of any kind without the advice and consent of the Senate; and the discussion was soon found to involve the second article of the arbitration treaties. By this article, as we have seen, it was provided that the President should in each individual case, before appealing to the permanent court of arbitration, conclude a "special agreement," defining the matter in dispute and the scope of the arbitrators' powers, and fixing the periods for the formation of the arbitral tribunal and the several stages of the procedure. As announced in the press, the position was taken by Senators that the "special agreement" required in each case must be in the form of a treaty, duly submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent.
> The President, on the other hand, took the ground that the arbitration treaties, if approved by the Senate and afterwards ratified, would in themselves constitute complete legislative acts, which it would be within his powers as Executive to carry into effect as occasion might arise; and that, if a new treaty were required in each particular case, the general treaties would fail to accomplish their primary purpose and would in reality constitute a step backward rather than a step forward in the development of the practice of international arbitration by the United States. These views the President embodied in a letter to Senator Cullom, which was in the nature of a protest against the position which Senators were understood to have taken. On receiving this letter, the Senate, with only seven dissenting votes, immediately amended the treaties by striking out of the second article the word "agreement" and substituting for it the word "treaty," so that it would be necessary in each individual case before proceeding to arbitration to conclude a special "treaty," defining the matter in dispute and the scope of the arbitrators' powers, as well as fixing the periods for the formation of the tribunal and the several stages of the procedure. When the treaties as thus amended were returned to the President it was announced that he would not submit them in their amended form to the other governments concerned, but would consider the action of the Senate as constituting in principle a disapproval of them.
> As the record stands, issue was thus joined on the broad question whether it is within the power of the President to conclude any "agreement" or, at any rate, any arbitral agreement, with a foreign power without the advice and consent of the Senate. As regards this question, the President appears upon the affirmative side and the Senate apparently upon the negative. No doubt, if the subject had been further discussed, the issue might have been brought within narrower limits. It will not be pretended by anyone that the President can make any and every kind of an international agreement without the cooperation of the Senate, for the Constitution expressly requires that "treaties" shall be made by him "by and with the advice and consent" of that body, signified by the approving vote of two-thirds of the Senators present. On the other hand, it can easily be demonstrated that the word "treaties," as used in the constitutional law of the United States, does not embrace any and every kind of international agreement.

Now, for a moment I wish to bring the illustration to hand. I invite the attention of the Senate to the instance of the agreement of 1817 for the limitation of naval armaments on the Great Lakes. I ask the privilege of incorporating in my address, sir, the full description of that agreement and its related companion instances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The agreement of 1817, for the limitation of naval armaments on the Great Lakes, was made and carried into effect by the Executive, though it was afterwards submitted to the Senate. By a protocol signed at London December 9, 1850, by Abbott Lawrence, American minister, on the part of the United States, and by Viscount Palmerston, on the part of Great Britain, it was agreed that the British Crown should cede to the United States Horseshoe Reef, in Lake Erie, and that the United States should accept it, on the conditions of erecting a lighthouse there and maintaining no fortifications. On receipt of the protocol Mr. Webster, as Secretary of State, on January 7, 1851, instructed Mr. Lawrence to acquaint the British Government that the arrangement was "approved" by the Government of the United States. This Mr. Lawrence did on the 17th of the succeeding month. Congress made appropriations for the erection of the lighthouse, which was built in 1856. The validity of the title thus gained will hardly be disputed. The cession, which the Executive had arranged, having been adopted by Congress, the territory came completely within the jurisdiction and control of the United States without any "treaty." We hold the Hawaiian Islands by no better tenure. Two successive attempts to annex them by treaty having failed, they were acquired under a joint resolution of Congress. Texas also was annexed by a joint resolution, but as it was at the same time admitted as a State, it stands in a legal category distinguishable from that of Hawaii.

In 1882 an arrangement was effected between the United States and Mexico, by means of an exchange of notes, for the reciprocal passage of troops of the two countries across the border when in pursuit of hostile Indians. On June 25, 1890, an agreement, in the form of a protocol, was entered into on the same subject, and this agreement was from time to time renewed with amendments. The Federal troops of the two countries were permitted to cross the international boundary in pursuit of certain hostile Indians in the uninhabited and desert part of the line, which were defined as "all points that are at least 10 kilometers distant from any encampment or town of either country." It was expressly stipulated that no such crossing should take place between two certain specified points. There were various other provisions requiring notice of crossing to be given, if possible, and permitting the chastisement of other hostiles whom the troops might chance to meet.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I now ask the Senate's attention as approving the position of the President and as justifying his course in precedent. My recital of late history—political, military, and diplomatic—exactly fitting in parallel the circumstances now applying to the President's action now proceeding in Europe.

One of the most important agreements ever made by the Executive without submission to the Senate was the peace protocol with Spain of August 12, 1898. By this protocol provision was made for a general armistice between the two countries. This stipulation was no doubt within the powers of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army in time of war, but there were other provisions of a different nature and of far-reaching importance. Not only did the protocol stipulate that Spain should relinquish all claim of sovereignty over the title to Cuba, and should cede to the United States Porto Rico and other islands under Spanish sovereignty in the West Indies, and an island in the Ladrones to be selected by the United States, but it also provided that Spain should "immediately evacuate" Cuba, Porto Rico, and other Spanish islands in the West Indies, and to this end within 10 days should appoint commissioners, who within 30 days were to meet commissioners of the United States at Havana, in Cuba, and San Juan, in Porto Rico, respectively, for the purpose of arranging and carrying out the details of the evacuation of Cuba and the adjacent islands. Commissioners to negotiate the definitive peace were to meet at Paris not later than October 1, 1898. They met accordingly, and, pending the negotiations which resulted in the signature of the treaty of peace on December 10, 1898, Porto Rico was evacuated and the preparations for the evacuation of Cuba were proceeding. It may be said that the evacuation of Cuba was clearly within the scope of the joint resolution under which the President was directed to intervene in Cuba, but this could not be said with regard to the anticipatory evacuation of Porto Rico and other Spanish islands in the West Indies, which was clearly an incident of the cession.

Mr. President, another remarkable exercise by the President alone of the power to make agreements with foreign countries is found in the protocol concluded at Peking on September 7, 1901, between China and the allied powers who had cooperated in the march to Peking for the relief of the foreign legations. This protocol was signed on the part of the United States by Mr. W. W. Rockhill, now minister to China, who was then acting as a special commissioner to China by Executive appointment alone. It embraced numerous topics, including reparation by China for the murder of the German minister at Peking, the infliction of punishment of the principal authors of the outrages and crimes committed against foreign governments and their nationals, the prohibition by China of the importation of arms and ammunition as well as of the materials exclusively used for their manufacture, the payment to the allies of an indemnity of 450,000,000 taels, the constitution of an extraterritorial quarter for the use of the foreign legations in Peking, the temporary occupation by the powers of certain points in order to keep open the communication between the capital and the sea, and undertakings on the part of China to negotiate amendments to her existing treaties, to improve the navigability of the Peiho River, and to transform her office of foreign affairs into a ministry of foreign affairs, which was to take precedence over the six ministries of state.

Mr. President, I invite attention to the fact, sir, that neither of those was referred to by the eminent Senator from Massachusetts in his impeachment of the course of the President. Not one of those was alluded to by the Senator in the arraignment that he presented in his late speech nor in the catalogue and schedule that he gave the Senate of the instances in this Government wherein the President consulted the Senate. These, the only instances which paralleled the exact conditions now, sir, as Commander in Chief, were omitted completely. Surely the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts was not ignorant of these. He was a Member of the body when they transpired, and he raised not a voice then against these distinguished Executives executing the project and carrying out the design as Commander in Chief, because his eminent ability submitted to his own judgment that they were right, wholly within their province, and justified by precedent and the law of their country. He could not bring himself to give the President the benefit of their weight, though he was too honest with history to dispute the existence of the acknowledged authority.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not approaching the subject in a disputatious or argumentative spirit at all; but one view expressed by the Senator from Illinois very greatly interests me, and I should like him to elaborate it a little further. The question is this:

On the 6th day of April, 1917, Congress declared that a state of war existed between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany. Could the President the following day have declared the war at an end without consultation with Congress, or any action upon the part of either the Senate or both Houses of Congress?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator, yes; the President as Commander in Chief could have declared the war at an end, and then he could have submitted to the body, if he cared—as he should—whatever conclusion he arrived at upon the facts before him. The body could have repudiated his conclusions. There, sir, I say, answering the able Senator, the power of the Senate would begin after the President had announced his conclusion.

Now, Mr. President, the learned Senator from Massachusetts recognized this exact situation when, in a speech on January 3, 1917, the Senator referred to the course of President Roosevelt in seeking to bring together the nations of Japan and Russia for the purpose of peace. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] then rose and interpellated the Senator from Massachusetts, and asked if there was any resolution introduced in this body concerning the conduct of President Roosevelt, and the Senator from Massachusetts, so anxious to have it understood that under no circumstances had the body any right to intrude itself with its advice, much less to hope that the proposal would be sent to it for confirmation, said:

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. I ask the Senator if, in the case of President Roosevelt's note, any resolution was introduced into the Senate for a confirmation of his proposal?

Mr. LODGE. I do not remember that any resolution was passed by either House of Congress indorsing and approving the action of the President. The President was acting wholly within his right as Chief Executive, as the present Executive is acting, and it was not sought by him certainly to project the Congress of the United States into the negotiations, if you choose to call them so, or with the good offices he had offered in hopes of bringing the belligerents together.

And, Mr. President, I can answer the direct question of the Senator from Indiana, made to me a few moments ago, by quoting the Senator from Massachusetts in his reply to the Senator. It is this I meant when I said, in reply to the Senator from Indiana, I would quote him in reply to his query to me. The Senator from Massachusetts continued then to say:

The Senate, in my judgment, has no right—and I have thought so for a long time—to try to force itself into the conduct of a diplomatic negotiation, and when it asks for diplomatic papers its request is always accompanied with the statement that the papers be sent "if not incompatible with the public interest"; in other words, it is recognized that the whole conduct of the negotiation is in the President's hands. Now, if the President has in his possession the terms proposed by the central powers, it is entirely within his discretion to deal with them; but if we are summoned to indorse in the dark everything that he is doing, then before action we are entitled to know the grounds of the action; in other words, when our cooperation is invited we are entitled to have the same information as that which the President has.

It must be very apparent then, Senators, that the viewpoint of the able Senator from Massachusetts in his last address here in this body is in opposition to that which he uttered here in January, 1917, on the same subject. It is equally obvious the change of position has an object. If then, in 1917, he sought to deprive the Democratic side of the credit of offering its cooperation and instruction to the President in his effort to attain peace, upon the ground that we had no right to offer our advice or consultation until the President had demanded it, may I not ask, What right has the eminent Senator now to say the President commits a wrong in not waiting for that advice of the Senate before he acts and before he demands it? Why should the able Senator for that charge him with committing an infraction of the constitutional law of the land and of the fundamental doctrines of the Government? No one knew better than the senior Senator from Massachusetts that he had fully presented the very opposite view and had maintained it. There can be but one construction to this conflict of conclusion on the same state of facts—politics.

It is the one I deplore. It is one that follows the conditions outlined—the desire to obtain the political advantage to be had by holding out to the people of America, who generally do not understand the course of these questions, that the President was assuming, in a despotic manner, as a dictator, as an imperial potentate, to ignore the people by refusing to do that which under the law was his duty, as the able Senator would have the country understand; and that the President was violating the fundamental doctrines of our whole theory of government—and only because it was his privilege to do so—by ignoring this body and showing contempt for its prerogative.

Mr. President, of course you have seen, all of you, newspaper items over the country teeming with burning utterances accusing the President of this great offense to the Senate, of the violation of his obligation to the people, by in no wise conferring with their representatives, the Senate; and these put their accusing judgment on the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. It was this purpose, I assert, the Senator from Massachusetts artfully had; and here upon the record, as is evident to all mankind, a more unjustified accusation on the part of the able Senator was never made by man of high position, in high place, against the Executive of his own country.

Mr. President, I insist that the object is clear; the Senator hears my voice. It is to make the negotiators in Europe believe that the President has violated the laws of his land and is a fugitive from the justice of the Senate, taking refuge in their midst; that while he is being entertained by them he is as one discredited by his correlative body, the Senate, and that his conduct has been such that he only awaits the repudiation of his American mankind.

And why, sir, is all this? It is that these who unjustly accuse may defeat the very purpose for which the man has gone abroad as the representative of his Nation, and that when defeated they can cry out to America, "Behold what a failure this man was; see how he has brought upon the land this regrettable spectacle of disgrace," showing the world how all the pouring out of blood and sacrifice of life has been of no avail, as they will charge; how, as they will cry out, he was accompanied abroad by Mr. Creel and his retinue; and how he presented himself to the kings and potentates, feasted from golden plates in Buckingham Palace, and came home with a zero to the credit of his office and a disdain of his countrymen to his name and fame.

These condemning Senators hope that their whole design, acutely executed, audaciously conceived, shall accomplish that result. Then they will go before the country and say: "There is but one thing to do; defeat this detestable Democracy, that has brought upon you so contemptible a result. Summon your Republican forces at once and demand a special session of Congress, that you shall on March 4 have a Republican Senate called to right your wrongs." Then, sir, that new Congress, summoned under the call of patriotism, under the guidance of that same leadership, will proceed to turn the railroads back to their masters' possession, without regard to the rights of our people. Then we will have another orgy, where certain railroad manipulators polluted every legislature possible, purchased judges to violate the law, and debauched the Government whenever private profit could follow their crime. Then, too, will follow the telegraph and cable lines to be restored to their private owners to continue their monopoly and outrage upon the people, yet both to be the flowing fount of corrupt political campaign funds.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] may now know something of the truth of the matter he referred to this morning, that with all efforts of this Government to get the reports about our dead boys on the fields of France, to be communicated home, the cables were so choked by messages that paid from 60 cents a word up to $6 that it was impossible to get a message over here to a weeping mother or waiting father with all the power of the Federal Government. The Senator's criticism was just, that these delays seemed to be inhuman, that they must awaken a revolt in the heart of anyone who has to suffer the experience.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but he should remember the casualty lists came from Europe at a time when the cables were under private control, every week bringing to the War Department the hospital lists—at least it was so reported to the Committee on Military Affairs—so that the choking of the cables could not have interfered in any way with disseminating the information for the lack of which I have criticized the department this morning.

Mr. LEWIS. I must advise the able Senator, since he has alluded to that, so careful was this Government to make an arrangement by which it took no money from the cables and left the officials and operators in charge of the cable companies' affairs, continued its managers and superintendents, that when the opportunity came for one of these lines to profit financially upon the distress of a Nation in the way to which I have alluded, they not only did not fail to accept it, but rushed to do so, and thought that they did so in secrecy. The eminent Senator is right in assuming the Government was in control of the war messages, so far as their contents were supervised at that time, but upon the facts being disclosed he will discover the real reason of the delay in getting reports from Europe as to sickness, casualties, and deaths of soldiers.

For many other reasons the Government has been compelled to lay its strong hand upon these agencies that this continuation of wrong and this unnamable infliction upon the mothers of this country shall not longer continue by private enterprise that is now being championed in this Chamber and elsewhere as "legitimate private business."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting his line of thought. I had no intention of doing so, but I wished to inject this comment, in view of what he has just said, that there has been no complaint on the part of the War Department or by any official of it that there was delay on the part of the cables in sending the names of the casualties from the other side.

Mr. LEWIS. It may be the Senator, Mr. President, has not had the War Department use that excuse. I pray the War Department and no other department of this Government will attempt to shove off, as it were, from its own responsibility by attempting to put the blame upon any other source. Nevertheless, I inform the Senator that at a little later time, in an official report which is now on its way to this body, he will have such different information of the real reason that neither he nor the country need go astray. At a later time I will enter upon that subject more in detail, when not altogether foreign to my discussion.

Then, sir, to proceed, these views I have described of the President's critics go out, flashed at once abroad, and the impression, so unjust of our land and our people, in relation to the President and his country finally succeeds. Then we have the commissioners representing the European countries misled, misguided, and deceived. We have every land abroad advised each morning that the man whom they have received in their halls of hospitality is unwelcome in his own country. Upon those false premises this form of indictment is presented to the world. What do you say, Mr. President of the Senate? What will you say, Senators to my left and you to my right, of the situation I am presenting to you, that here is a citizen from America—I care nothing about his political cognomen—who is President of the United States? With the dignity of this country in his keeping he goes abroad to serve humanity. He is welcomed by every land as the apostle of liberty, received by every country as the distributor of justice, homage paid to him from the doors of the humblest homes, millions of the poor trooping to the highways to see him, that they may see what represents democracy in a humble, simple human being of America.

All over the world every ear is turned to hearken to his least utterance, the earth gives audience to his every declaration. Everywhere benighted civilization and oppressed mankind confide to his justice and trust his promise. These everywhere pray to be delivered by him and are content that he will but remember them. Sir, only here in his own land, only in the Congress of the United States, of all the world, is he reviled and misrepresented, to such low plane of political uses have some patriots of our land fallen. America, we may not ask, Is this your land—are such as these your sons?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Prophets.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] interpolates "prophets." Prophets! These eminent leaders—I am pleased that I can never bring the charge, fitting to some, against their party or its patriotic followers, for they can not be indicted—but those who wrap themselves in a cloak and brand it "Republican," besmirch the garment and stain the character of a noble party name by their ignoble conduct.

Prophets! So far as I am concerned, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska they shall hereafter be known as "the soviets of the Senate."

Mr. President, since we have seen the object of the thing I oppose, I have but this to say—and then I conclude this branch of the discussion—that when men with motives such as I charge, eminent leaders though they may be, shall have ceased their defamation of this man; when they have ended their misrepresentation, finished their false drama, and have gone into the obloquy which awaits them, and in the calm reflection of a just American public, shall have been driven from public place by that contempt which ever follows deliberate injustice on the part of any man—the President of the United States of America, this man Woodrow Wilson, will rise as a figure illumined on the pages of history, reflecting glory upon this Republic for generations yet unborn. And mankind recalling his labors for good and his sacrifices for man, will ever recall him as one spoken of by Cato in "Pharsalia";

Clarum et venerabile nomen
Gentibus, et multum nostrae quod proderat-urbi.

(A man illustrious and revered by nations and rich in blessings for our country's good.)

I come now to analysis of the compliance to the demand that the President take advice of the Senators as to the peace treaty. I ask your attention, Senators, who do me the compliment of listening to me, to this thought: The Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators say the President will not take the consultation of the Senate. As a mere matter of les amusant pour le moment—"amusement for the moment"—as the French would have it, in Victor Hugo's The Man Who Laughs, may I submit to you this thought? I now bring in the President; I summon him and say, "The distinguished Senators say you should consult them and take their advice." We imagine him, in his usual genial accommodation, replying, "I shall be happy to do so. I want the Senate's advice." But I as Senator now ask, What advice will the President take? Will he take the advice of the distinguished Republican Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and that of the distinguished Democratic Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who oppose our entering into any form of alliance upon the ground that it violates the traditional principles of our Government and runs counter to the direction of George Washington? Will he follow that advice and keep off altogether, or will he take the advice of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who says, "Yes; we should enter into ententes and alliances in Europe or anywhere, but with a limited number of countries only and with defined responsibilities"; or will he take the advice of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and enter into a general understanding with all European little factions by which he pledges our land behind all these foreign divisions to establish any purpose or policy which any of them desires, however much force it may take?

Which advice shall the President follow? Shall he follow the suggestion of the eminent Senator from Massachusetts in saying "This war was a war for civilization," or that of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who says it was one to establish ancient rights on the sea, and we should not enter into the affairs generally of Europe or Asia, but, after stating peace terms, obtain the main principles and get out of the affairs of the world? Or, pardon me for again asking on another phase. Will the President follow the advice of the humane Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and withdraw all the troops we now have in Russia at once, though we have them there as a necessary protection of American interests? Or shall he follow the advice of the kindly souled and industrious Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and, instead of withdrawing them, obey his demand and at once put more soldiers in there? Finally, Mr. President, as between the protesting voices of the Senators from Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, shall the President take the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts and sit at the peace table, demanding that all of these nations be divided up into different political divisions, to be established in government and entrenched in power and held there by American force, or the advice of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who says we shall lay down such propositions of general policy for which we fought this war, and "then come home" and have nothing to do with these internal policies of any of the warring lands or their factions?

What advice shall the President take of the Senate? Surely, poor man, in such event—when he comes to get that advice and to follow it—he would have to quote in his soul the passage from Milton's Paradise Lost, where the individual, beholding himself surrounded by such confusion of counsels, persecuting him with insistence that he worship in every direction, cries out, "Wretched me, whither shall I fly? If to one, consumed by the gods; if to the other, destroyed by the demons."—Pluto, "rather to thy bosom be my refuge."

Sirs, I mention all this that the country may see how utterly impossible is the attitude of the eminent Senators who make this opposition, and I present it that the country may see, upon reflection, how impossible it would be for the President ever to take his consultation from the viewpoint as expressed by the eminent Senators, however in their sincerity, because of the lack of any concrete judgment on the part of the opposition or any concrete and established policy on the part of any six—or indeed of any two of those opposing this policy—or of any two or more proposing any other policy of any kind or of any nature for the purpose of avoiding war, the devastation of lands, the murder of children, the destruction of civilization.

The Senators may say, as they do, that they will not vote to ratify a treaty or to confirm an agreement made in the manner that they indicate, as drawn from the reports in the public press. Mr. President, I would have no Senator vote for any policy that did not meet his conscience; I would have no Senator give his approval to that which he felt was not for the welfare of this country; but I have this to say:

Now, sir, I am brought to the demands of the Senator that Wilson postpone his ordered work. Says the Senator, "There should be postponement of the freedom of the seas." What postponement? Postponement of an expression of our rights on the sea. Pay tribute to the forceful deliverance of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] on this point and envy its convincing arraignment as an expression of my own. Where is my friend, the senior Senator from Massachusetts? Will he hear me from the recesses of his self-effacement in the lobby? Where is the man sitting here that did not hear that distinguished Senator time and time again inveigh against us because we would resign to Germany the freedom of the seas? Where is the speech of my eminent friend which he made in Massachusetts in the political campaign of 1916 and his eloquent and able address made on this floor in condemnation of the President because he would resign, as the Senator set forth, our rights in the matter of the freedom of the seas? Nor, as he charged, ever prescribe and assert it. Now, it is to be postponed. Why? What is his reason, sir, that it should be postponed now? Now, that the battles have been fought and victory won, the representatives are around the peace table for what? They are assembled there that they may incorporate a definition of the results.

What are the results for which we fought? Among others, the freedom of the seas. Postpone it? Postpone the recognition of it? Postpone the statement of it? Postpone the assertion of it? Postpone the demand for it? Then, the only thought I have to reply is, Why did we fight and for what did this Nation go to war? If Germany had not violated our rights on the seas, shattered our ships into splinters, submerged our cargoes, murdered our fellow citizens, defenseless, and without cause, we would have been following to-day the advice of such eminent Senators as these to whom I am referring by "keeping our hands out of European politics." Avoiding every conflict, we would to-day not have one soldier boy lying stretched upon the plains of France bathed in the dew of his own blood, while his mother waits at home for but a sign of where her angel boy sleeps. There are those who were driven to this necessity of sacrifice of our children because of the denial to our country of the freedom of the seas. And this distinguished Senator contributed to this body a discussion that can be used, indeed, as a model anywhere of our right to the seas and the necessity for claiming it, aye, through war. Then, indeed, sir, shall we hastily and without preparation postpone it? Why is it asked? What for? Hear me; I will tell you.

There is no abler historian in this body than the senior Senator from Massachusetts. He can tell you how in 1812 and 1814, when we had concluded war with England, made for our rights, known as the rights of the sea, and then in peace negotiated a treaty, we permitted ourselves to be juggled into omitting any definition of our rights on the sea. It was left out and postponed; all assertion of our rights to the sea abandoned.

We withdrew it completely that we might not have a further discussion or embarrassment upon the subject. Yet, sir, when Henry Clay, as commissioner, came home and made this confession to the American people they defeated him for the Presidency. All over America, even in our weak years, went the echo: Why the war, why the death, why the desolation, if for all that for which we suffered we get not even a word establishing our rights? The eminent Senator from Massachusetts is not blind in his astuteness to the fact that if you can but duplicate that history, you can in 1920 go all over America and cry, "Behold the Nation, with twenty billions of its money gone, with its homes desolated of children, with a cloud of misery on every threshold and in every home, and yet for all this, what? Nothing!"

Should the demand of the Senator and his allies prevail, then to-morrow, if Germany is rehabilitated, she is just as she was yesterday, without a warning by America of any right of ours whatever on the seas. Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and Austria, indeed every nation at the peace table, has not a line from us insisting on our rights, nor is there recorded in any compact a single demand for the security of America on the seas for the to-morrows. Ah, then, the distinguished Senator and his colleagues will cry: "Out with those who did such cowardice, out with them, send them into outer darkness, where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, postpone!" Postpone?

Mr. President, I regret my learned friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is not here. I wish to speak of that able Senator's position. In his speech the Senator from Pennsylvania tendered a resolution. Behold, sir, it reads in its preamble:

> Whereas the United States of America entered the war with Germany and Austria-Hungary in order to vindicate the ancient rights of navigation as established under international law—

The Senator from Pennsylvania says we entered the war to vindicate our ancient rights, and the Senator from Massachusetts says, "We shall postpone the vindication." If we entered the war to vindicate them, then why postpone it? What is the purpose of the eminent Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. President, here we will recall that likewise the Senator from Pennsylvania demands that we postpone the league of nations. I pray you watch this little game. Political ping-pong was never played with more astuteness nor more amusingly. First, the Senator from Massachusetts demands that we shall postpone the freedom of the seas; he makes his declaration and declamation with all the anathema of accusation and condemnation. Then arises the eminent ex-Secretary of State, the Senator from Pennsylvania, for whom all have an affection, and demands postponement of the establishment of a league of nations. Now, in the language of the Gilbert and Sullivan opera, "there's a howdy-do." Postponement! Why? Did we not go to war for complete vindication of all we were fighting for? Are we now to forego any of these necessary guaranties? Might I not put a query here to the Senator from Massachusetts and to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

I read from a report of 1898. When the peace arrangements were being proposed between this country and Spain and the proposition was made that we take the Philippine Islands, yonder in New England there arose a great protest of those who called themselves "anti-imperialists" against the taking of the Philippine Islands. There arose also from these and elsewhere a demand to abandon that question then and there. Senators who do me the honor to hear me remember the cry was, you will recall, "Let us have immediate peace that we may stop the fighting in the Philippines," which at that time was going on, as you recall, between Aguinaldo and the United States. It was these distinguished Senators, if I err not and call upon them to bring forth facts to the contrary, if I am in error or my report in error, who, in their wisdom, protested against the postponement of any of the terms necessary to a complete peace. To use the words of one of them, "It would be a piecemeal peace," and the country would not know for what they had fought or what they had obtained.

This was sensible. It was what America demanded!

Why ask us now to postpone? What is the theory of saying to us, "Let us postpone," when they realize postponement means a wrong to the Nation and a wrong to the purpose for which we fought and for which our Nation's children died? We know what postponement means. We are not all in the dark as to what is in mind by demanding postponement. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts will have us postpone freedom of the seas. The eminent Senator from Pennsylvania will have us postpone the league of nations. In other words, "Mr. Wilson, please postpone yourself and postpone the Democratic Party and postpone any achievement and postpone any result, as we desire to postpone you politically perpetually." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, if the distinguished Senators had advanced a reason founded in any of the past history of our land or in the suggestions of accommodation to any claim of justice for these propositions and these demands, they would receive at my hands a dignified and considerate treatment. But, sir, as I will point out, and trust I have, there is not one suggestion of conduct made by the eminent Senators but directly contradicts that which they have made before under similar circumstances during other administrations. It is but evident that the purpose is to serve partisan opportunity that might be born of confusion of a people and a misconception of the duties of the President and misrepresentation of his constitutional rights. It is to be deplored that for the consolation of each Senator that each could not have known how to anticipate the antithesis of policies they bear to each other and harmonize on one sure principle of obstruction. That result might promise some hope of advantage.

But we who love them both and wish them well can for the consolation of their hearts dismiss all consciousness of inconsistency of theme, action, or time of performance and cry forth, "Ye gods, annihilate but space and time and make two lovers happy."

Mr. President, we come now, sir, seriously to the situation which the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Pennsylvania would leave us in. I am not without consciousness of the seriousness of an observation I make here. I have stated before—in agreement with what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] this morning said—that this treaty will be before us in some form before this short session closes. All the more ought I to be careful of any utterance I make here touching any viewpoint I have. Mr. President, I say to the country that if the influence of distinguished Senators in this body or of any others anywhere else shall succeed in postponing any arrangement whatever for the creation of some tribunal to which disputes of small nationalities and contentions of European peoples shall be submitted, there will be war resumed, and to this country there will be no exemption. This feared war will break in Europe exactly and for the same apparent beginnings as this great world war broke before. Hear me in my reasoning, sir. We now behold Italy contending for territory a part of which the Jugo-Slavs insist is theirs; again is Italy contending for a territory part of which Greece demands. Greece demands that which Bulgaria claims. We see that as to one of these, as to Greece, her leader, Venizelos says, touching Bulgaria and the claims of Italy—announces—I read from the foreign journal quoting Venizelos:

> Bulgaria sets up territorial claims in the Near East, which, Mr. Venizelos says, will lay the foundation for another war in the immediate future if Mr. Wilson allows himself to be misled.

Sir, we recur then to note another expression, far away geographically. Italy is making certain claims to certain territory, and the Jugo-Slavs, on the other hand, are making counter claims to the same territory. Now, it is said by the leader of the Jugo-Slavs. I read:

> It is impossible in the terms of this armistice to avoid seeing again the effect of the Baron Sonnino's reactionary policy.
> If this policy is allowed to prosper unchecked, if its attempt to lay hands on as many pawns as possible, is not frustrated, there is a definite danger of permanent armed conflict between the two shores of the Adriatic, and such a conflict would have the immediate effect of weakening the Agram Government, and most likely of opening the floodgates of bolshevism.

Mr. President, is this all we need fear? No. Let us pause and contemplate. There is Japan. Japan says, "I claim as the fruit of war the islands heretofore held by Germany in China." She contends that the Provinces which have been wrested by her from Germany, Kiaochow, shall be hers. China replies that these were hers—ever hers—and that they should be returned to her, because first taken by Germany by force from her.

In the meantime, as to the Manchurian border, a part of which was once Russian and a part China's, China is asking to have that returned to her from Russia, while Japan is asking to have Manchuria placed in her hands, as she has been administering it after capturing it from Russia, who had taken it from China.

Do you not realize that each of these will begin their contention—force their claims against each other—if we have not a tribunal such as President Wilson is seeking to create? These conflicts can find but one court of arbitration. This will be where the advocate is the sword, where the judges are cannon, and where the decrees are writ in blood. Let no man beguile himself. They have nowhere else to go. When we have refused after we have promised, or when we have defaulted after we have undertaken, and when their hopes have been dissipated, and only disappointment and despair is their inheritance, what else, they will argue, can they do but fight? It is all they were taught by the Old World, and fight they will. So all of the losses which the world now endures and all the sufferings which mankind has borne as the result of the breaking out of the fires in the Balkans will be again renewed in all their horror and desolation. It will be the United States bringing—

> Cæsar's spirit, ranging for revenge,
> With Ate by his side come hot from hell,
> Shall in these confines with a monarch's voice
> Cry "Havoc," and let slip the dogs of war.

Sir, once the flames light again, with armies resting on arms, no man can picture the universal devastation, nor how the new anarchy and war aroused in the Orient and Russia will rush like leaping flames to our possessions in the Pacific, and approaching us from the Pacific Ocean envelop our west coast in its fires and descend with riot and civil anarchy on us in every center of America. I warn you of the day you bring on yourself.

[Mr. LEWIS yielded the floor at 4 o'clock Thursday.]

Friday, January 3, 1919.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I would not resume the floor this morning had I not laid down specific propositions and stated that I would amplify them by proofs from the RECORD. I appreciate the generosity the Senate has extended me, and I certainly shall not abuse it. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] desire to address the Senate after 2 o'clock on the pending question. I certainly anticipate that nothing I may continue to say will stand in the way of that program.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] this morning had read into the RECORD some views of Viscount Bryce as to the difficulties that would attend the formation of this league of nations, and the eminent Senator would have us understand that, because of those projected difficulties, the embarrassment is regarded by some as insuperable, and for that reason we should not enter upon the undertaking.

Mr. President, no one could have heard those views read without recalling how literally they were the forms of objections which were urged to the confederation of States in the United States of America. They were almost in form literally the things that were constantly said as to how that confederation could never be successful and the Union never permanent. Of course, Mr. President, there are objections to be urged from many viewpoints, there are difficulties apparent; but if we are to shrink from an undertaking merely because we are confronted with a difficulty we shall never enter upon any solution of any question. The mere fact that there are these indications as to difficulties that might arise only serves to warn what things are to solve, what difficulties are to meet, and what obstructions to overcome. Thus I do not regard the mere suggestions of Lord Bryce, or from any other source indeed, pointing out difficulties as obstacles insurmountable to the purpose in view, nor do I recognize them as excuses for failing to enter upon the principal design that is in contemplation. As to the contributions tendered by the Senator from Wells, the novelist, I had adverted to those in the speech of weeks past, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] read the extracts in the RECORD. They point nothing new of objection and give much of hope from new quarter. They were offered by the Senator to dispel the impression he fancied I had awakened, that he alone had presented objections to the plan as proposed and to the project as designed. Alas, for both of us, in all thoughts we can not claim originality.

But when I closed yesterday afternoon, Mr. President, I had reached a point where I was about to enter upon the analysis of the counter propositions suggested by the two Senators—the able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and the equally able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I had stated that the propositions presented by those Senators as counter propositions carried with them the very same suggestion of difficulty that they themselves conjured as against the proposition for the league of nations, and that every one of the burdens which they said would fall upon the nations in the event of attempting a league of nations, would, I charge, inevitably grow out of either plan suggested by either of these two able Senators in the view which they proposed. If this be true such clearly conducts to the mind the conclusion that the league of nations as proposed has less evils in its prospect than the propositions presented by the Senators as their counter propositions have in their inheritance. Let me prove that.

The Senator from Pennsylvania tenders the proposition that we postpone the suggestion of a league of nations, and in its place—and I will quote the Senator's speech literally from the RECORD—he proposes an entente of nations. The Senator would have the larger nations—he named Italy, Japan, France, and the United States, to illustrate—have an understanding that in the event there is anything that looks like the prospect of a conflict, those nations then are to get together and say to the particular nation that threatens that they will use their combined strength to avoid the conflict by whatever means is at their hands or to defeat it.

Now, I ask the question, How could such an entente ever be created to execute these purposes without an understanding between them that they were to use their army and navy? If there be no understanding to use any army and navy, then their mere assertion of a request would be as idle as a whisper. If the purpose be, as the Senator says, and clearly discloses, that where the nation that threatens shall not abjure and desist, then we shall use the combined forces of these, the entente. There, Mr. President, have we not then that force of army and navy invoked by combination of the entente, and have we not the exact situation which Senators conjure up as the evil that they fear to follow and the consequence which they claim make disastrous the adoption of a league of nations?

And, Mr. President, the distinction between the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania and that of the league of nations is this: In the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania you would have a few select nations banding themselves together because they are large and assuming to say to all those whom they have kept out, "You shall obey the theories of life as we prescribe them; you shall be under the jurisdiction of ourselves, as we have combined; you shall have no voice in the understanding; you shall have no representative in the agreement, but what we determine you shall obey." Fancy how long, Mr. President, that would be successful.

And, Mr. President, how would it be executed? Let us pause a minute. Do you assume that under that agreement—may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania when he has time to consider the matter—Italy, with so many thousands of her nationals in Argentina, would agree to abide by whatever agreement these other three or four nations might make as against South America in any design that might arise there? or let us imagine some grievance that they might have from there. Certainly not. Could you imagine, sir, that France, with the interests that she would have in Argentina, could you imagine that Spain would stand silent when Chile was being made the subject of some assault? Could you assume that Britain, with her interests in nitrates in that country, would be content to sit silent and allow other nations anywhere to dispose of Chile? You can readily see, Mr. President, that the suggestion by the eminent Senator is a mere escape from the bigger question. From less than the Senator we would characterize it as a subterfuge. It is filled with every conceivable objection; there is no virtue from it compared to the virtues in an agreement of all nations that can be tendered as an offset, much less as a counter-proposition, to that of a league of nations.

Mr. President, what is it, therefore, the Senator contends for it? Here we are interested in this thought: The able Senator from Pennsylvania would have this entente of nations and have an agreement on their part to carry out the design of frustrating any nation that attempted to make war if it did not settle according to the terms of these four. Then the Senator is wholly at variance with the objection urged by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. They contend that it would be against the policy of George Washington that we should have any alliance with any foreign countries of any nature that might involve us in any complications of the sort which the Senator from Pennsylvania would prevent. The Senator from Pennsylvania presents St. Paul's theory, as expressed to the Corinthians, "all the old things are changed and only the new have come upon us," when the Senator says that George Washington referred to our isolated state, to our separate and distant condition, and, says the Senator from Pennsylvania, "I will not concur and I do not adopt the theory that there should not be some entente arrangement with foreign nations to accomplish purposes of this kind." Then, Mr. President, we see at once that in this opposition to the President we have such a variance between these leaders of the opposition that there is no concrete form which they present that could possibly be executed as either a party policy on the one hand or a unanimous one from the opponents of, as nonpartisan, on the other.

Let us see, sir. There is a thought to be brought to our attention: The eminent Senator from Pennsylvania would have the country understand that, as he says, had we been wise enough to have adopted a suggestion of this kind in 1914 there would have been no war, and I have never a doubt that the distinguished Senator will present before the country how this splendid plan, had it been conceived and executed, would have avoided war. Why, Senators, the eminent Senator is possibly for the moment unconscious of the fact that had the proposition been available, had it been practical at that time—Germany was at peace—we had no reason to suspect, we had no proof at that time that she was establishing a conspiracy. So she would have been one of the nations brought in by him, and then, within the counsels of this select entente in its privilege of monopoly, Germany, with all of her secreted power of 40 years, would have been the dominant figure with the secrets of the power of the other nations in the big entente.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just as she was at The Hague tribunal.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Mississippi injects appropriately, as Germany was at The Hague tribunal.

I bring to your attention this to demonstrate how impracticable, and may I say, sir, how thoughtless, are these suggestions, grandiose in their sound, presented by these eminent Senators that the country may see, as they would have the country believe, that they are not indifferent to some form of league; that they have one quite complete in itself and concrete sufficiently to accomplish the purpose as a reply when they have defeated the one that is now before us for consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. If a simple announcement of that doctrine by America in 1914 would have prevented the late disastrous war, the most disastrous of all wars, how much stronger and how much more effective would be the announcement by all of the nations instead of by the United States alone. And does not the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania show beyond controversy that, if it be a good doctrine if applied by the United States, it would be a far better doctrine if applied by all of the nations instead of just one of the nations?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I must concur in the statement of the Senator from Tennessee, for, as usual, he contributes a potent thought and one effective in its suggestion.

Mr. President, it is interesting, however, at this point to recognize what view is held of the position of these eminent Senators by those outside, and more interesting, when we contemplate the Senator from Pennsylvania, to note that from his own home city of Pittsburgh, from the Pittsburgh Press, there comes comment. That is evidently not a party paper that can be called Democratic; it can not be said to be distinctively favorable to Woodrow Wilson; it attempts to give the credit for a league of nations to ex-President Taft, from whom we wish to take no just credit. But, sir, the editorial, referring to this league of nations, says:

> It is properly no party matter. The league of nations is favored by Republicans as much as by Democrats. * * * To attempt by Senate or national committee action to discredit the idea for which the league stands would be not only to misrepresent and outrage the convictions of the vast majority of Republican voters but would be to commit a colossal political blunder.
> It is to be hoped that Mr. Taft will fight to a finish against the folly of the handful of blind though powerful Republican reactionaries who are working to give the Democratic Party the immense benefit of a Republican miscue on this tremendously important issue.

Mr. President, it must be plain that the attitude of these Senators, as I have pointed it out, is not only inconsistent with practical execution, but is merely tendered for its smoothing effect. Sir, Edmund Burke had occasion to observe that deceit and sometimes hidden design ever delight to speculate in grand presentation. As it has no intention of going any further, says he, than to speculate, it can do so grandly.

Therefore, sir, we see when we examine the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania that it presents no counterproposition, except one that would involve the country in every conceivable form of difficulty, which they conjure up as against the league, with none of the league's compensations.

Now, I take the last suggestion that the Senator presents. The Senator concludes his able speech by saying that he would never consent nor vote to ratify any treaty that would enable our country to be called into action by any foreign power. Why, Senators, how would the distinguished Senator, with this wonderful entente that is sent over the world, flattering these particular nations that, could this policy of Wilson be beaten, they would alone be brought into the secret consultation chamber of the favored, as an inducement to them to do what they can to frustrate the plan now put forth, that they might be favored in the ultimate design presented—how, sir, could they succeed in the realization of the theory of the eminent Senator, except, sir, that it would involve our Navy and our Army, invoke it whenever necessary to carry out the plan of that particular entente against any others outside of it and obstructing or antagonizing it?

And when they did do that, sir, would not that be calling in our Nation by the foreign power, either one of them, two of them, three of them, or the four? Can not the able Senator see to what a reductio ad absurdam the conclusion of his view ultimately leads; will he not see how absolutely it refutes the policy suggested by them as the foundation of their objection—that our Nation could be called into action by foreign powers under the league? Yet the Senator's plan confesses thereby that only a few foreign powers, and those the favored ones, shall have the right to do so.

Mr. President, it seems to me the attempted distinction is so small, and rests on so small a basis, that the object for tendering it is the one I have charged; and, notwithstanding the somewhat indignant and warm, if not impulsive, refutation on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts this morning, saying that he did not know the speeches attacking the league were assailed, and if they were, he was not trying to vindicate them—it must be quite apparent, sir, and there are those in this body who are conscious now, upon examination and reflection, that these attacks can not escape the conclusion that the purpose they had was to frustrate the designs of the President, that he might be discredited and dishonored abroad, and the country defeated at home.

You remember, Mr. President, that one of Hamlet's observations was:

> Rightly to be great
> Is not to stir without great argument,
> But greatly to find quarrel in a straw
> When honor's at the stake. How stand I then?

Now, Mr. President, we come to the last subject, the matter that I referred to this morning in discussion with the Senator from Massachusetts. We see now the counterproposition of the Senator from Massachusetts for but a moment.

The Senator from Massachusetts tells the country that he opposes the league for two reasons. He offers those which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] offers, only in a different way—in a different expression, I might say, sir. Says the Senator from Massachusetts, he will oppose any league that has among its possibilities the country being called to put its Army and Navy at the disposal of a foreign nation; and, second, he will oppose it upon the ground, among other things, that we enter into the affairs of Europe by our alliance. At the same time the Senator from Massachusetts rises on this floor and, as he says this morning, declares that to which I turn in order that I may verify his speech; and I commend now to the country's serious consideration the fact that the coming leader of foreign affairs tells the Nation that he now insists—as he will in his position as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, what?

As the counterproposition, that we abandon the consideration of the league of nations now; that we proceed with the peace table; and, to use the language of the esteemed Senator, he says:

> I think there is general agreement upon them not only in the Senate but among the American people.

For what?

> The restoration of Belgium—

As to that humane design, we all know too well how much blood was shed for it.

> The return of Alsace-Lorraine to France, of the Italia Irredenta to Italy.

Surely the Senator does not mean the latter in entirety. The Italia Irredenta, Mr. President, if I am not wrong in my recollection of history, was an arrangement made in 1878 by a party in Italy called the Irredentists. Their theory was to have returned to Italy all the country of the Italian-speaking tongue; and Italia Irredenta then and now in itself includes Nice to be taken from France and Malta to be taken from Britain.

Does the Senator want to flatter the Italians who are in America, when they shall read this, into the belief that the Senator from Massachusetts demanded of the United States and her people that they pledge themselves to give to Italy the Italia Irredenta? Every humble little Italian, remembering the days of 1878, knows that that included Nice from France; that it likewise included Malta from Britain. Does the Senator assume here now to state that that was his purpose? Will he say, from his place on the floor, that it is his intention to demand that the American people shall take Nice from France? Will he say that he will demand that the American people shall take Malta from Britain? And yet that is the Italia Irredenta. Does the Senator wish to have the Italians all over this country, and particularly in Massachusetts, where their number is large and at the ballot box most potent, assume that this was his offer, to tender the American people as an indorser and guarantor of that?

Of course, the Senator here will insist that what he meant was merely the Trentino and Dalmatia, that land along the border; but that, Mr. President, is also under discussion, and just now serious dissension, Greece claiming a part, but the Jugo-Slavs a greater part.

Yet the Senator will have us not only guarantee to Italy that which we would love to do, even with the blood of our children—that she shall have all her boundaries as prescribed by nature—but the Senator practically says on the floor by his statement he would have the American people agree with the allies to enter and put her in position to hold these people there, if we correctly construe his speech. He does not mean it, of course; but he will have the Italians understand there and in America from their Italian papers that that is his promise. He would have these worthy people flatter their soul with the consolation that with himself and his political party in power that will be done. It is artfully urged, of course, but not altogether blurred in the vision of those who reflect, that the purpose of the Senator was to give the Italians to understand that the Wilson administration ought to police their Government and assure the possession of all disputed boundaries by American Army and Navy. Yet the Senator will not say he would do it.

Then says the Senator:

The establishment of a Jugo-Slav State—

How shall we establish a State, and where shall we establish it? We love to recognize the Jugo-Slav people as a people for independent nationality; but shall we take the American people and make them guarantee the establishment of a State? And how shall we do it, if we could do it at all, when objected to by Italy, which claims the border, unless we take from Italy what the Senator says she should have? Then we would have to do either by the only force in the world that we have to do it—the Army and Navy. And yet, says the Senator, he is opposed to any league or arrangement that would involve our Army and Navy to execute any design!

Ah, but we have merely entered upon this suggestion of glorious promise on the part of the Senator. Says he, also, that we shall guarantee "the security of Greece, the settlement of Albania."

Albania? The security of Greece? Greece is contending for Albania. Turkey is contending for Albania. How can we give security to Greece and also give Albania to Greece, and a portion of Albania to Albania? Yet it is very suggestive, of course, to the Greeks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And Albania is contending for herself.

Mr. LEWIS. And Albania, as the Senator from Mississippi correctly says, is contending for a separate government. Indeed, we removed the minister to Greece—if a suggestion for his resignation can be regarded as removal—Mr. George Fred Williams, appointed from the Senator's own State of Massachusetts. He was invited to resign because he left his post in Greece in order to advocate the cause of Albania among the Greeks, as the Senator must recognize, on the ground not that we did not respect Albania's rights but that a minister sent to Greece should not interfere with its local affairs any more than an ambassador sent here by Greece should interfere with our local affairs.

Mr. President, I merely call attention to these positions of the Senator that reflection can disclose how impossible is his plan. Then, says he, there should be brought about—the consolidation of all the Roumanian people under one government, as well as the neutralization of the Straits, the putting of Constantinople under international protection, with Greece, perhaps, as the mandatory of the powers to administer the affairs of the city.

Mr. President, what will Britain do if there is an attempt on the part of the United States to put Greece in control of the Dardanelles and Constantinople? Why, she fought the Crimean War to prevent that, even when Turkey offered to Greece to govern Constantinople as a combination between the two. And yet the Senator will have the people of the United States put behind the proposition of guaranteeing to Greece that she shall have Constantinople.

What will France do? What will all of these nations do that are interested in the problem of Christianity? The Senator well knows the proposition is impossible; that however much we would love to have Constantinople free, and the Christian religion dominant, you never could get the American people to agree that they shall enter into the purely municipal or State affairs, the purely political affairs of Europe, to establish that city under the control of any one separate country, and to do that in the only way we could, sir, by force, by the Army and by the Navy.

Mr. President, one other reference to this matter, and that will conclude me on this basis as the tests of the Senator's practicability or sincerity of counterproposition.

Says the Senator:

Such in outline are the necessary steps demanded by exact justice, upon which, I think, the United States and the allies are substantially agreed in order to make a lasting peace with Germany.

Mr. President, here I pause to call to your attention an important phase.

When the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], in January, 1917, tendered a resolution on this floor to support the message known as the peace message of the President, it brought into consideration at that time, sir, what was the peace message. Mr. President, we turn for a moment to consider that the Senator from Massachusetts opposed the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska upon the ground, among other things, that it approved that feature of the President's peace message that, as he said, guaranteed to the particular lands, to which I have just referred, their protection. Remember, sir, the full extent to which the President's peace message went was merely to offer the cooperation of the spirit of our country to secure them recognition as nationalities. In no wise, sir, to enter into their country and administer it by the only force that could administer it, the Army and Navy. Then the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] tenders, sir, the New York Sun's criticism of the President's message, as follows:

In this passage, as the World justly remarks, "the President pledges the cooperation of the United States in the enforcement of future guaranties of the peace of the world and the integrity of the small and weak nations of Europe. It can not be made too clear that whether this is or is not a desirable departure from past policy, it is a departure involving not only our participation in the control of the destinies of Belgium and Serbia and Roumania, but also participation of Great Britain and Germany and Russia and France and Italy in the control of the destinies of Mexico, of the Central American States, of Venezuela; why not even of Cuba?"

Then the Senator from Massachusetts, after that had been read, says:

Now we come to the second request, and that is the measures to be taken for the preservation of the future peace of the world after the war has concluded.

The Senator says, quoting the President's note:

In the measures to be taken to secure the future peace of the world the people and Government of the United States are as vitally and as directly interested as the Governments now at war. Their interest, moreover, in the means to be adopted to relieve the smaller and weaker peoples of the world of the peril of wrong and violence is as quick and ardent as that of any other people or government. They stand ready, and even eager, to cooperate in the accomplishment of these ends when the war is over with every influence and resource at their command.

Hear the Senator from Massachusetts—how the distinguished Senator denounced this!

Mr. President, we were then not at war, but tendering our services as a neutral; and as one intervening for peace it was our privilege, by every doctrine of humanity and international law, to tender any suggestion that could mollify or harmonize. Now that we have gone into the war, the limit is this: We are limited, so far as our demands are concerned, in the nature of things, to the purposes which we gave the world as those for which we entered the war as a belligerent. But, sir, when we were not in the war, with none of the obligations that are imposed upon us as a result of having been a belligerent and merely tendering our good offices to the extent that a national soul of cooperation could be justified, hear the Senator from Massachusetts raise his voice in denunciation against even that by saying:

Mr. President, I present these articles simply as showing what outside judges who have given attention to this point regard as involved in this committal by this note of the administration, and of the United States by implication, to the doctrine of general cooperation with the powers of Europe. I do not wish to enter into further details, which might be extended indefinitely, because I think it must be apparent to every one that when we abandon our traditional policy of separation from the politics and affairs of Europe we take a very momentous step, and one which should not be taken without the most thorough knowledge of what is intended and of the distance to which we are to be invited to go. An approval of the note in this general form carries approval, of course, and without limitation, of the principle of general cooperation with European powers in the affairs not only of Europe but of America.

Yet, Mr. President, the able Senator now tenders a program going further, indeed, in its effect than was ever contemplated by the President's message, and in effect urges that the American people shall now become the guarantors of the politics of Europe—first, it shall establish States; next, it shall take possession of cities; third, it shall guarantee the administration of them—when, sir, the very policy presented by the Senator, which he would have the country understand he sponsors—that it might flatter the hopes of the subjects of these different countries in this land who vote at the coming election—he had denounced as a thing outside of our province, and one which, if we dare enter upon, no one could see the end of in its bewilderment and destruction for our institutions.

I mention this to show you, sir, that when the eminent Senator from Massachusetts presents his counter proposition it is not one that he believed in; it is not one to execute; it is not one that he will dare offer at any time his country to execute or ever command his countrymen to follow—that we, the American people, should put our Army and Navy behind the undertakings of politics by choosing one faction, one division, and, sponsoring them, place all the power of our Government behind them to bring about success for them in their prospect, their project, their hope of racial divisions and political contests.

Mr. President, why did the Senator make that proposition? No one knew better than the Senator that it was an impossible design; but, Mr. President, it was read all over America. It was read by these nations yonder in Europe. There is not one of them that has not a great hope tendered by the Senator from Massachusetts, the future chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that he is for giving them, and that particular branch of them, the full control that they ask of anything they hope and of their former subjects here a great voting consideration.

Mr. President, we see from the press that one of the highest European authorities now in attendance upon this conference in France is asked the question, What significance lay in the unofficial Belgian announcement that Emile Vandervelde, the Belgian Socialist leader, will be one of the peace delegates? He said:

None. When the conference begins, it will concern only nations—not parties within the nations. There must be no appearance of party politics in so grave an undertaking.

Mr. President, then you must see clearly two things: First, if the policy of the Senator from Massachusetts were invoked, it calls for the participation of America in every form of European politics, in every country of Europe, in every division of that country, in every faction of that land, and in, sir, the affairs of every people of dialects, as well as those of languages. It surely fulfilled the greatest material hope held out anywhere in scripture. It gave all things to all men, and everything to everyone.

But if the Senator will put the United States behind the aspiration of every faction and division of every nationality and land he names, why omit Ireland? Why should she be forsaken, not even mentioned in the distribution of liberties and self-government? She was first among the first asking our offices of support and the world's recognition of a free land for a free people. Am I cruel to suggest that the fact that most Irishmen in the United States are presumed to be Democrats is responsible for my friend dropping them as unworthy of consideration?

When the eminent Senator would have it understood that he guarantees from his own viewpoint that it is the thing to do for the United States to enter into this design, does he not present to the world the clear interrogation, how can these men be put into possession of these countries by us but through force? How shall we administer this separate government if we have not entered into their politics? Only by force. How shall we keep them there continuously in power against those internally opposing them? Only by force. What force have we? The Army and Navy. Then how can the eminent Senator contend he is opposed to the league because it may involve all nations and at the same time the Army and Navy of the United States, when the proposition he tenders can only be executed in any way whatever by occupation by the Army or the Navy, or both—a perennial army of occupation—and the constant attendance of our flotillas in the waters surrounding those lands, showing very clearly that the eminent Senator in presenting his objection to the league does not found it upon the thing that he really has as his objection, because he tenders that same thing as a necessary corollary to the only proposition that he presents.

Let us have an understanding. We do not mind the position that these Senators take, but we would like to know their purpose. The Senator now says he will oppose a navy the size of Britain's; that he will oppose the policy of a large navy for us. He follows Col. Roosevelt in that. Hear me, then, sir: He will have no league of nations that shall preserve the peace. That is the position of the Senator and his supporters; and yet he will have no navy to preserve the peace after we have refused to have a league that could preserve it by harmony; he will have no peaceful peace by peaceful arrangement, and will make no preparation for a war to maintain peace by force for his country.

An interesting dilemma, it must be confessed, upon the part of a statesman whose views are supposed to be leading and to be honored.

Mr. President, the Homeric god cried out: "Ye may slay us; but, if ye do, let it be in the light."

The eminent Senator constantly quoted the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in his observations in reply to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], when the Senator from Idaho remarked, "Let us be candid with the American people; let the administration be candid; and let those who advocate the league be candid." Thus says the Senator from Massachusetts. That is what I say—be candid. I say to the Senator from Massachusetts, as he sits in the cloak room catching the sound of my voice through the crack of the door: "Physician, heal thyself." I would have the eminent leader candid. What is the subterranean design if we are to have no league to preserve peace by peaceful and Christian methods, and then we are to have no Navy large enough to enforce it by military methods, if necessary? What is the plan of protection or policy of action the Senator and his followers secretly husband to put on the law? Surely he will not "leave us naked to our enemies."

Where are we? What is involved in this hidden mystery? I will give it to you, sir, if I may be so bold as to tender a key to solve this apparent riddle. When we have in this short session, with a majority favorable to the administration, failed in the naval bill and failed in the league, then will come the command from the eminent leaders on the other side to the country to let this new Congress, called Republican, remedy this "unspeakable wrong," this "cowardly betrayal" on the part of this Democratic administration! What is the meaning suggested, sir? That Britain should have a navy so large as she may desire, but that we shall not have a Navy equal to it. Shall it be that the eminent Senator from Massachusetts will join with the distinguished ex-President in making the United States a dependency of Britain?

We are glad to have friendships, and we trust nothing shall ever dissolve them, not only with Britain, but with every other nation. But what shall be said if the time shall come when we shall exact from Britain the use of her navy for our defense anywhere; that Britain will not have the right then, under the form of reciprocity, to the use of our Army and Navy in her behalf everywhere? Then the Senator has the league again, only we say the league should be universal with all nations, while he would have us put in a position that only Britain could exact, by the doctrine of reciprocity, the contribution of our Army and Navy in her conflicts in return for giving us the protection of her navy.

Surely we can not understand this mystery. We only see that it exists, and strangely so; and we are compelled but to one conclusion, that the eminent Senators present no counter proposition which by test or analysis in anywise controverts the policy upon which a league of nations is presented or of the just and humane doctrines which the President of the United States urges in its behalf, and to the preservation of the peace of the world.

Senators say they will not vote to ratify the treaty if made by Wilson as now proposed. I would have no Senator vote against his conscience or against the interests of his constituents, but I now promise to you—and pledge the future to the fact—that when Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, returns to this land and tells the American people of the reception his policy was given; how the Government of Britain, under Lloyd George, approved his doctrine and gave it the hearty support of a Christian and generous people; how France, in her magnanimity and sad grandeur, gave it her indorsement and put behind it the noble spirit that has been so often vindicated in many, many conflicts on the field of battle, in letters and in science—but above all in the soul of her liberty. When he shall tell how Italy received him as one who brought her preservation, secured her liberties; and then shall speak to his people further of how there was not a nation in the world whose representatives sat about him that was not glad that he opened the era of a peace that could be had through Christianity of men and justice of nations, and then tell our people how our great America, for the first time in all her history as the first of the nations of the world, was the first voice in civilization on earth crying make way along the path prescribed by the great Master, for "peace on earth and good will to men," think you, then, what these distinguished Senators will do?

I answer they will hear from the great American people, their masters; and, as Wilson has ever gone to the people with every prospect and every project and has ever received upon his measures ever and ever their approval, the distinguished Senators will be found doing what they have ever done—yielding their amiable indorsement and unanimously being behind him, suddenly finding out that to be otherwise is to be self-destroying. Then we will have another repetition of their action growing out of their condemnation of his Mexican policy, the only other instance to parallel the present threat. When Wilson went to the people with his policy the only States in America that bordered on Mexico and knew the truth decided that they would reverse their party political policy of 20 years to stand behind Wilson, and after that election never a creak from those Senators who were to destroy as in the Senate the Wilson policy as to peace in Mexico.

Senators, we will have a repetition of the same policy of abnegation, surrender, and submission as to this forthcoming world treaty of peace, because it will be the voice of America which will speak to them and bid them obey.

Mr. President, there arises to my mind a picture which I leave the Senate to contemplate. We who have traveled in Pompeii remember that there is to be seen a monument of encrusted lava. It resembles a human being. As we nearer approach it, it takes on the form and visage of a man.

The stranger, asking what it means, is informed that in the eruption of Vesuvius, when the lava poured upon the earth and the flames consumed mankind, when the fiery smoke stifled children to death and women fell fainting, when it seemed hopeless that a human being could escape, one man, the keeper of the gate, rushing through the burning lava, contending against the whirling sparks, blistering his face, and the burning smoke that choked him breathless, reached the outer gate, unbarred it, opened it wide that the children could find fresh air and live, that the fainting women could be rescued and survive, that mankind, such as were left, could look up in hope to God and breathe the fresh air of rescue and preservation. For this is preserved his monument—yet at the gates. In this hour am I too bold to say that when the flames of war are still burning and civilization is still encrusted with the lava that belched from the mouth of the cannon, and children are yet writhing in suffering and agony to which they were exposed and driven in this conflict, when civilization is choking and crying for escape, the one courier of all of the world who rushes through the lanes of fire to open the gate to give to mankind and future humanity peace and life is America, through her faithful watchman, Woodrow Wilson. What hand shall be lifted now to stay, to block his way.

So I appeal to both Senators, to all Senators, as I do to their aids and their supporters—is there not a patriotism which serves country and that rises higher than politics which serve party? At this time is it not the policy that politics stop at the water's edge? That while the President is on foreign soil contesting for the supremacy of the United States he receive the unanimous cooperation of the United States Senate. That they hold high his hands, encourage and inspire his heart, and by their cooperation and indorsement impress upon the minds of every negotiator who shall confront the President that the principal thing which he seeks is the thing which this Nation demands. That in his every voice, his every contention, his every plea, his every demand there is the response and echo from the Congress of the United States to the world, saying, "We are with him—America is behind him—he is our President and as against foreign competitors and in foreign fields of conflict for the supremacy and dignity of the United States, we have one prayer—God speed him—one purpose—victory to his every undertaking!"

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. MYERS responded to his name when called.

Mr. BORAH, Mr. REED, Mr. KENYON, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. CALDER, Mr. TRAMMELL, Mr. FERNALD, and Mr. GRONNA entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

RATES ON SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for just a moment, I desire to say that the other day, while we were discussing the proposed second-class mail matter legislation, the Senator from Utah made certain statements with regard to Mr. John A. Penton, of the Penton Publishing Co., and his publication. The information which the Senator from Utah had in regard to that matter was not accurate; it wholly misrepresented Mr. Penton's position and the size and the character of his publication. I have before me a letter written by Mr. Penton, in answer to the suggestions of the Senator from Utah, bearing date December 31, 1918. There are two sentences in the letter which are of the same character as some of the utterances by the Senator from Utah with regard to Mr. Penton, but I am going to eliminate them, and I have inclosed them in brackets. I do not desire to trespass upon the time of the Senator from Colorado, but I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD for the information of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course I have no knowledge of what is contained in the letter of Mr. Penton, but I do say that the Senator from Utah has not referred disrespectfully in any way to Mr. Penton. My statement regarding him is in the RECORD, and anyone who is desirous of looking at it may see it. I did say that the information relative to the magazine published by him I received from a gentleman in whom I had absolute confidence. I had his publication here in the Senate at the time I made the statement. He does not publish the Iron Age, as stated by the Senator from Ohio and also by the Senator from Georgia. He is not the publisher of the Iron Age. His paper is published in Cleveland, Ohio, in the center of the iron district, as I stated the other day. Of course, the circulation being largely in the iron district, it comes within the first or second zones, while the Iron Age is published in New York, and in order to reach the center of the iron district must pay an additional rate by the zone system. I am perfectly willing that the letter shall go into the RECORD, even without my knowing what is in it, and the Senator need not eliminate any part of it, as far as I am concerned.

I do not know Mr. Penton; I have never met him in my life; I never have cast any reflection on his honesty or his integrity, and I do not do so now. I do not care what he states to the contrary in his letter.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado will pardon me for just one word further, I desire to say that the statement which the Senator from Utah has just made is inaccurate when he indicates that the circulation was merely about Cleveland.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not want to yield for the purposes of a controversy here.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very sorry that I brought this matter up at this time, because I do not care to trespass upon the time of the Senator from Colorado.

I may say, however, that the circulation of a number of these publications is given in this letter and the number of copies which has circulated in each of the several zones. If the Senator from Utah had known the facts he would not have said that the circulation was limited to the first and second zones.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that the circulation was limited to the first and second zones, Mr. President. I said that most of the circulation was in the first and second zones.

Mr. POMERENE. But, Mr. President, that statement is not correct, if the statements which are contained in this letter are correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I received my information from a man who is a very close observer and whose business it is to know the circulation of nearly every magazine in the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not care what the source of the information is; suffice it to say that the man who gave the information is one of the men who is being benefited by low-class rates on second-class postal matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio that the letter be printed in the RECORD? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE PENTON PUBLISHING CO.,
Cleveland, December 31, 1918.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The writer has had brought to his attention a statement appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 23, on page 833, in which Senator SMOOT, while discussing pending legislation in connection with the rate to be charged on second-class matter, has made the following statement:

Referring to me he says, "Mr. Penton does publish a little magazine in Cleveland, Ohio, whose circulation is in the iron industry around Cleveland, and it hardly goes out of the first zone. Of course, under the proposition he would prefer very greatly to have the rate provided in the present law apply to his magazine rather than to have it apply to first-class mail matter." This and several other statements made by Senator SMOOT certainly would not have been made by a gentleman of his standing and position were he at all familiar with the facts, and it is to be regretted that he has depended for his information in all probability on those who know much better but who have willfully misrepresented the facts to him and by thus doing have placed him in a rather embarrassing position.

The statement as made by Senator SMOOT, of course, is absolutely false in every respect. Re attempt to belittle the Iron Trade Review and cast a serious reflection on what is probably the leading iron and steel publication in this country, we cheerfully refer him to anyone engaged in the industry for confirmation of that statement.

Of the current issue of the Iron Trade Review 9,671 copies were distributed to regular list, namely, paid-in-advance subscribers, and this circulation is distributed among the various zones as follows:

	Per cent.
First and second zones	27.82
Third zone	20.54
Fourth zone	37.53
Fifth zone	8.56
Sixth zone	1.30
Seventh zone	.44
Eighth zone	3.81

We would call your attention to the fact that over one-third of this circulation is in the fourth zone, which covers a territory from 300 to 600 miles from this office.

We have another very large and important publication, the only one of its kind in the world, with a circulation of 10,000, namely, the Foundry, whose distribution, according to zones, is as follows:

	Per cent.
First and second zones	19.75
Third zone	20.99
Fourth zone	46.48
Fifth zone	4.99
Sixth zone	2.50
Seventh zone	.64
Eighth zone	4.65

We would call your attention to the fact that nearly half of this circulation is in the fourth zone, from 300 to 600 miles from this office.

We have another publication of very large circulation, namely, Power Boating, whose distribution is as follows:

	Per cent.
First and second zones	16.94
Third zone	11.31
Fourth zone	59.83
Fifth zone	7.87
Sixth zone	1.06
Seventh zone	.23
Eighth zone	2.76

This shows that more than half of the entire circulation is in the fourth zone.

We have another very important paper known as the Marine Review with a very large circulation, whose distribution is as per the following schedule:

	Per cent.
First and second zones	31.48
Third zone	15.05
Fourth zone	36.88
Fifth zone	6.50
Sixth zone	1.94
Seventh zone	1.05
Eighth zone	8.10

We also include the distribution of the Daily Iron Trade and Metal Market Report, which is the only paper of its kind in this country. You will see likewise that one-fourth of the circulation is in the fourth zone:

	Per cent.
First and second zones	31.42
Third zone	23.45
Fourth zone	34.63
Fifth zone	5.79
Sixth zone	1.26
Seventh zone	.20
Eighth zone	2.94

We sincerely trust you may be able to draw Senator SMOOT'S attention to the erroneous character of his statement, because as the matter stands it reflects as little credit upon him as it does upon anybody else.

We may say that these statements are the figures on which we pay postage at the Cleveland post office.

Yours, most sincerely,
JOHN PENTON,
President.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, every war must pass through the two phases of armed conflict and peace negotiation. If the first is the more exciting and spectacular, the last is equally serious and may prove the more important. Especially may this be so when, as in this great war, the combat is not that of one nation against another but between groups of nations and world embracing in its character. For the triumphant allies must not only determine the conditions of the peace to be imposed upon their vanquished antagonists but solve grave problems affecting themselves and the new nations now springing from the ashes of Teutonic conflagrations, and finally settle their relations and duties with and toward each other.

The task is virtually without a precedent. Its nearest approach was the congress of Vienna, in which France was treated as an ally and an equal, whose objects were the readjustment of boundaries and the final suppression of democracy, and the congress of Berlin, whose final terms of peace carried the seeds which ripened into the war just ending. In the congress about to assemble the four defeated nations have no voice. The victors' chief concern is to deal with them and also with each other to the end that wars may if possible be avoided altogether.

The task of the allies is immediate and insistent. They must crystallize into concrete form the interests which compelled their entry into the war and endeavor to translate the purposes underlying their action into a permanent code of international law.

The task is threefold in character. It involves the imposition of peace terms upon Germany and her satellites, the recognition and delimitation of the newborn peoples in Europe and Asia, and the establishment if possible of safeguards against the recurrence of international warfare. Having entered the war to vindicate her rights and rid the world of militarism, America's part in this great conference must be a prominent, possibly a controlling, one.

Until then we had carefully observed the counsels of Washington. By inclination also we had held ourselves aloof from Old-World complications. President Monroe fortified our attitude in 1823 by the announcement of his famous doctrine, which instantly commanded, as it has since received, the undivided indorsement of our people. Until in an evil hour in 1900 we acquired the Philippines, our adherence to this doctrine was steadfast and unbroken. We accepted the determinations of The Hague convention, expressly reserving our right to remain free from trans-Atlantic differences.

It was therefore inevitable that we would take part in the war only when the murder of our citizens, the destruction of our vessels, and the persistent violation of our fundamental rights as a neutral nation in disregard of our solemn and repeated warnings made such action unavoidable.

Our justification for war, announced to the world with our declaration of it, was very appropriately followed in due season by an outline of terms for a just and lasting peace. Great Britain had done this, and France as well. The President on January 8, 1918, clearly and felicitously announced the American view to the listening nations. He prefaced his terms by declaring that "What we demand in this war, therefore, is nothing peculiar to ourselves. It is that the world be fit and safe to live in, and particularly that it be made safe for every peace-loving nation which, like our own, wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression. All the peoples of the world are in effect partners in this interest, and for our own part, we see very clearly that unless justice be done to others it will not be done to us. The program of the world's peace is therefore our program."

He then announced the celebrated 14 propositions, not as a national but as a world program for peace. Doubtless before doing this he had conferred and therefore spoke with the sanction of our allies. At home his pronouncement was indorsed and welcomed with singular unanimity. No protest was voiced against it. Even former President Roosevelt for the time punctuated his rôle of chronic opposition to every Executive utterance by keeping the peace. Only from the enemy in arms came dissent and criticism. To this there was one exception.

The third point, relating to the removal of all possible economic barriers to trade conditions, aroused the apprehensions of some of those who regard trade barriers as trade blessings and tariff wars as trade developments. But these were neither vociferous nor widespread.

When the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts was invested with the leadership of his party in August last he signalized the occasion by announcing a peace program, differing principally from that of the President in its proposed treatment of Turkey and her subject peoples, the independence of Poland and the Slavic peoples, the repudiation of the Russian and Roumanian treaties, and the restoration of the Russian Provinces. And the President's reply to the Austrian plea for peace in September carried an abandonment of his announcements regarding the dual and Turkish monarchies. For in the interval

Turkey had collapsed and Austria was in the throes of impending dissolution.

When the Senator from Massachusetts delivered that address the beginning of the end of the war was above the horizon. Very naturally and appropriately, therefore, post-bellum conditions were of immediate importance, and the Senator's illuminating discussion of peace terms attracted and merited national consideration.

Even at that late day but little emphasis was laid upon presidential propositions relating to trade conditions, open diplomacy, freedom of the seas, and a league of nations, now so seemingly important as to dominate all the others. Opposition to them appears to have been quickened into life since the acceptance of the program by enemy nations and the execution of the armistice upon the 11th of last November. Whether this was cause or coincidence is perhaps immaterial, since if the objections to these or any features of the program be sound they should be respected. I think, nevertheless, that much difficulty and misunderstanding might have been obviated by their earlier criticism or disapproval here, since other nations were justified under the circumstances in concluding that the President's announcement of a world program for a permanent peace had behind it the approval of his own countrymen. The belated assurance to the contrary can not be otherwise than disturbing, and may, but I trust will not, impair the prestige or detract from America's influence in the congress of nations.

I speak not wholly as a Pharisee, because I have long entertained serious misgivings regarding the application of the terms "freedom of the seas" and "league of nations" to a concrete international understanding. I have sought enlightenment from more experienced and intelligent sources of information for some time past, both as to their definition and the method of their application to a world's affairs. If they are indispensable to permanent peace, they must be accepted; and, to be accepted, they must be understood. To understand and apply them, if that can be done, is in my humble judgment far more insistent and important than discussions about the power of the Senate to participate in the making of treaties or the duty of the President to seek senatorial counsel in advance of treaty negotiation.

But since this subject has become a burning one, as it always does when an important international situation arises, I shall burden the Senate with my views concerning it, promising at the outset to present nothing either startling or original for your consideration. Every phase of it has been argued by the ablest intellects of the country, and all one has to do at this late day is to accept those conclusions of former statesmen which appeal most strongly to one's judgment and reflection.

In harmony with this suggestion, my opinion is that, being executive in its character, the Senate may exercise the treaty-making power only as expressly authorized by the Constitution to do so. It can neither initiate nor negotiate a treaty. Its advice may be proffered to the Executive, who may or may not regard it. Its advice may be asked by the Executive, who may or may not be governed by it. The Senate may amend or strike out parts of a treaty after its receipt from the Executive. Its ratification is essential to a treaty, but the President may, after such ratification, decline, as he sometimes has, to accept or enforce it, notwithstanding such ratification. The power of the Senate over treaties is remotely analogous to the veto power of the President. The President originates; the Senate accepts, changes, or rejects it. The President is the author; the Senate the reviewer. The President erects the structure; the Senate takes it over with the power to alter the plan as it may desire or throw it into the discard if preferred. With the utmost respect for opposing opinions, I affirm that dissent from this view springs from an undue regard for senatorial authority or a reluctance to clothe the Executive with unlimited control over foreign affairs.

It will be noticed that the treaty-making power is grouped in the Constitution among executive, not legislative, powers. Article II declares that the executive power shall be vested in the President. This is restricted only by the express restriction immediately succeeding and embodied in the words: "He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls." His power here is limited only by the consent of the Senate to his treaties, for that consent is the ultimate act and depends not at all upon the element of advice, since the latter may not be asked and since the Senate can consent whether its advice is accepted or ignored.

President Washington's proclamation of neutrality in 1793 was extremely distasteful to certain French sympathizers in America, who attacked it as an exercise of unauthorized power. Mr. Hamilton came to the defense of the President in a series of letters to the Gazette of the United States, in which he considered this entire subject with his usual exhaustive ability. In the first of them he demonstrated that the executive power is vested in the President, subject only to expressed exceptions and qualifications which, being in derogation of such authority, must be strictly construed. I quote briefly from it:

> The legislative department is not the organ of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. It is charged neither with making nor interpreting treaties.

Again:

> It is to be remarked that as the participation of the Senate in the making of treaties and the power of the legislature to declare war are exceptions out of the general "executive power" vested in the President, they are to be construed strictly, and ought to be extended no further than is essential to their execution.

Mr. Jefferson, although he incited Mr. Madison to reply to Mr. Hamilton's contentions, wrote, at the President's request, an "Opinion on the powers of the Senate," in which he said:

> The transaction of business with foreign nations is executive altogether. It belongs, then, to the head of that department, except to such portions of it as are especially submitted to the Senate. Exceptions are to be construed strictly.

The Senate considers the draft of a treaty submitted to it as it considers a bill upon its calendar. It does not confer with the representatives of the nation with which the treaty is proposed. It neither bargains nor contends with the adversary party. It may not retain the document should the President determine, as he sometimes does, to withdraw it for change or abandonment altogether.

The Senator from Massachusetts has cited many instances in which the Executive has invoked the counsel of the Senate regarding proposed treaties in advance of their negotiation and of covenants or clauses under consideration between this Government and another. This is entirely proper—perhaps highly desirable in all cases—since opportunity is thus given the Senate to commit itself to or against the President's view, thus encouraging or dissuading him in advance of final Executive action. But no number of such instances can establish a right in the Senate to be thus consulted nor estop the President from ignoring the practice at his discretion. That method of procedure commends itself to me as highly desirable at all times, since it would largely expedite ratifications and tend to create a more cordial relation between Senate and Executive and smooth the way for their more speedy cooperation. Senators, like humbler men, are human, and therefore appreciate due recognition by the Executive of their official attributes.

Due to Mr. Roosevelt's cheerful assertion that "it was not only his right but his duty to do anything that the needs of the Nation demanded unless such action was forbidden by the Constitution and the laws," and the shaping of his official conduct to that standard by intervening in Panama and Santo Domingo, the criticism of Congress was aroused on more than one occasion. Very naturally the treaty-making power of the Senate became involved in the President's activities.

This culminated in 1906 in a spirited debate upon the subject between Senators Spooner and Bacon, wherein the Wisconsin Senator in his trenchant fashion asserted and successfully maintained the right of the Executive to control and direct all our foreign relations. This debate possesses an added interest at this time because the Senator from Massachusetts took occasion to say that he did not think it was possible for anybody to make any addition to the masterly statement of the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to the powers of the President in treaty making. The debate will be found in the RECORD of the Fifty-ninth Congress, pages 1417–1421 and pages 2125–2148, and can be read with profit by every Member of this body.

In the course of his discussion Senator Spooner said:

> The Senate has nothing whatever to do with the negotiation of treaties or the conduct of our foreign intercourse and relations, save the exercise of the one constitutional function of advice and consent, which the Constitution requires as a precedent condition to the making of a treaty. Except as to the participation in the treaty-making power, the Senate, under the Constitution, has obviously neither responsibilities nor power. From the foundation of the Government it has been conceded in practice and in theory that the Constitution vests the power of negotiation and the various phases—and they are multifarious—of the conduct of our foreign relations exclusively with the President. And he does not exercise that constitutional power, nor can he be made to do it under the tutelage or guardianship of the Senate or of the House or of the Senate and the House combined. The words "advice and consent of the Senate" are used in the Constitution with reference to the Senate's participation in the making of a treaty, and are well translated by the word "ratification," popularly used in this connection. The President negotiates the treaty to begin with. He may employ such agencies as he chooses to negotiate the proposed treaty. He may employ the ambassador, if there be one, or a minister, or a chargé d'affaires, or he may use a person in private life whom he thinks by his skill or knowledge of the language or people of the country with which he is about to deal is best fitted to negotiate the treaty. He may issue to the agent chosen by him—and neither Congress nor the Senate has any concern as to whom he chooses—such instructions as seem to him wise. That is his concern. The Senate has no right to demand that he shall unfold to the world or to it, even in executive session, his instructions or the prospect or progress of the negotiation. I said "right." I use that word advisedly in order to illustrate what all men who have studied the subject are willing to concede—that under the Constitution the absolute power of negotiation is in the President and the means of negotiation subject wholly to his will and his judgment.

When he shall have negotiated and sent his proposed treaty to the Senate the jurisdiction of this body attaches and its power begins. It may advise and consent or it may refuse. And in the exercise of this function it is as independent of the Executive as he is independent of it in the matter of negotiation. I do not deny the power of the Senate, either in legislative session or in executive session—that is a question of propriety—to pass a resolution expressive of its opinion as to matters of foreign policy. But if it is passed by the Senate or by the House or by both Houses it is beyond any possible question purely advisory and not in the slightest degree binding in law or in conscience upon the President. The President is so supreme under the Constitution in the matter of treaties, excluding only the Senate's ratification, that he may negotiate a treaty, he may send it to the Senate, it may receive by way of "advice and consent" the unanimous judgment of the Senate that it is in the highest degree for the public interest, and yet the President is as free, when it is sent back to the White House with resolution of ratification attached, to put it in his desk never again to see the light of day as he was free to determine in the first instance whether he would or would not negotiate it. That power is not expressly given to the President by the Constitution, but it inheres in the executive power which inheres in him as the sole organ under the Constitution through whom our foreign relations and diplomatic intercourse are conducted. Out of public necessity the President should be permitted to pocket a treaty no matter if every Member of the Senate thought he ought to exchange the ratification. Why? Because the President, through the ambassadors, ministers, consuls, and all the agencies of the Government, explores sources of information everywhere; it is his business to know whether anything has occurred since the Senate acted upon the treaty which would render it for the public interest that the ratification be not exchanged. The President may negotiate and sign a proposed treaty and not send it to the Senate. In such case what would be thought of a resolution asking him to inform the Senate whether he had negotiated such a proposed treaty and why he had not sent it to the Senate?

Mr. Wilson has been condemned for not selecting peace commissioners from the Members of the Senate, as did President McKinley in 1898. Such a commission would be a most competent one if composed of the senior members of the Foreign Relations Committee. But Senators so selected would not represent the Senate upon the commission nor discharge a Senator's duties while serving in that capacity. They would represent and become a component part of the executive department as completely as other members of the commission. The duties of the commission having been discharged, they might, as Senators, feel bound to ratify the treaty they had helped to negotiate as commissioners, yet they would be entirely free as Senators to vote for its rejection. Although foreign to the discussion, I might observe that the President by commissioning Senators to negotiate treaties would doubtless expedite their ratification. The practice might be highly desirable for that practical reason. Delays in ratification by the Senate are the rule and not the exception. Mr. Henry Adams, in his delightful autobiography, quotes Mr. Hay upon this feature of senatorial treaty making:

> A treaty of peace in any normal state of things ought to be ratified with unanimity in 24 hours. They wasted six weeks in wrangling over this one and ratified it with one vote to spare. We have five or six matters now demanding settlement. I can settle them all honorably and advantageously on our side, and I am assured by leading men in the Senate that not one of these treaties, if negotiated, will pass the Senate. I should have a majority in every case, but a malcontent third would certainly dish every one of them. To such monstrous shape has the original mistake of the Constitution grown in the evolution of our politics. You must understand it is not merely my solution the Senate will reject. They will reject, for instance, any treaty whatever, on any subject, with England. I doubt if they would accept any treaty of consequence with Russia or Germany. The recalcitrant third would be differently composed, but it would be on hand. So that the real duties of a Secretary of State seem to be three—to fight claims made upon us by other States; to press more or less fraudulent claims of our own citizens upon other countries; to find offices for the friends of Senators when there are none. Is it worth while—for me—to keep up this useless labor?

Mr. Adams adds to this very just reproach of a very capable minister that he had seen a dozen acquaintances struggling with the same enemies; that he had said all there was to say about it in volumes relating to the politics of a hundred years; that the interference of the German and Russian legations and of the Clan-na-Gael with the press and the Senate was innocently disguised; and that the three forces acting with the regular opposition and the natural obstructionists could always stop action in the Senate.

All this, if true—and it is true—condemns the wisdom of the fathers in clothing the Senate with any voice in the ratification of treaties. Its power conjointly with the House to enact legislation in abrogation of treaties would have been and is an ample check upon undue or improper Executive treaty action. Senator Sumner's animosity toward President Johnson prevented our acquisition of the Virgin Islands in 1867 for five or six millions of dollars. This enabled Germany to intrigue against their acquisition for half a century, although their importance as a safeguard to the Panama Canal is obvious to everyone. Similar situations are apt to arise again, if, indeed, they do not directly confront us. Division of Executive authority is never desirable. It frequently proves dangerous. It must prove embarrassing when it is to be shared between one man and a collective body of men of whom two-thirds must agree if it is to be made effective. Such a disposition of power is indefensible. We may defend it here, but we have by our conduct condemned it as intolerable elsewhere. In 1903 the Colombian Senate rejected the canal treaty. Its right to do so was beyond question, but the American Government expressed its disapprobation by conniving at an insurrection in one of the Colombian States, prevented its suppression by the Colombian Government, recognized the insurgent committee within 48 hours of its creation, accepted the telegraphic appointment of a minister plenipotentiary, and summarily negotiated a previously prepared treaty with him, which the American Senate ratified, thus recording its official disapprobation of a system its membership so stoutly champions upon its own account.

It is far from my purpose to criticize or condemn Senators who differ from me regarding this important subject and who have felt impelled by a sense of public duty to record their disagreement with the Executive's outline of peace conditions in advance of their submission to the Congress. I regret that they have done so, but I recognize that their action is in accord with their convictions of senatorial responsibility. Having done so, however, it is incumbent upon those of us who believe otherwise to make public expression of our views, lest it be gathered from our silence that announcements hitherto recorded embody the common sentiment of the American Senate. I shall therefore burden the RECORD with a brief outline of my own opinions regarding some features of a treaty of peace.

I am heartily in favor of open covenants of peace if that expression means that the treaty must contain the whole agreement between the treaty-making powers. There must be no more secret understandings between nations, as there never was with our own. Upon this proposition there can be no room for discussion. But I do not agree that all negotiations for these covenants should be open to the public. In peace congresses and in treaty making nations deal with each other as individuals. They must do so in the very nature of things, for treaties are merely national agreements. Nations are but aggregates of individuals; they must conduct their conferences by contact and interchange of views. Unlimited publicity would breed wholesale dissension, provoke controversy, embarrass official delegations, invoke protest, and confound understanding.

Moreover, it is practically impossible. The self-interest of some, if not all, of the participating countries impels in large degree the withholding from public knowledge of their ultimate objectives. This places the candid country at a disadvantage. Suspicion of sincerity is inevitable, and suspicion breeds dissension. A county convention of a political party, harmoniously chosen and harmoniously conducted, may nominate a ticket with unanimity, but behind the scenes and under the surface are many doubts and differences, perhaps dissatisfaction, born of defeated ambitions or thwarted plans. Every politician urging harmony knows this or he would not urge it. And every such gathering carefully safeguards its plans from the adversary, however worthy and altruistic their external structure may appear to be. What is a peace congress but a political convention of the nations or an international legislative body composed of delegates from sovereign powers, each depending upon its own representatives to promote and protect its own peculiar interests? This may be very material and barren of idealism, but it is everlastingly true. An open congress, as to all subjects, is therefore impossible; and being impossible, it would be most improvident to proclaim it as such, for the reaction would come with the grim realization of its Utopian character. Let the proposed treaty be complete and unequivocal, but do not strive to make it so by a process that is foredoomed to failure. The congress will do well, therefore, to conduct its proceedings so that it may reach ultimate conclusions, deliberating publicly only where it can be done with impunity and success.

I am reluctant to speak of economic barriers and trade relations, for in the last analysis that is the real obstacle to an all-embracing entente. Ours is an industrial and commercial age. Every manufacturing nation is prone to safeguard its own markets while invading others. Extension of foreign commerce, the securing of new markets, and the control of raw materials arouse competition, inspire jealousies, create dissensions, and provoke retaliations. The germs of war infest every foreign-trade propaganda. Restrictions and discriminations collide with each other. The friction always engenders heat, sometimes flaming into conflagration. The great conflict just ended was in large measure a trade war. Germany was fast conquering the markets of the world; she designed by military aggression to secure French and Belgian Channel ports, French and British colonies and dependencies, control of raw materials, world-wide commercial supremacy, and freedom from international competition. The allies and ourselves, so cordial and harmonious, are now watching each other askance, and commercially united chiefly in the common determination to permit no serious German trade competition. Already the air is charged with rumors of British trade ambitions, of French, Italian, and Japanese advantages, of America's need for a new tariff, a high tariff, a Chinese-wall tariff, scalable from within outward, but externally impenetrable. In the lexicon of international commerce equality of trade means only the right to sell without restriction. To my mind the only possible alternative to this entirely human but trouble-breeding situation is the removal of all economic barriers. But that is beyond human power while selfishness constitutes the mainspring of man's policies and progress. I cordially indorse the President's demand for "the removal as far as possible of economic barriers," but I am not overconfident of the possibilities involved in the equation. I agree that this is a bad old world, but I am also conscious that it is a tough old world, bent upon pursuing its lines of least resistance and exemplifying most of the weaknesses while paying tribute to all the virtues of its discordant populations. If it were possible to obliterate economic barriers and establish a true equality of trade relations, this and all other peace programs would reach a speedy solution. Their objects would for the most part establish themselves automatically, and the peace of the world would be disturbed only by domestic wars and internecine conflicts. I shall willingly give my support to any policy regarding this preponderant subject which the peace congress may be able to recommend, however skeptical I may remain regarding the probability of its practical operation.

Freedom of the seas is a vague and indefinable term. Like the peace of God it passeth understanding. It may have as many meanings as differing shades of national or local interests may assert. It is noticeable that the President does not use the term. He declares for "absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war." This phrase is none too specific, yet perhaps as much so as the subject permits. I understand him to mean that the right of navigation of the high seas, admittedly free in times of peace, shall be equally so in times of war, except as it may be restricted by international action for the enforcement of international covenants; that is to say, of international law. This condition does not apply to territorial waters where the warring nations are supreme and within whose boundaries international action can not become operative.

It may be that effectiveness can not be given to such a proposal without materially transforming the rights and liabilities of neutrals, but since the advent of the submarine these must be changed or the submarine suppressed. But the submarine, as a weapon of naval warfare, has come to stay, and international regulation for its use is imperative. Hence the unavoidable necessity for securing freedom of navigation in times of war under laws which belligerents must be made to respect. This seems to me entirely feasible without placing limitations on Britain's sea power and without at all affecting prevalent rights of navigation. The territorial boundary of waters should for obvious reasons be extended. The 3-mile limit was imposed when it was assumed to be the extreme range of distance for artillery. Hence, it represented the margin of safety from naval projectiles. Measured by the modern standard, this distance should be extended to 30 miles, a margin justified also by the need for protective measures against other modern methods of marine offensive warfare. A new code of international law adaptable to twentieth century conditions, made essential by the experiences of the past four years and designed for the protection of neutral rights, is not only demanded by every consideration of justice but is entirely compatible with any reasonable conception of freedom of the seas.

The naval power of Great Britain has never disturbed the peace of the world. Her supremacy of the sea has been attended by the most liberal commercial policies. All nations have had the same access to foreign ports everywhere, the same freedom of trade, the same markets which her own people enjoyed. Indeed, when we consider German purpose and ambition as disclosed by the events of the war, it may be truly said that the British navy has for years guaranteed the freedom of the seas to all the nations. For us it has been a bulwark for the Monroe doctrine, as it was a warning to Admiral Diederichs at Manila. Without it Germany would have devastated the seven seas after August, 1914, if, indeed, she had not destroyed the commerce of the world. Potentially, British sea power may menace the common enjoyment of ocean traffic; actually, England is too wise and too conscious of the inevitable reaction of the nations to convert her navy into an instrument of injustice in times of peace. Moreover, all navies are in process of evolution. The development of the submarine, the small and swift torpedo craft, and the hydroplane are even now correcting undue preponderance in battle fleets and affording to each of the great powers a fair start on other and better lines. I am far more concerned with supremacy in the air than with surface control of the sea. There is the new and boundless field for the agencies of war, of commerce, and of navigation. There America may compete in generous rivalry with all lands, there her victories will benefit herself not alone but all peoples everywhere. Then "absolute freedom of navigation" can be secured and made effective by force, if need be, albeit the peace congress should adjourn with its task unaccomplished or but partly performed.

The President's conception of "a general association of nations to be formed under special covenants to afford mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity" was recently described by him as a league "that shall operate as the organized moral force of men throughout the world, and that whenever or wherever wrong or aggression are planned or contemplated this searching light of conscience will be turned upon them and men everywhere will ask: What are your purposes that you hold in your heart against the fortunes of the world?"

At the same time, Viscount Grey said that "it is not necessary for the peace conference to create a league of nations. The conference will itself be a vital beginning of such a league. All that is absolutely necessary is that it should not commit suicide but keep itself alive by adjourning and leaving a permanent organization instead of dissolving itself and destroying its machinery. This is not all that is desirable but all that is essential. A beginning that has in it vitality and power of growth is better than a more complete and more attractive creation that has no life. One is a living thing, while the other is a piece of furniture."

If an organized moral force be what is meant by a league of nations, its formation can not be very difficult, since all men are one in the longing for an effective and enduring peace. But moral forces are not apt to be persuasive with a great nation determined upon war, unless it be sustained by the sanction of actual force. Public opinion rightly directed is organized moral force. Public opinion is the offspring of democracy. A league of democratic nations might therefore generate a moral force sufficiently strong in itself to dissuade belligerents from breaches of the peace.

But moral forces seldom move all the masses in the same direction. Before America's entry into the war our people were divided as to the end toward which our duties pointed. Many good people opposed, while others equally good advocated, our intervention. The application of German force was required for a decision. And the moral viewpoint of a nation is more likely to be influenced by its interest than by any other consideration. There are times, too, when it is very properly aroused for war, when it regards peace as humiliating and disastrous.

Morality is a static element in human affairs, which neither grows nor diminishes. The observance of its essentials may be more active in one age or country than in another, but its quality is essentially unchangeable. Buckle demonstrated that man's progress in civilization was achieved through the development of science and the industries, through the investigation of nature's mysteries and the conversion of her infinite resources to the welfare of mankind. Throughout this marvelous era of expansion morals, like the law of gravitation, have remained the same. During the Middle Ages when the world stood still, while man contemplated this life merely as a state of preparation for a better and a higher one, morals were confounded with religion. They were exalted, but they were not transformed.

If it be true, and I think it is, that man advances and his social condition improves with his extending grasp and domination of material things, and that his happiness and comfort are the outgrowth of the same forces which breed strife and conflict, then it must be true that their peaceful adjustment can not depend with safety upon the possible concentration of static elements upon them. For man is a fighting animal, and life even in the most orderly communities is a continuing contest. We speak of our ambitions, our difficulties, our accomplishments, and our affections in terms of conflict. We practice self-restraint with indifferent success and transfer our battles wherever possible from the field to the forum. This does not change the nature of man, but only his methods of waging wars. Morality is an invaluable ally of peace and of war when its precepts are duly observed by all. But if depended upon as a controlling influence in international affairs, it is apt, like a poorly tempered sword, to break in the hands at the moment of its greatest need.

The career of The Hague conventions affords some proof of this. They are easily the greatest advance of the nations toward harmony of understanding, for the mitigation of human strife. But their sanction was a moral one. Their structure, carefully and earnestly builded, collapsed like a house of cards with the first breath of the tempest. Their simple and attractive proportions had no rugged strength within and around them. The outline remains and may become the model for a wiser and sadder generation. But the world needs something more heroic, if nations are to be restrained within bounds and compelled to keep the peace.

Enthusiasts like William Ladd have dreamed for years of leagues for peace and formulated basic plans for their creation. Practically all of them recognized the need for a sanction behind them sufficiently adequate to make their decrees effective. The judgments of every court in Christendom, however peaceful and law-abiding the people, depend upon the power of the judges to summon if need be the armed strength of the Government for their vindication. All men respect the visible presence of actual power; many men in every country have no respect for anything else, and it is because of them that power must rest behind governments, whatever their character. "Liberty," said Robert Toombs, "is the blood of the brave. No people can long preserve it who are not ready at all times to die for it."

Confucius preached morality to China 500 years before the birth of Christ. He has since been its patron saint. Her defenseless and chaotic masses follow his precepts and respect his example. No man can question the beauty and worth of his philosophy, nor doubt the unwisdom of relying upon it as a sustaining force in political affairs. Indeed, it may be affirmed that if organized moral force can preserve the peace of the world, the hour of the millennium has struck, and man has reached the zenith of his material and intellectual advancement. I wish I could believe it possible.

I am much more impressed with Viscount Grey's suggestion. Let the victorious league now in force be continued. It is amply competent to keep the peace of the world and adjust all differences between its members. It is welded by a common sacrifice and consecrated to greater service by the achievement of a triumph to which they all contributed. Such an alliance commands respect by the strength it enjoys and inspires confidence by the cause it espoused and vindicated. It may admit other nations to its association as time and experience shall determine. The same sure guides will unfold the needs and suggest the methods for its policies and their enforcement, discover obstacles and difficulties with the way to overcome or avoid them. Indeed, Mr. President, I devoutly believe that an entente between the two great English-speaking nations, whose unhappy differences have, I trust, forever disappeared in the presence of a common danger, and whose friendship has been forged in the fires and sanctified upon the altars of a victory attained by a common sacrifice of blood and treasure, would be the harbinger of an era of peace for all the nations. Their hegemony in world affairs would lead away from strife, promote the administration of justice, respect the rights, the religion, and the aspirations of other and smaller peoples, encourage education, the development of art, science, and all the peaceful pursuits of man. The magnitude of their vast responsibilities and the majesty of their strength would guarantee their continued association, and the influence of their example would be compelling with every people.

Because an alliance actually exists, there is groundwork for its growth into a league. And I think in the nature of things a league must be a growth. It can only find its rudiments in conventions. The difficulties to be considered and reconciled are many. The Senators from Massachusetts, Missouri, and Pennsylvania have emphasized some of them. Others are as readily foreseen. I need only mention the financial burden and its method of distribution, its inclusion of the vanquished nations, of Bolshevist Russia, and the Vatican. For every advocate of the plan assumes the necessity of comprehending all nations within its confines. We can not include Germany until her repentance and reformation have transformed her. We can not include Russia until the hideous nightmare of her Bolshevist delirium shall have passed away. And Italy confronts the Vatican.

Shall the league be an indissoluble one? Should a dissatisfied nation determine to secede, are the batteries of the league to be turned upon it? If so, must it not by the union surrender an important element of its sovereignty? If not, may it not be dissolved at the pleasure of one or more of its constituents? And if it is permanent, indissoluble, and sovereign will it be a league or the successor of all nations? Questions like these can not be avoided nor is their solution easily attainable.

I do not say these difficulties are insuperable, but I feel sure that only time and experience can surmount them. They will tax the patience and the wisdom of the entente, whose immediate and compelling work is the dictation of peace to Germany and the organization of the nations now springing from the ashes of Turkey and Austria.

With this task the neutral nations are not directly concerned. It is exclusively that of our allies and of ourselves. Germany has but the semblance of a government with which the allies can deal. The nation is in flux and may at any time turn to quicksilver in their grasp. Peace conditions can not be imposed upon a people without a government to accept and obey them. We are now safeguarding the Rhineland border; we may soon be compelled to police Berlin and the confines of Poland. Indemnities are of no avail if there be no authority to collect and deliver them. The winning of a war is fruitless if the enemy melts away under the dissolving agencies of disaster. Let us therefore deal with Germany as summarily as justice will permit. We are not yet at peace. The world is still in revolt, and the burden of the war has not been taken from its shoulders. Until it shall have ended, it can not again settle down and adjust itself to the ancient ways, and it can not end until Germany knows what her sentence is to be. We must have peace before we can enforce it. The treaty must precede everything else, the league included.

Mr. President, I trust that events will justify those who believe in the possibility of securing permanent peace through the establishment of a world's tribunal. And I fervently hope that this great war may mark the close of strife among men. But I apprehend that until human nature shall have profoundly altered, until selfishness and greed, until the passions, the ambitions, and the emotions of men shall have been tempered by the altruism of a brotherhood we have never yet attained, the world will be troubled by wars and rumors of war. A French antiquarian recently announced that he had unearthed more than 3,000 treaties of peace since organized society began, all of them expressly designed to establish permanent peace on earth. The Congress of Vienna wrought to that end and rashly proclaimed its consummation, yet its every signatory was at war within half a century afterwards. The terrific cost and the terrible weapons of modern warfare will be greater deterrents to war than all the programs for its prevention which man's genius can evolve or his industry construct.

"The fate of nations," said Gov. Black, "is still decided by their wars. You may talk of orderly tribunals and learned referees; you may sing in your schools the gentle phrases of the quiet life; you may strike from your books the last note of every martial anthem, and yet out in the smoke and thunder will always be the tramp of horses and the silent, rigid, upturned face. Men may prophesy and women pray, but peace will come here to abide forever on this earth only when the dreams of childhood are accepted charts to guide the destinies of men. Events are numberless and mighty, and no man can tell which wire runs around the world. The nation basking to-day in the quiet of contentment and repose may still be in the deadly circuit and to-morrow writhing in the toils of war."

Mr. President, I am not apprehensive of any great international war until the horrors and desolation of this one shall have been forgotten in the excitements of some great upheaval. But I am concerned with the prospect of internal strife arising from the social, economic, and political unrest everywhere observable. I need go into no detail regarding Russia. But the chaos there prevalent seems infectious. The seeds of the bloody disorder blown westward by the winds of heaven are lodging and taking root in other soils. It can not be that we have overthrown autocracy only to prepare the world for Bolshevism. If that be so, we have made it worse than it ever was. A recent writer has described autocracy as organized hell and Bolshevism as hell broke loose. It is a despotism of murder, arson, and robbery enthroned, more deadly than Romanoff absolutism, more destructive than Teutonic warfare. It surpasses the barbarism of the savage. It must be stamped out as a nest of vipers, or its consuming fires may envelop the world in universal conflagration.

Mr. President, the glowing tributes to the heroic virtues and to the sentimental elements of human nature now so prevalent are timely and attractive. But I am unable to perceive that these qualities have been stimulated into universal activity. They are not apparent in the recent pronouncements of labor, in the aspirations of capital. The nations are girding their loins for the approaching economic struggle. Tariffs, protective and punitive, combinations to restrain and promote trade, the struggle for existence seem quite as aggressive as in the ante-bellum period. The advocate of the torch and the bomb, as the drastic but essential remedies for every social disorder, is plying his trade as though it had not been interrupted. The golden rule still yields to the rule of gold and men applaud the announcement of doctrines whose precepts, though beautiful, give no promise of material return.

Some of the peoples just freed from Teutonic oppression are signalizing their deliverance by the slaughter of aliens within their midst. Class appeals to violence in some of the allied countries mingle their voices in the general acclaim of victory. In free America the I. W. W. preach and practice the gospel of destruction; anarchy disseminates its poison among the discontented; wealth has not fully learned its lesson from the experiences of the recent past; strike breakers are dynamited and negroes lynched as they were in our era of peace and prosperity. The foremost advocates of a league for peace clamor for armies far outnumbering the establishments of the old order that has passed and for navies that shall overspread the seven seas. These conditions can not endure forever. They are not within the purview of leagues for peace. What shall it profit the nations if in securing peace between themselves they shall be torn to pieces by their own embittered populations? These are the dangers just ahead. Let us not overlook them by looking to the sky line beyond them. Let us see to it that they are avoided.

Mr. President, I entertain very decided opinions upon armaments and the economic policies of the great powers toward each other and the lesser peoples. But I shall not express them now. When the Navy bill reaches the Senate I shall probably do so. For the present I need only add that I recognize the Executive as the depositary of the treaty-making power. He should be free to exercise it as to him seems best for the country. His is the immediate responsibility. I have every confidence in the loftiness of his purposes, the integrity of his aims, and the measure of his ability at this crisis in our diplomatic history. Reserving my judgment upon the finished work of the commission when it comes to the Senate for approval, I confidently predict that President Wilson will acquit himself well before the nations and to the ultimate satisfaction of his countrymen.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I desire to ask a question. The Senator, speaking of the first principle of the 14 points, with reference to secret diplomacy, was of the opinion that negotiations should be in secret, as I understood him.

Mr. THOMAS. Except where the negotiations may be public without in any wise affecting or being dangerous to the ultimate purpose of the conference.

Mr. BORAH. The thought that occurred to me—leaving out for the present the general principle of secret or open diplomacy—is what reason can there be for maintaining any secrecy at all with reference to a treaty which is to be imposed upon or submitted to the conquered nations? They are not present, and publicity could not arouse any feelings such as the Senator speaks of. We are simply meeting there as friends and allies to impose upon the conquered nations certain conditions. What reason can there be for having secrecy about anything of that kind?

Mr. THOMAS. It is impossible, Mr. President, for me to forecast the situation as it is bound to unfold itself in that conference from day to day. On the other hand, it is impossible for me to conceive of a conference whose purposes are so numerous and so mighty as that which is about to assemble, without assuming the presence of questions which, to be settled peaceably, must be settled among themselves, and which, if given world-wide immediate publicity, will tend to destroy rather than to promote the purposes of the conference.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator leaves out of the conference, it seems to me, a body which ought to be taken into consideration, and that is the great mass of the people who really fought and won the war and who are to be bound by the treaty. Why should not they be informed as to what these conditions are prior to the time they are bound by them?

Mr. THOMAS. If those who fought the war, the armies, are to be informed of everything preceding the treaty, then they should make it and not their accredited delegates. I have not said, at least I am not conscious of having said, that the framework of the treaty and the basis of it should not be submitted to everybody before its ratification. If I have created that sort of an impression, I have been unfortunate in my use of language.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is never unfortunate in that respect.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not mean that the treaty should be completed by the conference in the sense that it is not to be submitted to the people of the various nations concerned after it has been virtually ratified.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator would not be in favor, for instance, of a completed instrument which should be brought here and ratified in secret session before the people were informed of its details?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; not at all. I would be perfectly willing, in considering a treaty of this kind, to cast my vote, unless I change my mind, for open sessions for its consideration by the Senate, but then we have to act upon it as it has been framed and submitted to us for our consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator think that any substantial terms of the treaty, any substantial provisions, ought to be made public before the treaty is finally agreed upon?

Mr. THOMAS. Absolutely. It is the negotiations leading up to that conclusion, which may not be permanent, which in the public interests, in my judgment, in nine cases out of ten should be discussed privately.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK obtained the floor.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish, if the Senator will permit me, to ask unanimous consent to have the Committee on Interstate Commerce discharged from the further consideration of a bill introduced by me, being Senate bill 5248, and have the bill referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I will say, if the Senator will pardon me, that I introduced this bill by request, being the same bill that is now in the House, with reference to the control of packing houses. I felt that it should go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The purpose of introducing the bill, however, was to have hearings in the Senate at the same time that they are being conducted in the House. That can not be done if the bill stays with the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. I have consulted the chairman of that committee, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the ranking minority member of the committee, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and both are agreed that these hearings could not take place before that committee for a month. It can just as well be done by the Agricultural Committee. Witnesses are to be here from some 1,500 miles who would otherwise have to be brought back. That is my reason for making this request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he will not withdraw that request for the present and bring it up to-morrow when there is a fuller attendance of the Senate?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; if there is any objection to it to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. KENYON. I will withdraw the request at this time and renew it to-morrow.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I submitted a day or two ago Senate resolution No. 399, which is now upon the table. I move that it be taken from the table, and that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 399.

Mr. THOMAS. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas claims aggregating millions of dollars in compensation for damages to property and for personal outrages and destruction of life, suffered by American citizens in the Republic of Mexico, have been filed with the Department of State for presentation to the Government of Mexico; and

Whereas some years have already intervened between the commission of such damages and outrages and no progress is apparently being made toward the liquidation, settlement, and payment of such claims: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate whether or not said claims have been presented to the Government of Mexico, and what steps and measures are being taken to prosecute such claims and to liquidate and settle the same, and if said claims have not been presented, then to report to the Senate what steps and measures are contemplated to be taken with respect thereto and when the department will proceed with the same.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest that is a matter which properly should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations for action.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I believe the time has come when this Government can, with propriety and, indeed, with justice, request the Republic of Mexico to make just compensation for the injuries inflicted upon American citizens who were rightfully in Mexico, as well as for damages to property which American citizens owned within the territorial limits of Mexico. This resolution challenges attention to this matter and may be regarded as preliminary to a pressing of claims which, under international law, the Republic of Mexico should meet. Not only millions and tens of millions of dollars in value of American property have been confiscated and destroyed by Mexicans, and in many instances by the military forces of the Government of Mexico, but many Americans have been subjected to physical violence and indignities at the hands of Mexican citizens, and a considerable number have been killed. American citizens who have been the victims of wrongs and injustices in Mexico have filed with the State Department in this city claims against the Government of Mexico amounting to several hundred millions of dollars. As the resolution recites, years have intervened between the commission of the wrongs and outrages which offer the basis for claims for damages, and no progress has been made toward the liquidation, settlement, or payment of the same. In my opinion, the United States has been generous in her treatment of the Mexican Republic. Our Government has exhibited the utmost patience and forbearance in her dealings with our neighbor Republic and the Mexican people. President Wilson has been the true friend of Mexico. He desired the welfare of the Republic and the happiness and the prosperity and liberty of the Mexican people. In every possible way he sought to prove the disinterested friendship that this Republic had for the Mexican people. Evidences are not wanting that the patience and friendship exhibited by President Wilson and by the American people have not brought forth a response from Mexico and her people that would be indicative of a reciprocal feeling upon the part of the latter. In the great world conflict through which we have just passed, Mexico evinced no friendship for the allied cause and no appreciation for the great work which was performed by this Nation. Indeed, I think the evidences are manifest that Carranza and his Government were pro-German rather than proally or neutral.

One would have thought that in view of the great principles for which the allies were fighting, and in view of the sincere regard which this Republic, particularly under Mr. Wilson's administration, had exhibited in behalf of Mexico and her people, that in the hour when the lines were drawn between the forces of liberty and freedom and those of autocracy our sister Republic and her people would have enthusiastically raised their voices in support of the forces contending against the central empires. Not only would this course have been just and humane but it would have been some compensation for the kindness and favors and friendship bestowed by the United States upon Mexico. During the war, and particularly after the United States entered the conflict, the present Government of Mexico not only failed to show sympathy with the allies and their aims but opposition was clearly manifested, and to our Government there was, I was about to say, open hostility—indeed, I shall not change the word—shown toward our Government.

How different was the course of Brazil and other Republics in South and Central America. The people of the United States will ever remember with deep appreciation and gratitude the fact that Cuba, Brazil, and other Republics to the south of us showed their abhorrence to the practices, policies, and contentions of the central powers and their approval of the aims and purposes of the allied nations. They became, as it were, partners with those nations that were carrying the standard of civilization and seeking to uphold the cause of freedom in all the world. Mexico chose a different course. She sought an inglorious and unenviable isolation:

Mr. President, the time has come when Mexico must meet the just demands of American citizens. The injuries and damages which they have sustained at the hands of Mexico and her people must be paid for. The hand of death is claiming many of those who have thus suffered. As time goes by the proof of the damages sustained becomes more difficult to secure. Compensation should be made to those who have suffered before the payment would be too late to be of advantage to them. International law and treaties have been violated and American rights have been trampled upon. This resolution should be promptly passed, and when the State Department has furnished the information sought, if it appears that further steps should be taken in order to enforce the rights of the American people, then I feel sure there would be no hesitation in proceeding along the lines of justice with vigor and promptitude.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the Senator will not press this matter this afternoon. I rose to move an executive session. I am very sure he would not be able to get his resolution through this afternoon. I will say if he will have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I will secure for it consideration next week, at the next session of that committee, and I believe it will be expedited. It is a little better to consult the Secretary of State before asking him to reveal here the relations that may be in existence between the State Department and the Mexican Government.

Mr. KING. I appreciate that certain formalities are sometimes required and indulged in with respect to resolutions calling for information from or action on the part of some governmental department, and particularly that department which has to do with our foreign relations; but I can not conceive of any objection to the passage of this resolution. I am frank to confess, however, that I know what the information will be. I have had a number of conferences with officials of the State Department. I will not disclose, of course, the information conveyed or the matters under discussion. I shall be equally frank in stating that I shall attempt to secure some action which it is quite likely this resolution will not secure in order to compel the Mexican Government to meet the just claims of American citizens. I am perfectly willing, however, to follow the suggestions of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and will, therefore, not object to the resolution being referred with the understanding that the committee act upon the same at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I am extremely anxious to see the resolution, which has just been read, passed as early as possible. I was hoping that the Senator would let it lie on the table for the present and that by our efforts we might get it up to-morrow or at some very early date. The committee meets next Wednesday, as I am informed by the chairman. Inasmuch as the reference of the resolution seems to have been consented to I shall not take the time of the Senate now to give a little history of our relations with Mexico since these outrages first occurred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a day or two ago I submitted Senate resolution No. 398 and asked its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. I have spoken to the chairman of that committee and he has no objection to the committee being discharged from the further consideration of the resolution and having it adopted by the Senate. Therefore, I move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution and that the Senate proceed to its consideration. It will only take a minute.

Mr. SMOOT. Will not my colleague divide that motion and first have the committee discharged from the further consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KING. Yes. I move, first, that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from further consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from further consideration of Senate resolution No. 398.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, let the resolution be read.

Mr. NEW. I should like to have the resolution read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas prior to the signing of the armistice a large number of enlisted men in the Army had been recommended for commissions and many officers had been recommended for promotion, and such recommendations were pending in the War Department when said armistice was signed; and

Whereas an order was issued by the Secretary of War which resulted in no action being taken upon said recommendations, or either of them; and

Whereas officers and enlisted men who were so recommended are being discharged from the service without said recommendations being acted upon; and

Whereas no good and sufficient reason appears for failure to act upon said recommendations, and justice and good faith would seem to require affirmative action thereon: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate whether a modification or revocation of said order is contemplated, and if not, what reasons exist for failing to act upon said recommendations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I see no objection to the adoption of this resolution, but I will say to the Senator, for his information, that the Committee on Military Affairs had up this morning the question involved, and sent to the department for consideration and report several bills and resolutions having the same purpose. We expect to have the information in the committee from the War Department within a few days as to the number of men involved and other facts connected with the matter. However, there is no objection to the adoption of this resolution, if the Senator desires to press it.

Mr. PHELAN. As a matter of information, the Secretary of War is reported as having said the men recommended for promotion after they have been disenrolled are still eligible to the promotion recommended in the reserves. Is the Senator informed on that subject?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a somewhat different question. The committee desired to get information as to how many men had been recommended for promotion and by whom the recommendations were made. The captain of a company may recommend a man for promotion, but the colonel of the regiment may not approve it; and that would hardly be such a recommendation as would be entitled to full consideration. The committee is seeking to get from the War Department full information on that matter.

Mr. PHELAN. My information was that Gen. Pershing had made many recommendations which were cut off by the signing of the armistice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. PHELAN. But that he did not exercise that privilege in the matter of the Medical Corps; that the Secretary when abroad instructed him to include the Medical Corps; and in answer to an interrogatory the Secretary said that such officers would receive their promotion in the reserves after their disenrollment.

Mr. SMOOT. The statement made by the Senator is correct; but many of the men who had been recommended for promotion in the Army before November 11 have no desire whatever to remain in the Reserve Corps. They have earned their promotion, but the order issued by the Secretary of War prevents the promotion being granted. There is no question that the statement made by the Senator is correct; but the subject we are discussing now relates to the men who have earned their promotions and were recommended before November 11.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am strongly in favor of the adoption of the resolution, because I think the recognition should be granted, and it will involve no expense to the Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a large number of men have risen from the ranks to the position where by their valiant service they have been recommended for promotion and were about to be promoted when this blanket order of November 11 prohibited further action. Many officers who likewise have rendered excellent service have been recommended for promotion, and they, too, by the operation of this order were prohibited from receiving their promotions. It seems to me that a blanket order of that character is rather unfortunate. This resolution inquires into the purpose of it, whether there is a probability of its revocation, and asks for general information upon the subject. I think there can be no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether or not he would have any objection to having included in the resolution an inquiry of the Secretary of War as to how many men would be affected? I understand that the committee has made inquiry about that.

Mr. THOMAS. The Committee on Military Affairs expects to have that information in a very few days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the matter of amending the resolution will come up after the main motion has been disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that; but I wanted to know from the Senator whether he would have any objection to having included in the resolution an inquiry as to the number of men who would be affected by it?

Mr. KING. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator his view as to whether the language of this resolution would include those men who had entered officers' training camps, but had not received commissions prior to the signing of the armistice?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are not involved.

Mr. LENROOT. But are they not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; they will get their commissions when they have earned them.

Mr. KING. That is my information.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if they complete their course they get their commissions; there is no doubt about that at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is up to them.

Mr. SMOOT. But it is up to them as to whether they want to get their commissions. If they desire commissions, they must complete their course; but if they leave before completing the course, then they do not get commissions.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say that what prompted me to make the inquiry was this: I have only this morning had one letter from an enlisted man who had entered a training school in France. He has been recommended for a commission.

Mr. THOMAS. If he has been recommended, then the bill which I introduced would cover his case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of Senate resolution No. 398.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand from the Senator from Nebraska, the Committee on Military Affairs has inquired of the Secretary of War for information as to how many men will be affected by the order referred to in the resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I so understand.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then I will not ask to have the resolution amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 6, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 3, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Heavenly Father, out of the issues of whose great loving heart come all the rich and varied blessings of life, temporal and spiritual, which, if assimilated and made dominant in the soul of man would transform the world into a veritable paradise, help us, we beseech Thee, to overcome the evils which doth so easily beset us—selfishness, greed, covetousness, envy, jealousy, hatred, revenge, egotism, and all that makes for evil—that we may be strong, pure, noble, holy. In the Spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FARR, temporarily, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. FAIRFIELD (at the request of Mr. WOOD of Indiana), for one week on account of illness.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE J. FREDERICK C. TALBOTT.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, February 9, 1919, be set aside for addresses on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. J. FREDERICK C. TALBOTT, late a Representative from the State of Maryland.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that Sunday, February 9, 1919, be set aside to memorialize the late Representative TALBOTT. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONTESTED ELECTION CASE—WICKERSHAM AGAINST SULZER.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I call up the contested election case of Wickersham against Sulzer, and ask that the Clerk report the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 492.

Contested-election case—Wickersham v. Sulzer.

Resolved,

1. That Charles A. Sulzer was not elected a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the Territory of Alaska in this Congress and is not entitled to retain a seat herein.

2. That James Wickersham was duly elected a Delegate to the House of Representatives from the Territory of Alaska in this Congress and is entitled to a seat therein.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the rule is that if we proceed without fixing a time for debate we proceed under the rules of the House, and that any Member who secures recognition will be entitled to have an hour.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Louisiana yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be better, if practicable, to fix the time for debate in this case?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not know. I do not imagine that it will take up any more time to proceed under the rules of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is this a unanimous report? There is no minority report filed.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; it is a unanimous decision of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I understand that the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. SULZER] and possibly others desire to be heard in opposition to the report of the committee.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is true.

Mr. MANN. It would be a matter of great convenience to the House if they could tell something about when the vote would be had upon the resolution.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It would be the intention to have the vote some time to-day. I do not think there is any doubt about that. It is hard to tell how much time will be necessary.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Louisiana any time limit to suggest?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman prefer a request for unanimous consent to fix the time? There is no minority report filed in this case, and, as the gentleman is well aware, there is another matter of very great importance that is desired by a great many Members to have disposed of to-day, if possible. I suggest to the gentleman the advisability of making a request and fixing the time.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I would not like to make a request that would shut anybody off who desires to be heard. I am not advised as to how much time is desired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of great importance, and we ought not to undertake the consideration of it with a handful of Members here. I make a point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-six Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a change of reference of House joint resolution 377, introduced by me on yesterday and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. What is it about?

Mr. GARD. The joint resolution has for its purpose the extending of the thanks of Congress to members of the American Protective League, an organization auxiliary to the Department of Justice.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be so referred.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to call attention to the reference of another bill, which, I think, has been wrongly referred. It is in the RECORD of December 30, page 930. It is Senate bill 1847, referred to the House Calendar, and it should have been referred to the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. What is it about?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is granting a large quantity of land to one of the forest reserves in the State of Wyoming. It pertains to the public domain, and really ought to be on the Union Calendar. I think it has been inadvertently referred, for such bills heretofore have gone to the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not fix the calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not know how to get at it, but I think it ought to be referred from the House Calendar to the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. What is the number of it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Senate bill 1847.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks that Senate bill 1847 be referred to the Committee on Public Lands——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; to the Union Calendar of the House. It is now on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Be referred from the House Calendar to the Union Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—I do not think I shall object to referring any bill to the House calendar, but I would like to know what the bill is.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is a bill incorporating quite a large territory in the State of Wyoming into one of the national forest reserves. It has the approval of both the Interior Department and the Agricultural Department. I reported the bill from the Committee on Public Lands, and the bill belongs to the Wyoming Senator and Representative.

Mr. MANN. It is a matter of change of reference for the Speaker whether unanimous consent is given or not; but I think nobody has any objection.

The SPEAKER. Well, let it go, then. The gentleman from Louisiana.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—WICKERSHAM AGAINST SULZER.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am very glad for an opportunity to transfer the responsibility of this complicated contested-election case to the House. The committee have given rather unusual consideration to this case. We felt the responsibility of deciding the case according to the law and the evidence and of making a correct report to the House of Representatives for what action it might deem necessary or fit to take in the premises. This contest arose in Alaska out of the election of November 7, 1916. When the returns were all in and canvassed there was a majority in favor of the contestant, Wickersham, of 31 votes. The matter of canvassing the election in Alaska is different from that of any State or any other country so far as I know. The act of Congress providing for the election of a Delegate from Alaska created a canvassing board consisting of the governor, the collector of customs, and the surveyor general. To this board was to be sent the complete returns from the various precincts of the Territory. To this canvassing board, under the act of Congress providing for the election of a Delegate from Alaska, was to be sent from the various precincts the election returns. This board, in my opinion, has rather unusual powers, because the law directing that it meet and canvass these returns does not fix any time limit upon how long this canvass may continue. In fact, the canvass in this case appeared to extend over several months, due to the fact that the election returns were very much delayed and reported very slowly. The law further provides that the board after canvassing the returns in the various precincts shall issue a certificate of election to the candidate having the greater number of the votes. Well, upon the completion of this canvass of this election some time about the 1st of March, 1917, the board was prepared to issue certificate to Mr. Wickersham, as the returns showed that he had a majority of 31 votes. Then a proceeding was taken in the United States district court by Mr. Sulzer, asking that a writ of mandamus be directed to this canvassing board commanding them to reject the returns at seven precincts and to issue a certificate of election to the contestee, Mr. Sulzer. To this writ the members of the board answered, and their answer is set out fully in the report of the committee, and upon this answer some time—I think about the 23d of March—the judge of the district court for the first division—I think it was—of Alaska issued a writ of mandamus directed to the canvassing board commanding them—of course the preliminary writ had that command—but ordering them to make a return. Then the writ was made peremptory, directing the canvassing board in the canvass and tabulation of the vote to reject the returns of six precincts and not count them and issue a certificate of election to the contestee, Mr. Sulzer. That was done and upon that order of the court the certificate was issued, and Mr. Sulzer was sworn in as a Member of Congress as a Delegate from Alaska.

Then the contest began in which the proceedings before the court were involved, and a number of other questions which are discussed in the report. Now, the question that was before the court there chiefly was what construction should be placed upon the election laws of Alaska. Before the committee there were a number of questions raised by Mr. Wickersham which the committee thought not necessary to pass upon. In the first place, he complained that this case was decided, that this certificate which the election board was about to issue to him was withheld and issued to Mr. Sulzer, without his being made a party to the proceedings. The committee found it unnecessary to pass upon that question on account of the peculiar jurisdiction that Congress has in these cases. In construing an election case, Congress sits not only as a court of appeal, but with power to try a case either de novo or on appeal. If you take the view that Congress is sitting as a court, that we are sitting as judges and trying the rights to an office, which in a sense we are, then we are a court of very peculiar jurisdiction, because we can try a case either on appeal or de novo, or both at the same time. For that reason the committee found it unnecessary to pass upon the question of whether Mr. Wickersham should have been made a party to the proceedings in Alaska. He made another contention, that quite a portion of the record is devoted to, that the Territorial legislature had exceeded its authority in passing the election statute which changed the form of ballot prescribed by the act of Congress in 1912. The committee found it unnecessary to pass upon that, because it raised a constitutional question. The act of Congress incorporating Alaska and providing for the election of a Delegate is held, I suppose, to be the constitution of Alaska. That act provided for the election, and that the electors might use either a printed or written ballot. And so the contention was that in changing that to the Australian ballot the legislature had exceeded its authority. We found it unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the question, because Congress has never undertaken in passing upon election cases to decide constitutional questions arising in a State. Of course, my opinion is that the legislature had authority to pass that law.

Now, the chief question there, I say, was the correct construction of the Alaska election law. This law provided for an official ballot under the Australian ballot system, or practically as we have it in the States. On account of conditions prevailing in Alaska—that is, the extent of the Territory and the uncertainty of communication—it was deemed advisable for the legislature to write an exception in the law to the use of official ballots.

No doubt, and it is conceded in the hearings, that this grew out of past experiences there; that it was probable that in many portions of the Territory the official ballots could not be delivered in time, so that if the voters everywhere throughout the Territory were given an opportunity to have a voice in their elections and to vote there should be some proviso to this Australian ballot system authorizing the voters to use other ballots than those that were official. So in order to meet that the legislature wrote into this election law a proviso which is known as section 21, and which reads as follows:

That in any precinct where the election has been legally called and no official ballots have been received the voters are permitted to write or print their ballots—

Now, that is just what the congressional act says, and that these ballots might be prepared by the voters—but the judges of election shall in this event certify to the facts which prevented the use of the official ballots, which certificate must accompany and be made a part of the election returns.

Now, it so happened that at a number of precincts, so far as they became involved in the case, as it appeared before the committee—some eight of them, I think—in some outlying sections of the Territory the official ballots were not delivered. In some of these precincts there was a certificate, or maybe just a line, by the election officers, stating that no official ballots had been received. With other precincts—three, I believe, in number, maybe four—in sending in the returns there was no certificate attached to the returns making any explanation on account of the absence of these official ballots.

Now, when the matter came before the court, of course there was no hearing except as to the matter set forth in the pleadings, and the court held that this proviso in the statute was absolutely mandatory, and ordered the canvassing board to reject the votes at those precincts and in another precinct for reasons that I will take up later. This established a majority of 19 in favor of Mr. Sulzer, and the court authorized a certificate of election to be issued to him.

The question came up in the main sense as to the mandatory or directory character of this clause in the statute. There does not seem to be any dispute anywhere about the reasons or moving causes which induced the legislature to write that provision in there. It was written in there in the interest of and for the protection of the voters in the outlying, isolated, and remote sections of Alaska, where, in all probability, it was not practical to deliver the ballots or the election supplies.

Now, in order to get at the construction of mandatory and directory statutes as applied to elections; as I understand it and as the courts hold, it is necessary to understand this: That in holding an election and applying the law as to whether or not certain provisions of a statute or certain portions of a statute are mandatory or directory, you divide the question of holding the election, you might say, into two divisions. One of those divisions is composed of those things that are done, acts performed, up to the time that the poll is complete, and the other division relates to those things done and acts performed after the poll is closed, and relate to the canvass, tabulation, and return of the vote.

Now, all the courts and all the authorities, so far as I am able to find, make that distinction. And the reason for it is this, that there are certain things pertaining to the election with which the voter is charged, a knowledge of certain things in connection with which he acts upon his own responsibility and assumes the risk of not comply with the law. For instance, the statutes say that the election must be on a certain day. Every voter knows that, the officers know it; the officers and voters are charged with knowledge alike. And the statute says that a voter must vote in the precinct of which he is a resident.

Now, in a number of cases the House of Representatives, as well as the courts, has held that that provision of the statute is mandatory, because the voter knows where he lives; he is charged with knowledge of the law, and he must vote in the precinct of his residence, the precinct of which he is an inhabitant. If he does not do that, he assumes the risk of having his vote rejected. It says that the voting shall be by ballot. The voter is charged with a knowledge of that law. It says, for instance, that the votes must go into the ballot box. The voter is charged with a knowledge of that, and those statutes relating to the qualification of voters in many States provide that before a man can vote he must be registered a certain number of days before the election. The voter is charged with a knowledge of that, or that he shall pay a poll tax. So that all those things that relate to the election up to the time the poll is closed and the verdict is made up are construed to be mandatory by the courts, because there the voter is charged with the knowledge of those things, and he assumes the responsibility in not so acting as the law provides.

But when the vote is complete there comes the second division, where all the courts and all the authorities make the distinction and construe the provisions of the statute as directory, especially as to the voter, because when the poll is closed and he has cast his ballot the courts have universally placed around him protection, and they protect him in the security of his right to have his vote counted as cast, and have refused in all cases, I might say, to permit negligence on the part of the officers making up and returning that vote to deprive the citizen of his right to have his vote counted as cast.

Now, in this case this certificate related entirely to the return of the vote. There is absolutely in this whole record no proof of fraud against any precinct thrown out, in the judgment of the court. The proviso in the statute says that the voter, in the event the official ballots are not received, is permitted to write or print his ballot. Now, the voter, when he writes or prints that ballot in the absence of an official ballot furnished to him, does exactly what the law permits him to do and what the law stated he might do under those conditions, and then it imposes upon the judges of election a duty. That is the first part of it. It authorizes the voter in those sections of the Territory where the ballot was not received to write or print his ballot. Then it imposes upon the judges of election the duty of making an explanation about the absence of this official ballot. That relates absolutely to the return of the vote as it is cast. It relates absolutely and solely to the duty imposed upon the officers, and under the construction of those statutes, as they have been construed time and time again by this House and the courts, that provision is directory, because it is after the closing of the polls, after the voter's ballot is in the ballot box, and he is no longer protected against the willful conduct or the negligence of those officers, unless it be by placing that kind of construction on the statute, and that is the underlying reason for all of it.

That is the main point relative to the decision of the court as to holding that provision of the statute is mandatory and ordering these votes not counted and ordering the certificate to be issued to Mr. Sulzer on account of the fact that it changed the result of the vote there. And it goes further than that, as I understand it. Of course, that opinion, if you will read it, might be construed to mean a great many things, but it goes so far as to hold that this provision of the statute is mandatory to the extent that it vitiates this return, that it nullifies the return, and that the man who is entitled to the office that would be secured by that vote would have no power to go into a court and have the evidence adduced to show whether or not these ballots might be there and have them counted. Of course, I say that is the effect of it.

Now, we were unable to agree with that construction of that statute, especially without any line or word of proof of any fraud.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Supposing under the election laws of Congress applicable to Alaska and this Australian ballot law, passed by the Territorial Legislature of Alaska, a voter appeared at the election booth, went into the booth, and then came up and delivered to the officers of election a ballot that was not official. Would he be guilty of any offense by offering or attempting to cast that vote?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Of course, to answer that I will have to state a little more about the law.

Mr. RAKER. Assuming, now, that all the election returns and the ballots are at the polls.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will answer that in this way: Under this statute it is made the duty of the judges of election to receive the official ballots. It is made the duty of the judges of election to have those at the polls and deliver them to each voter as he appears to vote. Then, under that condition, if the official ballot is there and the voter declined to use it and used a nonofficial ballot, of course he would be acting entirely outside the law and would assume all the responsibility of having his vote not counted or of being prosecuted.

Mr. RAKER. I want to get the attitude of the voter. Suppose he goes to the election boothr and gets a ballot and then comes out and hands to the judge of election a ballot that is not official, assuming, now, that all the paraphernalia—the ballots and tally sheets of election—were there. Would that voter be guilty of any offense?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If the official ballots were there in the manner that the law contemplates and were supplied to the voter?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I think he would be outside of the law and would violate the law to cast that vote.

Mr. RAKER. Now, one other question. Suppose the judges of election, with all the paraphernalia—ballots, and otherwise—at the election booth should receive a ballot that is not an official ballot under the Alaskan statute. Would they be guilty of any offense by receiving it—the judges of election themselves?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If they had the official ballots?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. There would not be any question about that at all. If the official ballots were there and in the possession of the judges, the law imposes upon them the duty of supplying the voters with them, and if they fail to do that they have not complied with the law.

Mr. RAKER. I know; but the judges of election, if they opened that ballot to see whether it was official or not, would be guilty of a felony, would they not, under the Alaskan statute?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I have never known of any Australian ballot which, when it was folded, did not notify the judges of election that it was an official ballot, so that it would not be necessary to open it.

Mr. RAKER. Then the point is that in this particular law the official ballot is designated by printing to show that it is an official ballot.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes. I am sure that is true.

Now, I want to get back to a discussion of this legal proposition.

On the question of when you can construe election statutes as directory and when you must construe them as mandatory there are a number of cases cited in this report of the committee. The general citation which I have quoted is from McCrary on Elections. Then, there is a case cited from Missouri (Horsefall v. School District, 143 Mo., 542) which upholds exactly what the committee found in this case. It says this:

> The decisions of the supreme court in this State have not been altogether harmonious as to the effect of irregularities upon the result of an election, and we shall not attempt to review these cases, but we think that it may now be said to be the established rule in this State, as it is generally in other jurisdictions, that when a statute expressly declares any particular act to be essential to the validity of an election, then the act must be performed in the manner provided or the election will be void.

Now, you will notice this exception in the Alaska statute. It does not say that the want of this certificate shall void the vote. The legislature did not place any penalty upon the voter there at all. Practically all of the statutes relative to the Australian ballot prescribe that a ballot not in a certain form shall not be received and shall not be counted. Now, the courts have usually construed that portion of the statute to be mandatory. This decision continues:

> Also, if the statute provides specifically that a ballot not in prescribed form shall not be counted, then the provision is mandatory and the courts will enforce it; but if the statute merely provides that certain things shall be done and does not prescribe what results shall follow if these things are not done, then the provision is directory merely—

That fits in exactly with the Alaska situation—

> and the final test as to the legality of either the election or the ballot is whether or not the voters have been given an opportunity to express, and have fairly expressed, their will. If they have, the election will be upheld or the ballot counted, as the case may be.

Now, there is a very interesting case on that doctrine, and the law of this case, found in Sixty-eighth Texas, page 30, Fowler against The State, which involves questions very much like the one involved in this case. The complaint there was relative to making up a faulty return. For instance, it was charged that no tally sheets or poll lists were kept and returned as required by law. The statute required that the tally sheets and poll lists be kept and made a part of the return.

It was also charged that the ballot box was sent to the county judge by mail instead of by the officer designated by law, and that the returns were not made in triplicate, as required by law.

Now, Chief Justice Willie, of the State of Texas, a judge whose decisions, I understand, are held in very high regard by the Texas bar, discusses and states this situation more clearly than almost any other decision I have seen. He says:

Without separately considering each of the objections raised to the manner of holding the election at precinct No. 3 and of returning its result, all such objections, including those we have already passed upon, may be disposed of on the ground that the requirements of the election law not obeyed by the managers were not mandatory but directory. The statute does not say that a failure to pursue the course pointed out by it in these respects shall vitiate the election, nor is there anything in the nature of these provisions which requires us to give them that effect. The object of every popular election for officers is to ascertain the will of the people as to what persons shall serve them as such in the various positions to be filled. A free, fair, and full expression of the public will is sought, and certain means are prescribed by law as the most certain to bring about the desired result. Some of these, from their very nature, or from the manner in which they are prescribed, are deemed absolutely essential to the accomplishment of the desired result. Among these may be named the requirement that the voting shall be by ballot; that it shall take place on a certain day and within certain precincts, etc. These are prescribed to insure perfect freedom of choice to the citizen, to serve his convenience in getting to the polls, and to bring out a full vote at the election.

Then there are other requirements, such as those which have been neglected in this case, that are merely formal in their character. The law deems that it is proper that they should be pursued in order to prevent frauds in the election and tampering with the votes and returns. If strictly followed, they furnish the best evidence that the election has been fairly conducted, and the burden of proof to show that it was not, either wholly or in part, rests upon the party attacking the returns. But these requirements are always treated as directory unless the law, either expressly or in effect, makes them essential to the validity of the election. Electors must not be deprived of their votes on account of any technical objection to the manner in which the election has been held, or for any misconduct on the part of its presiding officers, if these have not affected the true result of the election. (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 617, 618; Prince v. Skillin, 71 Maine, 361.) This would be to deprive the citizen of a great constitutional privilege for a mere informality; to place it within the power of a few persons to defeat the right of suffrage altogether. The very means provided to insure a fair and proper election might become an instrument of fraud and dishonesty.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. What are the requirements of the Alaska law in reference to the returns to be made to the canvassing board? In other words, is anything more required than the usual return, and this certificate that you state is required to be made, as to their not having received the official ballots? What other things, if any, are required?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The only other thing except the usual return is that when the polls close the judges of election are to make up the certificates and return one set to the clerk of the United States district court for that division and another set, with the ballots, to the canvassing board.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to know if, for the precincts where those certificates were not received, there were ballots received?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the law of Alaska provide for receiving the ballots in addition to the returns?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes. Here is what it says. I will read section 402.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand that the judges must make an official statement that the official ballots were not there, and that that was the reason why the official ballots were not used and other ballots were used.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The law says that the judges shall make a certificate showing why the official ballots were not used and make that a part of the return, yes.

In answer to the gentleman from Oklahoma, here is what the statute provides:

The election board at each polling place as soon as the polls are closed shall immediately publicly proceed to open the ballot box and count and canvass the votes cast, and they shall thereupon, under their hands and seals, make out in duplicate a certificate of the result of said election, specifying the number of votes, in words and figures, cast for each candidate, and they shall then immediately carefully and securely seal up in one envelope one of said duplicate certificates and one of the registers of voters, all the ballots cast, and all affidavits made, and mail such envelope, with said papers inclosed, at the nearest post office by registered mail, if possible, duly addressed to the governor of Alaska at his place of residence, with the postage prepaid thereon.

The other duplicate certificate and register of voters, with the oaths of the judges of election, the judges of election shall at once seal up in an envelope addressed to the clerk of the district court for the division in which the precinct is situate, at his place of residence, with the postage thereon prepaid, and deposit the same in the nearest post office by registered mail, if possible. And the said clerk shall, as soon as he receives the said duplicate certificate, at once make out and duly mail to the governor of Alaska a certified copy of such certificate.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. McKEOWN. Whether or not these returns contain anything except the ballots?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; the register and poll book were there.

Mr. McKEOWN. Had they been received by the election officials?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I think so.

Mr. McKEOWN. Was there any testimony as to why they were received and the ballots not received?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. In reference to the duty of the canvassing board, the act further says:

The said canvassing board shall commence the performance of its duties at the office of the governor within 10 days after the third Tuesday of October of each year in which an election is held under and by virtue of this act, and shall continue with such work from day to day until the same is completed, and said canvass shall be publicly made.

As to why the votes should be sent the statute is silent.

Upholding the doctrine I have stated there will be found a case in the Forty-fourth of Alabama, Montgomery against Henry, which upholds the same doctrine as laid down by the Texas court and the Missouri court. Also in the Thirty-fourth of Nebraska will be found a very interesting case on that question, and which adopts the dissenting opinion of Justice Peckham in the famous New York case, which has been quoted very largely in the briefs in this case.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Having to vote on this matter, I would like the benefit of the chairman's views. Speaking of the question of the mandatory provision of the act and whether or not it is directory and that only those provisions which really relate to the returns of the election officers are directory, is there anything in the Alaskan statute which requires the voter to know whether or not there are legal ballots at the election precincts before he votes?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The law provides that it is the duty of the officers, judges of election—and I think that would be true not only in Alaska but in every other place—the law makes it the duty of the clerk of the district court to prepare the ballots and send them to the various commissioners in the district, and they distribute them to the various precincts and election officers. So under the statute it is the duty of the judges of election to receive the ballots and have them at the precincts and supply the voters with the ballots as they appear to vote. So I would take it that if the voter appeared and he was unable to secure an official ballot from the judges of the election, or if they did not furnish him with it, he would come within the statute and have the right to prepare his own ballot.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman says whether or not the ballots were there. Suppose the ballots had been delivered to the election officers, but were not actually furnished to the voter, could he then use a ballot made by himself?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not think that would be a case that the Territorial legislature had in mind in writing this provision, because that would be a case of fraud on the part of the officers. The object of the legislature in enacting this provision of the statute was to secure to the people the right to vote in that portion of the Territory where no ballots could be delivered. They knew from past experience that that would be true. It is possible to imagine a case where the officers join in a fraud in order to withhold the ballots, but what the object would be I do not know. I do not think the legislature had in mind any such case.

Mr. RAKER. Suppose a case of this kind: Ballots had been received by the election officers and the election was conducted on a nonofficial ballot, would that election be legal in that precinct under the gentleman's view of the Australian ballot law?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It is possible to imagine that case. I do not think it would. When you are construing a proviso it is construed in the sense that you are not to include any cases not contemplated by the legislature. A proviso is a limitation on the enactment. I think that it is certain that the legislature in enacting that clause to give these people the right to vote did not have in contemplation an imaginary case such as the gentleman from California has stated, where the officers would form a conspiracy to commit fraud and then fail to include the certificate.

Mr. RAKER. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. If the voter applies to the judges for his ballot, is it the gentleman's view that they then advise him whether or not the official ballots are there and whether others can be used?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It is presumed that the officers will perform the duties imposed on them by the plain terms of the statute. Of course, if the official ballots were there, there would be no advice necessary; but if they are not there it is the duty of the presiding officer of the election to so advise the man when he appears to vote. The gentleman has stated an imaginary case where the officers form a conspiracy to withhold the ballots, and I suppose he assumes, in order to protect themselves, that they would withhold or decline to make a certificate. But I think that is stretching the imagination to quite a long limit, because I think the gentleman from California knows that when officers go out to violate the law about the first thing they do is to look up the law and come as near as possible to complying with the letter of it.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will pardon me, I am only seeking information. In this contest, while the record is voluminous, I doubt whether any Members have had the opportunity to read it. Did any of the election officers in those precincts and contests testify, or were their affidavits taken, relative to the presence or nonpresence of the official ballots at election?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. I shall come to the discussion of that part a little later. We have been cited to a number of cases, to which I understand Members of the House have been cited, as being contrary to the conclusion reached by the committee in construing this statute as directory. The main case in that respect is in the One hundred and thirty-eighth Northwestern Reporter. That is a South Dakota case, but I have read that case very carefully, and if the Members feel sufficiently interested I think they will find it exactly upholds the contentions of the committee in this case. There was no clause in the statute saying that certain kinds of ballots should not be counted, but the statute required that in voting upon the liquor question ballots should be separate from all other ballots, and it made the duty of the county auditor to prepare these ballots and display them in his office three days before the election, and there where the voters had used ballots in cases where city ordinances and other things were submitted at the same time the court rejected them. There is nothing in that contrary to the findings of the committee. The voter was charged with the knowledge of the law as to what kind of ballot he should use. That is true under the Australian ballot in general, and if that ballot is not counted he has no complaint to make. So that case does not interfere. I submit this proposition. I do not believe a case can be cited in the books or in the decisions and proceedings of this House where, under a statute relating to the making of a return in an election case, after the ballot has passed without the hands of the voter, and he has no means of protecting himself and is not charged with any knowledge, that he is held to have cast an illegal ballot on account of some act of the officers. I submit that there is not a case that would sustain a proposition holding that statute directory and throwing those ballots out.

The New York case is probably the strongest that can be found upon that proposition, but in that statute it is directly stated that a ballot with a distinguishing mark of any kind upon it shall not be counted, and, because the ballots in a certain number of precincts were the ballots that were numbered for another precinct, it was held that was a distinguishing mark. In other words, ballots for precinct No. 10 could not be voted in precinct No. 5, because of the prohibitory words of the statute, but Chief Justice Peckham dissented in that case, and I think you will find that the dissenting opinion, right in the face of the statute, has been cited more in controlling election cases than the majority opinion of the court.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Did the committee have proof aliunde of the authenticity of these ballots which the committee thought should be counted?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; that is discussed in the report.

Mr. BURNETT. I have not read the report. It is a fact that the committee had that proof?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes. I shall get to that directly.

Mr. BURNETT. I thought it germane to that question as to the certification by the judges.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is there any provision in the law of Alaska that the canvassing board may go behind the returns as they come in to them?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. There is nothing in the statute on that subject, in my judgment. This Alaska board has very peculiar powers. Of course, you know there are two different views about going behind returns of the election by the canvassing board.

Mr. McKEOWN. Usually they can not.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. They can not, except for one purpose. They are authorized to do it to complete the returns for the purpose of supplying deficiencies in returns, for the purpose of giving effect to the returns.

Mr. McKEOWN. I wanted to know if there is any provision of that kind why they did not go back and get certificates.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If the gentleman would read the hearings——

Mr. McKEOWN. I have read the hearings and the testimony.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The question came up, and according to the contentions made to the committee under the decisions of the court it did not make any difference whether they went back and got them.

Mr. McKEOWN. That was the decision of the court?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; and though the proof might be ever so conclusive, still that vote was nullified and vitiated by the fact that they were not made immediately and then closed with the returns.

Mr. McKEOWN. That decision of the court was before they would have had time to go back and get them?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I would not like to make a statement on that, because it is hard to tell when you would ever go back and get returns from certain portions of Alaska.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman leaves the legal feature would he submit to a question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes. In my view it was the duty of this election board, composed of the governor and these other officials, sitting there with unlimited time, returns then having been coming in for several months, to complete those returns if they could and ascertain the will of the people, but under the decisions of this court and the contentions made to this committee it did not make any difference. You might show there were no ballots within 500 miles of the precinct, and yet you would not be permitted to make that proof and establish your case in court, and that is the main part that the committee could not attempt to do.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I promised to first yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. I will gladly yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. As I understand it, this is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; but I would say that I do not think Mr. POLK ever agreed to our construction of the law as to the directory character of the statute.

Mr. HOWARD. It occurs to me that this is a very serious situation. The sitting Member has drawn $4,500 of mileage, and the committee brings in here, just a few days before the adjournment of the regular session of Congress, a report unseating this sitting Member and seating another Member for just a few days. As I understand it, the courts of Alaska passed upon the legality of this election and decided in favor of the sitting Member. Is that true?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. I would not say that they passed on the legality of this election.

Mr. HOWARD. In other words, it was adjudicated by the judicial machinery of Alaska.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Not the merits of the case.

Mr. HOWARD. How could the court determine that the sitting Member was entitled to his seat unless they had some facts before it on which to act?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Well, now, if the gentleman had read the proceedings there he would have that information.

Mr. HOWARD. But——

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Or had he heard my preliminary statement about it.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, there are some other questions I want to ask. As I understand it, since this contest has been filed, which was filed with the committee—when?

Mr. SULZER. This contest was placed before the committee in March.

Mr. HOWARD. Of what year, this year or last year?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Last year. The gentleman knows it takes a year to count the votes.

Mr. HOWARD. Of course the gentleman means March, 1917.
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; I mean March, 1918.
Mr. HOWARD. I meant 1918. Now, why is it the committee has taken nearly a year to act on this case? What was the trouble?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I wish to say to the gentleman from Georgia I am not going to make any apology for the action of the committee on this case——
Mr. HOWARD. I understand, and I am not making any criticism; I am trying to get the facts.
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Any more than were made for cases of like character. Of course, I think the gentleman is entitled to an explanation, and that is what he is asking for, I understand.
Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Of course, that is not an uncommon occurrence here in contested-election cases.
Mr. HOWARD. I know it.
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The committee has given very unusual consideration to this case. We have had other election cases to pass on, and I suppose the gentleman knows enough about the duties of a Congressman to know that he can not spend all his time investigating and going into these records. As a further explanation I would say that after the committee had once reached a conclusion about this case upon the application of Mr. Sulzer's attorney we reopened the case and reconsidered it.
Mr. HOWARD. Now, they have held another election in Alaska since this contest has been pending when the sitting Member, Sulzer, has been elected again by just about the majority he was elected to the Sixty-fifth Congress, and another contest is on as between the two parties, Wickersham and Sulzer; is not that true?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not know anything about that.
Mr. HOWARD. Now, the committee propose in this report to unseat Sulzer and seat Wickersham for 49 days before the expiration of the last session of this Congress to which he was elected, and then the Government—the taxpayers—pay Sulzer $19,500, as the sitting Member, and they turn around and pay Wickersham $19,500, making it cost the taxpayers on the committee's action practically $40,000.
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I wish to say to the gentleman I would be ashamed to be a Member of this House if I thought it took into consideration the question of dollars and cents in passing upon a judicial question. [Applause on the Republican side.]
Mr. HOWARD. There is more in that than this—I understand some gentlemen on the other side—but there is more in this than dollars and cents, and this thing can be carried on in Alaska——
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I have not any interest in that.
Mr. HOWARD. Indefinitely, and I look upon it with great suspicion, and I will give my reasons when I get a little time directly.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I want to make a statement with respect to what was said by the gentleman from Georgia, and that is that the committee has not taken into consideration anything except to reach a correct conclusion on this case. It has taken its time to consider the case and to make an investigation of the case, and to make a correct report to this House, and I think it would be an act of reflection upon a committee of Congress or a court to inquire if it took into consideration the question of dollars and cents in reaching a correct conclusion in any lawsuit. So I have no apology to make for the action of the committee in this case. The facts are in the record and the report sets them out, I think, correctly.
Mr. HOWARD. Just one other question I would like to go in the record in this connection, if the gentleman will yield. A man named Strong was appointed governor of Alaska?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I would rather the gentleman——
Mr. HOWARD. He took the side of Wickersham, the contestant in this election case, and the administration, after putting into operation all of its machinery and making a most thorough and sifting investigation, unseated Strong as governor of Alaska, giving as the reason his connection with this case. Is not that true?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I understand the governor of Alaska is appointed by the President. [Applause.]
Mr. HOWARD. I understand that is not true, that there is some form of election.
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is not in any way connected with this case.
Mr. HOWARD. I was informed here by some Republican Member.
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana if the people of Alaska elect their governor?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; I just stated it.
Mr. HOWARD. I was informed by one of my Republican friends that such a thing was true.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not know where he got that information.
Mr. HOWARD. I viewed it with a great deal of suspicion, but I thought I would put it in.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was there any charge made by the contestee or by anybody for him that in those precincts named on page 2 of the committee's report, the votes are not given correctly? For example, Wickersham 25, Sulzer 3; in another, Wickersham 10, Sulzer 6; in another, Wickersham 7, Sulzer 3; in another, Wickersham 10, Sulzer 3; in another, Wickersham 13, Sulzer 4; in another, Wickersham 3, Sulzer 1; in another, Wickersham 8, Sulzer 2.
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So, then, it is true, as claimed by the contestant and admitted by the contestee, that the voters in those districts cast a majority, as herein indicated, for Wickersham?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. There has been no question raised as to whether the votes were cast or not.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then, as the House has the sole authority under the Constitution to determine who shall be Members of this body, the question before us is whether we shall disfranchise these voters who admittedly cast a majority of their votes for Wickersham because some of the election officers in that Territory failed to do their sworn duty. That is the question before us, is it not?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The gentleman may construe it that way. It is largely true.
Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.
Mr. WINGO. I have read the report. Am I correct in this conclusion from that report, that the decision in this case turns on a legal proposition?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Not entirely; no. Relative to these votes at these particular precincts we have been discussing, it does.
Mr. WINGO. There are two batches of votes. One is in these precincts where there is irregularity on account of either the ballots used or the certificates. The other is the soldier vote. Are there any other cases of voters?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. There is a question as to Indian votes.
Mr. WINGO. Those are the three?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. But this is the question before the court——
Mr. WINGO. I gather from the gentleman's report, which I have read, that the question the House is going to have to determine is a legal question. There is not a question of fraud; there is not a question of how the voters voted, but a question of whether or not we will permit certain votes to be counted and will determine that by the determination of a legal question?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is largely true.
Mr. WINGO. Is this legal question involved—I could not gather it from the report—the question is whether or not the act of Congress will control out there or whether the act of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. The question was raised, but the committee decided it was not necessary to pass upon it.
Mr. WINGO. I see in the hearings in the Senate committee, in the impeachment charges concerning the Federal judge, that the grounds of that impeachment, or the principal ground, was that he undertook to base his decision upon an act of the Territory of Alaska instead of upon an act of Congress.
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That was not considered by the committee at all, because it raised a constitutional question, and a committee in Congress in passing upon these questions never deals with constitutional questions.
Mr. WINGO. In passing upon this legal question, does the gentleman base his conclusion upon the act of Congress controlling the election out there or the act of the legislature?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. On the act of the territorial legislature.
Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman base his conclusion upon the acts of the Territorial legislature out there?
Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Does the Territorial legislative act determine the legal question that is involved here?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It arises on account of certain provisions in this Territorial act; yes.

Mr. WINGO. Those provisions do not seem to be as strange as the committee's report indicates. There are provisions in different States as to the certificate, the character of ballots used, and what the voter may do. Now, what have the courts of the different States decided on the question of whether you should throw out a box in its entirety? Or will you purge it and undertake to poll each of the voters and ascertain how each one voted? Has the gentleman set out the decisions of the States on that question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That question is not involved here at all.

Mr. WINGO. I take it from the gentleman's own statement that it is involved. It may not be involved if the gentleman decides the single legal proposition, but the House may differ with him on one legal proposition and agree on another. Has the committee furnished the House a decision on this question: If you find the ballots have not been cast in accordance with the law and you want to arrive at the true intent of the voters, have you undertaken to take up and determine whether or not all these ballots were legally cast or that some were and some were not?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is not a question at issue in the case.

Mr. WINGO. From the gentleman's statement in the report I think it is.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I would like to complete my statement.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Louisiana be extended 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is not an issue in the case.

Mr. WINGO. It is to my mind, from the fact that the committee has so reported. The committee has not undertaken to furnish the House the decisions of the court on that feature. Here is the point: Say that the direction with reference to using official ballots is purely directory. All right. Is there no question at all but that each and every one of these ballots was clear and unequivocal?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. That is not involved.

Mr. WINGO. And that the only technicality that is involved was the question of whether or not the ballots had been furnished by the proper authority? Is that the only question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is the only question. The question hinges upon the decision relative to these precincts, the decision of the judge ordering them to be thrown out for failure of that certificate to be placed in there by the judges of election. Now, nobody offered any proof to show that the votes were not cast or that there was not any error in the action of the judge, and the committee did not undertake to consider that question.

Mr. WINGO. It was not considered an issue in the case?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; it was not an issue in the case.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. The committee does not take up any question that the parties themselves did not raise?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. That is the point.

Mr. WINGO. But the House sitting as a court can take up a question, even though neither of the parties does. We are here determining not so much the merits of this single case, but a principle, a ruled action as a basis to determine not only this case, but others of similar character. We want to reach a correct conclusion on the principles involved, regardless of the fact that this is from Alaska or anywhere else.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I hope everybody takes that view.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman has a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. How many Members were present at the meeting of the committee at the time the committee made that report?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It was under consideration twice. This report has been submitted to every member of the committee.

Mr. WINGO. How many Members were present at the time you acted on it?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not recollect; but there was a quorum, and those who were not there at the first meeting were present at the subsequent meeting of the committee.

Mr. WINGO. Were there more than six there?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I say we never acted without a quorum.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman say that all members of the committee approve this?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. There were seven.

Mr. WINGO. I say, does the gentleman say all the members of the committee approve this report?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is my understanding.

Mr. WINGO. I have been informed otherwise by a member of the committee.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I want to ask the gentleman a question in regard to this court that made the finding upon which the claim of Delegate Sulzer is based. Is that a court of final jurisdiction?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It is the United States District Court of Alaska, and then there is a court of appeals.

Mr. GARD. Was the case ever appealed to a higher court?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. The case came to the House of Representatives after the decision was given to Mr. SULZER.

Mr. GARD. By the district court, without appeal to any other court?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Was Mr. Wickersham a party to that suit?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. I have stated that.

Mr. BURNETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. As I understood the answer that the gentleman gave to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], after you had passed upon that question of the certificate being directory or mandatory, then you did not go further and inquire into the legality of the ballots that were claimed to be cast?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No.

Mr. BURNETT. Would not the burden be upon the contestant, who wanted the ballots cast in his favor, to show that these were legal ballots that had been cast by somebody, and did you take into consideraion any such evidence as that?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. Judge Jennings, the court, held that if the statute were directory the certificate should be issued to Mr. Wickersham, and that would have shifted the burden of proof.

Mr. BURNETT. You wanted proof as to who was elected. You wanted a basis upon which to decide who was elected. How can you do that when you have not taken any testimony to show the validity of these very ballots on which it appears to hinge?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If the official ballots were not there, there is no question about it.

Mr. BURNETT. Does not the contestant make the question himself, and is not the burden of proof on him to show that these ballots were cast, and cast for him?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. In canvassing the returns made to this board it was the duty of this board to issue the certificate of election under that law to the man having a majority of those votes. Then the board would have thrown on the man contesting the burden of showing a majority under that return. But there is no question like that involved here.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman ought to be permitted to proceed, so that we can get some idea of this case.

Mr. WINGO. With all due respect to the gentleman from Michigan, that was the object of my question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The questions which the gentleman asked were very interesting.

Mr. WINGO. I may be wrong in the conclusion that I have in mind, but I want to ask the gentleman this question: Was that canvassing board acting in a ministerial capacity?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. You would have to get that from a reading of the statute. It says that the canvassing board——

Mr. WINGO. I have not looked it up lately, but what have the courts decided on that? Is that a ministerial act?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Purely ministerial.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, they have to take what comes to them?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That was the position taken. The law says that they shall canvass the return certificate and issue the certificate to the one having the majority of votes; and they were attempting to do that, and they would have done that but for the order of the court to withhold the certificate from Mr. Wickersham and issue it to Mr. Sulzer.

Mr. WINGO. But it hinges upon the question as to whether the statute was mandatory or not, so that the legal question——

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. We discussed other questions, but that is the only thing involved here.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is sure that the canvassing boards have acted purely in a ministerial capacity?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That was the construction.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Does the gentleman mean that the canvassing board itself took that position, that it was acting in a purely ministerial capacity and not as a judicial body?

Mr. WINGO. The only body that has undertaken to pass upon the judicial question was the Federal judge. The canvassing board construed that they were a ministerial body?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

There was one other precinct that was ordered thrown out where the official ballots were used. I want to call the attention of the House to that. The position has been taken here that it would be wrong for the Congress or a committee of Congress to overrule the decision of the judge in ordering these ballots to be cast out.

Another precinct was known as Vault. At this precinct the official ballots were used. The register and certificate of election that came from the judges of election were not signed. The law provides that a duplicate certificate shall be made, that that duplicate certificate shall be sent to the clerk of the United States court, and that a copy shall be made and sent to the governor of Alaska for the use of this board. In that precinct the certified copy made by the clerk of the district court showed that the certificate was properly signed. This was a return provided for in the law, made by the officer who was the legal custodian of the document. Yet the court ordered that precinct thrown out. Now, I respectfully submit that it is impossible to follow the decision of the judge in a matter like that. I do not believe there is a lawyer in this House or a man in this House who can sanction the action of the judge in throwing out the ballots of a precinct where the statute specifically provides that the certificate shall be made in duplicate, that it shall go to the clerk of the district court, and that he shall immediately make a copy and send it to the canvassing board. That return was made, and it showed that the duplicate sent to the clerk was properly signed. Yet that precinct was ordered thrown out.

Mr. STEVENSON. What was the ground on which the judge ordered it thrown out? Did he assign any reason for it?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. On the ground that it was their duty to consider the certificate coming from the judges of election, and that that one was defective. Yet, in order to provide against that very thing, the statute provided that the clerk of the court should make a copy and send it to the canvassing board, and that copy showed the proper signatures.

Mr. GARD. Why was it that no appeal was taken from the decision of the court?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Of course, I can not answer that question, because as soon as Mr. Sulzer was sworn in the matter was shifted to the House, and a contest started here.

Mr. GARD. There is no evidence to show why an appeal was not taken?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. Mr. Wickersham was not a party to the suit, and I suppose when a man has a choice of tribunals he has a right to choose the tribunal to try his case. Just what reasons actuated him I do not know.

Now, the committee found itself absolutely unable to agree with the court, and I do not believe that any man could read that decision and agree with the action of the court in throwing out the ballots in the Vault precinct.

The question comes up as to whether or not the official ballots were at the various precincts involved in this election. A portion of these precincts were out on Bristol Bay, some 500 or 600 miles from Valdez. The three precincts involved there are Choggiung, Nushagak, and Bonafield. The record plainly showed that there was not a single official ballot received in that section of the Territory, on Bristol Bay. At Naknek, another precinct in that district, they had the official register and tally book. I want you to follow this to see why the committee reached the conclusion that it was not necessary to take any more evidence to find that the official ballots were not there. At Naknek they had the official register and tally book, and they used what are known as party workers' ballots, on which the name of Mr. Sulzer was printed. At that precinct the vote was 9 for Sulzer and none for Wickersham. With the return from that precinct there is a certificate stating that they did not receive the official ballots.

Now, over at Nushagak, in that same district on Bristol Bay, the same election supplies were used. The tickets had Mr. Sulzer's name on them, and opposite that there was a blank, and the voters there wrote the name of Mr. Wickersham in the blank, and at that precinct there were 10 ballots for Mr. Wickersham and 3 for Mr. Sulzer. In that particular precinct the certificate as to the absence of the official ballots was not inclosed; but at the other precinct of Naknek, where they cast the 9 votes solidly for Mr. Sulzer, they used this very same ballot and had this same portion of the election supplies. There in this same division, out on this bay, they had exactly the same election supplies as at the other precinct. At Choggiung, the other precinct on Bristol Bay, they used the same register and tally book, and there the voters made their ballots with a typewriter. At the remaining precinct of Koggiung on Bristol Bay, there was no election held. There was a notice that the voters would appear and vote at one of the other precincts.

Now, the commitee found, from an examination of those returns and those ballots, that in this section of the Territory, in the Bristol Bay district, there was not a single official ballot used. It was the duty of the judges of election to supply the voters with the official ballots if they had them, and I do not think it is reasonable or possible that in all this section of the Territory every voter would have been permitted to use non-official ballots if they had had the official ballots. The same conditions existed at the precincts where they voted for Sulzer as where they voted for Wickersham, and I consider that the facts established by those returns and those circumstances are really just as strong proof of the fact that there were no official ballots there as though some one had inclosed a certificate.

Now, the other two precincts involved are Utica and Deering. While the canvassing board were in session the clerk of the district court notified the canvassing board that he had received a certificate signed by the judges of election, and that the certificate was on its way to the canvassing board. That certificate showed that the form of the ballot used at those two precincts, Utica and Deering, had been telephoned from another precinct where they did have the official ballots. The judge did not wait for this certificate, and the canvassing board did not have it; but upon examining the returns for those two precincts it was seen that at one precinct the ballot was made exactly in the form of the official ballot, containing exactly the same information as that on the official ballot, and it was quite lengthy. Over at Utica the ballots were made with a typewriter, and contained exactly the same information. This telegram stated that they had the information phoned to them, and the certificate was made long before the contest was started. There was no controversy at that time, and when the returns were examined they exactly dovetailed in with the facts set forth in the certificate. So the information in the record was absolutely convincing to the committee that this was a case that the Territorial legislature had in mind when the statute was enacted to give the people at the outlying precincts a right to vote in case the official ballot did not arrive.

It is contended here that it would be a great calamity if Congress should find itself in opposition and overruling the findings of Judge Jennings. I think Judge Jennings contemplated that Congress might do that. I want to read a portion of the opinion of Judge Jennings. He was directing his opinion to the canvassing board, and this will answer a number of questions asked by the gentleman from Alabama. This is a quotation from his opinion:

> Again, the action of the canvassing board neither enfranchises nor disfranchises any voter. It sits merely to determine to whom to issue a certificate of election. This certificate of election is not final. The House of Representatives is the tribunal before which the contest of election comes. In its wisdom it may say, if it chooses, "It is true that the certificate of the judges of election does not state that no official ballots were received at Choggiung, but it is possible—probable, even—that none were received, and that that is the reason the judges allowed these otherwise prohibited ballots to be cast, and by inadvertence or neglect they omitted to say that was the reason; at any rate, we will investigate the matter; we will hear oral testimony; we will consider affidavits or get at the very truth of the matter in some other way."

The judge, I think, anticipated that Congress would investigate to get at the truth of the matter and give a correct decision, because he did no claim to be passing on the merits of the case.

Now, of course, gentlemen, there are other matters in this case upon which, I presume, I can be heard later. I do not want to tire the House, but, as I stated before, the question as to the legality of votes at any precinct is not involved in this case. No such contention was made before the committee,

The question as to these votes in these precincts is whether or not you are going to construe the provisions of the statute to be mandatory or directory.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Does not the contestant claim in his notice of contest that he was elected by a legal vote, and does not that raise the question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; he claims these are legal votes and that they should be counted.

Mr. BURNETT. But no proof was offered to the committee.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I stated that it was entirely satisfactory to the committee that the ballots were not there. I do not think the gentleman from Alabama or anyone else will agree to the action of the court in throwing out the Vault precinct, because, as I have stated, the certificate made by the clerk of the court was there, and the statute says that the certificate may be considered for that purpose. So, if the decision of the committee is correct and the other questions involved in the report are correct at Vault, you may adopt the decision of the judge in throwing out the other precincts and still Mr. Wickersham has a majority. You may eliminate the question of the want of a certificate, but adopt the views of the committee as to the Vault precinct, where the official ballots were used and correct as to their contention, and the case then would be in favor of Wickersham and he would have a majority.

Mr. GARD. Of how much?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Three. We went into that question because I do not believe the House should go on record as penalizing the voters in any locality in Alaska, or anywhere else, where they have furnished the ballots authorized by statute, on account of the willful neglect or even the fraudulent action of officers in making the returns. Congress has never done it and the courts have never done it. I can not give my consent even in this case, much as I regret to do so, and hold in face of the law, what I conceive to be the law and what the committee conceives to be the law, that any such rule ought to be adopted.

Then, if you adopt the decisions of the court at these precincts and the decision of the committee as to the Vault precinct and the other matters in the case, Mr. Wickersham would still have a majority of votes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to get it clear about the Vault precinct. I understand the managers made a certificate of election which was sent to the board of canvassers by the governor and which was signed by them. Is that the fact?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; but they did not sign it.

Mr. STEVENSON. But there was a duplicate filled out by the clerk of court.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. And the law provides that they can use the certified copy in case the other was not there?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; the statute provides for the clerk to make and send a copy.

Mr. STEVENSON. So the committee considered it as though they got none direct from the board of canvassers, but they had got one from the clerk of court upon which they could act.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. I do not know what information the committee had about the Vault precinct, but the information before the court was a telegram to the effect that the clerk of the district court at Fairbanks had received a certificate from the clerk of the election at the Vault precinct bearing the names of the election judges. Now, that statement does not say "signed by the election judges"; it simply says "bearing the names." It is possible that the clerk of that election board made up that statement on his own initiative and sent it in to the clerk of the court at Fairbanks.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I think the gentleman is mistaken. Here are the pleadings filed in the court. It is the answer of the canvassing board to the court:

In the case of the Vault voting precinct, the election judges did not sign the certificate of result form in the back of the election register and tally book, but the canvassing board received from the clerk of the United States District Court for the Fourth Judicial Division, in which said precinct is located, the "certificate of the clerk of election returns," bearing the names of the election judges for said voting precinct, and duly certified by the clerk of the court as a full, true, and correct copy of the original on file in his office.

Mr. SULZER. The statement says, "bearing the names of the judges of election." It does not say that the judges of election signed the certificate.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Of course, a man might go off on an imaginary case.

Mr. SULZER. There is nothing imaginary about that. If the judges did not sign it and send it to the canvassing board, is it to be presumed they signed something sent to the clerk of the court at Fairbanks?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. This is the certificate the law provided for.

Mr. BURNETT. Did you have the certificate before the committee?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I think it is printed in the record.

Mr. BURNETT. Was it introduced before the committee?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It is in a printed record, yes; and it was before the canvassing board, so the canvassing board certified to the governor.

Probably some other members of the committee desire to discuss this matter, and I do not care to take up any further time. [Applause.]

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, the matter now under consideration was given a full and fair hearing by the committee to which it was assigned. The principals themselves made their respective statements to the committee, and one of them was represented by counsel.

Every phase of the matter was fully and ably presented to the committee. It is well to say at the outstart that both sides to the controversy admitted, of record, that no charge of fraud or mistake upon the part of the voters at any of the precincts had or would be made, which will appear by reference to the testimony given before the committee.

In my opinion, this admission greatly reduced the labors of the committee so that the contest was narrowed down to the action and conduct of various court officials, election officers, the decisions of the canvassing board, the law governing elections in Alaska, and the decision of the court upon petition for mandamus.

One of the outstanding features in the hearings before the committee was the total absence of partisanship, and I am pleased to say that the findings of your committee were based upon their conception of the facts and the law, without regard to party affiliations, a course that I hope may be followed hereafter in all contested cases.

The entire proceedings are fully and forcefully presented by the able chairman of the committee in the report which he has filed for your consideration, and I might say that the recommendations offered have the support of the entire committee and therefore there is but little more to be said in support of the reasons and law assigned in support of the conclusions announced by the chairman.

I fully agree with his interpretation of the law governing the case and desire to add that the findings of the committee follow the well-established precedents of the House in cases involving like questions.

However, I want to add a few observations which are very interesting to me and may throw a few sidelights which, in a small measure, may be helpful.

The canvassing board for the Territory of Alaska consisted of the governor, the surveyor general, and the collector of customs. The duty of this board was to canvass the votes as returned for the election held in the Territory of Alaska on November 7, 1916, and we find on page 56 of the report with reference to the voting precinct of Utica, inter alia, the following:

GOVERNOR. We received no certificate. However, I have here a telegram from the clerk of the court from the second judicial division under date of December 18, 1916, reading: "Utica made returns without certificate. Returns to you may have certificate. For reasons unknown, election blanks and ballots failed to reach Utica and Deering. Utica election no doubt legal, but returns probably defective."

Then, on January 11, I received this telegram from the clerk of the court: "Second set election returns Utica precinct, including certificate, register of oaths of judges, and pay roll received this office to-day. All in due form and properly signed."

It will be noticed that the clerk of the court above mentioned makes known the fact that he has the certificate required in his possession.

Quoting further from the record, page 70, wherein it is shown that the canvassing board had concluded to issue the certificate to those having the greater number of votes, before the motion was put, Mr. Grigsby, attorney general, makes the following suggestion:

Mr. GRIGSBY. Before you put the motion, Mr. Chairman, I would like the privilege of notifying those who are acting for Mr. Sulzer that they may take such action as is necessary before a certificate is issued. I would like to ask if the character of this motion, if carried, would be final before proceedings could be taken. There might be proceedings for injunction, enjoining the count of what I consider illegal ballots, and if I could have it intimated to me what the intended act of the board is, I could very shortly notify the board.

The time for the issuing of the certificates to the successful candidates was then fixed at 10 o'clock on the morning of March 2, 1917.

The board met pursuant to adjournment, when the announcement was made that it had been served with an alternative writ of mandamus upon the relation of Charles A. Sulzer.

I merely call your attention to the above part of the record—and ask that you read the entire record of the various meetings of the canvassing board—not to impute inside knowledge to any official, but to show that partisan feeling ran high throughout the contest. It may not be at all strange that bright and early the next morning the following announcement was made by the governor:

The board has been served with an alternative writ of mandamus in the case of the Territory of Alaska on the relation of Charles A. Sulzer.

One of the board made answer thereto, admitting all of the allegations in the petition filed to support the rule, which was issued as a matter of course.

The remaining members of the canvassing board made answer to the rule, claiming, inter alia, that the board was ministerial and without judicial power and that nothing knowingly had been done contrary to the provisions of any law governing elections in Alaska and making known the fact that they are ready at all times to follow the ruling of the court.

Setting aside the fact that it is claimed that other districts than those attacked did not use official ballots and that no certificates accompanied the returns, as required by section 21 of the law governing elections in Alaska, the court very properly considered only those districts directly attacked, concluding that section 21 of the law is mandatory, and absolutely disqualified the voters in the districts named and thus brought about the defeat of the expressed will of the voters. The section referred to is as follows:

That in any precinct where the election has been legally called and no official ballots have been received the voters are permitted to write or print their ballots, but the judges of election shall in this event certify to the facts which prevented the use of the official ballots, which certificate must accompany and be made a part of the election returns.

The whole question must rest upon whether or not the section quoted is mandatory or directory. If mandatory, the decision of the court should be sustained; if directory, it must be set aside.

The jurisdiction of the court was attacked in a supplemental brief filed by John Rustgard, Esq., amicus curiæ, but the reasons were set aside by the court.

It might be well to say that John Rustgard, Esq., appeared at the suggestion of the court, and there is no part of the record that shows he appeared in the interest of Mr. Wickersham, the contestant, but he presented a brief to the court, claiming that the court was without jurisdiction in the premises, and the reasons and decisions supporting his contention are fully set forth.

From Pepper and Lewis Digest of Decisions of Pennsylvania Law, volume 11, column 19488, I quote the following:

Where a person or body is clothed with judicial, deliberative, or discretionary powers, and has exercised those powers according to the discretion, mandamus will not lie to compel a revision or modification of the resulting decision, though in fact it may have been wrong. The court can not control the discretion where it has been exercised in good faith and has not been abused. The party may be ordered by mandamus to proceed to do his duty by deciding and acting according to the best of his judgment, but the court will not direct him in what manner to decide, in case of his refusal to act at all; it may compel him to act or to enter on the duty, but can not compel him to adopt the judgment of the court in preference to his own.

In Black on Interpretations of Laws, page 338, is found the following:

There is no absolute formal test for determining whether a statutory provision is to be considered mandatory or directory. The meaning and intention of the legislature must govern and those are to be ascertained, not only from the phraseology of the provision, but also by considering its nature, its design, and the consequences which would follow from construing it in the one way or the other.

To construe section 21, as above set forth, as mandatory would do injustice to innocent persons, nor would such construction enable those guilty of neglect to gain any advantage, and it is unthinkable that such purpose should be attributed to the Legislature of Alaska or the legislature of any State in the Union. The Supreme Court of the United States has well said:

There are undoubtedly many statutory requisitions intended for the guidance of officers in the conduct of business devolved upon them, which do not limit their power or render its exercise in disregard of the requisitions ineffectual, and by a disregard of which the rights of parties interested can not be injuriously affected.

Provisions of this character are not usually regarded as mandatory unless accompanied by negative words importing that the acts required shall not be done in any other manner or time than that designated.

The citations given by the chairman in his able report show a practical uniformity in the decisions of the courts and the House of Representatives, and I only need to add that in my judgment they are sound in every particular.

It is well settled in Pennsylvania that "may" in a statute is equivalent to "shall" or "must," when the public interests or rights are concerned; but in the case at hand the public is interested only in seeing equal and exact justice done, and are not injured in any sense by the failure or refusal of election officers to add a certificate showing the reason why a certain kind of ballot was not used at an election.

The section of the statute under which the court declared the ballots invalid carried with it no penalties of any kind, and the very last thing that should be done under the circumstances is to make the voters responsible for the misconduct of election officers who are presumed to perform their respective duties under the law.

Owing to the peculiar conditions obtaining in Alaska, its enormous area, its meager transportation facilities, the Legislature of Alaska was not, nor would not be, willing to deprive the voters of their sacred right of voting and having the same officially counted in the returns, and then open wide the door for fraud, and through which misconduct upon the part of the election officials might so easily and would so surely enter.

Under all the conditions governing the election in the Territory of Alaska, in November, 1916, and fully covered by the proceedings in the present case before your committee, I have no hesitation in making the statement that James Wickersham received the greater number of legal ballots cast at said election and is therefore entitled to a seat in the present Congress.

I would like to have the Members of the House, if they find the time, examine the voluminous record furnished to us in this case. I have read the opinion of the court and I have read the proceedings before the canvassing board, and have been struck by a number of sentences in that long opinion of the court. I think it is well to say just here that there was no question raised anywhere that the returns of the canvassing board were not precisely those that were presented to the court. No objection was made before the committee at any time by either contestant or contestee that the number of votes returned from precincts attacked were not exactly as is shown in the record returned here, and this committee, as I understand its province, was not required at any time to make an investigation of the election held in Alaska in 1916. I would say now from my limited knowledge of the powers of the committee, and in the absence of misconduct upon the part of voters, that I would never agree that the people of the United States should be required to expend the enormous amount of money that would be necessary to make an investigation of the election in Alaska in 1916. In my judgment it was the duty of the men who were vitally, personally interested to satisfy this committee whether or not the votes returned were fraudulent. But it is the fact that at no time during the proceedings, either before the court or before this committee, has any person at any time in any manner, directly or indirectly, made any allegations that there was any fraud or misconduct on the part of the voters, and I do not believe the legislature in any State or Territory of the Union would agree to allow election officers to disfranchise men who were admitted to be citizens, who admittedly paid their taxes, and had a perfect right to vote. In this report you will find that there was a number of soldiers who voted. The committee took up that question, and I doubt very much if any attorney in this House would care to say that any soldier by moving his domicile or residence or habitation from one State to another while in the Army of the United States can transfer his residence from one State to another, from Pennsylvania to Ohio or to New York, while in the Army or Navy of the United States. I am glad to know that the law seems to be clear upon that subject, and that no voter is a resident of any State to which he may be forced to go. I can change my residence, of course. I can live in any State in the United States, but if I should be drafted into the Army and be obliged to go from one State to another, I surely can not make my residence in that State, even providing I live there for one year or more, as the case may be. I am sure all of us will recall that nearly every State in the Union provided for the taking of the soldier votes during the present war. It cost the State of Pennsylvania a pretty penny to take the soldier votes during the last election, and I think the statistics will show the cost was exceedingly high; but every soldier, as well as every civilian, has a right to vote at all elections when legally qualified, and I approve of the action of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in making it possible for our brave soldiers to vote. This committee considered everything that was brought before it. It has been intimated here, possibly not as fully as I may have conceived from the language used, that the members of the committee were not in attendance upon all the meetings of the committee. I was present at every meeting of that committee to which my attention was directed, with one exception, and at that time I was absent owing to the death of a relative.

With one exception there was a rather full attendance of the committee at every meeting called and which I attended. My understanding is that one member of the committee is not convinced that section 21, which I have heretofore quoted, is directory, but I am satisfied that, with one exception, the committee has concluded unanimously that the section is not mandatory, at least where it makes no reference to the conduct of the voter and there being no charge of fraud or misconduct upon the part of the voter.

It is clear after the many decisions stated in the report of the chairman that section 21 of the election law of Alaska is directory and not mandatory.

To my way of thinking, section 21 of the Alaska election law is the most remarkable section in any election law of any Territory or State of the Union; it is in a class by itself. It will be noticed that it provides no penalty for its neglect upon the part of election officers, nor does it make any provision concerning the conduct of voters with respect to a certificate, and I am unable to see why the voters may not be disfranchised for any misconduct whatever upon the part of election officers for the same reason.

Surely no law would attempt to punish those who are innocent, who have nothing whatever to do with the failure of election officers to do their sworn duty, and I can not bring myself to believe that the Legislature of Alaska ever intended an act to disfranchise voters because of misconduct of election officers.

For the above reasons, and many others which will be apparent by the examination of the record, I am firmly convinced, without regard to politics in any sense, that the greater number of legal votes in the election held in Alaska in November, 1916, for a Delegate to Congress were cast for James Wickersham, and therefore I have voted to sustain the report. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alaska.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House——

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I do.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a full attendance heard the presentation of the committee report, I feel that it is only fair that a full attendance should hear the presentation of the case of the gentleman from Alaska, and therefore I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 251 Members answered to their names.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM A. JONES.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent that Sunday, the 16th of February, be set aside for memorial exercises on the life, character, and public services of the late Representative WILLIAM A. JONES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] asks unanimous consent that Sunday, February 16, be set aside for memorial services for the late Representative JONES. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, on the request of Mr. RODENBERG, leave of absence was granted indefinitely to the Hon. J. K. KALANIANAOLE, on account of illness.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—WICKERSHAM AGAINST SULZER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alaska.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I fully realize that the House very rarely declines to accept a report of one of its committees, especially when the committee makes a unanimous report, as some Members have understood, but I think that is somewhat of a mistake. It is my understanding that when this contest was originally taken up it was referred to a subcommittee of three and that one member of that subcommittee did not agree with the finding of the committee as to the law and the facts in this case. When the report was voted upon there were only six members of the committee present and of that number five voted for the report and one did not. Now, I think that the Members of the House will fully realize that the conditions have been very unusual during the past two years. Members have been extremely busy with war matters. This is a very voluminous and complicated record, especially to those who are not familiar with conditions in Alaska, and it can easily be presumed that members of the committee have not had an opportunity or had time to go fully into the case. I think that the conditions pertaining in Alaska are so unusual, so different from what they are in most parts of the United States that there is reason for going more fully into this case and discussing it. There are some very important matters involved in this case. If it were but a question as to the personal fortunes of two men, if it were only a question as to whether the contestant or myself should be seated as a Member of this House, I would not be very much disposed to discuss this case so fully and oppose a committee report of this kind, but, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there are very much more important matters involved than that. The sanctity of the Australian ballot is at stake in this decision; the question of whether we are going to have a secret ballot in Alaska or whether we are going to have a ballot that is fraudulent is at stake in this question, and therefore I feel that the Members of the House ought to give the matter careful consideration. I have no criticism to make of the committee. I believe that they have conscientiously performed their duty as they saw it, but nevertheless after carefully reading their report a number of times I am more convinced than ever that I was the legally elected Delegate from Alaska to this Congress. I believe that the committee have overlooked many important points, important facts in this case.

I believe that the committee, those of them who have read the record and have paid particular attention to the case, and particularly the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON], the chairman of the committee, have been misled, that they have been confused by this record. And that is true because the contestant in this case, although he was a lawyer and a man who has sat upon the Federal bench, has filled this record with immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant testimony. I say that the contestant in this case, although he was a lawyer and knew what the legal procedure was, has thrown the ethics of the law to the four winds and has violated the methods of legal procedure in the way that he took the testimony and introduced it in this case. The contestant had 40 days' time to take his evidence in chief, and then I had 40 days' time to take my evidence. Then the contestant had 10 days' time to take evidence in rebuttal. Now, I am not a lawyer; I am a plain business man; but it is my understanding that evidence in rebuttal should be evidence to refute the evidence that I took in this case. But instead of the contestant taking any evidence, or practically any evidence, to refute the evidence which I had put into the record, he consumed practically all of his 10-day period in taking rebuttal testimony by placing in the record evidence in chief, evidence that he should have taken during his time, his proper time, for taking evidence in chief. Now, what is the result? Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, I have had no opportunity to introduce any evidence into this record to refute the evidence that the contestant took during his rebuttal period. What opportunity has been granted me? There was no way by which I could get into the record. My time had closed, and therefore I say the contestant has taken undue advantage; that he knowingly took undue advantage, because he was a lawyer, and he was a Member of this House for eight years and knew thoroughly what the procedure was in these matters.

The contestant has made every conceivable sort of a charge against me and against my friends, against the officials of the United States Government in Alaska, against the entire press of Alaska, against the officers of the Army, and he has introduced no evidence whatever to substantiate any of his charges. He had every opportunity in the world to take legal evidence, to place officials upon the witness stand, to interrogate them, to take their depositions, but he failed to do it, and he simply placed a lot of ex parte material in the record and his own bald, bare statements of these things at a time and in such a manner as precluded absolutely any refutation of them on my part.

Now, I say that this is the situation, which I feel justifies me and justifies the Members of this House in looking into this case to consider the evidence, and by evidence I mean sworn testimony. I do not mean letters written by political henchmen or political friends. I do not mean telegrams. I mean sworn depositions, where the opposing side has an opportunity to interrogate the witnesses and to bring out the facts. And that is the part of the record that I wish to confine myself to and to explain to the membership of this House.

And before proceeding with these details, anticipating that possibly this may be the last day that I will have the honor to sit as a Member of this Congress, and fearing that possibly before I conclude I may overlook it, I wish to take this opportunity to extend my thanks to the membership for the courtesies that have been extended to me during the period that I have been here. I wish to extend my thanks and appreciation to the Members of this Congress for the kindly interest that they have taken and displayed and manifested in the Territory of Alaska. We are a great, large empire, and we need the assistance of Congress; and it has been very gratifying to me that there has been so much interest displayed in Alaska even though during a time when we were involved in the great war. I hope and anticipate that I may have the pleasure of serving in this House at the following Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, one of the principal issues involved in this case is the sanctity of the Australian ballot, the secrecy of the ballot. And in order to arrive at the particular conditions in Alaska, in order to arrive at a proper conclusion as to how this Australian ballot law of ours should be interpreted, I wish to call attention to another very important part of this record, in my judgment possibly the most important part of it, a part that the committee have quite ignored, and that is the question of Indians voting in the Territory. The committee say that the record is indefinite, confusing, and unsatisfactory in regard to the Indian vote, and therefore they take no cognizance of it, or practically none, and make no decision in regard to it. Now, what is the result of that opinion? The result is simply this, that in the Territory of Alaska to-day we have a population of 28,000 Indians, according to the Bureau of Education. We have in that Territory, according to the estimate of the governor, less than 20,000 white people. Now, the committee say this, in practically so many words, that every Indian in Alaska, man or woman—because we have woman suffrage there—is entitled to cast a vote at every election that we hold there. He or she is entitled to cast a vote whether or not he or she is living in tribal relationship, whether or not he or she know anything about the English language, whether they know any candidate who is running or not, and whether they have the slightest conception or not of what the election is for. The committee report says in black and white, in so many words, "All you Indians in Alaska, regardless of your qualifications, regardless of what you may know, regardless of whether you have severed your tribal relationship or not, as required by the United States statutes, can go into the election booth, and you can void a ballot that is cast by the governor of Alaska or any of its most intelligent citizens."

What is the result if that is the law? What are we going to do in our future elections in Alaska? Are we going to have to submit to political henchmen who fraudulently vote these Indians by wholesale, regardless of what the facts may be, and disfranchise practically all the white people of Alaska? The chairman of the committee and the committee, in its report, have been very solicitous about disfranchising voters. That has been the principal bone of contention in their consideration of this case. That is the reason why they have hesitated to declare our Australian ballot law as mandatory. Why? Because they said that that would disfranchise some voters. I propose to show you, gentlemen, just the kind of voter it was that the committee claimed the court of Alaska, which knows the conditions there, disfranchised. And I want to do it by quoting from the record. I do not want to make a single statement that is not here in legal evidence, taken in a legal manner, and properly and under the regular procedure, because I took no evidence except in that way. I make this charge, that in the precincts of Afognak and Seldovia, which I locate right here in this southwestern portion of Alaska [pointing to map], very close to these Bristol Bay precincts, which the chairman has discussed quite fully—I make this charge, that practically nine-tenths of the voters in those precincts were Indians, living in tribal relationship; that they were living there at the time of this election the same as they had lived there 50 years or more ago; that they knew absolutely nothing about what they were doing; and that as a matter of fact they did not vote themselves, but that they were voted by the political henchmen of the contestant, and they were voted for him. In those two precincts the contestant received 100 votes and I received 28. In those two precincts the record shows that there were not to exceed 28 white people.

Now, I say that those Indians were not qualified. They were not qualified because they were living in tribal relationships.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. You say there were 20,000 white people in Alaska and 25,000 Indians?

Mr. SULZER. Twenty-eight thousand Indians.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How many tribes are there, and do they speak the English language?

Mr. SULZER. Well, there are a great many different tribes, a different tribe in almost every locality, and they have their tribal languages.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Do you mean to say there are only 20,000 white people in the whole Territory of Alaska?

Mr. SULZER. That is all we have there at the present time, according to the very best estimates.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Then there are more Indian voters than there are white voters?

Mr. SULZER. I do not think so, because I think that the vast majority of these Indians are not legal voters. But the report of the committee practically makes them voters, and I think that that is a very important matter to be considered.

These Indians are living in tribal relationship and under the United States laws. Under United States statutes, because we have no Territorial law upon the subject, any Indian, in order to become a citizen of the United States, must sever his tribal relationship and adopt the habits of civilized life. Manifestly, if they have not done that, they are not citizens. The committee agree that that is the law, and I do not think that that proposition will be seriously doubted.

Now, let us see if these people are living in tribal relationships or not. We knew or we believed they were, and so we took testimony in these precincts. We placed the chief of the tribe on the witness stand. I want to read to you his testimony. This occurred at Afognak:

TESTIMONY BY GREGORI YAKANAK.

Cecil R. King, first duly sworn as interpreter, and the witnesses were thereupon interrogated through said interpreter.

Direct examination by Mr. DONOHOE:

Q. State your name.—A. Gregori Yakanak.
Q. Where do you live?—A. At Afognak.
Q. What part of town do you live in?—A. In the Aleut village.
Q. Are you the chief of the Aleut village of Afognak?—A. Yes, sir; I am.
Q. Did you vote at the election held at Afognak on the 7th day of November, 1916, at which there was a Delegate to Congress voted for?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Can you read or write the English language?—A. No.
Q. Can you read or write the Russian language?—A. No.
Q. Can you speak the Russian language?—A. No.

Q. Can you speak the English language?—A. No.
Q. The only language you do speak and understand is the Aleut language, is it not?—A. That is all.

Now, the Aleut language is like nearly all the tribal languages of Alaska. It is not a recorded language; it is not a written language. There is no way in which you can write it. It is a guttural language, and it is very nearly impossible for anyone who has arrived at maturity to learn a language of that sort. It must be learned from childhood. That is the only language that this man knew anything about. It was the only language that he could speak or understand. I read:

Q. Whom did you vote for——

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SULZER. Very well.

Mr. SHERWOOD. You have a Territorial legislature?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How many Indians have you in that Territorial legislature?

Mr. SULZER. Absolutely none. I read:

Q. Whom did you vote for on the 7th day of November, 1916, at which a Delegate to Congress was elected?—A. I don't know; I have forgotten.
Q. What did you do when you came to the place where they were holding the election?—A. I had somebody to write it for me and I then put it in the box.
Q. Did you tell any person who wrote it for you who you wanted to vote for for Delegate to Congress?—A. I have forgotten.
Q. Did John Taushivak write your ballot for you?—A. I have forgotten.
Q. Did you tell the person who wrote on your ballot who you wanted to vote for for Delegate?—A. I have forgotten whose name I told him to put on the ballot.
Q. Who told you to come up to the place where they were holding the election and vote?—A. No one. Everybody came up, and I came along.
Q. Did Mr. Petellin fix your ballot for you which you put in the box?—A. I don't know, but I think not.
Q. Do you know any person that you voted for at that election?—A. I do not.

Now, there were a great many other candidates running for offices at this election besides the candidates for Delegate to Congress. There was an attorney general to be elected. There were members of the senate and members of the house of the Territorial legislature. There were road commissioners. There was the question whether the Territory of Alaska should be wet or dry to be voted on. There was the question of whether the Territory of Alaska should have an eight-hour law or otherwise, and various other matters. I read:

Q. Do you know any person you voted for at that election?—A. I do not.
Q. For whom did you vote for attorney general?—A. The interpreter says he can not interpret this in the Aleut language.

Observe that the interpreter says that he can not interpret this in the Aleut language. I read further:

Q. For whom did you vote for senator?—A. The interpreter says he can not interpret this in the Aleut language.

Now, those are the kind of people that the committee are so solicitous about disfranchising. Those are the kind of people that men who wish to indulge in election frauds do not want to have to use an official ballot that is numbered in duplicate and that must be used according to law in a specified manner, that must be obtained from the election judges, when one number is taken off and the voter directed to go immediately to the booth and prepare his ballot and bring it back and hand it to the election judges.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does the ballot law passed by your legislature require any educational qualifications for an elector?

Mr. SULZER. Only the educational qualifications which will enable him intelligently to use the ballot. That is all. Now, when he gets into that booth he must go in there alone. He must mark that ballot. How can a man do it if it is impossible even to interpret the words describing the title of the candidate into his language, the only language he knows anything about? How is it possible for that man to cast a legal vote? When we pass a law in order that we may have a secret ballot and clean and pure elections, is it any crime if incidentally we disfranchise a man of that kind? Is he of more importance than all the other intelligent voters of the Territory of Alaska?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is it your claim that all the illiterate voters voted for the contestant and all the others for the contestee?

Mr. SULZER. I will say to the gentleman from New York that in this record it appears that everyone who was placed upon the witness stand, where it was determined how he voted, swore that he voted for the contestant. The total vote of these two precincts shows that the voters voted largely for the contestant.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Did the gentleman, in making his canvass for the position of Delegate from Alaska, solicit the votes of those illiterates?

Mr. SULZER. I did not. [Applause.]

Mr. CARAWAY. They naturally voted for the other party, did they not? [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I want to tell you a few things that happened in these precincts at some previous elections. I want to show why it became necessary for us to do something to purify our elections in Alaska. I want to show you why we adopted the Australian ballot system. In the election at Afognak some years previous to the election that we are considering, the election judges voted scores of Indians who were not within miles of the precinct at all on election day. The election judges were convicted of that offense, and it is in the record. They voted them without their being present at all. It was not a question of using official ballots, but they voted people who were miles away from that precinct on that election day.

What happened at the precinct of Seldovia in the election of 1914, when the contestant in this case received every single vote in that precinct and his opponent received not one vote? There were something like 100 votes cast in that precinct at that election. What happened there? Why, this is what happened. During the dinner hour, when two of the judges went to dinner, the third judge opened the ballot box, took out all the ballots that were cast for the opponent of the contestant, and replaced them with ballots for the contestant; and when the election judges counted the votes of that precinct every one was for the contestant. It was unanimous. [Laughter.] Now, those are the kind of elections that we have been having in Alaska. That is the sort of thing that those who are in favor of decent, clean elections have been trying to overcome. That is the reason why we passed this Australian ballot law. I was a member of the legislature that passed that law. I was a member of the senate, and I went there knowing that my constituency and the constituency of practically every other member of that legislature insisted that something be done to stop these fraudulent practices which were going on almost wholesale in these out-of-the-way precincts.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Is what the gentleman is now stating a matter of public record?

Mr. SULZER. The matter that occurred in Afognak is a matter of official record, in this record.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I do not question the gentleman's statement at all, but will he incorporate that in his speech?

Mr. SULZER. The statement as to what happened at Afognak is found in the testimony of the watcher of the contestant, Mr. Ernest Stricker, who testifies at considerable length in this record.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. There is no controversy about the truthfulness of that statement, is there?

Mr. SULZER. I do not think so. In regard to what happened at Seldovia, I will say that that is not in the record, and there is no official record of it, but it is a matter of common knowledge in Alaska. The gentleman who performed this feat boasted about it at various times in the Territory, and it is a matter of common knowledge in that section.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, you can readily understand that where there is no official ballot, where any kind of a ballot can be used, where you can write a ballot on a shingle or on a deerskin, outside of the polls, and make it legal, all sorts of frauds can be perpetrated. There is no question about that. I think it will be readily admitted that that is the reason why the Australian ballot law has been universally adopted. It can be readily understood that in these remote precincts in Alaska, where there are possibly one or two white men running a little store, or doing something else, and the balance are helpless, illiterate natives, any sort of an illegal, fraudulent practice can be pursued unless there are some safeguards thrown around the election and unless there is an election law that will give some protection to the legitimate, legal voters of the Territory. That is exactly the reason why we passed this law, and that is precisely the reason why I am so sincerely and intensely interested and concerned in upholding it. I am very much more concerned about that, gentlemen of the House, than I am about serving here for two months longer.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Under the law of your territory, are Indians living in tribal relations entitled to vote?

Mr. SULZER. No, sir.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Was there any evidence introduced by the contestant undertaking to show who were the beneficiaries of any of these votes?

Mr. SULZER. No, sir.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. How about the 28 Indians residing on the Hydaburg Reservation who voted at Sulzer?

Mr. SULZER. I will say that there was not an Indian voted at Sulzer. I will say to the gentleman that the contestant has not introduced a single bit of evidence to show that an Indian voted at Sulzer. He made a lot of allegations and introduced some evidence.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Does the gentleman know the voters at Sulzer?

Mr. SULZER. I do know them all. I will say that that is the very thing I endeavored to explain at the beginning of my remarks—that instead of the contestant taking any evidence at Afognak or Seldovia during his period of rebuttal, instead of putting evidence into the record to refute the statement that the Indians were living in tribal relations and not qualified, what does he do? He takes the time for rebuttal and makes allegations and introduces one witness about voting at Sulzer, and has not proven a single thing by it. He did it under an illegal procedure, because he gave me no opportunity whatever to introduce any evidence showing that there was not an Indian that voted at Sulzer. I could have done it; I could go to the United States Bureau of Education in the city of Washington; I could go to the Department of Commerce in the city of Washington and put the officials of those departments on the witness stand and prove that every one of those people who voted at Sulzer was a citizen of the United States and not an Indian, because the law of the United States says what an Indian is in Alaska. It says that a citizen is one who has severed his tribal relations and adopted the habits of civilized life.

That is the case of every man who voted at Sulzer. I could have proved it conclusively if the contestant had given me any opportunity to do so, but he gave me no opportunity to introduce any evidence to prove it. He subpœnaed five witnesses in the city of Juneau, and the first one was the Rev. David Waggoner, and when he put him on the stand the testimony that he elicited from the Rev. David Waggoner was so unsatisfactory to him that he did not interrogate another one of those five witnesses that had been subpœnaed. That is the record, and I will prove it before I get through with this case if I have the time.

I want to say that the contestant made a trip from Seattle to Craig, Alaska, where I had given notice that I was going to take testimony. On that trip he passed through the town of Sulzer. On that trip he was entertained at the home of the contestee in this case. He spent several days at that place. He was taken in the launch of the contestee in this case a distance of 60 miles to Craig and return, and he passed the village of Hydaburg on both occasions. He learned all the ins and outs of the conditions existing in that section of Alaska.

Now, why did he not take some testimony? Why did he not put some witnesses on the stand to prove that any Indians who had not severed tribal relations voted at Sulzer, if there was a possibility or chance to do it. No; he absolutely ignored the whole thing, and then had one of his attorneys in Juneau call some witnesses, endeavoring to prove it during his rebuttal time.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. How did the Indians vote at St. Michael No. 1?

Mr. SULZER. I do not know that there are any Indians there.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. How far is St. Michael No. 1 from St. Michael No. 2?

Mr. SULZER. About 60 miles.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Does the gentleman know that part of the country?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; I spent three weeks at St. Michael in my campaign, because I could not get a boat up the river.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. The gentleman does not know that there are any Indians in St. Michael No. 1?

Mr. SULZER. No, sir. Now, the contestant endeavored to befuddle and confuse this committee. I took testimony to show that Indians voted in St. Michael No. 2, and he has attempted to befuddle and confuse the committee by making a charge that Indians voted in St. Michael No. 1. He has endeavored to leave the impression that St. Michael No. 1 and St. Michael No. 2 were precincts of the same town, as anyone ordinarily would presume who did not know the facts and did not know the difference. But there is a wide difference. He took an unfair advantage of the members of the committee when he did that. There is no connection between St. Michael No. 1 and St. Michael No. 2. St. Michael No. 1 is the town of St. Michael, near the mouth of the Yukon River, the headquarters of vessels operating on the Yukon River.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Is it not a long ways from the mouth of the Yukon?

Mr. SULZER. I will show you gentlemen on the map. Vessels have to come out a little way from the mouth and pass through Norton Sound.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. How far from the Yukon River is it—100 miles?

Mr. SULZER. No; I do not think so.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Eighty miles?

Mr. SULZER. No; about 60 miles. St. Michael is an old-established point in Alaska. It is the headquarters for commercial companies operating on the Yukon River.

It has large stores, and all of the vessels that ply on that river start from St. Michael, and they go around Norton Sound, it is true, and enter the river, because it is impossible to build a town at the mouth of the river—that is all. I do not know that there are any Indians at St. Michael. Certainly I do not know that any voted there. What is the truth about St. Michael No. 2? St. Michael No. 2 is the Indian village of Unalakleet. It is not St. Michael at all. It has no relation with St. Michael. Here is St. Michael on the map and here is Unalakleet—about 50 miles farther up the bay from it. There are scarcely any but Indians at Unalakleet, and because the commissioner happened to designate Unalakleet precinct as St. Michael No. 2 the contestant endeavors to have the committee understand that the same conditions exist in St. Michael No. 1 as exist in St. Michael No. 2, and he simply made charges in his brief against St. Michael No. 1 because he wanted to take some unfair advantage. That is exactly what the situation is.

Mr. Speaker, let me read a little more of this record. I only read you the testimony of Chief Gregori Yakanak, chief of the Aleuts. I think that fact in itself proves that these Indians were living in tribal relations, because if they were not they would not have a chief, and when we put the chief on the stand and he swears that he is the chief, that proves it conclusively. But let me read a little more. I want to read from the testimony of John Taushwak, on page 272. John Taushwak was one of these Indians who has progressed a little beyond the others and who had a little more intelligence than they had. He was the acting henchman of the contestant in this particular election to round up the Indians and vote them. This is the testimony found on page 272 of the official record:

TESTIMONY OF JOHN TAUSHWAK.

Q. State your name.—A. John Taushwak.
Q. Where do you live?—A. Afognak.
Q. Whereabouts in Afognak?—A. In the Aleut village.
Q. Did you vote at the election held November 7, 1916, at which said election a Delegate to Congress was voted for?—A. I did.
Q. For whom did you vote for Delegate to Congress?—A. I voted for Wickersham.
Q. You helped seven or eight?—A. Yes; they could not read.

Now, John Taushwak was not a judge of election at Afognak. He was not an official of any kind, he swears that he voted for Mr. Wickersham, and the record abundantly shows that he was the man who was looking after the contestant's interests among these helpless Indians. He swears on the witness stand that he helped seven or eight of these Indians to vote. I say that beyond the fact that these Indians were living in tribal relationship, and therefore not entitled to vote, that they were voted fraudulently, because others went into the election booths and prepared their ballots, and they did not do it at all, and those ballots are absolutely fraudulent. Still the committee say there has been no charges of fraud in this case.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. The gentleman says that they were fraudulent votes. Does the gentleman make any specific charge in his answer as to wherein they are fraudulent?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. What part of the answer?

Mr. SULZER. It is in the answer.

Mr. RUCKER. Let him read the answer.

Mr. SULZER. Yes; the gentleman will have to read the answer; I could not place my hand on that at this moment. But there is no question about that. The committee say there have been no charges of fraud in this election. The committee say that there has not been any evidence of fraud produced. Mr. Speaker and Members of this House, we certainly made allegations of fraud in these precincts. That was our particular answer. We certainly took testimony—sworn testimony, depositions. There are 133 pages, one-third of this record, which consist of depositions of Indians—bright as day, no contradiction about it at all—that show conclusively there was fraud practiced in these precincts.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. What are the names of the two precincts that the gentleman last referred to, where there were one hundred and some odd Indian votes and 28 white votes?

Mr. SULZER. Afognak and Seldovia.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman recollect the number of votes cast in those two precincts?

Mr. SULZER. One hundred votes cast for the contestant and 28 votes for the contestee.

Mr. RAKER. How many white men voted at that election? They say you took depositions.

Mr. SULZER. It is impossible for me to say. All I can say is that the sworn testimony shows that there were not to exceed 15 white people on Afognak Island at the time of this election—the contestant's own watcher at the polls—and he swears that he was appointed as a watcher for the contestant and swears that there were not to exceed 15 white people on this whole island.

Mr. RAKER. Is it the gentleman's contention that the Indian voters there voted, or that the people who voted as Indians belonged to the Indian tribe and were still under tribal relations?

Mr. SULZER. Absolutely.

Mr. RAKER. And had not been released and were not living as white people?

Mr. SULZER. They had not.

Mr. RAKER. Does the record show approximately the number of Indians thus situated that voted at those two election precincts?

Mr. SULZER. I think it does. I think the record shows it quite clearly.

Mr. RAKER. And about what is the estimate of Indians thus situated who voted as compared with the white people who voted?

Mr. SULZER. I think it is about 100 to 28.

Mr. RAKER. One other question and then I am through. What was the final disposition of the committee as to those two precincts?

Mr. SULZER. The committee said that while there undoubtedly had been some illegal votes cast, still the evidence was so indefinite, so confusing, and so unsatisfactory that they could arrive at no conclusion about it, and simply ignored it.

Mr. RAKER. What does that ignoring mean?

Mr. SULZER. That they came to no decision about it at all, and they let those votes stand, and I interpret that to mean that they think those votes were all right.

Mr. RAKER. They must have acted affirmatively or negatively. They accepted the vote in those precincts?

Mr. SULZER. They accepted it, certainly. I will read from the report of the committee to show the gentleman. On page 15 of the committee's report, about the fourth line from the top, this is what they say:

> The evidence fails to disclose any intention or attempt to commit fraud at either of the precincts in question and where the Indians voted.

That is what the committee say, that the evidence fails to disclose any intention to commit fraud. I want to show, by reading some of this record, there was a very decided intention. I think the testimony of John Taushwak shows that he voted seven or eight Indians instead of their voting for themselves, and is manifestly fraud on its face, yet the committee say they can not find any evidence of attempt to commit fraud. The committee further says:

> The election officers have particular knowledge of the conditions and the people in the localities surrounding precincts where they reside, and it is their duty to know that each voter is duly qualified before permitting him to deposit a ballot. These officers are presumed to have performed this duty.

In other words, the committee ignored absolutely the sworn depositions which we placed in the record at great trouble, difficulty, and expense, and they simply base their action on the assumption that election officers would not fail to perform their duty.

Mr. RAKER. Both parties appeared at those two election precincts named with witnesses before a notary when the depositions were taken?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. Now, approximately how many witnesses testified in those two precincts when the testimony was taken before a notary?

Mr. SULZER. I think there were about 20. There are 133 pages of the record. I did not count them up so as to know how many witnesses there were, but I think there were about 20 persons placed upon the witness stand whose depositions were taken very fully, some of the depositions consisting of four or five pages of the record.

Mr. RAKER. That is set out in the record; but, in the gentleman's recollection, what is the epitome of the testimony of those witnesses as to whether or not those Indians were living in tribal relations and therefore not qualified to vote, or had abandoned their tribal relations and were living a civilized life?

Mr. SULZER. The testimony is absolutely conclusive that they were living in tribal relationship.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I will.

Mr. DALLINGER. I would like to ask the Delegate from Alaska who appoints election officers at those precincts of which he speaks.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, I know the contestant has made all sorts of charges against me; that I was in control of all the election machinery in Alaska, that I control the court, and that the election officials were all against him, and all sorts of rubbish of that kind. I know he has filled the record with that sort of stuff. I know he has told you that the canvassing board consisted of three Democrats who were appointed by the President, that the judges were all appointed by the President, and they in turn appointed all the commissioners; that they in turn appointed the election judges, and so forth. He has endeavored to convince you that he was not given a fair deal in the selection. He has not put any evidence whatever in the record to prove anything. He had the opportunity to take the testimony of every official in Alaska that he wanted to take, and he did not take any, and he did not make any attempt to put any evidence or depositions in the record, but simply endeavored to make his proof by a bald statement. What is the truth about the matter? The truth about the matter is this, that as far as the canvassing board was concerned they were ostensibly Democrats. They were appointed by the President of the United States, but they were not friendly to me. Two of them were not, one of them was, or so held, the other two were antagonistic, unfriendly, and opposed to me, and they were friendly to the contestant. And, moreover, the chairman of that canvassing board—the man whom the contestant says endeavored to give him the certificate—was an illegal voter himself in this very election. He cast an illegal vote and then he sat as chairman of this canvassing board to decide on illegal votes and decide on our election laws and say whether those votes coming before him were legal or not, and he himself was an illegal voter, and he knew he was an illegal voter. Why was he an illegal voter? Why, because he was not a citizen of the United States. That is the sort of a man who was at the head of this canvassing board holding the high office of governor of the Territory of Alaska for nearly five years when all the time he knew it was totally illegal, that he was not a citizen——

Mr. DALLINGER. May I ask who it was who appointed this man?

Mr. SULZER. I said that the President appointed him. I will say further that the Democrats of Alaska recommended him and he obtained his appointment upon their recommendation, but that does not prove anything. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The Democrats can make mistakes as well as anybody else and they made a bad mistake in that instance. They acted in perfectly good faith but they did not know the sort of man he was and nobody else did until the facts were later developed on investigation by the Interior Department. But that sort of man was passing judgment on whether I should have a certificate to this House or not. Now, when you come to the election judges there is an entirely different condition existing there from what the contestant has endeavored to make the committee believe existed. In the first place in all incorporated municipalities of Alaska the commissioners have absolutely nothing to do with elections——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alaska be permitted to proceed until he concludes his statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alaska be permitted to conclude his statement. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULZER. Now, the election judges——

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, was that request granted? I was going to suggest if it would not be well to limit the time and not have it unlimited. But, however, give the gentleman reasonable time.

Mr. SULZER. I will conclude as quickly as I can, I will say to the gentleman.

The election judges in these municipalities are appointed by the town councils, and they are not partisan at all, and the commissioners have absolutely nothing to do with it.

I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER]. He interrupted me and wanted this explanation, and I am endeavoring to give him the facts. As far as the commissioners outside of the municipalities are concerned, they are very seldom changed. Many of them have been there for years. They are the only persons available in many of these small places, and the only persons equipped to act and serve as commissioners; and it is not a partisan question at all. The record abundantly shows in a great many instances the officials were the friends of the contestant rather than friends of mine.

Now, let me read a little further from this interesting record. I want to read you from the testimony of Mr. Mafrey Agick, on page 273 of the record. Cecil R. King was first duly sworn as an interpreter, and the witness was thereupon interrogated through said interpreter.

The testimony reads:

Q. State your name.—A. Mafrey Agick.
Q. Where do you live?—A. Afognak.
Q. Do you live in the Aleut village of Afognak?—A. I do.
Q. Did you vote in Afognak at the election held there on the 7th day of November, 1916?—A. Yes.
Q. Whom did you vote for for Delegate to Congress from Alaska?

And the answer is.

He voted for the new man.

Now, I want to call your attention to another little deception which the contestant has practiced in this case. In his printed brief he set forth how these Indians voted and he showed that most of them voted for him. Some of them said they did not know, but the record shows that those who did not know did not vote; that someone else voted for them; and the record shows conclusively who those people voted for. But he says one of these Indians voted for me, and that it was this Mafrey Agick. He endeavors to have the committee believe that one of these Indians in Afognak voted for me, and he so states it in his brief. I want to show you just how truthful he is about that. Here is the testimony of Mafrey Agick:

Q. Who did you vote for for Delegate to Congress from Alaska?—A. He voted for the new man.

The contestant put that in his brief. He says "new man" and follows it with "Sulzer," so the impression is that the evidence shows that this man voted for me. Let us read a little further in the record:

Q. Who took him to the polls?—A. He says everybody went to the polls alone.
Q. Who marked your ballot?—A. My relative, John Taushwak.

He says "my relative, John Taushwak," marked his ballot.

Now, John Taushwak, as we have seen on the opposite page, voted for Wickersham, and the record abundantly proves he was Wickersham's henchman there and was getting all these Indians to vote for him.

Q. Who marked your ballot?—A. My relative, John Taushwak.

Do you believe this relative, this worker for Wickersham, John Taushwak, was so good as to vote for me? No; he did not.

What is the next question? It is:

Q. How do you know you voted for the new man?—A. The people said so.

That is how he knew. The people said so.

Q. As a matter of fact, don't you know you don't know for whom you voted?

Now, here is the answer:

A. I don't know for whom I voted.

Of course he did not know for whom he voted. None of them knew for whom they voted, outside of John Taushwak. He is the only one that knew anything at all about the election there.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. Are the Indians in Alaska under the supervision of the Department of the Interior?

Mr. SULZER. No, sir.

Mr. HASTINGS. It has nothing to do with them?

Mr. SULZER. Except the Department of the Interior maintains some schools for them.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say that in the United States proper the decisions of all the courts are to the effect that the question of tribal relations is a political question and only for the department to determine. That is the reason I asked the question. If they were under the Interior Department there it was a question of their tribal relations being recognized or not recognized by the Interior Department. You say they are not under the Interior Department?

Mr. SULZER. The Indians there have been treated somewhat differently than the Indians in the States. They are not wards of the Government, and the only thing the Government has done for them is to maintain schools in some of these places and endeavor to give the children an education. It has on other occasions extended relief in cases of sickness and distress, and to prevent or control epidemics and things of that sort, but beyond that the United States Government has never done anything for the Indians in Alaska.

Now, the test as to whether they are citizens or not comes under the interpretation of the law as to whether they have severed their tribal relationship. If they have not, then they are not citizens.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield? I wanted to ask a question.

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I have read every word of this testimony about the Indians, and do I understand the gentleman to state that John Taushwak stated that he voted the ticket that his people referred to in his testimony?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Now, his testimony, if you read the cross-examination, stated that each one of those men fixed his own ticket. Now, I read this testimony very carefully to find out about these Indians, because I was very much impressed with the charges against places where Indians voted in the Territory. I think it would have been best if none of them had voted.

If I had the authority or the opportunity to make a choice, I think it would be best to take the opinion of the one who voted. But I was unable to find, in reading the testimony, where they did not mark their tickets. Many of them, I think, had been pasted on the outside. They got their tickets from the commissioners. John Taushwak states that he did not fix these tickets. He states that in his cross-examination. I wanted to say that in the interest of correctly informing the House.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the witness himself says he had it fixed for him, why not take his word for it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If they could not read or write, how could they fix their tickets?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. They could not. I have read this testimony carefully to find what kind of a system they used, and I do not think it is in the testimony of this man that he marked the tickets.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. It seems to me that the gentleman read from the testimony of this man who voted for the new man, and that man said John Taushwak made out his ticket for him.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. My question was whether Taushwak marked the ticket for him.

Mr. HARDY. No. He said this other witness said John Taushwak made out the tickets for them.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Louisiana that in the direct testimony of John Taushwak he swears that he helped seven or eight. Take the testimony of Mafrey Agick. He does not know whom he voted for, but he swears that Taushwak marked his ballot. I know that the contestant had a very astute lawyer at the hearing, and this lawyer endeavored to try out these rather helpless witnesses in the attempt to disprove the testimony that we had taken.

But those are mere technicalities. The record is clear and conclusive and abundantly shows that all of these Indians are living in tribal relationship. And that is the test. They are not qualified voters, and those who used them knew they were not qualified. Moreover, I think the record shows conclusively that they were fraudulently voted, and I think that if any fair-minded person will thoroughly consider this record, he will say that these two precincts were fraudulent and that they should be thrown out.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. At how many precincts did the Indians vote? At more than the two precints named?

Mr. SULZER. As far as the record discloses, there are only three that we have in the record.

Mr. HASTINGS. About how many Indians voted at the three precincts?

Mr. SULZER. Well, there were somewhere around 175, I should think. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon; I will have to stand corrected on that, because the record shows conclusively that in these precincts where these official ballots were not used, where they were thrown out by the court, they were largely Indians of this same type and character.

I am going to show that in a little while. That is the reason why I am elaborating somewhat on this Indian vote, in order to show the Members of this House that the conditions existing in Afognak and Seldovia were practically the same conditions that existed in these other precincts, where they not only went into the booths and marked the ballot, where they used the official ballot, but where they went still further, because they were a little more isolated and they thought they could get away with it, and undoubtedly they threw away the official ballots altogether, because they were a nuisance to them.

Mr. HASTINGS. Do the Indians understand the English language?

Mr. SULZER. Some of them understand a little about it.

Mr. HASTINGS. What percentage of those who voted speak or understand the English language?

Mr. SULZER. I think very few of them. I will develop that by reading a little more of the record.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I want to understand if this board first denied you the election certificate, and then the court, upon passing on the matter, taking the testimony and going into it fully, awarded a certificate favorable to you?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; that is substantially correct.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. What court was it?

Mr. SULZER. The United States district court. I will explain it fully to the gentleman. What happened was precisely this: The canvassing board, consisting of the governor, the surveyor general, and the collector of customs of Alaska, met and considered these facts. They had a great many questions coming up in regard to the legality and illegality of various votes. As a final proposition, they eventually submitted all these questions to the attorney general of Alaska, and they asked his written legal opinion on 22 different questions.

The attorney general considered those questions in two separate opinions. In the first opinion he answered 19 questions regarding various irregularities in the returns, and said that in all these cases the ballots should be counted. In the other opinion he considered the other three questions, which were in regard to this official Australian ballot, and he stated that five precincts must be rejected, because the official ballots were dispensed with without any explanation, and because the law in this regard was mandatory.

The chairman of the committee in his report has conveyed just the opposite impression. He quotes a conversation that was had between the canvassing board and the attorney general on the 20th day of January, 1917. The canvassing board did not meet until the 19th of January. This conversation took place on the next day, and it was a mere conversation. They were just talking over the matter in general terms, and the attorney general was asked whether these ballots should be counted or not, and he did not give a decisive opinion about it. He was asked whether the fact that the official ballots were not used was not prima facie evidence that they were not there, and he said, "Well, the chances are that that might be so." The chairman of the committee has thus conveyed the impression that the attorney general advised the canvassing board that these precincts should be counted, but the facts are that subsequently, nearly a month later, after a consideration of this case for weeks, the attorney general wrote an opinion—a very able one, in my opinion—and it is in accordance with the law, stating conclusively that this law is mandatory.

Now, after the canvassing board had received that opinion from the attorney general—and he was the legal adviser of the board—and after they had followed his advice in every other instance, they refused to follow him in this instance. Why? Because if they followed him the certificate would issue to me, and if they did not follow him the certificate would issue to the contestant. When that happened, my friends said, "Sulzer, you are being taken advantage of. Moreover, the Australian ballot act that you did so much to get through the legislature will be practically destroyed, and we say you ought to fight this case and you ought to go to court with it." I did so, and the court considered the matter for weeks, and finally rendered an opinion upholding the opinion of the attorney general and instructing the canvassing board to issue the certificate to me. Then the certificate was issued to me, and the extra session of Congress had been called and I hurried to Washington as soon as I could and I was sworn in here on the 3d day of April, 1917.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to ask the gentleman about the Eskimos. Do they vote in Alaska?

Mr. SULZER. They did in this precinct of Unalakleet.

Mr. McKEOWN. Are they classed as Indians?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; they are all classed as Indians, and the committee agreed to that.

Mr. McKEOWN. Do they live in tribal relations or not?

Mr. SULZER. I think so. We were unable to go to Unalakleet; at least those who were handling the matter in that particular section did not go there. They took a lot of testimony in Nome, and while it shows conclusively that practically the same conditions existed in Unalakleet as existed in Afognak and Seldovia, still the record is not so conclusive in that particular precinct, and I am not making very much contention about Unalakleet, because the record is not nearly so conclusive as it is concerning Afognak and Seldovia. And if this House thoroughly considers this one question and determines that these two precincts conducted a fraudulent election and that those votes are fraudulent and that the vote of Gregori Yakanak should not be permitted to destroy my vote or to destroy the vote of an intelligent white person in Alaska—if you determine that, then you will vote to seat me in this House, and the other questions will not be at all pertinent, because they will not be controlling in any event.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. What evidence of fraud is there in the record?

Mr. SULZER. I have just been reading some of it, and I will continue to read some more.

Mr. GORDON. I mean, what evidence is there as to a fraudulent election, aside from the fact that the judges failed to comply with the statute and certify the reasons for permitting the use of unofficial ballots? Have you any evidence of fraud in the record aside from that?

Mr. SULZER. I have just been discussing it for an hour and showing that these Indians have been fraudulently voted. I have been showing you that these Indians were not citizens, that they were living in tribal relations, that they and everybody else admits—not only the Indians but the white people there admit it—that they are living in tribal relations. We put the chief himself on the stand, and he admitted that he was the chief of the tribe.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Assuming the gentleman's contention to be correct, those votes do not appear to me to be fraudulent, but rather illegal. Does the gentleman draw a distinction between a fraudulent vote and an illegal vote?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes. As far as these Indians living in tribal relations and not being qualified voters by reason of the fact that they are not citizens, I will say that they cast illegal votes; but when the record shows that men like John Taushwak went into the polling booth after obtaining ballots from the judges, went in with the Indians and marked their ballots for them, they were practicing a fraud, and the judges of election knew that they were practicing a fraud when they permitted it.

I will read from the record where the judges of election were placed on the stand and admitted that they did that, admitted that they permitted it—admitted that others marked the ballots for these Indians—and that there was no certification on the ballot that such a thing was done. Now, the law on the subject is this, that no one can mark a ballot for a voter except the judges of election. If the voter is illiterate, if he is unable to prepare the ballot himself, he must ask the judges of election to mark the ballot as he directs, and the judges of election must mark it there in public—that is, before the three of them—and they must certify on the back of that ballot that the ballot was so marked by the judges of election. They did not do that. There is no certification on these ballots that they were marked by the judges of election and no certification that they were marked by John Taushwak and these other people. Therefore I say that the whole thing was a fraud from start to finish, and there is no question about it.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. What does the record show as to how these ballots in these two precincts were marked for the voters?

Mr. SULZER. I have not seen the ballots. I can not answer that for the gentleman. I do not know.

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman does not understand my question. What does the record before the committee show as to who marked the ballots? Did the judges of election do it or did some outsider do it?

Mr. SULZER. I have just read here that John Taushwak admits that he marked eight ballots, and Mafrey Agik says that his relative, John Taushwak, marked his ballot.

Mr. RAKER. Now, is that disputed by John Taushwak and the election board?

Mr. SULZER. No; it is not, except as the chairman of the committee disputed it.

Mr. RAKER. What page is that on? I want to ask another question, but I want to be specific.

Mr. SULZER. This is on pages 272 and 273.

Mr. RAKER. If John Taushwak did enter the booth and mark the ballots of the Indian voters, was he guilty of a felony?

Mr. SULZER. I think so; I think the judges of election would be guilty of a felony in permitting him to do it.

Mr. RAKER. Under the statutes the judges of election would be guilty of a felony.

Mr. SULZER. Yes. Now I will read a little from the testimony of Ivan Alhoon, on page 266 of the record. He testified through the same interpreter:

TESTIMONY OF IVAN ALHOON.

Cecil R. King, duly and regularly sworn as interpreter.
Q. What is your name?—A. Ivan Alhoon.
Q. Where do you live?—A. In Afognak, Alaska.
Q. Do you live in that part of town known as Aleut town?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you live there on the 7th day of November, 1916?—A. I guess so.
Q. Do you speak the English language?—A. No.
Q. Can you write the English language?—A. No; I can't write.
Q. You do not know for whom you voted for Delegate to Congress?—A. The fellow I asked to write for me; I don't know whose name he voted for.

Now, that is a sworn deposition. This is legal evidence that the committee says is indefinite and unsatisfactory. Why, I could show conclusively, if I had the time to thoroughly discuss this case, that this evidence is all infinitely more definite and conclusive than a lot of other evidence that the committee has considered and presumed was correct which was not in my favor. Alhoon says, "The fellow I asked to write for me; I don't know whose name he voted for." Is not that conclusive?

Now, let me read from page 284 the testimony of Anton Dolchak:

TESTIMONY OF ANTON DOLCHAK.

Q. How came you to go to Shorty Stoffer's cabin on the morning of election?—A. The fellows told me to go down there and he would show me how to vote for Wickersham.
Q. You, then, were down at Shorty Stoffer's cabin?—A. Yes.
Q. What did Shorty do?—A. He showed me how to vote for Wickersham.
Q. Did he give you anything at the time—I mean any coffee and cake?—A. Yes; he gave me coffee and cake.
Q. Where did you go after you left the polls?—A. I went back to Shorty Stoffer's cabin and had some more coffee and cake.
Q. Did Shorty tell you to come back?—A. Yes.
Q. And you went up and voted for Wickersham?—A. Yes.

Now, that is very interesting. This is what happened at Seldovia. Shorty was an astute white man who lived in Seldovia. He, acting through this man Anton Dolchak, a sort of leader of these Indians, rounded up all the Indians on election day, marched them down to Shorty Stoffer's cabin and fed them up on cake and coffee. The record shows that they had never been there before, that they never had been given any coffee and cake before, and I want to say to the gentlemen of the House that on an occasion of that kind coffee and cake to the helpless Indians in that country is exactly the same as dollars and cents would be in your congressional district. Oh, yes; they were marched down to Shorty Stoffer's cabin and fed on coffee and cake and were instructed how to vote for Wickersham, and then they were marched up to the polls and voted.

Let me read the testimony of Gregory Foxy, on page 287. This is a sworn deposition. The gentleman has a very illuminating name. He gives his testimony through an interpreter, Mrs. Annie Christianson:

TESTIMONY OF GREGORY FOXY.

Mrs. Annie Christianson, first duly sworn as interpreter, and the witness was thereupon interpreted through said interpreter.
Q. What did Mike Dolchok tell you about who to vote for?.—A. He told me to put in ballot like he marked.
Q. Did he tell you to vote for Wickersham?—A. Yes.
Q. Did you vote that day?—A. Yes.
Q. Did Mike Dolchok go with you to the polls where they were voting?—A. Yes; Mike went with me over there.
Q. Did Mike mark your ballot?—A. Mike showed me where to vote.
Q. Did you vote for James Wickersham for Delegate to Congress?—A. Yes.
Q. Shorty Stoffer is not a native, is he?—A. No; he is a white man.
Q. You never had visited Shorty Stoffer's house before election day, had you?—A. No.
Q. Did you on the morning of the election of the 7th day of November, 1916, go to Shorty Stoffer's cabin?—A. Yes.
Q. Who told you to go up there?—A. Mike Dolchok.
Q. What did Mike Dolchok tell you to do?—A. He told me I must come up here to the election and vote.
Q. Are you a native?—A. Yes.
Q. What did you do on the morning of election when you reached Shorty Stoffer's cabin?—A. I didn't do anything.
Q. Did you have coffee and cake at Shorty Stoffer's cabin?—A. Yes.
Q. What did Shorty Stoffer say to you about voting?—A. He told me to have some coffee.
Q. Did he show you how to vote and who to vote for?—A. No; Mike Dolchok showed me.
Q. What did Mike Dolchok tell you about who to vote for?—A. He told me to put in ballot like he marked.
Q. Did he tell you to vote for Wickersham?—A. Yes.
Q. Did you vote that day?—A. Yes.
Q. Did Mike Dolchok go with you to the polls, where they were voting?—A. Yes; Mike went with me over there.
Q. Did Mike mark your ballot?—A. Mike showed me where to vote.
Q. I again repeat, did you vote for James Wickersham for Delegate to Congress?—A. Yes.

These people knew nothing about elections, they knew nothing about candidates, it was simply a fraudulent affair rounding these people up and voting for the contestant. I maintain that where a close election is held in the Territory of Alaska it should not be decided by votes of this character. If that is going to be the case then you are never going to have a decent, clean, and pure election in the Territory of Alaska, because if the politicians who will stoop to that sort of work know that they can pursue those practices with impunity, and that if the laws are not mandatory that they do not have to comply with them, that they can do as they please, they are going to do it. They are going to round up these helpless people, vote them in mass, and our elections will be absolutely a farce and disgrace, very much as they were before we had any Australian ballot system in Alaska.

Now let me read a few lines from the testimony of Sam Mercuroff:

Q. Did you vote at the election held November 7, 1916?—A. I did.
Q. Did Mike Dolchok come to you on the morning of election and tell you to go down to Shorty Stoffer's cabin?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see Shorty Stoffer when you got down to the cabin?—A. He was home.
Q. Did Shorty Stoffer give you some coffee and cake before you went up to vote?—A. I had two little cookies and a cup of coffee.
Q. Did Mike Dolchok or Shorty Stoffer tell you who to vote for for Delegate to Congress?
Mr. RUSTGARD. I make the same objection as I did at the beginning of Mr. Doyle's testimony.
A. Shorty Stoffer never said anything to me.
Q. Did Mike Dolchok tell you how to vote?—A. Yes.
Q. Who did he tell you to vote for?—A. Mike Dolchok gave me a piece of paper and told me to vote it the way it was marked.
Q. Did Mike go with you to the polls?—A. No; I went alone.
Q. Did you vote for James Wickersham for Delegate to Congress?—A. When I came down to the voting precinct they gave me a white piece of paper and it was marked like the yellow one.
Q. You don't know, then, who you voted for?—A. No; I couldn't read the paper.
Q. You don't know the name of anyone whom you voted for on that ticket?—A. No.
Q. Mike gave you a yellow piece of paper down at Shorty Stoffer's cabin and told you to mark the ticket you got from the judges in the same way?—A. Yes.
Q. And you didn't know at the time whom you voted for?—A. No.
Q. You mean you don't know the name of a single person you voted for?—A. No.
Q. Do you read or write the English language?—A. No.
Q. Do you read or write the Russian language?—A. No.
Q. Do you read or write any language?—A. No.
Q. Do you speak the English language?—A. No; I don't.

Now, gentlemen, do you want any more conclusive evidence or proof than that? He was given a white ballot, and swore it was marked the same as the ballot Shorty Stoffer had given him, and when he was asked if he knew whom he voted for he said no; he did not, because he could not read the paper, could not read the ballot.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Was that vote counted by the committee?

Mr. SULZER. Every one of these votes was counted by the committee, and yet the committee say there were no charges of fraud. When I had my opportunity to appear before the committee in this case—and I was only given 40 minutes' time, for that was all that I could get—I told the committee all of these facts. I made the same argument very much then that I am making now.

Mr. FIELDS. Does the gentleman say to this House that the committee gave him only 40 minutes—he, the contestee—in which to present his case?

Mr. SULZER. The committee decided each side should have two hours' time. I had an attorney who took an hour and twenty minutes, I believe, and therefore I had only 40 minutes at my own disposal.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that under the rules of the committee each side was allowed one hour and a half. It was agreed to give them such time as they chose to take, and they agreed on two hours on a side. So that it was by consent of the parties appearing before the committee. The committee would have been glad to give them six hours or eight hours. So that is a very unfair statement for the gentleman to make.

Mr. SULZER. In that connection I want to appeal to the Members of this House to hear this case and to look into and consider it. I do not want to make a single criticism of the committee. I cast no reflection on the committee at all. I said at the beginning of my remarks that I believe the committee has been misled; that is all. But I say this: That from the time that the contestant started to put in all of this irrelevant testimony of his as rebuttal testimony I have had absolutely no opportunity to present my case until this moment, except these 40 minutes I had before the committee, and a great deal of those 40 minutes, I will say to the gentleman, was taken up by questions asked by members of the committee.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman has made a very strong statement, and, for one, before I vote on the matter I would like to know wherein the truth lies. The gentleman stated that he had only 40 minutes before the committee, he had no time to present his evidence after the contestant had concluded in the 10 days of the introduction of rebuttal testimony, and that entirely new matter was introduced on rebuttal. Does the gentleman state to the House that he made an application before the committee to have further time in which to introduce testimony before the committee, or did he let it go by default?

Mr. SULZER. I do not recall making any request of the committee for further time. I will say to the gentleman that I was guided very much in this case by the advice of my attorney, and he conducted the case. I was very busy attending to the affairs and wants of my constituents, and did the very best I could for them and have done so since I came here. I thought this case was so conclusive that there was no necessity for me to devote any attention to it; that the facts were so clear, that the decisions of the Attorney General and the courts were so overwhelmingly in my favor, that there was no possibility of the committee holding against me, and what things were done, what action taken, were done by my attorney; but I will say to the gentleman that I do not think there was any opportunity presented under the rules of the House and under the law whereby I could get in any further additional evidence. I certainly told my attorney that I wanted to do that, and I collected a good deal of evidence from the departments of the Government here in Washington, but I could not find any way at all to get it in.

Mr. RAKER. While it may not be material, while it may not be really proper to consider, yet the gentleman has made that statement a couple of times, and for one I want to know the situation. Does the gentleman tell the House that he has gathered material evidence that he understands will rebut the evidence that was placed in the record by the contestant upon the close of his testimony, which evidence was not introduced before the committee at any time?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes.

Mr. RAKER. Would it affect the question of the result in this election contest if that evidence were presented to the House?

Mr. SULZER. I think it would, absolutely.

Mr. RAKER. On what particular issue; just in a general way?

Mr. SULZER. Well, there is a considerable amount on this very question of Indians being permitted to vote.

Mr. RAKER. To what extent and to what purport?

Mr. SULZER. The principal evidence that I have in mind right now is evidence along the lines of the answer which I gave to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES], who is a member of the committee, in regard to the charge that the contestant made that Indians voted for me at some other precincts in the Territory of Alaska, and that, therefore, it was an even break, that because these Indians voted for him in Afognak and Seldovia, likewise there were Indians who voted for me in other precincts, and that therefore I should not get any benefit from that. He put that all in as rebuttal testimony. I had no opportunity to overcome it. If I had, I would have and could have proved conclusively that his contentions are absolutely erroneous, because there were no Indians who voted for me at these other precincts. They were not Indians.

Mr. RAKER. What as to the status of these Indians that voted at the two precincts named? Had you put in all your case originally?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; we had put it all in. I have just been reading that now.

Mr. RAKER. Is that the only thing that the gentleman was not permitted to present to the committee because of the time limitation?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, no; practically all——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Wickersham had completed the rebuttal testimony?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, no; practically all the evidence that they took at the city of Seattle during his rebuttal testimony was all evidence in chief and it all reflected upon my character and reputation; it all reflected upon the officials of Alaska. Why, he stated at that time that a campaign fund of $10,000 was raised by the Democratic Party in Alaska and that all the press was subsidized, was purchased and bought to support me and to defeat him, but he never took a word of evidence in regard to that. He could have put the owners, the editors of those newspapers, on the stand if there was anything he could prove about that, but he could not do it. Why, it was all a malicious lie. That's what it was. Every word he said about there being any fraudulent practices in my election was a lie. Every word that he said about my having any advantage from a campaign fund raised by the corporations or that the press was subsidized was a lie. If he had any evidence he should have taken it and put it in the record. That is the sort of stuff that he got in, and he got page after page of it in, and I submit this record is very confusing and nobody can read the record without becoming confused.

Now, I say these things advisedly. And why? Simply because of this fact, that one of the members of this committee told me this. He said, "I did not give any attention to the decision of the court; I did not pay any attention to it; I did not think it should be given any consideration." I said, "Why, I thought it was a very able decision, a decision of the highest court we have in Alaska; why should it not have consideration?" "Well," he said, "because I thought and believed that it was prejudiced." I said, "Why do you think it was prejudiced?" "Simply because," he said, "no man can sit upon the bench as a judge of the court in Alaska who is your brother-in-law and who is deciding your case who will not be influenced in his decision." I said, "What do you mean?" He said, "The judge is your brother-in-law, is he not?" I said, "No; he is not my brother-in-law; he is absolutely no relation to me." I had never had any dealings with him of any kind, had never been in his court until this case was taken there, and in fact had never been in any court, and I hope I will never get in any more. But that gentleman had read this record rather hurriedly. He had read all this rubbish, these incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial charges that the contestant had made in wholesale, and he gained the wholly erroneous and false impression by it that this judge who decided this case was my brother-in-law.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Before passing, because I am a little bit particular about the proceedings of the committee, I want to make a statement to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], and that is that there was no application made to the committee for offering additional testimony. Mr. SULZER has reference, I think, to the rules of the House with regard to the time for taking rebuttal testimony, which was taken in Alaska before the case was submitted to the committee, but no application was ever made to the committee, and the time limit for rebuttal testimony has no reference——

Mr. RAKER. Was not discussed at all.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Was not discussed at all. As to the procedure under the rules of the House, the testimony was taken in Alaska long before the case came to Washington at all, and if an application had been submitted to the committee, and I think Mr. SULZER will concede the committee has been exceedingly indulgent in granting time for the consideration of his case, I have no doubt it would have been granted.

Mr. GORDON. If the gentleman will yield. Was there any objection made to these matters which were given in rebuttal which were not contained in the contestee's testimony in chief—was there any objection made to the testimony upon that ground before the committee?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; that was not taken before the committee. The gentleman understands that when a contest comes before Congress——

Mr. GORDON. I understand that, but in the argument of counsel was it contended that any testimony ought not to be considered because it was not strictly rebuttal testimony?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; there was complaint of some testimony, that in relation to some matters. It was not considered.

Mr. GORDON. The committee did not consider it?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes. Probably I will take that up later. I merely rose to the question of setting the committee straight on the question of rebuttal testimony and request for time.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Alaska know whether or not his counsel, Mr. Lloyd, filed two briefs, quite extensive ones, with the committee since our decision was announced, and one long after the argument, and before it was announced?

Mr. SULZER. Why, as I understand that question, I will say that after the oral arguments were made the attorneys were given permission to submit a brief citing the authorities on that one particular point as to whether this Alaskan law was mandatory or directory.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Do not those three briefs, that were filed since the argument, discuss the whole record?

Mr. SULZER. Not at all. They do not discuss anything but that one point of the mandatory and directory provisions of this Australian law.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Has the gentleman read the brief?

Mr. SULZER. Absolutely. I have read everything in the case.

Mr. FOCHT. I understood the gentleman to state that you have in Alaska an official ballot prescribed by the law, and that the election boards there accept any sort of a ballot, with a name written on a shingle, or on a piece of bark, or on a piece of paper. Is that the fact?

Mr. SULZER. They did in five of these precincts.

Mr. FOCHT. I was wondering whether that generally prevailed in Alaska and whether that was the sort of government they have up there under the supervision of the United States. I will say that you are progressing too rapidly if that is the case.

Mr. SULZER. I said that condition did exist until they provided for the Australian ballot law. Since the time of the passage of the Australian ballot law things have been very much better, and the contestant has found it has been very much more difficult to get elected to Congress.

Now, I have read quite extensively from the record in regard to these Indians. I want to read you the testimony of a few of the white people who were put upon the stand in these places. I think that the Indians testified very clearly; but let us see what the white people there say. I will read just a few lines from the testimony of Ernest Strickler, found on page 243, as follows:

Q. Were you a watchman for Judge Wickersham in that election?—A. I was.

Now, this gentleman is the watcher—the watchman—at the polls for the contestant. Manifestly, he is not friendly to me. In fact, there was hardly anyone in that section that was friendly to my cause. These witnesses, you must remember and consider, were nearly all hostile witnesses. They did not want to divulge anything more about these conditions than they absolutely had to divulge. They wanted to make it appear as reasonable as possible. They were endeavoring to defend the case of the contestant. Now, here is the watchman of the contestant testifying:

Q. Did you see anybody mark any of the ballots of these Aleuts other than the members of the election board?

Now, remember the watchman of this contestant in this precinct, the Afognak, is now testifying under oath on the witness stand. He is asked:

Q. Did you see anybody mark any of the ballots of these Aleuts other than the members of the election board?—A. I think John Taushwak marked some.

Q. Did he go into the booths and mark these ballots for a number that could not read or write?—A. Yes; three or four.

He was the watchman there in the polls. He saw this man John Taushwak go into the booth and mark these ballots for these helpless Indians. Is there any doubt in the mind of any Member of this House that that election in that precinct was fraudulent, and that I received the worst of it? Now——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman state how many votes he received in that precinct and how many the contestant received?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, sir; I can state that. I received 15 votes in Afognak and the contestant received 45. I received 13 votes in Seldovia and the contestant received 55.

Now:

Q. Did he go into the booths and mark these ballots for a number that could not read or write?—A. Yes; three or four.

Q. He was not a member of the election board?—A. No.

Now, that is very conclusive. On page 247 the same witness continues:

Q. Who is the chief of the Aleuts?—A. Gregori Yakanak.

Here is the contestant's watchman, who swears that the Aleuts have a chief and that the chief is Gregori Yakanak. He confirms the chief's own testimony on the witness stand. Can there be any doubt in the mind of any Member of this House that these Indians were living in tribal relationship? And is there any question but that if they are in tribal relationship they are not citizens, and therefore they can not vote, and that these men knew that that was the case and fraudulently voted them?

Q. Out of a population of about 400 people living on Afognak Island and in the town of Afognak on the date of the last election there were about a dozen of them white people, then?—A. Yes; between a dozen and fifteen.

That is all the white people there were on that island according to the sworn statement of the watchman of the contestant.

Now, let me read just a few lines from the testimony of Father N. P. Kashevarof, found on page 248 of the hearing.

Now, this is a gentleman who has been a priest of the Greek Church in that section of the Territory practically all his life. He has been there since 1878. He knows these people thoroughly. He understands all the conditions, and he is placed upon the witness stand, and this is his testimony. First, he goes on to identify these various voters as Aleut Indians. I will not enumerate them all, but his testimony is found on page 248. Then his evidence proceeds:

Q. Do you know whether the Aleuts residing in the Aleut village of Afognak have a chief?—A. They do.

Q. What is the name of their chief?—A. Gregori Yakanak.

Q. Do they live there in tribal relations—that is, does the chief have control of them?—A. The chief acts as their representative in any needs that they may have for him, especially when they are in need or destitute. When the fur laws have been passed, they look to him to advise them when they can hunt and when the season is opened and when it is closed.

Q. Now, do all the members of the tribe of Aleuts obey their chief?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That has been the case for many years gone by, has it not?—A. It has.

Q. They are living now in the same tribal relations as they did 25 years ago?—A. Yes; only a good deal better now.

Q. So far as their obeying the chief it is the same now as then and always has been?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You know that most of these parties whose names have been testified to by you as being Aleuts voted at the election held last November 7, 1916?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Aside from your church records you know that they are Aleuts?—A. Yes, sir.

Now, I would like to read just a few lines from the testimony of Martin Larsen, which is found on page 257 of the record. I read:

Q. Do you know whether John Taushwak, at the election held on November 7, 1917, induced any of the natives to go up and vote?—A. I don't remember.

Q. Did you see him bring any of the Aleuts to the polls?—A. No.

Q. Did you see him write out a ticket for some of the voters?—A. Yes.

Q. Were those tickets for the Aleuts?—A. Yes.

Q. What did he write on those tickets?—A. I don't know.

Q. Did he go into the booths with them?—A. I don't know.

Q. You saw him fix up the tickets?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He wasn't a judge of election, was he?—A. No.

Q. Now, this John Taushwak is the man that you saw preparing ballots last fall on election day?—A. Yes.

Q. He is the Aleut, then, that can read and write?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He is the man you saw preparing the ballots at the election?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You know all of these Aleuts personally yourself?—A. Yes.

Q. And you have known them for years?—A. Yes.

That is very conclusive evidence when testified by white people who are placed upon the witness stand and make their sworn depositions. Now let us read from page 261, from the testimony of E. Petellen:

Q. How long have you resided in Afognak?—A. Since the fall of 1907.

Q. You were one of the judges of election at the election held the 7th day of November, 1916, at Afognak, Alaska?—A. I was.

Q. As one of the judges of election do you recall keeping a registration book of the voters at that election?—A. Yes.

Q. I now hand you the registration book for the November 7, 1916, election at which a Delegate to the United States Congress was voted for, and ask you if this is the registration book that was kept at that election at Afognak?—A. I believe it is.

Q. I will ask you to state what is meant by the "crosses" in ink on the right-hand side of the various names which appear in that registration book?—A. Well, as near as I remember, these crosses were put in for the people who were unable to write and who asked the judges to assist them.

Q. Wherever there is crosses in ink on the right-hand side of the names it is to indicate that the parties were unable to write their own names, then?—A. No; not unnecessary to write his own name, but as near as I can remember some might not be able to write their own names, but as to number I can not state positively.

Q. Is not every name that appears upon this registry book which has a cross at the right-hand side of it written in your own handwriting?—A. I believe they are.

Q. Out of 62 voters who cast their ballots at the Afognak precinct at the election held on the 7th day of November, 1916, there were 21 for whom you made these crosses that were unable to write their own names?—A. They might not be able to write them in English.

Q. Did anybody other than the judges of election at the election held on the 7th day of November, 1916, for the election of a Delegate to Congress assist the illiterate voters in preparing their ballots?—A. Yes; I believe there was.

Q. State who that was.—A. As near as I can remember, believe it was John Taushwak.

Q. How many ballots did John Taushwak prepare for illiterate voters?—A. That I don't remember.
Q. John Taushwak is an Aleut, is he not?—A. Well, he is a native of this country.
Q. He lives in the Aleut village, does he not?—A. Yes.
Q. Mr. Petellin, previous to the last election you were working for Wickersham, were you not? I mean by that you were a strong partisan of Mr. Wickersham's and were advocating his election?—A. You mean the election previous to this one?
Q. No; I mean previous to the election last fall, during the latter summer months, and right up until election day.—A. I might have said a few words in his behalf. I always believe people have a right to vote for whom they please. I didn't want to mix up in politics at all.
Q. Where did John Taushwak prepare these ballots?—A. He prepared them in the voting place.

These people absolutely disregarded the law. On page 265 the same witness proceeds:

Q. John Taushwak was not a judge of the election, was he?—A. No.
Q. Did he sign his name on the back of any of the ballots which he prepared for some of those who could not read or write?—A. I don't remember.
Q. Were you the judge of election that prepared all the ballots for the voters who could not read or write?—A. That I can't remember positively.
Q. Do you recall at this time of any of the other two judges preparing any ballots for the voters who could not read or write?—A. I meant to say that the three judges assisted those who requested it.
Q. Did all three judges sign on the back of the ballot the fact that those particular ballots had been prepared for those voters who could not read or write?—A. As near as I can remember.
Q. None of the judges signed the ballots that John Taushwak had?—A. Not that I know of.
Q. Did you in your election returns to the governor of the Territory of Alaska make any note of the fact that John Taushwak prepared any of the ballots for the voters who could not read or write?—A. I don't remember.
Q. You would remember if such a report had been made?—A. I don't remember such a report being made.

I read further from the testimony of the same witness:

Q. Is it not a fact that on the 7th day of November, 1916, the Aleut village had their own chief and the Creole village had its own chief?—A. I think they did have.
Q. Then you say even the Aleuts had a chief last fall at election day, and the Creoles also had a chief; is that correct?—A. I think it is.
Q. You know it, do you not?—A. Yes.

Now, I do not think there is any question, gentlemen of this House, that these two precincts of Afognak and Seldovia conducted an illegal and fraudulent election. I do not think that the committee is justified in permitting those votes to be counted. I think that these two precincts should have been rejected in their entirety, because the evidence shows conclusively on its face that the votes there were illegal and fraudulent, and even though the committee did not see fit to throw out the votes of these precincts entirely, why did they not reject the votes that the evidence shows conclusively were illegal? Why did they not reject a certain number of these votes? Why, they say in their report that there was no way to determine whom these Indians voted for and no way to segregate their vote from the white folks. Well, the record shows conclusively how 21 of these Indians voted. It shows absolutely that they voted for Wickersham, and it shows that they were all frauds. There is not a single word to show that one of them voted for me. Why could not those 21 be rejected?

Now, in regard to the balance, why is it that the committee in this Indian proposition could not follow the same rule that they followed in two precincts where some soldiers voted? They say the soldiers cast illegal ballots, and it was not determined how these soldiers voted or how most of them voted. It was only determined how eight of them voted, and the committee deducted the balance pro rata from both of the candidates. They did that under a rule of law found in McCready on Elections. It was perfectly easy for them to do it in the case of certain soldiers who voted in certain precincts in Alaska. Why could it not be done in these precincts when the votes were absolutely more illegal in every sense of the word than where these soldiers voted? Because the soldiers were certainly citizens of the United States, and they were intelligent people, and knew how to cast an intelligent vote, and the only question there was a technical question as to whether they were legally residents of Alaska. But here is absolutely a different proposition, a question of tribal Indians living in tribal relations; Indians who knew absolutely nothing about the election, and who can not by any manner of means, under any circumstances, cast a legal ballot. And yet the committee say there is no way in which they can take any action in that case.

Mr. BURNETT. May I ask the gentleman how many Indians voted at that place?

Mr. SULZER. Well, Ernest Strickler, who was a watchman for the contestant, and who was very fully interrogated on the witness stand, identifies 19 of them as Aleut Indians.

Mr. BURNETT. And it could not be ascertained for whom any of them voted?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes; 21 of them were identified.

Mr. BURNETT. Not out of the 19?

Mr. SULZER. No; 21 out of the entire number who voted there. I was just starting to give the gentleman a statement of how many had been identified. Strickler identifies 19; Father Kashevarof identifies 15; Cecil R. King identifies 17; Martin Larsen identifies 14. They are nearly all identified as Indians, but there were only 21 whom we could get on the witness stand to prove how they voted.

Mr. BURNETT. How many in all voted?

Mr. SULZER. There were 72 Indians in these two precincts.

Mr. BURNETT. How many votes did the contestee get?

Mr. SULZER. He got 28 votes.

Mr. LONDON. Out of the 72?

Mr. SULZER. No; out of the 100.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. DILLON. I understand the gentleman to say that there were 21 of these Indian voters who went on the witness stand.

Mr. SULZER. Yes; they either went on the witness stand and swore that they voted for Wickersham, or they swore that John Taushwak, or somebody whom the record thoroughly identifies as voting for Wickersham, voted for them, so that the record conclusively proves that 21 of these Indians voted for contestant.

Mr. DILLON. Assuming that that is true, and that those 21 votes should be taken away from the Wickersham total, Mr. Wickersham would still be ahead 23 votes, would he not, according to the findings of this committee?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes; he would, but I do not agree with the findings of the committee in other respects, and I am going to discuss that phase of it.

Mr. DILLON. Therefore that in itself would be immaterial, because it would not change the result.

Mr. SULZER. It would if the findings of the committee are not upheld in other respects.

Mr. DILLON. Does the gentleman maintain that all the votes in these precincts where the Indians voted ought to be thrown out and not counted at all?

Mr. SULZER. I do.

Mr. DILLON. The gentleman does not think it is the duty of this committee to separate the good votes from the bad votes?

Mr. SULZER. I do not think so, for the simple reason that the record shows that the whole election was fraudulent, and the election judges knew it was fraudulent, and they winked at the fraud. It certainly would not be any injury to those who voted for me to throw out the entire vote of those precincts. No one who cast a vote there for me would have any objection to the committee rejecting the entire vote of those precincts, because I received so few votes that it would not affect my result at all.

Now, let us see what happened in another precinct, the precinct of Craig. The record shows conclusively that the followers of the contestant voted these helpless Indians fraudulently at these two precincts of Afognak and Seldovia, and it shows very much the same in regard to the Unalakleet precinct. On the other hand, at the precinct of Craig, in southeastern Alaska, a thousand miles from these other precincts, where the conditions are entirely different, where the Bureau of Education of the United States Government has been laboring for years to elevate and educate those natives, where the various church organizations of the country have been operating for years in an endeavor to elevate these people, where the conditions are as different from the conditions at Seldovia and Afognak as the poles are wide apart, at that place there were 30 intelligent men and women who had severed all tribal relationships years before, who had been living the same as all the rest of us, who had been recognized by the United States Government as citizens, in that they had been made masters of documented vessels and were owners of documented vessels of the United States, who had been in the Army and Navy of the United States and had served their country, who had been educated in various large institutions of the United States—there, in that precinct, the followers of the contestant in this case prevented those 30 people from voting, prevented them absolutely and forcibly, against all law, drove them away from the polls, and prevented them from voting because they were going to vote for me, and the followers of the contestant knew it.

Mr. BURNETT. Does the record show that?

Mr. SULZER. The record shows it very clearly. I will read from the testimony of Mr. C. E. Hibbs, found on page 334 of the record:

Q. Have they severed tribal relations?—A. Yes; they have. Since I have been in the village of Klawock there has been no semblance of any tribal relationship in a village of 300.

Klawock is about 10 miles from Craig, and they travel by boat altogether.

Q. Are they living a civilized life, same as white people?—A. They are.

Q. Were those people here at last election, November 7, 1916?—A. We all came up on the same boat.

Q. Did they vote at that election here at Craig?—A. They did not.

Q. Why didn't they vote?—A. They were told by the judge that they would not be allowed to vote.

Q. Did they offer themselves to vote?—A. Not all of them. There were three or four that went into the polls to vote, and they were told that they could not vote, so the others did not go in.

Q. What reasons were they given that they could not vote?—A. Because they were Indians.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Were not two men who offered to vote at that election, who were Indians living on the reservation at Craig and who were told that they could not vote, were not their votes counted by this committee, one of them the son of an Austrian beach comber and the other a full-blooded Indian? Were not their votes counted by the committee and given to you, and was there anyone else at all who offered to vote in that precinct who was rejected?

Mr. SULZER. I know these people very well. I have known them for years, and they are very intelligent people.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Were not the two men, one George Demmert and the other a half-breed son of a beach comber, whose father was not an American citizen, and were not those two votes counted?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; the committee allowed 2 votes and disallowed 28.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Were not they the only ones who offered to vote?

Mr. SULZER. No; they were all there and would have voted.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Does not the record show that they were the only ones who offered to vote?

Mr. SULZER. I think not; but I am going to read the record and show all about that:

What reasons were given that they could not vote?—A. Because they were Indians.

Now, they were not Indians, because they had severed their tribal relations. There is no question about that?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Did they not live on the reservation?

Mr. SULZER. No; they did not. The gentleman has been misled; there are no Indian reservations in Alaska—absolutely none. They were not living on the reservation any more than I was. Practically everybody in Alaska lives on ground reserved for some purpose or other. The whole southeastern part of Alaska is a forest reservation. I am living on it and all other white people are living on it, and most of the southwestern part of Alaska is in a forest reserve. You can hardly find a spot in Alaska inhabited by anybody that is not reserved for some purpose or other. That has nothing to do with citizenship. They are not Indian reservations in the sense that Indian reservations have been created in the States.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I want to ask the gentleman if the order of President Wilson, April 21, 1914, does not set aside this Indian place in the village of Klawock for natives indigenous to Alaska who may there reside, and was it not specifically set aside and described by President Wilson as an Indian reservation? Was not that done under Executive order of April 21, 1914? I want also to ask the gentleman if Hydaburg is not by Executive order of President Taft, which was never rescinded, set apart for the same purpose under an order of June 19, 1912, as an Indian reservation?

Mr. SULZER. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that strips of land have been set aside by the President of the United States for the use and benefit of the Bureau of Education of the United States Government, which is doing all it can to elevate the people, and has been doing it for years, and it has made good citizens of them. They are not Indian reservations at all. Indians are not put on these lands with the injunction that they must stay there and do as they are told or ordered to do.

They are free agents absolutely, and they are not placed upon any reservation in the sense that a soldier is placed on a military reservation or an Indian on an Indian reservation in the States, where he is not a free agent. They can go and come as they please, and they do so. They are not on any reservation whatever. The simple truth of the matter is that a certain amount of land has been set aside for the benefit and purposes of the Bureau of Education. The contestant has endeavored to confuse the committee in that respect. He has misrepresented the facts, and he knows it. As I told the gentleman and told the Members of the House before, he put this all in in rebuttal. If I had had any opportunity in the world to introduce any evidence to the contrary, I would have disproved it absolutely.

I will read from the hearings of this election case, and what do we find? Dr. Claxton, the head of the Bureau of Education, was asked in regard to this question, and he should be a pretty good authority, an authority that the Members of this House ought to be willing to accept. What does he say? On page 62 he says this:

The natives of Hydaburg and Klawock are not living in any tribal relationship. As said before, they are free and independent individuals.

They are not wards of the Government. There is not an Indian in Alaska that is a ward of the Government or that ever has been. There never have been any Indian reservations created there. They have never been treated as wards, and the gentleman ought to know that. To read further from what Dr. Claxton says:

4. The Hydahs are, most decidedly, living a civilized life. This is demonstrated by the success of the Hydaburg colony. In 1911 the villages of Klinquan and Howkan migrated to the site, hitherto unoccupied, selected on account of its advantages with regard to hunting and fishing, where they founded a village named Hydaburg. Under the supervision of the teacher of the United States public school a cooperative company of the natives was organized to transact the mercantile business of the settlement and to operate a sawmill, the machinery for which was sent them by the Bureau of Education at a cost of $2,200. The Hydaburg people have turned a dense forest into a thriving town with a busy wharf, a sawmill that turns out good lumber for them at a cost of $10 a thousand, neat, single-family homes, instead of the communal houses of their old villages, a long, boarded street, of which they are proud as the finest in Alaska, and a cooperative store, which the first year made a clear profit of 125 per cent, paying a cash dividend of 50 per cent and adding 75 per cent to the capital stock. The cooperative company was started with a capital of about $2,000, and within four years it has distributed $12,727.53 in dividends. The Hydaburg people have been able to keep their money in the village, which is prosperous and independent. The cooperative company has repaid to the Government $2,200, the cost of the machinery in the sawmill, which has been covered into the United States Treasury.

The natives inhabiting the village of Klawock are also civilized and prosperous. In his report for 1916 the teacher of the United States public school, who supervises the commercial undertakings of the natives, makes the following statement regarding the cooperative store owned and operated by them:

"During the year we increased our stock of goods more than $3,000, which almost doubled it. We have done some improving on the building and increased our fixtures. When our books were balanced in January they showed a net gain of almost 29 per cent."

5. There is at hand in this office no authoritative information regarding the origin of the Hydahs. The earliest official reference to the Hydahs that we have been able to find is the statement in the census report, 1880, that the Hydah Tribe existed in Alaska in 1839, when the Hudson Bay Co. leased what is now southeastern Alaska from Russia.

Cordially, yours,

P. P. CLAXTON, Commissioner.

Mr. RANDALL. Those are the Indians that were denied the privilege of voting?

Mr. SULZER. Yes. Let me continue the testimony of Mr. Hibbs, who is the Government school-teacher at this point, and who is thoroughly familiar with all of the facts in this case, and who knows these people.

Q. What reasons were given that they could not vote?—A. Because they were Indians.

Q. Do you know whether they ever voted before?—A. I think all of them have. Two years ago practically all those who were able to read and write in the village came up with me and voted.

Q. What kind of business are these people engaged in?—A. Do you want me to give the business of each one individually or generally?

Q. Where you can, you can group the business.—A. C. W. Demmert is a former merchant, at present in the fishing industry, having bought the buildings and old cannery equipment at Kuim Islands. Emma (his wife), Spencer Williams, Jack Perotovich, James Perotovich, William Jones, John Darrow, George Roberts, George Fields, Peter Wilson, Roy Williams, Richard Dullands, Sam Gunyah, Arthur James, William Gunyah, Albert Thomas, James Rowen, Peter Scott, Jimmy Jackson, Donald Kathlean are all fishermen. George Demmert is clerk and manager of the Klawock Commercial Co. R. J. Perotovich, proprietor of general store and moving-picture establishment. J. S. Johnson, boat builder. Henry Roberts, gas-boat engineer. J. K. Williams, carpenter. John Skan, seine maker. Andrew Thomas, boat builder and a minister. Maxfield Daklin, proprietor of a pool hall. P. Lee Anneskit, gas-boat engineer. Fred Williams has just received an honorable discharge from the United States Navy and at present is fishing.

Those are the kind of people that the contestant conspires to deprive of their citizenship and to prevent fraudulently from casting their votes. Those names sound very different from the names in those other precincts, and their occupations are very different I know them all. I have known them for years, because I spent 16 years in the precinct of Sulzer. I have been United States commissioner for many years at that precinct. I have become intimately acquainted with these people, I have been deputy collector of customs at the town of Sulzer, the precinct of Sulzer, and I know that most of these people enumerated there are recognized as citizens of the United States, because I have myself signed the documents of their vessels, stating on their face that so and so, "a citizen of the United States," is "the owner and master of this vessel." There is no question about that, absolutely none, and the contestant could not introduce any evidence to refute it. He could not introduce a single bit of evidence to prove that any of these people were not citizens, and when they are citizens of the United States they are not Indians. They cease to be Indians in a legal sense; from a legal point of view they are not Indians, they are Americans, they are citizens, recognized as citizens by the United States, and they were fraudulently prevented from exercising their franchises.

Now, that is the sort of work that has been going on up in Alaska. The committee have been solicitous about disfranchising the voter, and no one is more solicitous about disfranchising a voter than I am, and I certainly do not want to see any voter disfranchised. That is the last thing in the world I want to do; but, my friends, we have got to have decent elections, we have got to have a clean ballot, we have got to maintain the secrecy of the ballot, and we have got to be fair in our elections. It is very much more important that an intelligent majority be considered, that the interests of six thousand five hundred and odd legal voters who voted for me should have some consideration rather than a few illegal voters should be given the great consideration of having their votes counted when they were absolutely disregarding the law in every respect. Let me read a little further from Mr. Hibbs's testimony:

Q. If you know, state how they intended to vote on the Delegate question.—A. Not all of them have discussed or talked to me, but all who have were favorable to Mr. Sulzer.

Q. Can you take this list and say how many, without naming them, would vote for Mr. Sulzer?—A. I am positive that more than 20 would have voted for Mr. Sulzer.

On page 328 the witness is being cross-examined by the contestant when he gave this testimony. The contestant was there and attended this hearing and cross-examined this witness and is cross-examining him now. This is found on page 328 of the record:

Q. You mention that six or eight of these named by you are half-breeds. Do you know whether their fathers were citizens or not?—A. Personally I know that one of them was. The father of C. W. Demmert, who offered to vote, was a veteran of the Civil War. He just died in the State of Washington in a veteran's home, and the papers were sent up and are now in an attorney's hands giving his property and the pension due to C. W. Demmert.

Now, gentlemen of this House, here is a picture of Charles W. Demmert and his family. Here is a man whose father was a veteran of the Civil War. Here is a man whom the contestant's henchman fraudulently prevented from voting and said he was not a citizen of the United States and drove him out of the polling place, when they did everything in their power to have scores upon scores of absolutely helpless Indians vote in the Afognak and Seldovia precincts because they knew they could vote them for contestant. Now, why should C. W. Demmert be prevented from voting? Why is it fair to count all of these Indian votes in one precinct and reject the vote of this citizen of the United States in another precinct?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Did not the committee count that vote; does not the testimony show that Mr. Demmert's vote and the other Indian were counted?

Mr. SULZER. No; it does not. It shows the vote of George Demmert, who is an entirely different person, was allowed and counted by the committee, but it does not show a thing about C. W. Demmert, who is a different man altogether. That is the trouble with this whole case. The gentlemen of the committee, or some of them, have become confused and have gotten the facts and the evidence of the case mixed, and they do not understand the principal points involved. It is not surprising that it should be confusing. It is not surprising that the number of cases and conditions I have mentioned are rather complicated and confusing, and it is necessary to go to the bottom of these things. Here are several other pictures. Here are two pictures of the organizations of these people, one a ladies' organization and the other a men's organization. This shows the kind and type of those people. You can study those pictures and see that those are intelligent men and women. Now, if you do not draw some distinction between those people, if you do not say that the man or the woman in Alaska who has received the benefit of the Bureau of Education's work, of the various beneficent and benevolent organizations that have been working to uplift them for many years, is not in a different class from those other helpless and illiterate people out in this far remote country, why what is all the work of the Bureau of Education going to amount to? What encouragement is there for these people to develop and progress and to become citizens of the United States if you say indiscriminately, "You are all upon the same basis; you can all vote."

Here were the most helpless people in the world, who could not vote intelligently at all, who knew nothing about what they were doing, and they were permitted to vote, and did vote, and their votes were counted for the contestant. Here are some eminently civilized people, in every respect qualified citizens, people who are developed in every sense of the word, people who know what they are doing, who can cast an intelligent ballot, who can go in the booths themselves and know their own minds, who are interested in the country, who have large investments there, yet they were fraudulently prevented from voting at all. Why? Simply because they were going to vote for me.

Let me read a little more:

Q. Who challenged Demmert's vote on November 7 last?—A. Mr. Hal Gould, I think, was the one that told him that he could not vote. Mr. Fred Butler and J. P. Smith were the ones who did the arguing.

Now, Mr. Fred Butler and Mr. J. P. Smith are known intimately and well to me. I have known them for years and they are absolutely political opponents of mine. They were the friends and party workers of the contestant, and they conspired—and I say the word advisedly—they conspired to bulldoze and browbeat that election board and those people who came from Klawock to vote and who had voted in previous elections, and they drove them out of the polls because they were going to vote for me. And the record shows conclusively that they would have voted for me.

I say, Is that right? Is it fair? Is it fair that I should be deprived of these 30 votes in the precinct of Craig when the contestant can not produce a single bit of evidence to prove they were not legal voters in every sense of the word or were not citizens of the United States, and then have the votes of these other people counted in the other precincts, where they were absolutely fraudulent? I do not think the House, if it wants to be fair, will say it is a fair proposition.

Mr. Hibbs, on page 329, is asked this question. He is the teacher of the Government school at that place, which is operated by the Bureau of Education, and Mr. Hibbs knows each one of these people intimately and well. He is working as hard and as assiduously as he can to help to benefit them and has been doing it for years. He is a splendid gentleman in all respects, notwithstanding he has been denounced by the contestant. He is asked by the contestant:

Q. Do you know of any of the witnesses named by you who would have voted for me?—A. I do not.

Now, the testimony of Mrs. C. E. Hibbs; the Rev. E. E. Bromley, who was the minister of the Presbyterian Church at Klawock; the testimony of C. D. Calhoun, who was the United States marshal at that point; the testimony of R. J. Peratovich; the testimony of George Demmert, is all set forth very fully in the record, and it all corroborates and proves everything that I have said. And there is no evidence of any kind given to refute it. I have not the time to read all of that. But I think I have read sufficient to prove just what happened in that particular precinct.

Now, the contestant has made a great point that all the election officials were in my control. Here is a little evidence, and the record is full of evidence all the way through, that that is not the case, and in regard to the statement made a little while ago to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] I will read a few lines from the testimony of C. D. Calhoun, on page 337:

Q. Is Charles Fox, commissioner of this precinct, also a Democrat?—A. He is; but had absolutely nothing to do with the election.

Q. Well, but what I want to know is, if the matter of the appointment of the election officers in Craig at that election was not under the control of the Democrats?—A. It was not.

Q. And that commissioner supported Mr. Sulzer, did he not?—A. He did not, if I have been rightly informed.

Q. I would like to ask, Mr. Calhoun, if Judge Stackpole was not a Republican, and that he appointed this election board without the influence of Judge Jennings?—A. There was no influence brought to bear to my knowledge, and Judge Stackpole is a Republican.

Now, the contestant has made a number of statements in the record which are not correct. Not all the commissioners in Alaska appoint election judges. In fact, the great majority of them have nothing whatever to do with elections. The election judges in precincts outside of incorporated towns and municipalities can only be appointed by the commissioners who are recorders, and there are not a great number who are recorders. Now, Mr. Fox, who was the commissioner at Craig, was a Democrat. He was not a recorder, and he had absolutely nothing to do with appointing the officials there; had absolutely nothing to do with the election. The judges of election at Craig were appointed by the United States commissioner at Ketchikan.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Who generally appoints the election officials in Alaska?

Mr. SULZER. The election officials in the incorporated towns and municipalities are appointed by the city councils. The election officials outside of incorporated towns and municipalities are appointed by the United States commissioners who are recorders of that particular district.

Mr. MANN. And who appoints the United States commissioners?

Mr. SULZER. The United States commissioners are appointed by the judges of the district courts.

Mr. MANN. And who are those judges appointed by?

Mr. SULZER. Well, the judges at this particular time are all appointed by President Wilson.

Mr. MANN. It could not very well be charged that there was a Republican conspiracy on the part of election officials, as the gentleman seems to intimate, when it takes the President and the judges and the commissioners into the conspiracy.

Mr. SULZER. I would not think for a moment of making any such charge. In fact, the record shows conclusively that the contestant was not running in Alaska as a Republican.

Mr. MANN. I do not see what that has to do with it. The intimation that the gentleman is making, as I gathered it—and I listened to the gentleman carefully—was that the election officials were conspiring to deprive the gentleman of votes. Certainly it was not a Republican conspiracy, although the gentleman just said with great emphasis that some election official or somebody connected with it was a Republican, charging fraud at that place.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, no. I did not have any purpose of making any such intimation.

Mr. MANN. That was the intimation, as I gathered it.

Mr. SULZER. I certainly did not intend to convey any such intimation. I intended to convey this impression, that the contention of the contestant that all the election machinery and the officials in the Territory of Alaska were in my control was not the truth.

Mr. MANN. I do not have any idea that the gentleman had full control over the President or anybody of that sort, or that anybody else has control over all this machinery; but the gentleman was a Democratic candidate?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. He certainly ought to give proof, instead of making mere charges, that election officials appointed by Democrats, whatever their politics may have been, were in a conspiracy to prevent a Democrat from receiving votes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, if I understood the gentleman from Alaska aright in regard to the conspiracy, he charged that certain partisans of the contestant at Craig had entered into a conspiracy to prevent these people who came up on the boat from voting. That is the conspiracy he referred to and spoke about.

Mr. MANN. He charged that certain men were not permitted to vote, and the only ones who could keep them from voting were election officers.

Mr. HAMLIN. And he said he charged conspiracy against a man named——

Mr. SULZER. Butler and Smith.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; that Butler and Smith had conspired to influence and bulldoze the officers there so as to prevent these people from voting. That was the statement he made, as I understood him.

Mr. SULZER. That was the statement I made, or the statement I intended to make.

Mr. MANN. This will be a very interesting statement to our southern friends.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. You said that outside of the incorporated cities and towns the election officers were all appointed by the United States commissioners, who are in turn appointed by the Federal judges. How many incorporated cities and towns have you in Alaska—as many as six?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes; a great many more.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. There are really five?

Mr. SULZER. Five?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, no; there are dozens.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Is there any voting place over which there is any dispute in this election case in an incorporated city or town?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; I think so.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. What voting place?

Mr. SULZER. I think that Fairbanks is an incorporated town.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. There is no dispute in the Fairbanks vote at all.

Mr. SULZER. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. I do not know about Gibbon being an incorporated town, but I am under the impression that it is.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. There is no contest over the Fairbanks vote.

Mr. SULZER. I think there is. I think I will be able to show that later, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. There is nothing in the record about it.

Mr. SULZER. I think the town of Gibbon is incorporated, but I would not be sure about that.

However, that is not the matter at issue. I am simply saying that the great majority of votes cast were in the incorporated towns and municipalities, and there the officials were elected by the common councils.

Now, I would like to read a few lines from the testimony of the Rev. David Waggoner, which is found on page 226 of the record; and the Members of the House should remember that this testimony was taken in rebuttal. Manifestly it was to rebut something that I had put in the record, and the testimony is about the Sulzer precinct. I put in absolutely nothing in the record about the Sulzer precinct, and I took no testimony about it, so that this should not be considered at all. The committee should not consider any votes that were cast at Sulzer, because there is nothing in the record as evidence in chief that there were any illegal votes cast there, and the committee should not consider this evidence that was put in in rebuttal, because I had no opportunity to put in any evidence to refute it.

Now, on page 226 it is shown that the contestant subpœnaed these witnesses: Charles W. Hawksworth, David Waggoner, Mabel Le Roy, Esther Gibson, and J. W. Bell, before H. R. Le Fevre, a notary public, at his office in the Seward Building, in the town of Juneau, Alaska. He subpœnaed those five witnesses, and only interrogated one, David Waggoner; and I think that any Member who will read the record will see that Mr. Waggoner's testimony is so disappointing to the contestant that he did not think it was advisable for him to place any other witnesses on the stand. On page 228 Mr. Waggoner makes this statement:

> The men are the residents of Hydaburg, because they have definitely severed their relations with the old customs of the Hydas at the old villages. That was the reason for the founding of the Hydaburg village.

Now, that is the truth. The very fact that these people are living at Hydaburg is proof conclusive that they are not living in tribal relationships, because that was one of the objects of founding this village. That was one of the rules that they had to agree to among themselves before they went there, that they had severed all tribal relationships and that they had adopted the habits of civilized life, and that village was founded years ago. There is not a word of claim that these people were not citizens. Now, this testimony continues:

> Q. Is it not a fact, Mr. Waggoner, that the inhabitants at Hydaburg and Klawock are intelligent fishermen and mechanics?—A. Yes, sir.
> Q. And carry on their vocation in the same manner that white men do under similar circumstances?—A. Yes, sir.
> Q. Is it not a fact that some of these men are highly skilled mechanics?—A. Yes, sir.
> Q. On gas boats as well as otherwise?—A. Yes; and some are boat builders.
> Q. Carpenters?—A. Yes.
> Q. Machinists?—A. Yes; some to a degree—the result of their training.
> Q. They received their training that you mention in the Indian schools?—A. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. In view of the lateness of the hour, I desire to inquire of the gentleman if it would be agreeable to him to conclude his remarks to-morrow morning and let the House adjourn now?

Mr. SULZER. That would be satisfactory to me, if I may have the time then.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FIELDS. If the House should adjourn now, would the gentleman from Alaska be entitled to the floor when the matter is taken up again?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. How much longer does the gentleman anticipate he will need in order to conclude his remarks?

Mr. SULZER. I am about to conclude as far as this Indian question is concerned, but I should like very much to debate the Australian ballot law and the soldiers' voting.

Mr. WALSH. How long does the gentleman think it will take?

Mr. SULZER. I have not any idea. It is impossible to say. It depends on how many questions are asked me and what different lines of argument develop, and how far away I am drawn from the argument I have in mind.

Mr. WALSH. Could not the gentleman conclude his remarks this evening in the course of 30 or 40 minutes?

Mr. SULZER. I could not be certain about that.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman must realize that we have got to get through with this business some time.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, if the House should adjourn now, it is understood that Mr. SULZER can conclude his statement in the morning?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That would be the order of business, then, would it not?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. When will we have to come back to vote?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Chair state how much time the gentleman will be entitled to occupy to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It happens that the Speaker was not in the chair when the time of the gentleman was extended. If it turns out that it was extended indefinitely, and I am informed that it was, then the gentleman will be entitled to all the time he wants.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I asked unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alaska be permitted to continue until he concluded his statement, and that consent was given.

The SPEAKER. Then, after the small business on the Speaker's table is disposed of to-morrow the gentleman will be entitled to the floor until he gets through.

Mr. GARNER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. If the House concludes to remain in session until the gentleman from Alaska concludes his remarks, then he will not have unlimited time to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. Of course not.

Mr. GARNER. But if he did start in to-morrow after the business on the Speaker's table was disposed of, he might hold the floor until 6 o'clock to-morrow evening.

The SPEAKER. That is absolutely true, and he might hold it the next day also.

Mr. GARNER. I think this thing ought to come to a conclusion.

Mr. CROSSER. And the gentleman from Alaska ought to have an opportunity to make his statement, too.

The SPEAKER. The question of the right of a Member to his seat is the very highest privilege known to the House.

Mr. SULZER. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that it will all depend as to the interest displayed by the Members of the House as to how much time I will take. If the Members of the House do not show much interest and do not want to get at the merits of the case, I am willing to conclude at a much earlier time.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Can the gentleman assure the House that he can get through in an hour and a half longer?

Mr. SULZER. It is impossible to say, because I do not know what the membership of the House is going to do when I resume. It will all depend on the membership of the House.

Mr. CANNON. The Committee on Rules could report a rule as a matter of privilege that to-morrow at 6 o'clock the House will take a vote.

Mr. GARNER. I was trying to get at the matter so that we could arrive at a conclusion in this case to-morrow.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to know whether the war contract bill has the right of way immediately after this contested-election case?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the Committee on Rules has a rule making that bill in order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Alaska yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A number of gentlemen are interested in the bill which is to follow—the war contract bill—and the question is whether they shall remain here to-morrow afternoon. If the war contract bill followed the contested-election case they may not be required to remain. I am endeavoring to ascertain how much longer the gentleman will retain the floor so that they may make some estimate as to whether they will have to stay here over to-morrow.

Mr. SULZER. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I appreciate thoroughly the courtesy extended me by the House and I have no disposition whatever to delay or take up the time. My sole object is to take a sufficient amount of time to explain this case to the membership of the House as they may wish to have it explained. I do not think it is going to take much longer, but I can not tell just how long or how many questions will develop. I have no disposition to delay any matter, and I am willing to make any arrangement which will expedite the business of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no desire to curtail the gentleman's statement. I think he is entitled to make a full and free statement of his position; but the Speaker having stated that the war contract bill under the rule would have the right of way following the contested-election case, it is a fair assumption that the river and harbor bill will not be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Let me say that I understand there are three or four other speeches in this contested-election case.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then it is a fair assumption that the river and harbor bill will not be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman from Alaska have time to conclude his statement. I do not think it is possible to conclude to-night, and, with the understanding that the gentleman is to resume to-morrow, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Louisiana will withhold his motion——

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I withhold it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alaska having been given the right to conclude his remarks, and having taken the floor for an hour's time under the rules of the House, can he now yield the floor to the gentleman from Louisiana to make a motion to adjourn, that gentleman not being able to make the motion unless the gentleman from Alaska yields the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alaska yields the floor by compulsion.

Mr. MANN. He is only speaking by grace of the House to an unlimited extent. Has not the House the right to assume when the request is made that the gentleman must occupy the floor until he concludes his remarks and not be able to yield to some other Member to move to adjourn or to ask unanimous consent, or perhaps for the consideration of a bill? Is it not his duty under the unanimous-consent agreement given him to conclude his remarks but not yield the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Alaska should have more time.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana moves that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 4, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 4, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who openest Thine hand and satisfiest the desire of every living thing, we recognize in Thee the source of every noble impulse, every high and holy aspiration. Be Thou our strength in the duties of this day, purify our hearts, direct our thoughts, encourage every good endeavor, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in all our hearts, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—WICKERSHAM AGAINST SULZER.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned yesterday the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SULZER] had the floor in his own right.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alaska yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions in the Sulzer against Wickersham contested-election case be rereferred to the Committee on Elections No. 1.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the resolutions in the case of Wickersham against Sulzer be recommitted to the Committee on Elections No. 1. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, of course that would be the ending of the case for this Congress. There is a unanimous report from the committee, which, I assume, and have no doubt the assumption is correct, was made after very careful consideration and investigation by the committee. I served on the Elections Committee No. 1 for 12 years, and I know that they do good work. It does not seem to me that the House ought, offhand, to dispose of an election contest in this way. The gentleman knows that if this was recommitted to the Elections Committee No. 1 it would not be considered very promptly by the House, and in all probability not be considered by the House again during the present session of Congress, because the last days of the Congress will be very fully occupied during the day and even at night. What is the reason for casting this reflection upon the Committee on Elections No. 1?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SULZER], in his remarks yesterday, suggested certain matters that he could have proved if he had had the opportunity of proving them. Whether that is correct or not, and I do not undertake to say anything about it or pass upon it, it does seem that the Committee on Elections No. 1 might again convene and give to him an opportunity which he says he was denied.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee will readily admit that if either the contestant or the contestee, or the committee itself by direction of the House, proposes to take additional testimony, that means that the case certainly will not even be reported, much less considered by the House, at this session of Congress. Of course, that would be true beyond peradventure if the testimony were to be taken in Alaska. My observation and experience on the Committee on Elections No. 1 for 12 years lead me to believe that everyone, contestant or contestee, who did not win his case before the committee always claimed that he could put in something else if he had the opportunity which would win it. I think that is true of my experience as a lawyer, while I was a lawyer practicing law, in respect to both my own clients when they were defeated and the clients on the other side when they were defeated. They always claimed that if they had had an opportunity to put in new testimony they would win. The gentleman from Alaska yesterday kept introducing testimony of his own which is not in the record. He was represented by very able counsel. I read carefully the brief of Mr. Lloyd, his counsel. Mr. Lloyd is a very able lawyer and he knows something about election cases. Now, upon a mere idle statement, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] proposes to cast a serious reflection upon both the committee and the counsel of the contestee.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield for a question.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois, not as a lawyer, which he knows I am not, but I have paid particular attention to this election-contest case and I heard all of the presentation yesterday. I heard my colleague from Indiana [Mr. MOORES], a very able lawyer and conscientious man, interrogate the gentleman from Alaska repeatedly, and in each instance, with all due respect to my colleague, he showed to the House that he did not have the understanding of the case as the gentleman from Alaska showed it and seemed to prove it. For instance, in reference to the two precincts which he, the gentleman from Indiana, evidently thought were adjoining it was shown that they are really 60 miles apart.

Mr. MANN. And still adjoining.

Mr. BARNHART. And in another instance he was referring to a man in the controversy that he was considering whom the gentleman from Alaska clearly demonstrated was not that man at all.

Mr. MANN. He asserted it.

Mr. BARNHART. He showed it by a photograph; he proved it that far, at least.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; he did not show it by a photograph. He exhibited a photograph, which was not in the record, by the way.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. And then read——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am asking unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has reserved the right to object. If I have the floor, I yield.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object. I will state that there was but one Demmert who voted at this election. He was George Demmert. The contestee in his speech later on read from the deposition of George Demmert, as to whom the committee decided he had a right to vote and counted his vote. The photograph was marked "C. W. Demmert," but it was undoubtedly the photograph of George Demmert, 33 years old, described in the depositions.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if we are going to get into an argument about the facts that have been gone into, I think we would better have the suggestion made.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understand it, the contestant was allowed 40 days for filing his testimony and the contestee 40 days to file his opposing testimony. Then 10 days were granted the contestant for filing additional testimony. In his statement all the way through, as I understand it, the contestee has claimed that this evidence introduced during the last 10 days was new evidence, which he had not right to meet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I thought the gentleman was going to ask me a question.

Mr. TOWNER. Well, it is a question. Was the contestee claiming all the time that this new evidence was introduced by the contestant during those last 10 days? Is not that the understanding of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know.

Mr. TOWNER. That is my understanding and, of course, that occurs in every contested-election case. It is not a new proposition by any means, as the gentleman from Tennessee seems to believe.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, after all, here is an unusual case where a committee, composed of a majority of Democrats in the House, two-thirds majority in the committee, has reported unanimously against a sitting Democrat. A contest arises in the House. I have wondered all the time whether the Democratic Members of the House would be politically honest enough to stand by the report of their committee. Now, here is an effort—I will not say the gentleman from Tennessee has resorted to a subterfuge, because I do not think he ever does that—but the result of it will be to deprive the House of any opportunity to vote upon the contest, a direct reflection upon the committee which was honest enough to disregard political considerations and make an honest report to the House. It remains to see whether the House will be politically honest enough to disregard politics, and I object. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and that is the end of it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a motion, but I would like to make a statement in advance.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not make a motion while the gentleman from Alaska has the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move——

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Alaska has the floor unless he yields the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. He did when he yielded to me.

Mr. MANN. He can not yield to the gentleman to make a motion to recommit the case unless he yields the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's last contention is right, that after he takes the floor if he yields to somebody to make a motion, unless the House be very charitable about it he loses the floor.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I just desire a minute to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for a minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the motion from the gentleman from Tennessee arises out of statements which were made by the Delegate from Alaska in his speech on yesterday relative to the fact that he was denied the opportunity to produce important evidence. Now, the statements of the gentleman from Alaska, of course, were surprising to the members of the committee. The committee heard every request that was made of the committee, and a statement was made yesterday which was probably misleading to the House. As far as taking the testimony is concerned and the time given for taking rebuttal testimony, the committee has nothing to do with it. The House of Representatives might extend that or give opportunity to take and consider additional testimony if it felt it ought to do that. But it was also stated that in the argument the time was shut off. Of course, that was very unfair to the committee, because the gentlemen appearing before the committee arranged the time for themselves, and the Delegate from Alaska in his statement stated that if he had an opportunity, of course, he had collected important information or testimony, which was in the city of Washington, that would throw a great deal of light on many phases of this case, but, of course, the committee know nothing about that. I simply feel just this way about it: With the evidence before the committee, we have considered it and reached a conclusion, but if the House of Representatives feel that on account of anything that occurred in any statement that has been made that there is available testimony, that it wants to hear that testimony or secure that testimony, why I simply submit that matter to the House to proceed with according to its own judgment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alaska.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, yesterday I discussed quite fully the Indian portion of this testimony, and it is not my purpose further to delay the House on that particular subject, but I wish to say that this testimony in regard to these Indians has developed two important points. First, that in the two precincts of Afognak and Seldovia the elections were fraudulent on their face, and the committee have taken no action in regard to them. I feel that those two precincts should be rejected by the House. The other point is that the testimony in regard to these Indians clearly indicates that like conditions prevailed in those precincts which were rejected by the court, and in that connection I want to call the attention of the House to the register of the voters from the precinct of Koggiung, on page 392 of the record. Now, Koggiung was one of the precincts that was rejected by the court. Koggiung cast 28 votes. Twenty-five of those votes were for the contestant and three of those votes were for the contestee. Let me read to you a few of the names on this official register of voters from the Koggiung precinct:

Ivan (his × mark) Ungak.
Balanka (his × mark) Larson.
Ballasora (his × mark) Gland.
Ivan (his × mark) Cheronkok.
Brokojsi (his × mark) Iwkak.
Simion (his × mark) Anmuksok.
Wassilli (his × mark) Cooktune.
Simion (his × mark) Tretiakoff.
Wassilli (his × mark) Vetok.

Now, those are the sort of people who voted in this precinct of Choggiung, where the official ballots were not used and where the committee is so solicitous that some one has been disfranchised. That record shows conclusively on its face, gentlemen of this House, that the same conditions existed in these Bristol Bay precincts that existed at Afognak and Seldovia. The chairman in his report inquires:

Should these ballots be rejected, what reason could there be for the judges of election and the people of those precincts not to use official ballots?

Why, the reason is seemingly that these people could not use official ballots. Apparently it was impossible for them to use them, just as it was impossible at Afognak, where another had to vote for the Indians, and therefore they wanted to use the ballot that was prepared by themselves, made up on the outside of the election polling place.

The contestant, in his briefs and in his argument before the committee, has made the assertion that these people are Russians and that they were guaranteed citizenship by the treaty of cession whereby Alaska was acquired by the United States. This is so much rubbish, dwelt upon at length by the contestant to confuse and mislead the committee. Such contentions are mere subterfuges. The treaty with Russia made in 1867 provided that the inhabitants of Alaska reserving their natural allegiance might return to Russia within three years, but if they elected to remain in Alaska they, with the exception of the native tribes, should be admitted to the rights of citizenship. These tribes of Aleuts never made allegiance to Russia. When the treaty provided for the return of the Russians to Russia it did not include native Aleut tribes who had never seen Russia and did not know such a country was in existence. The treaty provided that the native tribes should be subject to such laws as the United States might adopt in regard to the aboriginal tribes. Now, what is the statute of the United States defining what an Indian is in Alaska? It is this (sec. 2022, ch. 8, Compiled Laws of Alaska):

That the term "Indian" in this act shall be construed to include the aboriginal races inhabiting Alaska when annexed to the United States, and their descendants of the whole or half blood, who have not become citizens of the United States.

These people that the record describes were voted at Afognak have not become citizens, because they are still living in tribal relationship, and the statute says an Indian to become a citizen must "sever all tribal relationship and adopt the habits of a civilized life."

Again, the contestant pretends that because they are enrolled in a church that therefore they are citizens. If that were true, then every Indian in Alaska is a citizen, because they are all enrolled in a church of one denomination or another.

Again, it is not only a question of noncitizenship but a very serious question of fraud, because the record shows conclusively that even granting these Aleuts were citizens, they nevertheless cast illegal ballots, because they did not prepare their ballots, but some one not an official of the election prepared the ballots in violation of law for these Indians who knew not what they were doing. The election officials connived at and permitted this sort of thing that is absolutely contrary to the statute, and, therefore, I say the whole thing was a fraud on its face. Why did not the contestant place some witnesses on the stand to disprove the astounding evidence of fraud at Afognak and Seldovia that I placed in the record? He made no effort whatever to do so, but contents himself during his time for taking rebuttal evidence in attacking another precinct where no issue has been raised and then can produce no evidence to substantiate his charges. The same condition is true throughout the record, contestant relying entirely on private letters, telegrams, and ex parte affidavit and his own adroit and clever statements.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SULZER. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Was there any evidence before the committee as to why the official ballots were not used at these eight precincts?

Mr. SULZER. I do not quite understand the question.

Mr. HARDY. Was there any evidence before the Elections Committee as to why the official ballots were not used?

Mr. SULZER. No.

Mr. HARDY. Then there was no evidence to take the place of the legally required certificate as to why they should not be used?

Mr. SULZER. No, sir; there was no evidence. The contestant put in the record a letter purporting to be from some of his friends as to one precinct and an ex parte affidavit dated three months after election as to what happened in another precinct, but no witnesses were examined.

In the precinct of Afognak we placed Gregory Yakanak, chief of the Aleuts, upon the witness stand, and we proved conclusively by his own deposition and by the deposition of everyone placed on the stand that he was the chief. And Gregory Yakanak took his ballot and mechanically put it in the box. And when he did that he voided the ballot which I put in the ballot box. He disfranchised me, because his vote destroyed my vote. Any man who is a mechanical genius could readily make a tin man that would wind up with a steel spring and go and mechanically drop a piece of paper in a box, as Gregory Yakanak did. And that is all he knew about it.

These names that I have read here from the record of the voters in the precinct of Choggiung, disfranchised an equal number of the leading business men and professional men of the capital city of Juneau. That is what the House should consider as far as the disfranchisement argument is concerned.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. In looking over the record, on page 119, referring to the Bonafield precinct, is there any evidence in the record of the register of voters that voted at that precinct?

Mr. SULZER. I do not think so. I have not seen the list of the Bonafield precinct.

Mr. RAKER. Was that one of the precincts wherein there were unofficial ballots used?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. How many officers of election are there?

Mr. SULZER. How many officers?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. In Alaska.

Mr. SULZER. I do not quite get the gentleman's question.

Mr. RAKER. How many officers of election should there be at each precinct?

Mr. SULZER. There are three judges of election, and there is the clerk of the election board. I do not know of any others.

Mr. RAKER. A clerk or two clerks? Are there not two clerks?

Mr. SULZER. I think there are.

Mr. RAKER. Does not the statute provide for the appointment by the commissioner of three judges of election?

Mr. SULZER. I am sure about that.

Mr. RAKER. The three judges of election, upon the calling of the election in the precinct that day, appoint and swear in two clerks?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. Was there any evidence in the record showing whether or not the official ballots were received at this Bonafield precinct?

Mr. SULZER. There is evidence in the record that the clerk of the court forwarded the official ballots. There is evidence in the record that the clerks of the three courts in the three divisions where these precincts were located all forwarded the official ballots.

Mr. RAKER. I have not got down to the crux of my inquiry yet. The question now is, Is there any evidence in the record that the official ballots were not received by the judges of election in that Bonafield precinct?

Mr. SULZER. No; there is no evidence that they were not received; absolutely none.

Mr. RAKER. But there were unofficial ballots cast in that precinct?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. Now, what strikes me peculiarly is that there were only 4 votes cast, and if there were only 4 votes cast, and the law requires five election officers, I wonder what became of the official ballots if they were received or were not received, or what became of the question of the certificate under section 21.

Mr. SULZER. There is no evidence in the record about it.

Mr. RAKER. Well, would it be your theory that the voters at the election would or would not know whether or not the ballots were received in that precinct, if there were only 4 votes cast and it required five officers to hold the election?

Mr. SULZER. I do not know what the gentleman intends to convey by that.

Mr. RAKER. I will leave the others to follow.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, to show that the committee have not grasped the points in this case, I want to call attention to a few statements that they have made. I want to particularly call the attention of the chairman of the Elections Committee to this. On page 9 of his report he states:

> Three of the precincts from which the vote was rejected in the court decree are Koggiung, Nushagak, and Bonafield. These are out on Bristol Bay, some five or six hundred miles from Valdez.

The committee has not learned where these points are in Alaska. Bonafield is not on Bristol Bay at all. Bonafield is hundreds of miles from Bristol Bay. It is here [pointing to map]. It is not in the same division that Nushagak and Koggiung are in. It is in an entirely different division—division No. 4—where the court is at Fairbanks. Koggiung and Nushagak are in the third division, where the court is located at Valdez, Alaska. There is no connection between the two; and yet the chairman of the committee uses Bonafield as an illustration of the fact that no official ballots arrived in the Bristol Bay section. The record shows where Bonafield is, and the statement of the clerk of the court of that judicial division states that the official ballots were sent to Bonafield. Then, on the next page, the chairman gives as an illustration the case of Koggiung, manifestly having the idea that no election was held at Koggiung, because there were no official ballots or election supplies there.

What does the record say about Koggiung? You will find it on page 64 of the record, giving the official proceedings of the canvassing board:

> KOGGIUNG.
> At the time of appointing judges of election there was only one man recorded, and he is not a resident, consequently there was no election held.

That is the reason why there was no election held in Koggiung. Note the distinction between Koggiung and Choggiung. One starts with a "K" and the other with "Ch." They were two different precincts. But the reason why there was no election held at Koggiung was because there was no one there to appoint as judges, and consequently the commissioner appointed no one, and no supplies were sent there, and no election was held. That should not be used as evidence to prove that because nothing arrived at Koggiung, therefore nothing arrived at Choggiung and Nushagak.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Does the report show that that is the reason why no election was held? It says simply, "No election was held."

Mr. SULZER. I read from the record:

> At the time of appointing judges of election there was only one man recorded, and he is not a resident, consequently there was no election held.

That is signed "Wm. Nielson, United States commissioner."

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I was asking about the report of the committee.

Mr. SULZER. The report states, on page 10, that at Koggiung no election was held.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is a fact, is it not?

Mr. SULZER. It is a fact.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It does not state, as the gentleman has told the House, that the reason it was not held was that there were no official ballots?

Mr. SULZER. It says, on page 9:

> These are out on Bristol Bay, some five or six hundred miles from Valdez. There are also in this locality two other precincts—Koggiung and Naknek—while not involved in the court proceedings are discussed in the printed record and are important in reaching a conclusion as to whether or not there were any official ballots at the other three precincts.

The chairman must have considered that in deciding this case. The fact that there was not any election held at Koggiung must have had an influence on his mind when he makes a statement of that kind, and he must have concluded just as I have stated.

Now, what is the truth about Bonafield? We find it on page 63 of the record. The chairman of the committee has assumed that Bonafield was in the Bristol Bay section. Here are the official records of the canvassing board, on page 63, "Bonafield":

> At Bonafield sample ballots were used, but there were no affidavits from the judges as to why they were used, but a letter from the clerk of the court says that they sent official ballots, but sample ballots were used instead.

Now, that is clear and conclusive. The canvassing board——

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. The statement is that they sent official ballots. Is there any evidence in the record that official ballots were ever received in that precinct?

Mr. SULZER. No; there is not.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Or in any other precinct from which these ballots were returned?

Mr. SULZER. There is not. But this is what the report of the committee says.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Was there any evidence that they were not received?

Mr. SULZER. None whatever. We took the position from the very start that the fact that the judges of election failed to make any certificate that they were not there was presumptive evidence that they were there; otherwise they would have made a certificate in accordance with the law.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SULZER. I yield.

Mr. McKEOWN. I will ask the gentleman if they did not receive or acknowledge receipt of the other necessary papers in the election?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; they did. I will come to that in a moment. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the report of the committee on page 10, where it says there is no testimony in the record that such ballots were sent to or received at these precincts.

He says there is no testimony in the record that official ballots were sent to any of these precincts. I have just read to you the record in regard to the fact that the clerk of the court says he sent the official ballots to Bonafield. Now, what is true regarding Choggiung and Nushagak? Let us read from the testimony of the clerk of the court at Valdez, on page 238. This is very important. On page 238 Mr. Arthur Lang, the clerk of that court—and the clerk of the District Court of Alaska is a very important position—is asked this question:

Did you, as said clerk of the district court, cause to be prepared necessary election supplies to be furnished to judges of election in the various precincts throughout the third judicial division, Territory of Alaska, for the election to be held on the 7th day of November, 1916?—A. I did.

I want to particularly call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] to this testimony. I read further:

Q. What did these election supplies consist of?—A. Two election register and tally books and one registration book; instructions to judges of election; pay rolls; two official envelopes with registry stamp on each, one of which envelopes was addressed to the clerk of the court, Valdez, Alaska, and the other to the governor, Juneau, Alaska; a copy of the wet and dry law for or against the sale of intoxicating liquor in the Territory of Alaska after December 31, 1917; and the official ballots.

Those were the supplies that the clerk of the court prepared and sealed up for each precinct in his division and sent out.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Where does it say he sent them out?

Mr. SULZER. I will read it to you. It is on page 239. The gentleman has read the record, and the chairman of the committee has read the record, but they have overlooked the main point altogether in this connection.

Now here it is, on page 239, a little below the center of the page:

Q. Were these election supplies, as testified to by you, sent to the various precincts throughout your division to be used at the election to be held on the 7th day of November, 1916?—A. They were.

Is not that evidence? The chairman of the committee says there is no evidence that these ballots were sent. There it is in the record. Now, I am not quoting anything outside of the record. I am not making any charges about anything that is not there, in legal evidence. I showed you that the clerk of the court at Fairbanks says he sent the official ballots to Bonafield, and I show you here now clearly that the clerk of the court at Valdez swears on oath, on the witness stand, that he sent the official ballots to Choggiung and Nushagak.

Now let us read a little further:

Q How were they sent to the election precincts?—A. The supplies were put up one for each election precinct throughout the division and forwarded to the United States commissioners of each district, who placed them in the hands of the judges of election.

Now, why were they sent in that manner? Because the clerks of the court under the law were instructed to send twice as many official ballots as there were votes cast in the previous election, and the clerk is bound by law to send all these supplies for each precinct, and he sends them to the commissioners because he does not know who the election judges are. The commissioners appoint these election judges. But the clerks of the court know how many precincts there are. They know what supplies they have got to send out, and they prepare them all and put them in these envelopes as I have described and seal them up and send them to the commissioners, and the commissioners send them to the election judges. Now, that is perfectly clear.

What does Mr. Lang state further?

Q. Do you know that the judges of election in the precincts of Choggiung and Nushagak, in the Bristol Bay recording district, third division, Territory of Alaska, received the election register and tally book which had inclosed in it the instructions to judges of election, a copy of which is marked "Contestee's Exhibit No. 1," and made a part of this deposition?—A. I do.

Q. How do you know?—A. Because they went out with the supplies. I received the election register and tally book back in this office again after the election.

He knows it.

Q. How do you know?—A. Because they went out with the supplies. I received the election register and tally book back in this office again after the election.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Did these go out by mail or by special messenger?

Mr. SULZER. Presumably they went by mail where there is a mail service. Otherwise, I presume they would go by messenger. I presume they were sent by mail in these cases, because there is mail service to all these places.

Now, these supplies went out together. We know they got all the supplies except the official ballots, because the record proves it. What became of the official ballots?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Are ballots named in the list of supplies that were sent out?

Mr. SULZER. I have just read it to the gentleman, and if the gentleman knows this record, as he says he knows it, he ought to know that.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. What the gentleman has just read does not say anything about the official ballots.

Mr. SULZER. Let the Clerk read it and see if it is there. I have read it once.

The Clerk read as follows:

Q. Did you, as said clerk of said district court, cause to be prepared necessary election supplies to be furnished the judges of election in the various precincts throughout the third judicial division, Territory of Alaska, for the election to be held on the 7th day of November, 1916?—A. I did.

Q. What did those election supplies consist of?—A. Two election register and tally books and one registration book; instructions to judges of election; pay rolls; two official envelopes with registry stamp on each, one of which envelopes was addressed to the clerk of the court, Valdez, Alaska, and the other to the governor, Juneau, Alaska; a copy of the wet and dry law for or against the sale of intoxicating liquor in the Territory of Alaska after December 31, 1917; and the official ballots.

[Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. That shows how ignorant they are of their own case.

Mr. RUCKER. Let them go on, and maybe they will learn.

Mr. SULZER. Now, gentlemen of this House, I submit that it is not fair for members of this committee to throw me out of this House when they do not know what this record is. [Applause.] I submit that I ought to have an opportunity to show them what is in the record, because I think I have proved to you conclusively that they do not know what is in that record.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does not the gentleman think they ought to have a new trial?

Mr. SULZER. I certainly do.

Mr. RUCKER. Would it not be satisfactory to have the committee make a new report, now that they have been informed as to what the record contains?

Mr. SULZER. I certainly think so.

Now, my time is going, and I agreed that I would not take up any more time than is absolutely necessary, and I hope gentlemen will not interrupt me any more than is necessary.

Mr. Adams, the clerk of the court at Nome, shows, on page 56 of the record, that the official ballots were sent to Utica and Deering, the other two precincts involved. It is not quite as direct testimony, but it is indirect testimony, because he states as follows:

For reasons unknown, ballots failed to reach Utica and Deering.

He says "for reasons unknown." He is the clerk of the court. He prepared these supplies—prepared these ballots. He does not know of any reason why they did not get there; consequently he must know that he sent them, and they were sent to every one of these precincts, as the record conclusively proves. If they were not sent there, I say to the gentlemen of this House, why did not the contestant put these clerks of the court and these officials in Alaska on the witness stand and prove that they did not perform their duty? He had every opportunity in the world to take legal evidence. He had every chance to put these clerks on the witness stand. Why did he not do it? He never took a word of evidence about it. Is not that presumtive proof that he knew that the evidence that he might take in that matter would be against him, and he did not avail himself of the opportunity? Is not that clear? If the contestant believed that the decision of this United States district court in Alaska was wrong, and if he believed that these official ballots were never sent or received at these precincts, would not the very first thing he would do, after he filed a contest to unseat me here, be this, to call the officials who knew something about these facts and place them on the witness stand and take their depositions and prove his contention?

No; he does not do a thing; and what did the committee do? The committee placed all the burden on me, and said I should have taken all this evidence. Why, I had no reason to take evidence on this particular subject. I was perfectly satisfied with the situation. I accepted the decree of the courts. I was seated in the House of Representatives. I had no complaint. It was the contestant who was complaining. Why did he not produce some evidence, then, to show that these facts which are in the record are not true? The committee have simply taken part of Mr. Lang's testimony, and they do not see the purport or the meaning of it. They simply take the part at the bottom of page 239, which states that Mr. Lang knows that the official tally book and register were received at this place; and why? Because he received them back again after the election! Why was that put in the record? It was put in the record to prove that if these supplies got there, then the conclusion must be reached that the official ballots got there also. Further, that particular part of the testimony was put in there to show that the election judges of these precincts were officially instructed and informed about what to do and what the law was. I have a copy here of the election law and the instructions to judges. These instructions were printed in the registers and the tally books, and in addition they were sent to be posted, and they show exactly what the judges are required to do. It is all conclusively proven in the record. What does the committee report say? It says, on page 10, and I call the attention of the chairman to it particularly, and of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES]:

If the testimony clearly indicated that all the election supplies, among which are the register and tally books and official ballots, had been sent to these precincts, and a portion returned after the election, ordinarily the inference would be that all such supplies were received at those precincts.

Just think of that, gentlemen. Just consider it. They say that if the testimony clearly indicated such was the case, the inference would be that the official ballots were there, while the record absolutely not only clearly indicates it, but it absolutely and positively proves by sworn deposition, which I have just read to you, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana, the chairman of the committee, if he has thoroughly grasped that particular point?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that I think I have. Of course, I do not care to take the time of the gentleman to make a speech now, but that statement follows in the report, and I do not care to take the gentleman's time to explain it.

Mr. SULZER. And you go on in this report to say:

He does not testify definitely that he sent the ballots.

Does the gentleman think that is a correct statement?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is a correct statement; that he did not state that he sent the ballots to the precincts, because it is not part of his duty to do that under the law. The ballots are not distributed to the precincts under the Alaska statutes by the clerk of the court.

Mr. SULZER. I think it is very clear and conclusive. The gentleman from Louisiana in his report says he does not testify definitely he sent the ballots. I think he does testify definitely, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] said I could not prove it in the record, and the clerk read from the record that the official ballots were part of the supplies.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not think that there is any question that the gentleman is correct as to the testimony about sending them to the commissioners, but the committee was discussing the question of sending them to the precincts.

Mr. SULZER. Does the gentleman think that the commissioners tore open these official envelopes and stole the ballots?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not think anything of the kind. The gentleman asked me a question, and his argument is misleading, for the reason that he said that the clerk of the court sent the ballots to the precincts, when that is not the duty of the clerk at all under the law.

Mr. HOWARD. He sent them the same way that he sent all the other supplies?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly. Mr. Speaker, we now arrive at the proposition whether this law of ours in Alaska is mandatory or directory. That has been one of the principal issues in this case, and I am going to take up a very short time to discuss it. I do not think there is any question that it is mandatory, for this reason: If it is not mandatory, if it is construed to be not mandatory, then we have no law at all, because if the judges of election or the voters in any precincts in Alaska can disregard the use of the official ballot with impunity, without making any explanation of any kind as to why they do it, then we have no official ballot, we have no Australian ballot, and I think gentlemen can readily see that. That is the true test of the law. The true test of an election law as to whether it is mandatory or not is this, that if it were construed to be not mandatory, it would then have the force of destroying the act, destroying the purpose that the legislature had in creating the act; then it must be construed to be mandatory. If you say the use of these official ballots, these Australian ballots, is not mandatory, then you destroy the very purpose of the legislature in enacting that law.

I want to read just a few short extracts from the opinion of the attorney general of Alaska on this proposition. The report of the committee conveys the impression that the attorney general of Alaska ruled against me in this matter, but that is not so, and I shall show by quoting from his opinion. He states on page 81:

All authorities are agreed that the controlling purpose of the Australian ballot law is to secure a secret ballot, to the end that the voter may fully and freely vote for his choice of candidates uninfluenced by threats or intimidation, and that the corruption of his vote may be prevented.

The attorney general goes on to quote the Horsefall case, which the committee used as an illustration as to why this law is directory, and he sets out the opinion of the Horsefall case in full, but I shall not take the time to read that. I read further now from the opinion of the attorney general:

The foregoing rule has been applied in many cases where the ballots provided by those whose duty it was to prepare them did not strictly conform to the statutory provisions. In some of the cases the ballots were only slightly irregular, and there is a hopeless confusion of authorities as to what departures from the statutory requirements are and what are not fatal to the validity of the ballots.

I have been unable to find any case, however, holding the votes legal where the use of official ballots was entirely dispensed with.

That is the truth, and no gentleman can find anywhere in the books any decision that holds that a law is not mandatory, where an entire absence of the official ballot occurs, where they dispensed with them absolutely.

Mr. Speaker, what does the committee do? They start out in their report at the very beginning of it and apparently cite as their strongest case an authority found in McCrary on Elections, and say this:

This doctrine was approved by the House in the case of Arnold against Lee, Twenty-first Congress.

Now, those are the authorities that the chairman of the committee has been stating, decisions which were made in the Twenty-first Congress. The Twenty-first Congress, gentlemen of this House, was held 42 years after the foundation of this Government. There was no Australian ballot known or dreamed of at that time. How could a decision made in the Twenty-first Congress have any force or effect whatsoever upon an Australian ballot law? They did not know what an Australian ballot law was. It is a development of very recent years, and it is not fair, it is not just, it is not reasonable or sensible, to unseat me from this House, to destroy the official secret ballot of Alaska and our Australian ballot law, on some decision that was rendered by the House of Representatives in the Twenty-first Congress. Election laws have progressed since that time; election laws and elections have been hedged about by all sorts of safeguards that were not in force 42 years after the foundation of this Government, and yet the committee overlooks that entirely and endeavors to decide my case on something that happened 60 years or more ago probably——

Mr. ROMJUE. One hundred years.

Mr. SULZER. One hundred years ago. Now, that is not a fair proposition. What does the attorney general say further? He says:

The effect of applying the rule announced in Horsefall against School District to the case before this board, where no official ballots were used at all, would be to establish a precedent encouraging an absolute disregard by both voters and officials of the provisions of the law as to the form of the ballot.

That is exactly what it would do; it would encourage absolute disregard of this law, especially in those precincts where there are these helpless Indians who can not intelligently vote an official ballot, so that a few people there who want to indulge in corrupt election practices can have already prepared for the voters, before they go near the voting booth, ballots marked so all they have to do is to go into the election booth and put it in the box. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman were given the legal presumption that these ballots were sent to each precinct where there was no evidence to the contrary, just how many precincts would that leave involved—that is, if the gentleman were given the benefit of the legal presumption?

Mr. SULZER. That would be upholding the court's decision.

Mr. BLANTON. Would there be any precinct involved where there was evidence directly showing that the ballots had not been sent?

Mr. SULZER. Absolutely none. Now, what does the attorney general say further:

The Horsefall case, however, is not supported by the best authorities. Considering the purpose of the Australian ballot law, it is claimed that its object would be defeated if the direction as to the preparation and form of the ballot were not regarded as mandatory. The employment of express words is not always necessary to give a law a mandatory character.

Now, he quotes the decisions to back up his opinion, and these are the decisions he quotes, some of them. I have not time to read them all, but here is the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia in the case of Pearson v. Brunswick County (91 Va., 322; 21 S. E., 483). What do they say about it? This is what they say:

Thus it is seen that the general scheme of the system is to secure the independence of the voter by requiring him to cast his vote in secret.

That is the system, "secrecy."

Secrecy is the fundamental underlying primary essential of the system, and is the one element and condition which, paramount to all others, can not be destroyed without destroying the reform intended and reestablishing the evils it was designed to correct.

Now, that is the proposition exactly.

Statutes which make, even incidentally, for its preservation and inviolability are seldom directory, and without exception, where the language will admit of it, are held to be mandatory.

Without exception where the language will admit they are held to be mandatory, and what does our section 21 of the Alaska statute say? It says that the judges of election must make out a certificate and that certificate must accompany the returns. Will not that language admit a mandatory construction? Will not that language convince anybody that this law is mandatory? I think so. I do not think there is any question about that. Now, the attorney general quotes the case of Tuntland v. Noble (138 N. W., 292), and in that case the court disapproved the opinion in the Horsefall case, and condenses what seems to be the weight of authority, as follows:

What seems to us to be the true rule is laid down in the following from the opinion of the court in the case of Perty v. Hackney (90 N. W., 485). The statute under consideration is, then, not in terms mandatory——

Our statute is not in terms mandatory, but it does not have to be mandatory in its terms, in the express terms; if it is mandatory by implication it is just as mandatory as though it expressly said so, and that is what the court says in this opinion:

The statute under consideration is, then, not in terms mandatory, but it is well settled that the employment of express words is not always necessary to give it that character. Where the aim and purpose of the lawmaking power would be plainly defeated if the command to do the thing in a particular manner did not imply an inhibition to do it in any other, no doubt can be maintained as to the mandatory character of the statute.

Now, is not that perfectly clear and plain? Let me read that again:

Where the aim and purpose of the lawmaking power would be plainly defeated if the command to do the thing in a particular manner did not imply an inhibition to do it in any other, no doubt can be maintained as to the mandatory character of the statute.

"The aim and purpose of the lawmaking power." Now, what was the aim and purpose of the lawmaking power? I know what it was. I was elected to that legislature that made the law. I was a member of the senate, and I know exactly what the sentiments of the legislature were, and I know exactly what happened there. We went to that legislature determined to improve our election system. We went there determined to pass an act that would purify our elections, and we spent a lot of our time preparing and enacting this law. What did we do? We enacted an Australian ballot law, the heart and core of which, the essence of which, was the official ballot. Now, does any gentleman of this House think for one moment that we would sit there for nearly two months, using the money of the people, to pass an act for pure elections, to pass an act which the committee admit is mandatory as far as the official ballot is concerned—do you think we would do that and then that we would deliberately turn around and put a proviso in that law, that we would deliberately put in section 21, that would have the force and effect of destroying the very purpose of the law, of nullifying everything that we had done if it were interpreted in any way but mandatory? Could it be possible? It seems to me the contention is ridiculous, absolutely ridiculous, that we would go there and enact a law of this kind for the purpose we had in view, and then deliberately nullify it by putting in a proviso which would make it merely directory. It can not possibly be so. And there is no more question than that I am standing here that this law is absolutely mandatory, and the attorney general of Alaska and the United States district court of Alaska are absolutely correct in their interpretation of the law.

What does Judge Jennings in his decision say about this law? I will read on page 102. He quotes from Thirty-sixth Cyclopedia, page 1157, and the cyclopedia says this:

Whether a particular statute is mandatory or directory does not depend upon its form, but upon the intention of the legislature, to be ascertained from a consideration of the entire act, its nature, its object, and the consequences that would result from construing it one way or the other.

Now, what are the consequences that are going to result if this committee report stands and this law is construed as only directory? I say, what are the consequences? I say that they are simply this, that in any election precinct in Alaska at any subsequent election anybody can do what they please with the official ballots. They can throw them in the fire. They can use any sort of ballot they want; they can write it on a deerskin, and they need make no explanation as to what they do. They need certify in no manner anything at all about it. They need not prove that there were no official ballots at hand. They can simply do as they please, and make our law as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal.

Now, are you going to do that after we struggled for years to get this law in the statute books, after we have gotten to the point where we have some safeguards around our elections? Are you going to say, "Gentlemen of Alaska, we are going to wipe this thing all out and put you right back where you were before you enacted this law?"

Now, this decision further says:

When a fair interpretation of a statute which directs acts or proceedings to be done in a certain way shows that the legislature intended a compliance with such provision to be essential to the validity of the act or proceeding, * * * then the statute must be regarded as mandatory.

Now, it is absolutely essential. This goes to the essence of the law, and when it does there is no question that the statute must be regarded as mandatory.

What do we find in the case of Hope against Hengate (41 N. W., 1002); Apollo against Clepper (44 Pa. Sup. Ct., 396)? The court says this:

Where the provision of a statute is of the very essence of the thing to be done it is mandatory.

Is not that clear?

What does the court say in the case of Offield against Davis (41 S. E., 910)? It says:

When the terms of a statute are such that they can not be made effective to the extent of giving each and all of them some reasonable operation without interpreting the statute as mandatory, then such interpretation should be given to it.

Is not that the case exactly? Can any reasonable effect be given to this act unless it is construed as mandatory? Why, no. The act would be void. It would be no act at all.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I will.

Mr. HOWARD. Would the gentleman mind putting in the RECORD the very clear-cut opinion of the judge here on page 104, as to the Australian ballot statute, and his opinion construing the act down at the bottom of page 104?

Mr. SULZER. Does the gentleman wish me to read all that?

Mr. HOWARD. No. I just ask you to put it in the RECORD in connection with that statement.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate the matter referred to in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to incorporate certain matter in the RECORD, to which he has referred.

Mr. WALSH. What is that?

Mr. SULZER. Two paragraphs.

Mr. WALSH. Is not the judge's opinion already put in the RECORD?

Mr. HOWARD. It is just the interpretation that the courts have put on the mandatory part of the law.

Mr. WALSH. As part of the remarks he is now making?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The part of Judge Jennings's decision referred to follows:

ALASKA'S AUSTRALIAN BALLOT STATUTE.

Now, the same considerations which have led to the adoption elsewhere of the Australian system prevailed in Alaska and led the legislature of 1915 to pass the act of that year. There was beginning to work here the sinister influences which led to the downfall of the old system there. Owing to the fact that many men in remote localities in Alaska were markedly in the power of single influences, there was abundant opportunity for the stifling of a free expression of the opinion of the electorate. And, too, the political manipulator was already abroad in the land; the employer exerted pressure; men had been sent to jail by courts for election frauds; "the poison of the serpent was just entering the Garden of Eden." The legislature saw those evils, and to its credit determined to remedy them. That legislature was the second legislature to convene after Alaska had been given the small measure of home rule which it now enjoys, and the very fact that an Australian ballot was provided at so early a period is evidence of the enormity of the evil, of the imperativeness of a change, and of the efficacy of the Australian official ballot to effect that change. Accordingly the legislature enacted the law (session laws, 1915, ch. 25), and it received the approval of the governor. How is it to be construed?

OUR ACT, HOW CONSTRUED.

Now, having in mind the former evil, the desirability of extirpating that evil and the means adopted to extirpate it, let us examine that statute in detail with a view of ascertaining the legislative intent.

By its first section a complete change is to be wrought in a thing which is of the very essence. Prior to the enactment every person voting prepared, or had some private person prepare for him, the ballot which he was to use at the election. Now the change. Says the statute:

"After the passage of this act, for all elections in the Territory of Alaska * * * the clerk of the district court * * * shall prepare ballots for use in their respective divisions * * *."

Prepare ballots for use; not prepare them as playthings to look at, but prepare them "for use." I can not see that that can have any other meaning than this: "No other person shall prepare ballots" for use at the election. It seems to me that this construction is required not only by a consideration of the former evil but also by the context, to which allusion will be made later on in this opinion.

Section 2 provides that the ballot which the clerk is to prepare for use at all elections shall be printed upon white paper; that it shall contain the names of all candidates nominated and blank spaces to write in other names. We shall see later on that no one can write in any such names, however, except the voter himself or some of the officers for him in case of his disability.

Mr. SULZER. Now, here is the strongest case of them all, in my judgment. It is in 36 Cyclopedia, supra, and it says this. The court says it is mandatory—

If from a consideration of the entire act, its nature and its object, the consequences which would result from not construing it as mandatory would defeat the very objects of the legislature.

Then it must be considered as mandatory. That is perfectly clear. If from a consideration of the entire act, its nature and the consequences which would follow if it were not construed as mandatory it would defeat the very object of the legislation, then it must be considered mandatory, and that is exactly what this case does. If this law is not held to be mandatory, then the very object of the legislation is defeated, and must be defeated, because the very object of the legislation is the official secret ballot, and when you say that that can be dispensed with with impunity, then you have defeated absolutely the very object of the legislation, and that legislature which enacted it sat in vain and spent its time for nothing, and we have no guaranty of decency in our elections in the future. Now, what does the judge say on page 110 of his decision? I read:

If the canvassing board can indulge in any presumption at all, it would seem that it must be the presumption that no such facts existed, else the certificate would have stated them.

That is what the judge says. But the committee say just the opposite. They take the presumption that because the judges did not certify as to the facts, as the law provided and directed them to do, therefore the official ballots were not there. That is an absolutely wrong presumption. The presumption should be just the opposite. If the committee are going to determine the law and the facts in this case upon presumption—and they seem to have done so almost from start to finish—I say, if they are going to do that, they ought to adopt a reasonable presumption, and the reasonable presumption is this, that they could not make that certificate conscientiously, because they would be telling an untruth, they would be perjuring themselves, they would be subjecting themselves to liability to punishment for felony, because the official ballots being there, it was impossible for them to certify that they were not there.

Now, what becomes of that presumption? Why is it not good evidence in this case? What becomes of this fact, that if the contestant really believed that the official ballots had not been received in these precincts why did he not make some effort to prove it?

I recognize, gentlemen of the House, that the House is not required to decide this case upon a point of law, or to decide it upon any other matter than they may wish to do. They may seat whomsoever they please or see fit to seat. But I say this, that if the contestant would not make any effort to take any testimony to show the facts in the case, then the presumption must be that he was not satisfied that any facts he might develop would be favorable to him. And I say this, that if the contestant had proved by any evidence in the record that these elections in these disputed precincts were fair and fairly conducted and that there was not any wrong practice, then the House might be justified in overruling the opinion of the attorney general of Alaska and the United States courts of Alaska. The House might be justified in seating him if the House really could learn from legal evidence that these elections were absolutely fair. But the contestant has not made any effort to prove that they were fair. He has left it all in the air. Is not the presumption, then, that he could not make such proof? Because if he could that is the first thing he would have done.

What does the court say in 15 Cyclopedia? This is the case of Oglesby v. Segman, 58 Miss., 502, cited in People v. Board, 14 L. R. A., 630 (N. Y.). I read:

Elections are a contrivance of government which prescribes who are electors and how they may express their will, and it is a legitimate exercise of power to prescribe the description of the ballot which shall be used.

It does not say that everybody may be an elector. "Elections are a contrivance of government which prescribes who are electors." Election laws are made in the interest of the common good and the vast majority, and it throws every possible safeguard around the secrecy and the sanctity of the ballot, and it is not a question at all of disfranchising anybody. There is not any such question, in my judgment, involved in this case at all. Reading further:

We would still be obliged to hold that it would be far better that their votes should be deemed ineffectual than that the fundamental purpose of an important public statute should be subverted.

We are not disfranchising anybody, we are not taking citizenship away from anybody, we are saying that these illegal votes shall be ineffectual. Why? Because—

It would be far better that their votes should be deemed ineffectual than that the fundamental purpose of important public statutes should be subverted, and, in the struggle to save those votes by judicial construction, the door should be thrown open for evasions of the statute which might revive evils far more dangerous to the public welfare than can possibly follow the exclusion of a few hundred votes in a single county.

That is the law. I wish I had time, gentlemen of the House, to go fully into the details regarding each one of these precincts, but I have not the time. I must hurry along. I may say, merely in passing, that in the precincts of Deering and Utica the same thing happened. There was no reason why they should not have received the official ballots, and these precincts involved here are not the most remote precincts at all. The mail must go there before Candle gets its mail, and yet the statement is made that they obtained by telephone news from Candle as to what the ballot was. Official ballots were used in precincts that were infinitely more remote than Deering and Utica. Why should they not have received them at Deering and Utica?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that the gentleman makes the contention that the Alaskan elections are provided with the Australian ballot system of voting?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Is there any law in Alaska to compel a voter to divulge for whom he voted?

Mr. SULZER. None that I know of.

Mr. WALSH. Yet there is testimony taken before some official as to how certain of these Indians voted.

Mr. SULZER. Yes; and as to how certain soldiers voted.

Mr. WALSH. Were they compelled to divulge for whom they voted?

Mr. SULZER. I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH. Were they notified or advised at the time of the proceeding that they need not disclose for whom they voted if they did not care to do so?

Mr. SULZER. I am not advised as to that. I can not state.

Mr. WALSH. One further question: Does the gentleman make any distinction between a situation which might arise and lead to the conclusion that the party who received the certificate of election was the wrong party and a case in which, from the circumstances in connection with the election proceedings, it might appear that neither party should be seated?

Mr. SULZER. I do not believe I grasp the point the gentleman is making.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think the law is the same in a case where, as you contend, you have been rightfully seated in the House and have properly received your certificate—does the gentleman think the same treatment should be accorded that sort of a contest as would be accorded in a case where from the circumstances and happenings it might appear that neither party should be seated?

Mr. SULZER. I would not think so.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that in this case the only question is to decide whether or not he was rightfully seated as a Member of the House?

Mr. SULZER. I think so.

Mr. WALSH. And that none of the irregular acts connected with the election are of sufficient irregularity or invalidity to avoid the entire election and compel a new election to be held?

Mr. SULZER. I would hardly like to state anything in regard to that. It is a question to which I have never given any thought.

Mr. WALSH. I wanted the gentleman's opinion on it. Of course, if he has not considered it, it would be unfair to press the question.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there is other evidence in this record to show that everything was not just as it should be in this election. There is in the record the case of Louis Klopsch, who voted in the Sour Dough precinct. And the committee have given me credit for that. This man was shown to have voted for Wickersham, and his vote has not been allowed, because he was not a resident of that division in which he voted. But I call attention to this fact, that every voter in that precinct voted for Wickersham. Louis Klopsch was the editor and proprietor of a newspaper in Fairbanks, which had gone defunct during the campaign. He was well known in all that country. Everyone in Sour Dough precinct knew him, and when he came along and voted in a precinct that was not in his division, those election officers knew he was not entitled to vote. They knew he was not a resident of that precinct or of that division, and yet they permitted him to vote. That was fraudulent. And there are other cases in the record of the same sort.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The gentleman states that the committee rejected the vote of that man who voted out of his precinct.

Mr. SULZER. I have stated that the committee rejected the vote of that man. I am not complaining about that at all. I am simply citing that case to show that they violate the rules of elections in Alaska and that it is necessary for us to surround our elections and our election laws with every safeguard that we can.

Now, there was another vote rejected by the committee—that of a man named Julius Forsman, in the precinct of Afognak—that I have discussed pretty fully here. His vote was rejected because he was not a citizen of the United States. Yet he went and voted. The election judges undoubtedly knew of the fact, yet they permitted him to vote.

Now, the same thing happened in Cordova, but the committee have given no attention to it. The record shows that a man who was not a citizen voted at Cordova. The facts about that are stated on page 240 of the record, yet the committee have taken no cognizance of it, and Cordova cast a majority for the contestant. If the committee had taken any action on the matter, I would have received the benefit of it. It might have been only a fraction, but it would have been of some benefit to me. I simply call attention to it to show that the committee have overlooked certain things in the record.

The contestant has complained in his briefs because he was not made a party to the court proceedings. The facts are set out fully in the statement made by the court, found on page 99 of the record:

STATEMENT BY JUDGE JENNINGS OF THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT OF ALASKA.

All the defendants appeared without counsel. Mr. Davidson, besides filing his joint answer aforesaid, appeared in person.

The plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings, but the court refused to consider the matter on such motion, deeming it better to take it up on demurrer to the answers; whereupon plaintiff demurred ore tenus to the answers. The court advised the canvassing board to secure counsel, whereupon Mr. Davidson made the following statement: "Your honor, we have no interest in it any more than we would like the law point decided, and we have made our answer the best we could, and we have no other interest any more than to obey the orders of the court, whatever they may be."

The court thereupon inquired if Judge Wickersham was represented at this hearing and being answered in the negative stated that it would hear the oral argument of plaintiff in favor of the demurrer and would be glad to consider any argument that any friend of Judge Wickersham might wish to make or any brief he might choose to file at that time or at a later date.

It is to be regretted that Judge Wickersham has not intervened herein. He is a proper party, but probably not a necessary party. At present, as the court is informed, he is absent from the Territory, and the date of his return thereto is problematical. Owing to the near approach of the extra session of Congress a situation is presented necessitating action by the court without too long delay. I believe, however, that his interests have been looked after by Mr. Rustgrad, who has filed a brief herein in which, although the author expressly disclaims any authority from Judge Wickersham, the points against the demurrer are presented with great force and clearness; and I can not see how Judge Wickersham's interests could be any better presented were he a formal party and here protesting against the sustaining of the demurrer.

When the argument was made before the committee, I made the following statement:

Mr. Chairman, just to briefly refer to the argument of Mr. Wickersham in regard to the matters before the canvassing board, the contestant complains that he was not made a party to the suit. He was not a necessary party to the suit, but I think I was well within my rights as a candidate before the board to appeal this matter to the courts. The contestant claims that he was not advised in the matter; that he was here in Washington at the time; and that he was the Delegate from Alaska sitting in Congress.

The Legislature of Alaska was about to convene, and the leading men of the Territory, who were most familiar with political conditions—many of them the most intimate friends of Mr. Wickersham—were there in Juneau. They kept him thoroughly advised. He was thoroughly advised of every move. He sent telegrams to the governor of Alaska before the board convened and during its sessions, advising the governor what to do and how the canvass should be conducted. Some of those telegrams are in the record. He was advised of every possible move made and was in thorough touch with the situation at all times. He had many legal friends in Juneau who could have represented him at every stage of the proceedings if he had so desired. When the matter was first brought before the court, the judge of that court asked if Mr. Wickersham was represented, and when no one replied—and the court room was crowded with the leading citizens of Juneau and the Territory of Alaska—he stated openly (which is also in the record) that anyone, any lawyer, or anyone there present, might have the opportunity to represent Judge Wickersham and that he would be very pleased if that were done. Mr. Davidson, a member of the canvassing board, was present at that time, although Judge Wickersham states he was not. He was present, and the record will show it; and the question was directed to him by the court if the canvassing board had any further answer to make, and Mr. Davidson said they had not; that, so far as they were concerned, they were finished with the case.

Another thing that might be considered in this connection: Several months after the court decision of this case the contestant viciously attacked the confirmation of Judge Jennings before the Senate Judiciary Committee in May, 1917, basing his objections entirely on this contest decision, and alleging the action of the court was improper and incorrect, but the Senate committee overruled every objection he made and determined the action of Judge Jennings was entirely proper and correct, and his renomination was duly confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was somewhat struck by a remark I understood the gentleman to make yesterday, and I have refreshed my recollection of it by reading the gentleman's remarks in the RECORD. The gentleman stated that the contestant was not running as a Republican in Alaska. Will the gentleman state just what he meant by that?

Mr. SULZER. I will call the attention of the gentleman and of the House to the record on page 49. This is the deposition of the contestant, taken in the city of Washington before Capt. Mull in the House Office Building. At the bottom of page 49 we find the following:

Mr. LLOYD. You do not charge that the election judges who would pass upon these matters were not divided as the law directs?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; I think they were. But you must remember that I was not nominated as a Republican from Alaska at all. I never have been. The Republican organization up there, headed by Mr. Shackleford, always opposed me, and they did this time. They supported Mr. Sulzer.

Mr. BUTLER. Under what designation did he run?

Mr. SULZER. He ran——

Mr. BUTLER. As Wickersham?

Mr. RUCKER. As an Indian?

Mr. SULZER. By different designations in different sections of the Territory. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. What was the difference between the form of the contestant's nomination and that of the contestee?

Mr. SULZER. I was nominated by the regular Democratic convention, called at the city of Juneau, and very largely attended by delegates from all sections of the Territory. I was unanimously nominated, without any opposition, and ran as the Democratic candidate. [Applause.] I never have been anything but a Democratic. While I have received many Republican votes in the Territory of Alaska, I have never pretended to be anything except a Democrat.

Now, I spent five months in that campaign, and campaigned the Territory of Alaska thoroughly. I know everything that occurred and happened there, and I know that my opponent was running in one division in Alaska as a Republican. He was running in a second division of Alaska as a Democrat. He was running in a third division of Alaska as a Progressive Democrat. He was running in a fourth division of Alaska as an independent.

Mr. FIELDS. Is that all?

Mr. SULZER. That is all as far as the politics of it is concerned in these districts. It is a question of who was legally elected.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have not had the advantage of hearing the gentleman's speech; I have been busy in committee. Will the gentleman tell me what sort of a ballot they have up there; how was it designated? Do they have separate ballots, or does each election district print its own ballots?

Mr. SULZER. No; the clerk of the court prints the ballots.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not necessary for a man to designate the party to which he belongs?

Mr. SULZER. No; I have an official ballot here for the third judicial district of Alaska. It is certified on the back as an official ballot. It says there that the election judges can help the voter, but they must sign on the back of every ballot that they assist. That was not done in the precincts of Afognak and Seldovia, where outsiders who were workers for the contestant went in the booths and marked the ballots for the Indians.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman himself is not designated on this ballot as a Democrat?

Mr. SULZER. No; but I did not hide my light under a bushel; I spread it broadcast. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. But the gentleman did not bring the candle down here with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I will conclude as quickly as possible. There is one other question involved in the case that I wish to refer to, and that is that some soldiers voted in the Territory of Alaska. The committee report says that 36 soldiers voted in the precincts of Gibbon and Eagle. The committee report says that 7 of these soldiers voted for me and 1 voted for Wickersham, and that is correct. The committee rejects them all and deducts from each of us the pro rata in accordance with the total vote.

Let me tell you a few things which the committee overlooked in disposing of the soldier vote. I do not dispute the law as laid down by the committee. I think that is correct; I have no contention to make about the law on the subject. The committee say the law is that no soldier in the military service can change his domicile; that his domicile remains where it was at the time he entered the military service. I think that is correct. They say that he does not necessarily lose his citizenship or his vote because he is in the military service, but he can not change it from the original domicile at the time he entered the service.

Now, here is one point I want to call to the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON], as to the testimony of Orville Jones, found on page 192 of the record. He declares that he did not vote for me. Each one of the soldiers was asked this question: "Did you vote for Charles A. Sulzer for Delegate to Congress?" They did not ask them who they voted for, but they asked if they voted for me. Jones declares that he did not vote for me. Now, shall I suffer because this man declares he did not vote for me and therefore I receive no benefit from it? I say, should I suffer? I have suffered by the report of the committee, for it makes no allowance for that vote. The man did not vote for me. Another point: Why should I have deduction made from my total on the ground that the contestant and myself were the only candidates running for Delegate? There was a third candidate running for Delegate. There were three candidates. How does the chairman of the committee, or how does the committee, know but what some of these votes that were indefinite were not cast for the third candidate? Why should I suffer for votes cast for the third candidate?

Now, as far as the soldiers are concerned, I have no contention with the law as defined and laid down by the committee, but I say there is nothing in the record, no evidence in the case, to prove that most of these soldiers did not have their legal domicile in Alaska at the time they entered into the military service. Because a man enlists in the United States Army in Seattle does not prove that he is not a resident of Alaska. I have had some of them come to my office since I have been here that I know are of that character.

It is very reasonable to assume that a man might go to Alaska, spend years prospecting, hunting for gold and not finding all that he hoped to find, come back to the States to visit his old home or his folks or to see the new developments, and becoming short of funds or for other innumerable reasons decide to enter the Army. He goes to the recruiting office in Seattle and says, "I want to join the Army." They ask him where he has been, and he says in Alaska, that he understands the country thoroughly, knows its conditions, and how to take care of himself under the peculiar difficulties confronting a soldier on duty in Alaska. "Very well," they say, "you are just the man we want. We have telegraph and cable systems there, and we want men of your type up there. You know how to take care of yourself and handle yourself in that country, and we will send you to Alaska." He says, "All right; I want to get back there as quick as I can." He is sent up there in the United States Army, and he is assigned to the Signal Corps or the Medical Corps or the Quartermaster Corps. The record shows that most of these soldiers there were in the Signal Corps, the Medical Corps, or the Quartermaster Corps. The only soldiers going on the witness stand swore under oath that they were legal voters. Are we justified in saying that they are perjurers and not telling the truth? Why did not the contestant show where the legal domiciles of these men are? He shows that they enlisted in the States, all except one.

The committee reports that all of them enlisted in the States. That is not true. The committee has not followed the record. I call attention to the case of Ralph O. Wilson, on page 176. He swears that he enlisted at Fairbanks, Alaska, on October 20, 1913, and he swears that he has been a civilian there since 1911. What right have the committee to throw that man's vote out? How does the committee know that man was not a legal resident of Alaska and entitled to vote under their own interpretation of the law? I call the attention of the committee to the case of William E. Wood, one of these soldiers. His deposition is found on page 186 of the record. Mr. Wood swears on the witness stand that he enlisted at Seattle, Wash., July 1, 1914.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will say to the gentleman, if it will save any time, that William E. Wood's name was not considered among the soldiers who were held to be not residents of the district in which they voted.

Mr. SULZER. I have gone through the record and checked up every soldier, and every one is accounted for. I can not see how the committee could have allowed the vote of Mr. Wood and still reach their deductions.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will state to the gentleman that the list that was made up by the committee has been gone over a number of times, and it was made from the soldiers who were shown by the records of The Adjutant General's office to have enlisted in the States and whose testimony showed they had gone to Alaska as soldiers, and that that has been their occupation since they have been in Alaska, and that that was their occupation before. Mr. Wood was eliminated because he enlisted in Alaska.

Mr. SULZER. I have had no opportunity to examine as a witness anyone from the War Department, and when that statement was made up we were involved in a great war and the War Department was very much upset. There were possibilities of discrepancies occurring in a report of that kind, and besides it is not legal evidence.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will state to the gentleman that the courts have held that a certificate from the office of The Adjutant General, the legal custodian of documents of enlistment, has been held to be legal and all the evidence required.

Mr. SULZER. I will ask the gentleman this: Did the gentleman follow explicitly the statement and the report of the War Department?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; as to the place of enlistment, the time of enlistment of the men that were brought in there. Of course, there were a number of soldiers, some 45 or 48, and a number were eliminated.

Mr. FIELDS. Does the report of the War Department show the place of enlistment or the place of residence?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It shows the place of enlistment, but the law as held by The Adjutant General's office, and upheld by the courts, is that the soldier's home remains at the place of enlistment.

Mr. FIELDS. Oh, no. That is not so.

Mr. RAKER. That could not be.

Mr. FIELDS Many soldiers from my district enlisted in Cincinnati.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Probably I did not state that correctly.

Mr. FIELDS. And many of those soldiers who enlisted in Cincinnati voted by mail in Kentucky at their respective precincts.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; that might be true.

Mr. FIELDS. So that the place of enlistment does not determine the place of residence.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; I did not intend to say that it did; but, of course, I shall not take up the time of the gentleman to discuss that situation, but will discuss it when I come to it.

Mr. SULZER. Does the gentleman recollect that at the bottom of the statement from the War Department it is stated that they have no records as to Clarence Hefron?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Showing that he has been enlisted in the United States Army, and they have searched the records for the past eight years.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; I recollect that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did the committee make any deduction for Mr. Hefron?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. How does the committee arrive at the total of 36 votes?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I would have to go through all of the evidence, of course. I do not care to take that much of the gentleman's time.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman admits that there were the votes of 36 soldiers in controversy?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman admits that 36 have been deducted, does he not?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. How does he eliminate those two—Mr. Wood and Mr. Hefron.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Because there were more than 36 involved in the controversy over the soldiers.

Mr. SULZER. I do not agree with that. I just asked the gentleman if the total was 36.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Thirty-six were involved in the deductions, but not involved in the entire controversy about soldiers.

Mr. SULZER. Does the gentleman get that from the statement of the War Department?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; and the record in this case.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to count that up.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I have been through it several times.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I understand that there was a contest and the committee excluded 36 votes?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. How many of those were taken from the contestant's total?

Mr. SULZER. I suffered a net loss of 20.

Mr. RAKER. Where does Lena Morrow Lewis come in, who received 1,346 votes in Alaska? How many of those 36 voted for Lena?

Mr. SULZER. Well, the committee just assumed that the soldiers were so gallant none of them would vote for a lady. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The calculation is made on the basis of the votes polled there as actually polled, because that is what the law provided.

Mr. RAKER. The question struck me as being important, if the gentleman will allow me to answer.

Mr. SULZER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RAKER. In general, the record shows that Lena Morrow Lewis received 1,346 votes in Alaska. Now, I wondered how you could take all the votes from Mr. Wickersham and Mr. Sulzer, the contestant and contestee, and leave Miss Lewis without any votes. Who knows but what every one of those 36 soldiers voted for Miss Lewis? Yet at the same time you deduct them from Mr. Wickersham, who loses them and he ought not to, and Mr. Sulzer, who loses them, possibly when he ought not to, when, as a matter of fact, they should be deducted from Miss Lewis.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not agree with the gentleman. It was based upon the vote each got there, on the percentage; that is what the statute, the law, requires containing that provision; you have either got to do that or you have got to cast out the precinct.

Mr. SULZER. I call the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana to the record on pages 150 and 151, which contain a statement of the War Department. I have counted up the soldiers which they enumerate, and they make 33.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Well, there is another certificate.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. There are four in the other precinct.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. They give 34; that would necessitate counting in Hefron.

Mr. SULZER. The four at Eagle are included in the War Department statement.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Thirty-three at Fort Gibbon precinct and 4 at Eagle precinct.

Mr. SULZER. Then you have a total of 37. You do not seem to agree with the chairman of the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Because Ralph Wilson was a civilian who enlisted in Alaska, the only one of the bunch who did.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman deducts Wilson, the chairman deducts Wood and Hefron, and I am sure I can not arrive at any conclusion as to what was actually done; but as far as the records prove there were 32 of those soldiers whose depositions were taken in Fort Gibbon and there were 4 that the contestant claims voted in Eagle. There is no evidence that they did. There were no depositions taken in Eagle. There is nothing at all about Eagle precinct in the record, but nevertheless the committee deducted those 4, and that makes 36, and I can not see how they arrived at it in any other manner; that is, the committee deducted the votes of all the soldiers shown to have voted at Gibbon and 4 that contestant claims voted at Eagle.

Now, William E. Wood swears that he resided in Alaska for six years previous to enlistment in the Army. I know William E. Wood. I know he was a deputy marshal up there in the early days. He is an Alaskan. He is what we call a "sour dough." He knows the country thoroughly. Now, what happened to William E. Wood? He went to Seattle for a trip. After he had been in Alaska for years, after he had established that as his legal domicile, he went to Seattle. When he got tired of Seattle he said, "I am going to join the Army," and he did join the Army, and the Army sent him back to Alaska. That man is a legal voter, and why should not the contestant be made to prove conclusively that every one of these soldiers was not of that character and type? Take the next, John O. Sherlock, page 196 of the record, where it shows that he enlisted at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., on July 19, 1914, and yet he on the stand said that he voted in Alaska in 1908 and 1912. Now, is the committee going to decide on mere presumption that that man was not a legal resident of Alaska simply because he was in the military service and wore the uniform of the United States Army, when he said on the witness stand that he voted in 1908 and 1912 and when the record of the War Department shows that he enlisted at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., on July 19, 1914?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I will.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Was there any proof to the contrary that he was not a resident of Alaska?

Mr. SULZER. No; there was no proof.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Is his name deducted from the number of votes cast?

Mr. SULZER. Absolutely.

Mr. RAKER. In regard to the statement about which the question was asked a moment ago I was not prepared to answer, and I would like to ask the Delegate a question. On page 162 of the record I find that at Eagle precinct Lena Morrow Lewis received 5 votes, at Fairbanks she received 48 votes, and at Fort Gibbon 3 votes. That makes 56 votes in all, and there were only 36 soldier votes. Now, who knows but what every one of those soldiers voted for Lena?

Mr. SULZER. Well, I do not know. I will come to that in a moment. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as I have said several times, the committee, in my judgment, instead of picking out these facts from the record—and I admit it is rather difficult to do it, because it is made as complicated and confused as possible by the contestant—but instead of picking out these various facts from the record they have evidently been largely following the briefs of the contestant, and that is what the report seems to indicate. Now, how does the committee know positively or definitely that these soldiers were not legal residents of Alaska? There were several hundred soldiers at Fort Gibbon alone on the day of election. No one will seriously dispute the fact that they were all citizens of the United States, and they had been in Alaska for some time. Why did not they all vote? Why did only 32 at Fort Gibbon vote after they had gone very thoroughly into all the legal phases of the question, after the matter had been taken up by the commanding officer of the Department of the West at San Francisco, after these soldiers had consulted numerous lawyers in Gibbon that I know of and learned what their true status and rights were?

All the soldiers whose depositions were taken were categorically asked a list of questions, and they answered "Yes" or "No," and the true facts were not developed. They were asked this question, "Did you come to Alaska in the service as a soldier?" and most of them answered, "Yes." But that is not a conclusive answer under the circumstances of their questioning. Most probably they understood this question to mean that after enlisting in the States they were sent to Alaska in the Army service. This is shown by the deposition of Wood, who at first answers, "Yes," but subsequently states he had been in Alaska years before entering the military service.

Why should the committee presume that only 32 out of these more than several hundred were not legal residents of Alaska—that they would go and cast an illegal ballot, and that they would swear they were legal residents when they were not? I say, why should they be presumed to be of that type?

And when you come to these Indians the committee says just the opposite. When the evidence is clear, concise, and conclusive, beyond all peradventure of a doubt, why should the committee refuse to reject any Indian votes? Why? Because they say that the evidence is indefinite and it is unsatisfactory, and that there is no way by which they can figure how they can make any deduction of these Indian votes when the record does not disclose for whom they voted. They do not have any trouble deducting the soldiers under the same circumstances.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a legal presumption recognized by the jurisprudence of every State in this Union that when the law requires a certain thing to be done, or requires an official to act in a particular way, the thing is done according to law and the official acts according to law, until the contrary is shown; and the burden is upon anyone contending the law was not complied with to show that it was not complied with. If that legal presumption is given to the gentleman, his case is won. Is not that true?

Mr. SULZER. I think so.

Mr. BLANTON. He has been denied that legal presumption by the committee all the way through in passing upon the case. Is that your contention?

Mr. SULZER. I think the gentleman is correct.

Now, a few words further in regard to these soldier votes, and I ask the particular attention of the gentlemen of the committee, and particularly the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES]—and I hope he is not going out for the moment—to the fact that the committee have deducted 36 soldiers' votes from the precinct of Fort Gibbon and from the precinct of Eagle. There is no evidence in the record at all as to any soldier voting in Eagle; but, notwithstanding, they make the deduction; and Fort Gibbon and Eagle cast large majorities in my favor. Therefore, by the rule and action of the committee, I have suffered considerable loss, because I received 70 votes in those two precincts and the contestant received only 22.

Now, I want to ask the chairman of the committee this: When the record shows conclusively that 10 soldiers voted in the city of Fairbanks, Alaska, and when the record shows that I received 368 votes in Fairbanks, and the contestant received 529, why did not the committee take into consideration the Fairbanks precinct along with these other two precincts and make a deduction from all three? If they had done that, I would have suffered no loss.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will explain to the gentleman that Fairbanks was not an issue in the case, and that when the testimony was attempted to be taken at Fairbanks, as found on page 169, the attorneys for the contestee, Mr. Sulzer, objected to the taking of any testimony at that place, that being one of the grounds of the objection. And the witnesses were not sworn, and there was no testimony taken on account of the objection of the contestee himself. Particularly on page 170 you find that to be true; and the witnesses refused to testify under that objection.

Mr. SULZER. I think the chairman of the committee is totally wrong in his premises. In the first place, the chairman says there was no testimony taken in regard to the soldiers at Fairbanks. The chairman will admit there was no testimony taken in regard to the soldiers at Eagle?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not admit it.

Mr. SULZER. Where is the testimony?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. There is some testimony on that. But I will not take up your time.

Mr. SULZER. I want you to take up my time, because I want you to point out any place in the record where there was any depositon taken at Eagle. I have read the record through a great many times, and I know it almost by heart, and I do not remember reading anything of that kind.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I think if the gentleman will read his pleading in the brief, and his argument, he will find that is conceded.

Mr. SULZER. I never conceded anything of that kind. How could I do that? Does the gentleman think there is any deposition or evidence in the record about any soldier voting at Eagle?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Can the gentleman refer to it?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I will take that up when I get to my argument.

Mr. SULZER. Is it in the index?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I stated that the vote of the soldiers at Eagle is conceded in the brief, in the pleading. That is not in dispute. And I think I am correct relative to the testimony at Fairbanks, because here is the objection on page 170, made by the attorney.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman will concede that the attorneys on one side or the other objected to every blessed thing that was done in this contest.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. This objection was made.

Mr. SULZER. The committee, then, has simply upheld the objection made at one particular precinct and disregarded that one, but let all the objections stand as to every other precinct, because I got the worst of it. Is that the contention of the gentleman?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. There was no testimony taken.

Mr. SULZER. I call the gentleman's attention to the testimony of Robert Loghry, on page 166. The gentleman has the record there.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I know about that.

Mr. SULZER. I will read it:

Robert Loghry, being first duly sworn, testified as follows:
Q. State your name and age.—A. Robert Loghry, age 40 years.
Q. What was your business, occupation, or profession on November 7, 1916?—A. Master signal electrician at Fairbanks, Alaska.
Q. Give the place of your last enlistment in the United States Army prior to that date.—A. Fort Leavenworth, Kans.
Q. Did you come to Alaska in the service as a soldier?—A. I did.
Q. Has that been your occupation since coming to Alaska?—A. It has.
Q. Did you, on November 7, 1916, vote in Fairbanks precinct, Alaska, at an election then and there held for Delegate to Congress from Alaska?—A. I did.

They took no account of the Fairbanks precinct at all. That is what I contend with the chairman. He contends that there is no testimony on that in the record. I am reading from the record at page 166. Does the gentleman wish me to read further? I read:

Q. Did you then and there vote for Charles A. Sulzer for Delegate to Congress from Alaska?—A I refuse to state.
Q. What reason do you give for your refusal?—A. I don't know as I have to give any reason. I do not think the notary has proper authority to take my testimony.

That is signed Robert Loghry, sworn to and subscribed before Henry T. Ray, notary public in and for Alaska. That is followed by the testimony of James G. Coleman, another soldier who voted at Fairbanks.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RAKER. Was there any pleading involved in this contest which raised the question of the soldier vote at Eagle, Fairbanks, and Gibbon?

Mr. SULZER. Well, there was at all three of them.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I think the gentleman is mistaken as to Fairbanks. Objection was made by his counsel, and I consider the objection as absolutely good.

Mr. SULZER. I call the gentleman's attention to the record on page 36, where it is alleged in contestant's petition that illegal votes were cast at the precinct of Fairbanks. That is on page 36 of the record. I will call attention to the record there, where the contestant gave notice of taking depositions at Fairbanks. I have just called attention to page 166, where it is shown that depositions were taken. Now the gentleman ignores and does not consider Fairbanks, simply because some one who happened to act as my attorney there objected to taking testimony. Is the gentleman deciding this case on legal technicalities of that sort?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; because that precinct is not in issue.

Mr. SULZER. Has the gentleman any doubt that soldiers voted in Fairbanks?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Fairbanks was not an issue in the record. That was done at the instance of the gentleman's counsel. It is true that in rebuttal Mr. Wickersham made an objection.

Mr. SULZER. Was it not in the pleading?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It may have been in the pleading. That may be so.

Mr. SULZER. I call attention to page 36, that there were illegal votes cast in Fairbanks. That is his reply to the answer.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That was not in his original petition. That is what I said. The objection made was in the final reply to the contest—the answer to the contest—and it was good.

Mr. SULZER. I do not understand the legal points involved, but it was not my understanding that that particular issue had to be raised in the original pleading. I think it could come in in the reply.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, as a lawyer, if these pleadings of the contestant did not raise the question of illegal votes cast at Fairbanks, and whether the deposition of a witness was not taken there who showed himself to be a soldier who enlisted at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and went to Alaska, and remained in the service of the United States Government, thus proving, according to the committee's contention, that his vote should not be counted as being illegal. Did not that raise an issue before the committee which they should have considered?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I do not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. Then there is nothing in the pleading or evidence that would raise an issue?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Oh, yes. This question was not raised in the main issue, and the objection was made on behalf of Mr. Sulzer against taking depositions.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SULZER. In a moment. If I understand the contention of the gentleman from Louisiana, it is simply this: That if I had attorneys at every place where there was any testimony taken in this case and those attorneys objected to the taking of the testimony, then there would be no testimony in the case at all. I am anxious to know about that, because I might be involved in some future contest at a future time. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If the testimony was not taken, of course it is not in evidence.

Mr. SULZER. It is here in the record. I have read it. The gentleman did not consider it because my attorney objected to it. Well, my attorney objected to taking the testimony of soldiers at Gibbon—see the record, page 172—but Gibbon precinct has not been disregarded by the committee. If the gentleman will follow my attorneys in this case, then he will seat me and his report is not right. [Laughter.]

The gentleman says in this Indian proposition that my attorneys made the statement that all the Indians ought either to be counted or all thrown out, and therefore he followed the advice of my attorney. That is a surprising statement, because if the gentleman followed the advice of my attorneys I can not understand how in the world he brought in this report. [Laughter.] Because my attorneys certainly never advised my being unseated. [Laughter.] If I am going to lose this case on such technicalities, I might as well stop right here, and there is no use in arguing it further.

Now I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. In turning to page 166 of the record, as to Fairbanks, I notice a number of witnesses were subpœnaed to testify before the notary, and that the attorneys for the parties were present at that place, and that two depositions were taken, and on page 167 I find the following:

Witnesses Griffin and Myerson, upon satisfactory showing that they had not voted at the election on November 7, 1917, were excused from further attendance.

Then this follows:

At this time the notary adjourned the hearing until June 15, 1917, at 1 o'clock p. m., and excused all witnesses until that time.

Mr. Clegg, of counsel for Mr. Sulzer, entered objection to adjournment on the ground that "all the witnesses are now present, and that the officer, Henry T. Ray, as notary public, has now no authority under the statute to postpone or continue the proceeding until to-morrow at the time set."

Now, what I want to know is whether or not these alleged soldiers who were subpœnaed, alleged to have voted at Fairbanks, were put on the witness stand, and whether the notary continued the hearing without hearing their testimony, against the protest of the counsel for the contestee.

Mr. SULZER. Yes. That is what happened. Two were put on the stand, and the notary adjourned the hearing, and he adjourned from day to day until they got tired, and he did not take any more testimony. Everybody knows what the facts are at Fairbanks. It is not such a very large city. There are only a few thousand people there. Mr. Ray, the attorney for the contestant, and every attorney in Fairbanks knows every soldier that was there; knows every man in the Signal Corps at Fairbanks. There is no doubt but that these men were soldiers and voted; and yet the committee entirely ignored it, and did not take it into consideration at all, whereas if they had followed the same rule that they followed at Eagle and Gibbon and made the deductions pro rata, made deductions from all the precincts instead of only two, then I would not have suffered any loss at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in conclusion I wish to say that I feel that this House should reject the returns from Afognak and Seldovia.

I think they are wholly illegal and should be rejected. That would give me an advantage of 72 votes, and no matter what other considerations are taken it would insure my election. In addition to that the court's decision should be upheld; our law is absolutely mandatory, and the House should so rule. In addition to that the 28 votes that were fraudulently denied me at Craig ought to be allowed. In addition to that the soldier vote ought not to be taken into consideration at all, because the committee have overlooked very many important points in connection with it. They have deducted votes which should not be deducted under any circumstances. Beyond that there is no conclusive proof that most of these soldiers were not legal residents of Alaska at the time they voted. Beyond that the committee only picked out two precincts in all Alaska where the soldiers voted, and they refused to take Fairbanks into consideration. If the House will consider these matters from the evidence and the record, you will find that I was elected by a considerable majority of the legal votes cast in Alaska at the election November 7, 1916. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks I desire to call attention to the deposition of contestant, James Wickersham, found on page 210 of the record in this contested-election case of Wickersham versus Sulzer. This deposition was taken at Seattle, Wash., during the 10 days' time allowed contestant for taking testimony in rebuttal. He introduced no evidence to rebut any testimony I had placed in the record, but he placed page after page in the record of the most slanderous charges that reflect upon my character and reputation and the character and reputation of honest and reputable men who are among the leading citizens of Alaska. He has charged the press of Alaska with crimes that are serious, and he has accused the officials of Alaska with all sorts of wrongdoing. While he had every opportunity to take depositions to support his wild and vicious charges, he contented himself with filling the record, which is a public document, with unsupported charges that reflect on some of the best people.

I quote from the record, page 210:

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Some time not long previous to the time when this letter was written I had a conversation with Thompson at Fairbanks, in which he told me that he was then receiving from the White Pass & Yukon Railway a regular salary of $150 per month for the control of his paper, and I also knew at that time from him and from other official record sources that the Northern Commercial Co. and the Northern Navigation Co., united or one for the other, had an interest in his paper, in the ownership, or by an advance of money to him for its use, and a mortgage in return. Thompson and McGowan collected, I am informed, $10,000 on this trip outside for the purpose of supporting Mr. Sulzer and defeating me at the election, and this money was expended very largely in controlling the press in the Territory. The Ketchikan Progressive Miner editor had just previously made an application to me for money, which I declined to give him, whereupon he was employed by Thompson and paid $350, and he did everything he could thereafter to support Mr. Sulzer and oppose me. The Juneau Daily Empire, of which John W. Troy is the editor, was also paid a consideration in that connection, although the paper was supporting Mr. Sulzer without the payment of this money, but it was very useful in that work. Eleven newspapers in the Territory of Alaska out of, I think, 16 were paid portions of this bribe fund put up by these corporations, and every one of the 11 that stayed bought fought me to a finish and supported Mr. Sulzer. Many of these newspapers previously supported me, and undoubtedly would have continued to do so if they had not been bribed by Thompson and McGowan for the big corporations.

There is not a word of truth in these malicious charges, and the owners of the papers mentioned by the contestant resent the unjust and unwarranted attacks that have been made upon them by the contestant in his efforts to deprive me of my rightful seat in the House of Representatives. The record, on page 217, discloses the following interesting statements made by the contestant:

Mr. JONES. Upon the answer of the witness, I move that his testimony given on this subject in direct examination be stricken as hearsay and as incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and not within the issues.

Q. Do you know that this Ketchikan editor, whom it was testified was paid $250 by Mr. Thompson, actually received that money?—A. It was $350.

Q. Do you know that of your own knowledge?—A. I didn't see it paid, but I accused him of it in public meeting and he didn't deny it. He admitted that he got it, but said that it was for advertising.

Q. How do you know, Mr. Wickersham, that Thompson and McGowan collected $10,000?—A. I don't know, except from what Thompson says in his letter and the information that I got from Lathrop and the other people who subscribed to the fund.

Q. By Thompson's letter you refer to your Exhibit A?—A. Yes.

Q. That is the source of your knowledge?—A. That and, as I say, other sources.

Q. Common gossip?—A. Oh, no. Not at all. Not at all. Common history.

The editor of the Ketchikan Progressive Miner has always been a Republican and has always published a Republican paper. He supported me because he believed I was the best man, and because I had lived and worked in the Ketchikan district for 15 years.

This editor, Mr. Rivard, sent me the following affidavit when the contestant's charges were brought to his attention:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Territory of Alaska, ss:

J. E. Rivard, being first duly sworn, upon his oath deposes and says: I am the editor, owner, and publisher of the Daily Progressive Miner, a daily newspaper published at Ketchikan, Alaska.

On September 9, 1916, James Wickersham, then Delegate to Congress from Alaska, made a political speech at Ketchikan, Alaska, in the course of which he said that a corruption fund had been raised by the corporations doing business in Alaska, to be used for the purpose of bringing about his defeat for reelection; and he further said, in substance, that the newspapers of Alaska had sold out to the corporation committee handling this corruption fund, and that said committee had paid to the Daily Progressive Miner the sum of $300 to further the candidacy of his opponent, Charles A. Sulzer.

Said statement was false. And affiant believes and alleges that Mr. Wickersham made that statement, knowing it to be untrue, and that it was made and asserted maliciously and with intent to deliberately deceive the voters of Alaska.

Affiant further says that in the issue of said Daily Progressive Miner of September 11, 1916, he wrote an editorial which appeared in the issue of said date, wherein he denies said statement as false and herewith refers to said issue of the Daily Progressive Miner, of Ketchikan, Alaska, of said September 11, 1916. J. E. RIVARD.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 15th day of November, 1917.
[SEAL.] CHAS. H. COSGROVE,
Notary Public for Alaska.

[Extract from an editorial in the Daily Progressive Miner, Ketchikan, Alaska, Sept. 11, 1916.]

* * * * * * *

Leaving the infamous Alexander bill, he proceeded to abuse Shackleford, Irving, Faulkner, Murane, and others, who he said wanted to do the bossing in Alaska, to which he is much opposed, for the good reason that he wants to do that himself. He has tried to boss now for 15 years. He naturally hates like sixty to quit. Moving along in his usual tirade of abuses, he finally landed on the newspapers, which he said had sold out for $300, and he repeated, "for $300—just think." He further said that there was a newspaper man in the audience who had sold out in this campaign. That's Wickersham every time. He is always ready to accuse others. * * * But if he had reference to the Progressive Miner, all we can say is that he is a liar, and as such is a defamer of character. * * *

We have always tried to be fair with the Delegate. We have always given him credit when in our opinion we thought credit was due him, but our opposition to his coming election dates back from the time he said, "Not in 40 years will I help you in this matter." If the Delegate thought that he could throw dirt and we would stand that he might rub it in, he was mistaken. We could say a great deal about the Delegate that would not be to his credit, either. However, and so far as we are personally concerned, we feel that we have answered his charge, if the charge was intended for us. In conclusion, it would probably be well for the Delegate to remember Lincoln's old saying, which applied here would read thus: The Delegate may have fooled all the Alaskans some time, and he may be able to fool some all the time, but he can not fool them all all the time.

Messrs. Shackleford, Irving, Faulkner, and Murane were the leaders of the Republican Party in Alaska.

Mr. John W. Troy is one of Alaska's most honored citizens and a man of the highest integrity. When he learned of the accusations of the contestant against him he gave me the following affidavit, showing conclusively that all these charges of contestant are just so much rubbish:

[Statement by John W. Troy, of Juneau, Alaska.]

UNITED STATES,
District of Columbia, ss:

John W. Troy, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That he is a citizen of the United States, of the age of 21 years; that he is the editor and publisher of the Alaska Daily Empire, printed and published at Juneau, Alaska, and has been such editor and publisher for more than four years last past; that he was editor of said paper for one year previous to his acquisition of ownership of it; that during all of said five years he had been a resident of Juneau, Alaska, and is familiar with conditions in that Territory; that he was a resident of Skagway, Alaska, for 10 years, between 1897 and 1907, before he became a resident of Juneau; that he has read the testimony of James Wickersham in the contested-election case of Wickersham v. Sulzer, appearing at pages 208 to 218 of the printed record, and referring particularly to that portion of said testimony which appears at pages 210 and 211 and the reference thereto. On cross-examination, deponent says that neither T. A. McGowan nor W. F. Thompson, acting together or separately, raised $10,000, or any other sum, for the purpose of electing Charles A. Sulzer Delegate to Congress or of defeating James Wickersham for that office in the summer of 1916 or any other time; that neither T. A. McGowan nor W. F. Thompson were in the States during the summer of 1916 at all; that both of them were at Fairbanks, Alaska, long before the nomination of Charles A. Sulzer for Delegate to Congress and before it was known whether or not Mr. Sulzer would be a candidate for the nomination for Delegate to Congress before the Democratic convention, which convened at Juneau May 24, 1916, and before the announcement of the candidacy of James Wickersham for reelection to said office;

That when Mr. Wickersham testified that, "I had a conversation with Thompson at Fairbanks not long previous to the time when this letter was written," he was in error, because he was not in Fairbanks in 1916 nor had he been there for a long time before that date mentioned nor at any time during the period of the campaign of Mr. Sulzer for Delegate to Congress nor for a long time before said campaign was started; that such part of the testimony of Mr. Wickersham which refers to the Alaska Daily Empire and the deponent, wherein it is said that "the Juneau Daily Empire, of which Mr. John W. Troy is the editor, was also paid a consideration in that connection," is absolutely false and without a shred of fact for foundation; that the Alaska Daily Empire since it was acquired by said John W. Troy, or while said John W. Troy has been connected with it, never received a single cent from Thompson, McGowan, any corporation, or any agent of a corporation, or any person for supporting Mr. Sulzer for Delegate to Congress, or any other office, or for supporting anyone else for any office, or for supporting any proposition of nature or kind whatsoever, or for opposing Mr. Wickersham for Delegate to Congress or for any other office, or for opposing any person for any office, or for opposing any proposition of nature or kind whatsoever, directly or indirectly; that the Alaska Daily Empire has never received one cent for any purpose except for the sale of papers, for legitimate advertising, and in the general course of the legitimate newspaper business; that the Alaska Daily Empire donated, without charge to anyone whatever, the advertising that it carried in the interest of the campaign of Mr. Sulzer and the other candidates on the Democratic ticket, and it donated without charge hundreds of copies of the paper containing such advertising and other matter relating to the campaign of 1916 because of its conviction that the welfare of Alaska depended largely upon the election of Mr. Sulzer and the elimination of Wickersham; that deponent is familiar with the details of the campaign that was waged by the Democratic organization against Mr. Wickersham in the first division of Alaska in 1916 and in favor of the election of Mr. Sulzer for Delegate in Congress, and of his own knowledge no such sum as $1,500, or any other sum, was sent from Seattle to Juneau to be expended in the interest of Mr. Sulzer or against Mr. Wickersham, nor was any such sum sent to the first division from any other place, outside of the said first division, nor any sum whatever for use in the Sulzer campaign; that there were only seven newspapers in the Territory of Alaska which supported Mr. Sulzer in the last campaign, to wit, the Ketchikan Progressive Miner; the Alaska Daily Empire, of Juneau; the Douglas Island News; the Valdez Prospector; the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner; the Fairbanks Daily Citizen; and the Iditarod Pioneer; and seven newspapers in the Territory supported Mr. Wickersham, to wit, the Petersburg Report, the Juneau Daily Dispatch, the Seward Daily Times, the Anchorage Daily Times, the Fairbanks Daily Times, the Seward Daily Post, and the Skagway Daily Alaska; two papers, the Nome Industrial Worker and the Anchorage Labor News, supported Mrs. Lena Morrow Lewis, the Socialist nominee for Delegate; and five newspapers, the Wrangell Sentinel, the Seward Daily Gateway, the Ruby Record-Citizen, the Nome Nugget, and the McCarthy Avalanche, were neutral.

Only one of the newspapers that supported Mr. Sulzer in the campaign of 1916 supported Judge Wickersham in the campaign of 1914, to wit, the Ketchikan Progressive Miner; that the letter referred to in Mr. Wickersham's testimony as "Exhibit A" clearly refers to contracts that Mr. Thompson had secured from the newspapers for advertising space for the use of the National Liquor Dealers' Association, which contracts were secured long before the nomination of Mr. Sulzer by the Democrats, before the meeting of the Republican convention which failed to nominate a candidate for Delegate to Congress, and before the announcement of the candidacy of Mr. Wickersham; that Mr. Thompson made a trip throughout the coast towns of Alaska in the month of February, 1916, and possibly in early March of that year; that it was reported to the editor and publisher of the Alaska Daily Empire by his advertising manager that said Thompson was offering newspapers contracts to print certain articles to be prepared by said Thompson which would be in opposition to prohibition, the same to be run as advertising, but said Thompson did not offer said contract to the deponent, publisher of the Alaska Daily Empire; that a little later, but long before the meeting of the Democratic convention which nominated Mr. Sulzer for Delegate to Congress, and before it was known whether or not Mr. Sulzer would be a candidate, and long before the announcement of the candidacy for Delegate by Mr. Wickersham, Mr. Thomas A. McGowan made a trip along the coast of Alaska in the interest of the National Liquor Dealers' Association, and called upon the publisher of the Alaska Daily Empire at Juneau, informing the latter that he was representing the National Liquor Dealers' Association, and asked if he would accept advertising from the association and print the same in the Empire; that the publisher of the Empire informed him that he would accept such a contract, provided, of course, there was nothing objectionable in the matter submitted for publication in the advertising space; that McGowan then submitted a blank form of contract to the deponent, remarking as he did so, "Thompson was afraid to offer you a contract." When asked, "Why?" he replied, "Because he was afraid you would not sign it"; that upon investigating the deponent discovered that the blank contract presented to him provided for the payment of a certain sum for advertising, with a proviso that the amount to be paid would be 50 per cent greater in the event of the defeat of prohibition; that thereupon deponent told Mr. McGowan that he could not accept advertising for the Alaska Empire on that basis, that it was against the policy of the Empire to be financially interested in the result of an election, and that, furthermore, such a contract was in violation of the postal laws of the United States;

That deponent then told Mr. McGowan that he would be pleased to contract with the National Liquor Dealers' Association for space at the regular rates for advertising, but that was as far as he could go to do business with said association; that thereupon he signed a contract with the National Liquor Dealers' Association for $300 worth of space at the regular advertising rates of the Alaska Daily Empire, Mr. McGowan signing the same as agent for the said association; that Mr. McGowan thereupon said, in substance, "you are more conscientious than your contemporary," and selecting a carbon copy of a contract from among a bunch of others he exhibited to deponent the same, and it was signed by the publisher of another newspaper for that paper and by W. F. Thompson, as agent for the National Liquor Dealers' Association, and it was on the same blank form as that described, with a provision for an additional payment in case of the defeat of prohibition; subsequently that newspaper supported Mr. Wickersham for election as Delegate to Congress and he was one of Mr. Wickersham's managers in both the campaign of 1916 and that of 1914 in the first division; that there was nothing in the contract referred to as signed by the deponent that referred directly or indirectly to any other subject than the prohibition question and the space purchased; nothing was said in the contract concerning the attitude of the Empire on the question of prohibition or on anything else, the contract being simply for so much advertising space at the regular rates of the Empire; the space purchased was not great nor was the advertising contract regarded as an important transaction at all; the monthly earnings of the Empire have averaged for the last three years from $3,000 to more than $4,500 a month, and this contract, extending over several months, was for $300 only; later the advertising copy for the Empire was furnished by Mr. Thompson and printed in the paper in the advertising columns and as advertising in advertising type, and was paid for as contracted; that this contract was made long before the nomination of Mr. Sulzer or the announcement of the candidacy of Mr. Wickersham and before it was known whether or not that Mr. Sulzer would be a candidate; that there was nothing said during the negotiations for the advertising space concerning the election for Delegate or as to the attitude of the Empire on that matter or any other matter; that later the Alaska Daily Empire accepted advertising from the dry forces in favor of prohibition and printed it in like manner as it printed the matter from the National Liquor Dealers' Association, with this exception that the dry forces were only charged half rates for the advertsing while the National Liquor Dealers' Association paid the full rate, but not more; that Mr. McGowan and Mr. Thompson had completed their canvass of Alaska newspapers before the convention which nominated Mr. Sulzer had convened;

That Mr. McGowan and Mr. Thompson did not visit the coast again before the termination of the campaign; in fact, Mr. Thompson has not returned to the coast since he left there for the interior of Alaska in February, 1916, and Mr. McGowan did not return to the coast until the spring of 1917; that there was absolutely no connection between the campaign and candidacy of Mr. Sulzer and that for and against prohibition, though one of the campaign documents used by the Wickersham forces against Mr. Sulzer was a photograph of a letter written by Mr. Sulzer, in which he favored prohibition; that a further indication of the alignment of the voting population of Alaska is disclosed in the fact that the only precinct on Gastineau Channel, Alaska, including the municipalities of Juneau and Douglas, carried by Mr. Wickersham was the precinct in which 18 of Juneau's 19 saloons were located, while the precinct in which every one of Juneau's churches are located was carried by Mr. Sulzer by a large majority, the vote being, Sulzer 435, Wickersham 247; that Mr. Sulzer carried the only two towns in Alaska where saloons had been voted out of business by the people under local-option law then obtaining in Alaska, to wit, Skagway and Sitka; that there was no connection between Mr. Sulzer's campaign and the Guggenheim corporations is further disclosed by the fact that Mr. Wickersham got a plurality of the votes cast in the communities where the Guggenheim interests are located, including Cordova, notwithstanding that the members of union labor in all those towns, as elsewhere along the Alaska coast, generally supported Mr. Sulzer; that no corporation, local or foreign, contributed one cent to the Sulzer or Democratic campaign in the first division in the year 1916; that the whole campaign fund used for Mr. Sulzer and the other nominees on the Democratic ticket was small, not exceeding the total sum of $1,600 for the Territorial and legislative and divisional tickets, the committee being hard pressed at all times for funds to meet legitimate expenses for printing, for halls, music, etc.

My commission expires May 1, 1919.

Mr. Speaker, I have not had any opportunity to place these facts before the committee, and I have not placed them before the House because I felt it might be assumed that I was trying to influence Members in my behalf. The case is now practically disposed of and this may be my last opportunity to place the matter in the public record, and the slander against honorable and upright men should not be permitted to stand in the official records of Congress without a true statement of the facts being put in the RECORD.

These things illustrate the methods the contestant has resorted to in order to deprive me of my seat. Along the same line he has placed in the record private letters and telegrams, purporting to come from his political friends, in an attempt to prove his contentions regarding the failure of the use of official ballots. What do such letters amount to? They are not evidence, and he has taken no depositions nor produced any evidence.

A soldier came into my office the other day and gave me the following affidavit, and it shows how dangerous it is to make presumptions regarding a few soldiers voting in Alaska:

[Before the House of Representatives, 65th Cong., 2d sess. James Wickersham, contestant, v. Charles A. Sulzer, contestee. Affidavit.]

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
District of Columbia, ss:

J. Perrin Willis being first duly sworn on oath deposes and says:

I. I have resided in and been a resident of the Fort Gibbon precinct, Territory of Alaska, since June, 1912.

II. That I have been actively engaged in the practice of law in the Fort Gibbon precinct, Territory of Alaska, since June, 1913.

III. That I was engaged in the practice of my profession in the Fort Gibbon precinct on the 7th day of November, 1916. That on that date and prior thereto I was frequently consulted by soldiers living at Fort Gibbon, Alaska, as to their rights of suffrage.

IV. That I advised such soldiers that they could not exercise the rights of suffrage unless they had acquired a residence within the Territory of Alaska before entering the military service.

V. That several soldiers upon my advice made no attempt to exercise their rights of suffrage at the above election.

VI. That as many as three soldiers voted at the aforesaid election who were personally known by me to have been residents of the Fort Gibbon precinct, Territory of Alaska, prior to their enlisting in the said United States Army, and others stated to me prior to said election that they had resided in Alaska prior to their enlistment in the Army; in fact, I know of none who voted at said election who were not qualified.

VII. That I personally saw a wire signed by Mr. James Wickersham and delivered to George F. Bemis as his local political manager prior to the 7th day of November, 1916, saying, in part, "Soldiers can vote."

VIII. That I have been and now am a supporter of Charles A. Sulzer and am thoroughly acquainted with all the facts and conditions prior to and including the date of said election of November 7, 1916, and am at present in the military service of the United States.

My commission expires September 19, 1919.

Mr. Speaker, regarding the people at Klawock and Hydaburg, whom the contestant has asserted are tribal Indians and not citizens, I desire to place in the RECORD the following statements that have been sent to me. The contestant made no charges against the Hydaburg citizens until he put them in during rebuttal, and I have therefore had no chance to introduce evidence to refute his unsupported statements regarding these worthy people. The men named in the following letters were voters at Sulzer whom the contestant alleges are illegal, and some were of those who were forcibly deprived of their rights at Craig. I have affidavits proving each individual case, but I have had no opportunity to get same in the RECORD or before the committee.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Territory of Alaska, ss:

Charles W. Hawkesworth, being first duly sworn, upon oath deposes and says: That he is district superintendent of schools for the southeastern district of Alaska, and that the said schools are conducted under the United States Bureau of Education; that during the period from 1911 to 1916, inclusive, he was the teacher of the school under the said bureau at the town of Hydaburg, Alaska; that during his said connection with the said school he became well acquainted with the people and the conditions at said town of Hydaburg, and that the history of the said town is substantially as follows:

The young people of Howkan and Klinquan, from about 1900, had desired to move away from the two above-mentioned towns, where tribal customs were in vogue, and establish a new town where such customs would have no influence over them. They consulted with various superintendents of schools under the Bureau of Education to see if the bureau would establish a school at a site which they would choose.

This was agreed upon, and in 1911 the town of Hydaburg was started, all of the people of Klinquan moving themselves there, and Thanksgiving Day, 1911, is the day celebrated as Founders' Day in the town. The people of Howkan came later, and also several from Kasaan.

The people immediately organized a cooperative store and a sawmill, stock selling at $10 a share, and without exception every family in town owned shares in both companies. A town council was organized, and all of the affairs of the town were taken care of by this elected council, as the records in the town now show.

In order to have a uniform civic action, it was understood by all the members of this community that only those who were born on American soil could enjoy the right of franchise; affiant states that he was at Sulzer, Alaska, when the election of 1914 took place and knows that only such natives as had been born on American soil, abandoned tribal customs, and adopted the habits of civilized life presented themselves at the polls and voted at that election; with reference to the general election of 1916, affiant states that he is personally acquainted with the natives who voted at Sulzer, Alaska, at such election, including the following persons: Alex Peele, George Haldane, Peter Nathlan, Benson Skulthka, J. S. Brown, Paul D. Morrison, Fred Grant, Charlie Scott, Mason Frank, Powell Charles, Thaddeus Isaacs, Matthew Scott, Jack George, David Nathlan, Boyd Nakathla, Albert Nathkang, Sam Douglas, Mike George, Luke Frank, Fred Wallace, Alex Yealthtatze, Robert Edenshaw, Hugh Rogo, James George, David Jason, Willie Skulthka, Edwin Scott, and Alex Spoon; and that all of said persons were born on American soil, had abandoned tribal customs, and adopted the habits of civilized life, and were in all respects qualified to vote at such election.

According to the property returns of the town there are some 34 gas boats owned by the people of Hydaburg. These boats are powered with heavy-duty engines, ranging from 15 to 40 horsepower capacity, all of which are licensed in the customhouse at either Ketchikan or Sulzer.

The people have built their own sidewalks, by cooperative public work, and have also built two wharves, as well as the town hall. The only outside assistance of any sort they have received has been assistance from the Bureau of Education in establishing the school and in the purchase of the sawmill equipment, the purchase price of which was paid back in 1913. Last year, at a church meeting, the question was up for discussion as to whether the town should receive funds from the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions for building a church or should they furnish everything themselves and thus own their own building. After considerable debate it was decided that they would ask for no assistance from anyone outside the town, but would erect a building by themselves. This was done, and the cornerstone laid, with the records of the town placed therein.

The town council deliberations are all conducted in regular parliamentary manner and in the English language. The elected magistrate decides cases as they are presented to him in much the same way that cases are handled in the courts of the Territory.

Affiant states that from his work with the people of Hydaburg from 1911 to 1916, he can confidently say that these people are actually citizens of the United States, because of having abandoned tribal relations and taken up the life and habits of civilized men and women as white people in similar circumstances elsewhere in Alaska.

CHAS. W. HAWKESWORTH.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 5th day of December, 1917.

[SEAL.] JNO. R. WINN,
Notary Public for Alaska.

My commission expires October 21, 1919.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that one hour's time be granted to the contestant [Mr. Wickersham].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES], a member of the committee, asks unanimous consent that the contestant, Judge Wickersham, be granted one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, some question has been made here as to my politics and as to how I received the nomination for Delegate from Alaska two years ago. As to my politics, permit me to say that I was appointed United States district judge in Alaska by William McKinley and four years after that I was reappointed by Theodore Roosevelt. I have always been a Republican. Now, as to my nomination two years ago for Delegate from Alaska, permit me to say that the Territorial Legislature of Alaska has provided by law for nomination by petition. It is the only way in which one can get on the official ballot; it is the way that my opponent's name got on the official ballot; and it is the way mine got on the official ballot two years ago; and it is the way mine got on the official ballot this time, although last year we had a primary election in the Territory of Alaska and I was nominated as a Republican in the primary election, and my name came on the ticket in that way. I do not see the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] here. He asked some question about my politics, and I want to say to him that among the most pleasant things I have ever received in a political way have been the telegrams received from Theodore Roosevelt congratulating me upon my election as the Republican Delegate from the Territory of Alaska. So I hope there will be no question about that. I do not want to appear before these Democratic jurors under any other than my true colors. I do not understand that that has anything to do with this case, however, but since the question was raised by the gentleman from Ohio, I think it is perfectly fair to put the facts before the House.

In the two days that I have listened to my distinguished opponent I have been very much interested to note how skillfully he has talked about two of the precincts in this Territory without mentioning the point at issue. I say skillfully, for I compliment him upon the skill with which he has gone around the real true situation in Afognak and Seldovia precincts. I never was in Afognak precinct in my life, and all I know about it is what I have gathered from the standard histories of the Territory of Alaska. I have been in Seldovia. I was there this fall and became acquainted with 150 or more strong, vigorous American fishermen who inhabit that vincinity and precinct, and who gave me a large majority of their votes. They are strong, vigorous, good Americans. There are no better people in the Territory of Alaska than the men who live in Seldovia precinct, who voted for me two years ago and who voted for me this fall. I have not been in Afognak and know few of the people there. My acquaintance with them has resulted almost wholly from communications from them to me with respect to official business, but I do know their history and I do know their legal status before the law. My opponent has stood here hour after hour talking to you about "the Indians" who live in Seldovia and Afognak precincts. He has pointed the finger of scorn at them because some of them are unable to read and write. He has called them "Indians," and has mentioned the "chief of the tribe," and has declared that there is no excuse for permitting them to vote because they are Indians.

But my opponent is not ignorant of the true situation. There is in southwestern Alaska a population composed of people who have lived there, many of them, they and their ancestors for more than a hundred years. More than 100 years ago the Russians came into that region, settled there, intermarried with the Aleuts, and the half-breed Aleut-Russians inhabit Unalaska and Unga and Kodiak and Afognak, and some of them live at Seldovia. They are a mild, quiet, gentle people. The record before this House is full of evidence with respect to them. Father Kashevarof, their priest, was on the witness stand. He is their parochial priest, their guide; he gives their names and their birth, marriage, and death records. He states that they belong to his church, he gives their relationship to him and to his church. They are all his church members. They all belong to the Russian Orthodox Greek Church. They are substantial, quiet citizens. They lived in the Territory of Alaska long before Mr. Sulzer or I came there. Their church is there, their homes are there, their families are there; most of them engaged in fishing. They are a quiet, gentle sort of people. All of these people whom he has been talking about and calling "Indians" are by descent Russian half-breeds. He read you their names and pointed the finger of scorn at them because they had foreign names. Granted that they have, they are honest names.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Are they still tribal Indians?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No. Now I want to call your attention to that situation for a moment. These people have rights.

Mr. ELSTON. Do these so-called Indians wear the old-time Indian costumes and have they European customs and European habits?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. They have European habits and wear European costumes.

Mr. ELSTON. And they are not in any sense garbed up like the Indians of the West?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No, sir; in no way, shape, or manner.

Now I want to call your attention to their civil status and to the people themselves. I get the testimony with respect to them from the fact that I have been with them and know them. While I was never at Afognak, I have been at Seldovia, Kodiak, and Unalaska. I have been at all these places, except Afognak. I know these people and have been acquainted with them for 20 years. I know their ministers, and a better class of people does not live anywhere in Alaska than these Russian-Aleut people. They are each and all citizens of the United States, made so by the solemn treaty contract between the United States and Russia. They have the right to vote, and merely because some were unable to read and write, merely because some of them said "no," and passed over the questions easily and got out of the situation without giving any particular information, does not show that they are not entitled to vote. It merely shows that they are a quiet, inoffensive people. Nine-tenths of them can read and write. Nine-tenths of them read and write either English or Russian. Churches were established among these people more than a century ago. Schools were established about the same time in Seldovia, Afognak, and Unalaska. They have been educated in their local schools and, as a class, they are well educated, as good a class of people as you will find in any agricultural population throughout the United States. It is true that you can pick out one here and there who is illiterate, and a sharp and shrewd lawyer getting them on the witness stand and finding that the witness is deficient in some way, asking questions and permitting him to say "no" to everything, can get evidence against him which, if applied to the whole community, would make a very bad showing and specious argument, as the gentleman from Alaska did. But when you take them as a whole, they are an educated, civilized body, quiet, law-abiding, and almost without exception members of the Russian Greek Orthodox Church.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. It is claimed by the sitting Member that he did not have an opportunity to reply in rebuttal to your testimony. How is that?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. My opponent made application to the committee on two occasions for leave to put something before the committee, either to introduce new testimony or to prepare and introduce new briefs. I think he had that opportunity on two occasions granted to him, and on one occasion when I knew nothing about it, but I did not object.

The taking of testimony in his case was begun in May, 1917. I took my testimony in the city of Washington in May, 1917, almost two years ago. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] made some statements yesterday that appealed to me very strongly, and I thank him for making them. Then in July, 1917, following, we took additional testimony, and the taking of testimony was closed on the 9th day of August, 1917. The case was at issue practically at that time, upon the pleadings and all the evidence. This is January, 1919, and the committee has not refused anything that my opponent has asked of them. They have given him every opportunity to introduce testimony, to introduce briefs, and to appear before them in any and every way he has desired. Now, after almost two years has gone by, he comes in and says he has had no opportunity to be heard.

I want to go back and talk about these people in Afognak and Seldovia. I have gone over the record very carefully, and I find that there are 17 persons pointed out in the testimony in Afognak and Seldovia about whose voting there is some evidence in the record. Eight of these persons admitted that they voted for me. One said he voted for the "new man," which meant my opponent. The other seven said they did not know who they voted for.

If you knew these people—the quiet, inoffensive, gentle Aleuts—you would understand why they say they do not know. They just let it go at that. A cunning attorney encouraged them to do that, so as to make the record as bad against them as possible.

The Russian-Aleut voters, 17 in number, which have been shown to have voted at Afognak and Seldovia, who were examined, said that 8 voted for me, 1 for my opponent, and 7 said they did not know. That is all there is to it. My opponent gave notice that he would take the testimony of a large number, but they did not examine all of them. They had the records in their possession and knew their names, and they could interrogate them all, but they did not. That is the record with respect to these people.

Afognak was settled by the Russians in 1780, nearly 140 years ago, and ever since it has been inhabited by the Russians and their children. Afognak and Kodiak were called the garden spots of Alaska. Kodiak was the first capital of Alaska, made the capital about 1776, about the time of the beginning of the Revolutionary War. Churches and schools were built there soon after that, and these people have been living quietly and peaceably from that time to this.

In Bancroft's History of Alaska, 1890, which is the standard history with respect to Alaska, it is said about these localities:

> The islands of Kodiak and Afognak, "the garden spots of Alaska," as they are termed, enjoy more sunshine and fair weather than any portion of the Territory, with the exception, perhaps, of some favored spots of Cooks Inlet.
> The village of St. Paul, or Kodiak, contained in 1880 about 400 inhabitants, a large population of whom were Creoles.

A Creole is half Aleut and half Russian, or quarter blood, as the case may be. He is a mixture of Russian and Aleut. The Aleuts live along that coast from the mouth of the Copper River to the westward, out to the end of the Aleutian Islands.

Bancroft further says:

> The village of Afognak, on the island of the same name, separated by a narrow channel from the northern shore of Kodiak Island, is one of the most thriving settlements in Alaska. Though mountainous, and in some parts thickly wooded, the cutting of timber and firewood being one of its chief industries, it contains many spots suitable for pasture and agriculture. Boat building is also a profitable occupation. Many of the inhabitants, who now muster about 350, live in substantial frame houses, this being one of the few places in the Territory where any considerable number of dwellings other than log huts are to be found.

That was the description of Afognak and her people in 1890, about 30 years ago, as contained in the standard history of the Territory of Alaska. I could go on and give you more historical information about them, but it is all in this record. The record in this case is very full with respect to their being church members, with respect to Father Kashevarof and parochial schools and the parochial residence there, and the fact that they all belong to his church. All of them were asked if they belonged to his church, and all of them answered in the affirmative. With that admission, and it is an admission because it is not denied anywhere, I want to call your attention to their civil status.

In 1867 we purchased Alaska. At that time there were probably three or four thousand Creoles living along that coast from the mouth of the Copper River westward to Unalaska. They were Creoles, mind you. They were half-breeds, they were quarter-breeds, three-quarter breeds, and one of them became the governor of Alaska. One of these quarter-breed Aleuts became the governor of Alaska and another one engraved the great coast and geodetic charts of Alaska. He was a cartographer, skillful in the use of the pen, and made wonderful maps of Alaska, and you will find them all in Tebenkof's atlas of Alaska, consisting of 39 great charts, made in 1854. They were an educated people, a fishing and fur-producing population. Some arrangements had to be made by the Russian minister who signed the treaty with the United States for the purchase of Alaska about the protection of these people and their rights, and the treaty does make that provision, and it is a naturalization law. It is a law which naturalizes everyone of those residents of Afognak and Seldovia who are named in the evidence—in the record—as witnesses and voters. They have no need to be naturalized by any other laws of the United States, because they are naturalized by the treaty of 1867, in the third section, which reads as follows:

> ARTICLE III.
> The inhabitants of the ceded territory, according to their choice, reserving their natural allegiance, may return to Russia within three years, but if they should prefer to remain in the ceded territory they, with the exception of the uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion. The uncivilized tribes will be subject to such laws and regulations as the United States may from time to time adopt in regard to aboriginal tribes of that country.

You will notice that this provision not only protects them in their property rights and their religion, but it makes citizens of the United States out of all those who shall remain in Alaska after three years. The provision used here to naturalize are the words which naturalized the inhabitants of the Floridas in the treaty by which we acquired the Florida cession from Spain in 1818, and they are almost the identical words, the substantial words, of the treaty by which we obtained the Louisiana Purchase at an earlier date. Those words have been before the courts on many occasions, and the United States Supreme Court and the lesser courts have held that those words naturalize the inhabitants of the ceded territory. So that when these Russian half-breeds remained in Alaska Territory for three years after 1867 they became by virtue of that provision of the treaty, ipso facto, citizens of the United States, with a right to cast their ballot without any naturalization law being passed by the Congress. Congress approved that treaty, and some of these questions were raised at the time the treaty was approved in Congress by Senator Cullom, from Illinois, who was then a Representative from that State. The treaty was approved with the distinct understanding that it had that effect. It has so been held by the courts from that day to this, and every one of these natives that my friend called Indians—and the evidence is perfectly clear that they are half-breed Russians, all down the line, all belonging to the Russian Greek Church—are American citizens, and it is not necessary that they should read or write to be entitled to cast a legal vote. We have no literacy qualification in Alaska. If you are 21 years of age, and have lived in the Territory one year and in the precinct 30 days, you are entitled to vote in Alaska, if you are a citizen of the United States as these people are.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does that apply to soldiers in Alaska doing garrison duty?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It does not, but it applies to all of these people at Afognak and Seldovia, who were born there, the data of whose births Father Kashevarof gave in his testimony, all of which appears in this record in detail.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give us his idea of the meaning of the word "Tribes"?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; although it may be very indefinite, and I doubt if it will be satisfactory to me when I see it in print in the morning. But so far as it relates to Indians, it has relation to an aggregation of Indians who are recognized at least by the Government of the United States within her territories as having probably one language, living in the same community, being guided and controlled within that community by the same general cultural standards.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do they own property in severalty up there?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. All of them do; yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They do not own it as a tribe usually owns it—under the control of the chief?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; there is no tribal property.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Each man owns his own property?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; and the record is perfectly clear about that, and when the committee had this matter before them I argued it before the committee, as did my opponent. We argued it freely and fully to the committee, and the committee was advised about all of these various matters. I believe the committee was earnest and honest. They certainly had time enough to decide the case right, and they did decide it according to the law and the evidence.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I yield.

Mr. ELSTON. Do they act through a trustee?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Under no condition.

Mr. ELSTON. None whatever?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. None whatever.

Mr. ELSTON. Their tribal relationship is merely a traditional affair?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It is not only traditional but has not had any force among them for a hundred years.

Mr. ELSTON. Their recognition of the chief is merely traditional, too, without any authority, or has he any authority over them by law or custom?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. None whatever.

Mr. ELSTON. They merely look upon it as being an honor to him, and so forth?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Not only that, but if my opponent will read the record and would make a fair statement to this House, he would say to this House there was proof from the evidence of some of these men who are best qualified to speak that their local organization is a sort of town-meeting organization somewhat after the Russian type—a sort of town-meeting organization, as we in America understand it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. And it is that sort of an organization that these Russian Aleuts have maintained in southwestern Alaska, and nothing more. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There are citizens, yes, there are United States Senators and Members of Congress, who are known as members of certain tribes of Indians in Oklahoma to-day?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; some in the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Those tribes have chiefs?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; as fairly as those mentioned in this record.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Though they own their land in severalty and they are citizens for all purposes?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; just as the Russian Aleuts do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They do recognize tribes of Indians——

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I have but a short time.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I wanted to ask the gentleman if these Indians were modeled after the present Russian type or after the old Russian type?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. After the old Russian type. I thank the gentleman for asking the question, because there is no Bolshevikism among them; they are mild, gentle, church-going, God-fearing people. These facts appear as a part of the history of our country, and this House and the courts of this land will take judicial notice of a fact of that kind. But it may occur to some one to ask when the question of the citizenship of these people in the Seldovia and Afognak precincts was raised why I did not make an allegation that the people at Kodiak and Unalaska and various other places inhabited by them were of the same type and therefore not citizens? Now, Mr. Sulzer got majorities in other precincts, as the record shows, while I had a majority in two—Afognak and Seldovia. Mr. Sulzer had majorities in four others. He brought a contest against the two precincts where I had majorities, alleging their want of citizenship, when as a matter of fact the same character exists in the other four precincts where he got greater majorities than I did in those two. You may say, "Why should you not make the same allegation and throw those precincts out?" Unfortunately for me, I was district judge in Alaska for eight years, and during that period it became my duty at one time to consider this matter and to write a very elaborate and very learned opinion upon the status of these people. I am sure it was elaborate and I am willing to admit it was learned. [Laughter and applause.] In that opinion, delivered, I think, in 1902 or 1903, which will be found in Second Alaskan Reports, page 200, I had occasion to go over the entire status and history of these people, and I held they were all American citizens and had all the rights of such citizens. So when this contest came up I could not go back on my former decision in the case and stultify myself by declaring the people in these precincts were not citizens of the United States and were not authorized to vote for Mr. Sulzer and whose votes ought to be thrown out. I could not do that, because if I did somebody would refer to this decision, and I would be barred by it; and for that reason I could not do it. My judgment then was and my judgment now is that they were all citizens of the United States and had the right to vote for Mr. Sulzer or for me. You will find the opinion mentioned in the case of In re Minook, Second Alaska, page 200.

When we purchased Alaska in 1867 we found a local system of government there. We found this system of government in the Territory of Alaska at that time, and it had existed there since 1799. In 1799 the Czar granted the first great charter to the Russian-American Co. in Russian America, now Alaska. He granted a subsequent charter in 1841, and in 1867, when we took over the Territory, the laws under those charters were in force there.

It is interesting to read those charters, to discover how broad and liberal they were. I am going to read you that portion of the charter of 1841 and of the rules and regulations promulgated thereunder by the Czar, having the force of law in the Territory in 1867, and which fixed the status of these Russian-Aleuts at the time we purchased the Territory. Article III of that charter provided:

ARTICLE III.

OF THE CREOLES.

SEC. 236. Children born of a European or Siberian father and a native American mother, or if a native American father and a European or Siberian mother, shall be regarded as Creoles equally with the children of these latter, of whom a special record is preserved.

SEC. 237. The Creoles are Russian subjects, and as such shall have a right to the lawful protection of the Government, equally with all other subjects belonging to the rank of commoners, even should they not, by merit and for special cause, acquire the rights extended to people belonging to a different station.

Now, that was the status of these people when we took over this country in 1867. They were commoners; they were subjects of the Russian Empire, and had all of the rights in Russian America, now the Territory of Alaska, that any other Russian subject had at that time, including the right to remain there for three years and become American citizens, under Article III of the treaty of cession. And these people did remain at Afognak and Seldovia, members of Father Kashevarof's church, as the record shows. Their grandfathers and grandmothers and their fathers and mothers were there at the time, and all became citizens of the United States under the treaty provisions, because they were citizens of Russia in Alaska at that time, and their previous status was fixed in Russian America by the law of Russia applicable to the country at that time.

I am technically correct in saying that Afognak and Seldovia were Russian communities and that those people had all the rights as Russian subjects at the time of the purchase.

Article IV of the imperial ukase of 1841, which was in force when we purchased Alaska in 1867, provides also:

ARTICLE IV.

OF THE SETTLED TRIBES.

SEC. 247. The settled tribes in the colonies include the inhabitants of the Kurile Islands, the Aleutian Islands, Kadiak and the adjacent islands, and the Alaska Peninsula, as also the natives living on the shores of America, such as the Kenai natives, the Chugach, etc.

Now, that covers Seldovia and Afognak, Kadiak, and Unalaska. That covered every Russian settlement from the mouth of the Copper River westward to Unalaska and all the Russian settlements of those people in that territory except that at Sitka, which is not included.

SEC. 248. The settled tribes professing the Christian belief are not designated by any special name; those professing the native faith shall be styled, for the purpose of discrimination, "settled tribes of other religions."

SEC. 249. These people are recognized by the Government—equally with all the others—as Russian subjects. So long as they remain in the colonies they shall constitute a distinct rank of people, and shall not be entitled, by meritorious service or for any other cause, to pass into another condition.

Of course, without consent of the Russian Government.

SEC. 250. As Russian subjects, they shall conform to the common laws of the Government and shall enjoy the protection thereof.

Now, we have another class of natives in Alaska, dependent upon the colonial authorities, living in the colonial possessions, and they are provided for in this treaty as uncivilized native tribes, living outside of the jurisdiction of the Russian-American Co. but trading with them.

ARTICLE V.

TRIBES NOT WHOLLY DEPENDENT ON THE COLONIAL AUTHORITY BUT LIVING IN THE COLONIAL POSSESSIONS.

SEC. 280. The tribes dwelling within the boundaries of the Russian colonies, but not wholly dependent, shall enjoy the protection of the colonial administration only on making request therefor, and when such request is deemed worthy of consideration.

SEC. 285. The relations of the colonial administration with the independent tribes shall be limited to the exchange, by mutual consent, of European wares for furs and native products.

Now, I have gone thus far into this matter, because so much stress has been laid upon the character of the voters of Seldovia and Afognak by the gentleman on the other side. He has called them "Indians," and has never once been fair with you jurors by mentioning that they were Russian half-breeds, Russian creoles, and are specifically made citizens by the laws, first of Russia, and then of the United States.

Oh, but he says one of them could not read or write. Well, there are a great many voters in this country who can not read and write. Theoretically, all the negroes in the United States can vote, but as a matter of fact there are a great many of them who can neither read nor write. There are a great many white people who go to the polls and vote in New York City who can neither read nor write the English language. There is probably not a gentleman upon the floor who has not more people in his district who can neither read nor write than are to be found in the Russian villages from the Copper River westward to Unalaska. The people there do read and write, but many of them only read and write the Russian language.

As to those who are said to have voted for me and whom Mr. Sulzer desires to have stricken from the record because they can not read or write, Ivan Derenoff comes first. And you find from page 267 of the record that he reads and writes Russian; probably not English. John Taushwak, about whom so much was said, who is a Russian-Aleut creole, reads and writes English. John Taushwak is an educated man and an influential one in that community; a good citizen born in Alaska.

Anton Dolchak reads and writes English. Savarian Jakaloff speaks English, and so does Gregory Foxy. Mike Dolchok, who was mentioned, reads and writes English, as you will find on page 296 of this record. One man, Zakar Chonkua, can not read or write; and Steve E. Sorokovikoff, page 297 of the record, reads and writes English.

The first schools in that northern country were established at Kodiak. Before there was a school in California or Oregon or the State of Washington there were schools in Kodiak, and churches, and these challenged voters are the sons and daughters of Russian people who lived there for more than a century and have had the advantages of this schooling and the advantages of religious instruction from Father Kashevarof and other good men of that kind. They are not Indians, and I could not claim that in making my contest against my opponent, because I knew better. And he dare not set the truth up and challenge Kodiak and Unalaska, where exactly the same population lives that resides at Seldovia and at Afognak, because there he had the vote; there he had the majority; and to challenge that vote would rob him of his majority, and if I should do it it would stultify me, because I knew they were American citizens.

The same situation exists at St. Michael. St. Michael was not settled until about 1838, but from that time to this it has been a civilized community, inhabited by Russians and their descendants, who are the voters now there. The old Russian church stands there yet alongside of the old Russian blockhouse, and the old Russian minister is there. There are old Russians and young Russians, and a Russian half-breed population there; and they voted a majority for my opponent, and I have not challenged their right to vote. They are the cousins of the people who live at Unalakleet, of the same class and kind.

My opponent has challenged Unalakleet because there I had a majority, whereas at St. Michael he had the majority. St. Michael is called "St. Michael No. 1." Unalakleet is called "St. Michael No. 2." It is just across the bay, some little distance away. There is no difference in the character of the population. They are the same class of people. The records of our case are full and complete, the Census Bureau and all the Government publications are full and complete upon the character and the status of the people at Unalakleet, St. Michael, and from Unalaska to the mouth of the Copper River, and as to the St. Michael district there is plenty of evidence in the record, too. The evidence taken about Unalakleet shows, just as it does in Afognak and Seldovia, that the so-called Indians are members of the Greek Church and have lived there all of their lives. But either the attorney for the contestee or my attorney forgot it, and nobody asked the voters in Unalakleet for whom they voted, so that the record with respect to Unalakleet does not show who the challenged elector voted for. The evidence shows a lot of discussion between a couple of lawyers up at Nome, who took the evidence, about matters of law that have nothing to do with this case; but it does not show who these people voted for. The evidence about Afognak and Seldovia shows that 17 of them were interrogated as to whom they voted for, and 8 said they voted for me and 7 of them said they did not know whom they voted for. The cunning lawyer on the other side let them do it and did not get any information out of them, because that was exactly what he wanted.

We have another class of native people in Alaska, and that class is also referred to by the treaty of 1867. Those people are referred to as "uncivilized native tribes," and as to them the treaty provides:

The uncivilized tribes will be subject to such laws and regulations as the United States may from time to time adopt in regard to aboriginal tribes of that country.

They are to be controlled by laws applicable generally to the Indians in the United States. That distinction is made in the treaty of 1867, showing that their treaty rights are strictly preserved, and the distinction is made between Indians on the one hand and these inhabitants or subjects of Russia on the other hand; their rights are separate and distinct and are preserved separately one from the other in the treaty.

Now, my opponent told you that at the Hyda Indian Reservation those people were highly educated and intelligent; that they were qualified voters; and he expatiated upon their qualifications as good citizens at great length and declared that they did not live on an Indian reservation. The testimony shows that they do all live on an Indian reservation. We took the testimony of witnesses there at Craig upon notice given by my opponent. He gave me notice to take that testimony, declaring that a number of them offered to vote at Craig and were denied, though entitled to vote. I had a moment of leisure, and I went there and assisted in taking that testimony. Only two Indians appeared who claimed to have been denied their right to vote—R. J. Peratovitch and George Demmert. My opponent had a beautiful picture of C. W. Demmert, which he exhibited here yesterday, but the record, page 338, shows, without any doubt, it was George Demmert and not C. W. who thus appeared.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. It is said by the sitting Member that there are no Indian reservations in Alaska.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes. The sitting Member said that, and repeated it many times.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I would like to know about it.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I think that statement of the sitting Member is fairly representative of the wild, exaggerated statements that he has been making to this House for two days; he said that there are no Indian reservations in Alaska. He looked you men in the eye and said: "There are no Indian reservations in Alaska." Every one of those natives who is said to have come to Craig to vote was an Indian from an Indian reservation. There were only two of them who came and testified, Peratovitch and Demmert. Peratovitch testified that his father was an Austrian who had run away from an Austrian ship and had gone up there, and that he was the son of that Austrian. I asked him whether his father had ever been naturalized. He said he did not know whether he had been or not. He thought he had seen his first intention papers. There is no proof that he ever was naturalized, and the proof is perfectly clear that he never was. So here is the son of an Austrian, a foreigner, who claimed the right to vote at that precinct. He took the legal status of his father as an Austrian, and if there was no other objection to him that was a good one, and he ought not to have been allowed to vote because he was an Austrian. But he lived on an Indian reservation and claimed to be an Indian, and that, under the law, disqualifies him.

Now, Gen. SHERWOOD asks here if there is an Indian reservation up there. I filed with the committee, and the committee has it in evidence——

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. CROSSER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this Austrian was born in Alaska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. CROSSER. Would not that make him a citizen of the United States?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Possibly it would, if he was not otherwise disqualified. I will state the fact to you fairly. I filed with the committee a copy, an official copy, of the Executive order creating the Hydah Indian Reservation. I will insert it in full, but I am going now to read all of it except that part which relates to the description. It is an Executive order, made by the President of the United States. I read:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

It is hereby ordered that the following land and water surfaces within the Tongass National Forest, surrounding the village of Hydaburg, in Alaska, be, and the same are hereby, reserved, subject to any vested rights, for use of the Hydah Tribe of Indians and such of the natives of Alaska as may settle within the limits of the reservation, viz:

Beginning at a large rock situated at the line of high tide and a few feet north of the sawmill in the village of Hydaburg, on the west coast of Prince of Wales Island, at approximately 55° 12′ N. latitude and 132° 48′ W. longitude, and at a cross chiseled on said rock, and running thence east 140 chains to a point for the middle of the east boundary of the reservation; thence north 140 chains to a point for a N. E. — corner; thence west 279.60 chains on land and the water of Sukkwan Strait to a point for the N. W. corner; thence south 280 chains on said strait and on land to a point for the S. W. corner; thence east 280 chains on said strait and on land to a point for the S. E. corner; thence north on the east boundary 140 chains to a point east of the place of beginning, including a tract 12.24 square miles (7,833.6 acres) with all islands and parts of islands within said boundary, as represented upon a diagram accompanying this order and made a part hereof.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 19, 1912.

The accompanying map attached to the Executive order is entitled as follows:

Reservation for the use of Hydah Tribe of Indians and other natives of Alaska as may settle thereon in Alaska. Total area 12.24 square miles, or 7,833.6 acres. Department of the Interior, Bureau of Education, P. P. Claxton, Commissioner.

That order established the Hydah Indian Reservation for "the use of the Hydah Tribe of Indians," but that is not the Klawak Reservation, where Peratovitch and Demmert lived. Here is the one that relates to them. It is an Executive order, issued by Woodrow Wilson. I read:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

It is hereby ordered that the tract of land in Alaska, described as follows, in and surrounding the native village of Klawak and within the Tongass National Forest, be, and the same is hereby, reserved, subject to any vested rights existing, for the use of the United States Bureau of Education and of the natives of indigenous Alaskan race who may there reside, viz:

DESCRIPTION.

Beginning at a point on the shore of the salt bay or mouth of Klawak Stream, 114 links south of a post marked "U. S. I. R. 1," which is a witness to said point on shore and stands about 40 chains eastward from Klawak village; thence northerly by a marked line 58° 49′ chains to a point on the shore of Klawak Harbor which is 30 links north of a witness post marked "U. S. I. R. 2"; thence westerly along the shore, and then around the peninsula at the mean high-tide mark to point for corner No. 1, the place of beginning; situated approximately in latitude 55° 33′ north, longitude 133° 06′ west, and estimated to contain 230 acres, as represented upon a diagram accompanying this order and made a part thereof.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 21 April, 1914.

Then follows the description, which I do not read. This is dated the White House, April 21, 1914. To that is attached a map which is marked "Klawak Reservation, for the use of Klawak Indians, Alaska, embracing a tract of land in the Tongas National Forest, approximately 230 acres, Department of the Interior." It is under the Department of the Interior. Both these are made Indian reservations by Executive order of the President of the United States, which still stands. It establishes these reservations for the use of these particular Indian tribes and so designates them officially.

Mr. RUCKER. How much land is there?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. In the Klawak Indian Reservation there are 230 acres, and in the other reservation 12.24 square miles.

Mr. RANDALL. Are these reservations under the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or under the Commissioner of Education?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. They are under the Department of the Interior, but they are conducted by the Commissioner of Education, and the officers of that bureau are there in charge of them. Mr. Hibbs, who testified here, was one of the officers in charge of the Klawak, and another officer from the Interior Department is in charge of the Hydaburg Reservation. They are both reservations in every sense that any other Indian reservation created by Executive order of the President of the United States is an Indian reservation.

Mr. FIELDS. Are the people who reside on these reservations entitled to vote, or are they deprived of the right?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. They have no right to vote, because they are classed as reservation Indians by the Executive order of the President establishing them reservations.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question there?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Is there any evidence showing that these Indians have any lands in severalty?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; the evidence is all the other way. They all testified that they lived on the reservation. The Indian severalty law of 1887 provides—

And every Indian born within the limits of the United States who has voluntarily taken up within said limits his residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians is hereby declared to be a citizen of the United States, and is entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities—

And so forth. In other words, before an Indian can acquire any right as a citizen, and therefore the right to vote, he must take up his residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians and adopt the habits of civilized life. Now, he may adopt all the habits of civilized life that he desires when living on the reservation and he can not become a citizen or entitled to vote. As long as he continues in the status of a reservation Indian he can not vote. That has been decided too many times in Alaska to be in any doubt at all. It has been decided by the courts of the country many times as respects the status of these natives under the Indian severalty law of 1887. Every lawyer who has had occasion to look into matters of that kind knows what the law is and what it means, and it means that Demmert and Peratovich, who came from the Klawak Indian Reservation to Craig to vote, were not allowed to vote by the election officers there because they were challenged, for the reason that they were Indians and resided on an Indian reservation. My opponent grew very eloquent and talked loudly about a conspiracy in challenging their votes. That is all there was to the conspiracy. He testified very fully about everything that he thought was important to his case here, but he gave you no evidence upon that, except what I have repeated, and in line with it.

Now, I challenged the 28 Hydah Indian votes cast for him at Sulzer. He lived at Sulzer, in Sulzer precinct, and the Hydaburg Reservation is in that precinct. Twenty-eight of the people from that reservation, as the record shows very fully and completely, came over to Sulzer and voted, and they voted for him. How do I know? Well, I can tell you how I know. There were 72 votes cast in the precinct, and I got only 2, and I learned who cast those 2. That was testified to in the record, and that left him the 28 Indians. They came over to Sulzer and voted for him two years ago. They came from an Indian reservation, where they resided as Indians. Oh, but he says, they can, some of them, read and write; and Demmert and Peratovich are put on the witness stand here as exhibits. Well, one of them does run a little store and the other, I think, runs a boat or something of that kind. They are pretty good men. I have known them as long as my opponent has. Some years ago, when I had occasion to make a speech up there, I gave that bunch of fellows a great big American flag, and they have it yet, and they are very proud of it. I know them very well, and a good many of them are bright Indians. You all know how the boys who go to Indian schools turn out. Many of them are bright young men, and many of these young men on these reservations, if they had the status of voters, would make good voters. I make no complaint against the men themselves—that is, Demmert and Peratovich—but, of course, there are a lot of old Indians there who can neither read nor write, who can not speak a word of English, who can speak only a little Chinook jargon, or the Klawak or Hydah Indian tongues. Those two men—Demmert and Peratovich—can read and write and are fairly intelligent men. If they did not live on this Indian reservation and resided separate and apart therefrom, they would be legal voters.

If they would abandon the Indian reservation, under the Indian severalty law of 1887, and take up their residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians, they might be entitled to vote. Oh, well, you may say that is not very liberal, but it is the law. The finest mind in France or England or any foreign country might come to America and stay here his whole lifetime and not be entitled to vote. He might be a philosopher, a great financier, a Christian nobleman, but that would not entitle him to vote. The Supreme Court of the United States has passed on that question in the Elk case long ago. (Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S., 94.) It said in that case that while it may be that these accomplishments would justify Congress in making him a citizen, it does not of itself make him one. It requires naturalization, and Congress has passed a naturalization law with respect to these Indians in Alaska—the Indian severalty act of 1887—and they must comply with its terms before they can vote. Those who live on the Hydah and Klawak Indian Reservations are not entitled to vote under the act of Congress because they have not taken up their residence separate and apart from the tribe and adopted the habits of civilized life. They are no more entitled to vote than a Frenchman or Englishman or any other foreigner who first comes into this country, however well he may otherwise be qualified.

There is a great deal more about this matter that my opponent has talked about that I will not have time to discuss. He read to you the testimony of Mr. Hibbs, the agent in charge of the Klawak Reservation, and other people showing the qualifications of these men, showing that some of them are educated, which I admit, showing that some can read and write, which I admit, showing that one runs a store on the reservation at the Indian camp, which I admit. He also quoted from the testimony of the deputy marshal, who was on the witness stand as his witness, in support of their cleverness. but when I got a chance to cross-examine him this is his testimony:

Q. Mr. Calhoun, if you saw a saloon keeper sell one of these Indians or half-breeds intoxicating liquors, would you have him arrested for it?—A. I would.
Q. You know they are Indians, don't you?—A. Yes.
Q. You know they reside on an Indian reservation, on an island set apart for their use by an order of the President, don't you?—A. I do.
Q. You know that the Government teacher, employed by the United States Bureau of Education, is there in charge of their schools and business, don't you?—A. I do.
Q. You know the white children do not go to the school on that reservation, don't you?—A. I do.
Q. You know that white men are not allowed to settle on that reservation, don't you?—A. Unless they were there prior to the time it was set aside.
Q. There are about 300 Indians residing on that reservation, are there not?—A. Yes.
Q. How many white men and women and children reside there, and what do they do?—A. Nine, to my knowledge; missionaries, school teachers, fishermen.
Q. How many missionaries, including children?—A. Four.
Q. Mr. Bromley and his wife and two children?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many in Mr. Hibb's family?—A. Two. And during school-time they have another teacher living there.
Q. What other white men or persons live there?—A. George Nelson, Jack Brady, Mose Morrsion; there may be others, but that is all I can think of now.
Q. Are they married to Indian women?—A. Brady is not.
Q. How does it come that he is allowed to remain there?—A. He has a settler's right, as I understand it.
Q. Secured prior to the withdrawal of the land for Indian purposes?—A. I think so.

This is the testimony of the United States marshal, Mr. Calhoun, who stays there in front of this Klawak Reservation to keep people from selling liquor to the Indians. If they were citizens of the United States they would have a right to buy liquor, but they are not; they are reservation Indians.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has expired.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Now, with respect to the soldier vote at Fort Gibbon I want to talk to my Democratic brethren, for I suppose I may be allowed to call them brothers at least. These enlisted men at Fort Gibbon were stationed on a military reservation. I went to the War Department and got a certified copy of the record showing that each one of the 33 at Fort Gibbon had enlisted in some State—New York, California, or some other State—and had been transferred to Alaska by orders of a superior officer. That was filed with the committee. There were eight of these men at Fairbanks, and I got such certified copies with respect to them, and of the four at Eagle. Those certified copies of the record of these soldiers were obtained from the War Department under a legal and proper rule and filed, without any exception; and it established the fact that as to these men, every one of them had been enlisted in a State of the United States and sent to Alaska by orders of the superior officer. They voted on election day; they were challenged and they swore in the votes and cast them. Of course I knew from outside evidence that they voted against me and for my opponent. I challenged their right to vote and presented the objection fully to the committee.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How long had these men been in Alaska?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Some had been there more than a year, perhaps all of them.

Now, the evidence shows that on election day there was posted at Fort Gibbons the following notice:

[Memorandum.]

HEADQUARTERS FORT GIBBON, ALASKA,
November 6, 1916.

Under date of October 17, 1916, the United States attorney of the fourth judicial district of Alaska, has expressed the opinion that enlisted men are entitled to vote at the coming election, provided they are citizens of the United States and have been residents of Alaska for one year and have resided within the district for 30 days immediately preceding the date of election.

The attention of all is invited to the fact that only actual and legal residents of Alaska are entitled to vote; that a declaration of legal residence in Alaska forfeits the legal residence of the voter in his permanent domicile, as no citizen can have legal residence in more than one State.

Enlisted men desiring to vote will see the commanding officer in his office before doing so.

S. B. MCINTYRE,
Captain, Fourteenth Infantry, Commanding.

And under these orders from headquarters 30 enlisted men belonging to that command, residing in military post at Fort Gibbon, on a military reservation, were marched to the polls at the congressional election and voted for Mr. Sulzer.

Now, here is what happened. The minute I served notice on my opponent that I was going to take testimony, he sent a telegram to the district judge in Alaska, saying this:

Wickersham will take testimony 33 soldiers, Tanana, June 6; Fairbanks, June 12, before Henry Ray. Wickersham states soldiers challenged, but made oath they were qualified. Soldiers in Alaska one year prior election entitled vote if he intends residence after discharge. Have me represented by reliable person. Answer fully, collect.

And then he wrote to another person:

I think the judge will look after this particular point.

He did; and when we were there to take their testimony they had these soldiers posted so that they would not answer. Some of them broke over and did answer that they voted for Sulzer, but the most of them simply said that they refused to answer. Well, what are you going to do about it? The record is full of all that. It shows that the attorney of my opponent had these soldiers fixed so that they would not answer as to how they voted. They did not answer, the most of them.

Mr. LARSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN. Does the record show what your opponent did to keep these parties from answering?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The attorney who represented him made objection to their answering, and the district attorney wrote a letter, in which he advised them that they did not have to answer unless they wished to.

Mr. LARSEN. The gentleman stated that his opponent did so and so to prevent them.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I referred to the telegram he sent. It is all in the record; the committee had all this before them.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman said a while ago that the record was full of facts showing that these soldiers were instructed or "fixed" before they went there, that they were instructed by the gentleman's opponent not to answer. I want the gentleman to refer to the record of that.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. What I said was that I read his telegram, and that his attorneys out there gave this sort of instruction to these people, and that they did not answer. Their objection will be found at page 169 of the record, and the attorneys' names on 170 and 171 of the record.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The gentleman said that they were fixed by him.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; through his attorneys. See pages 169 to 171 of the record. Oh, he was not there personally. His attorneys were, however. Here, for instance, is the first man, Robert Loghry. Let me read his testimony:

Q. State your name and age.—A. Robert Loghry, age 40 years.
Q. What was your business, occupation, or profession on November 7, 1916?—A. Master signal electrician at Fairbanks, Alaska.
Q. Give the place of your last enlistment in the United States Army prior to that date.—A. Fort Leavenworth, Kans.
Q. Did you come to Alaska in the service as a soldier?—A. I did.
Q. Has that been your occupation since coming to Alaska?—A. It has.
Q. Did you on November 7, 1916, vote in Fairbanks precinct, Alaska, at an election then and there held for Delegate to Congress from Alaska?—A. I did.
Q. Did you then and there vote for Charles A. Sulzer for Delegate to Congress from Alaska?—A. I refuse to state.
Q. What reason do you give for your refusal?—A. I don't know as I have to give any reason. I do not think the notary has proper authority to take my testimony.
(The notary public here read to the witness sec. 116, chap. 8, Rev. Stat. U. S., 1878, providing penalty for failure to attend and testify, and upon further demand to the witness to answer the question the witness refused so to do.)
By Mr. Clegg, counsel for Mr. Sulzer:
Q. You are a citizen of the United States?—A. I am.
Q. Prior to November 7, 1916, how long had you resided in Alaska?—A. Since June 10, 1915.
Q. You are a married man, are you not?—A. I am.
Q. State whether or not your family has resided here with you during that time.—A. Yes.

ROBERT LOGHRY.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 14th day of June, 1917.
[SEAL.] HENRY T. RAY,
Notary Public in and for Alaska.
My commission expires June 7, 1920.

And so it went all along the line. All of these soldiers refused to state, and the instructions of the district attorney and the objections of his attorneys—Mr. Sulzer's attorneys—are in the record, instructing them not to answer, at pages 169–171.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman contend that Mr. Sulzer instructed him to refuse to answer the questions?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I have answered that. I contend that Mr. Sulzer sent his attorney instructions to represent him there and that his attorneys and these other people did prevent this testimony from being taken.

Mr. LARSEN. What evidence has the gentleman that Mr. Sulzer so instructed his attorney?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The fact that his attorney did these things.

Mr. LARSEN. But where is the gentleman's authority for doing that?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It is in this record, at pages 169–171.

Mr. LARSEN. Will the gentleman read that part of it?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; I will not, because I have only 30 minutes. If the gentleman wants it he can look it up. The committee has read it all through.

Mr. LARSEN. So far as getting time is concerned, I am perfectly willing that the gentleman have more time; but I am asking him in a courteous way whether he has anything in the record that shows that?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; at pages 169–171, record.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think the gentleman who has just questioned Judge Wickersham is mistaken as to what the judge said. I understood Judge Wickersham to say that Mr. Sulzer instructed his attorney to go there to represent him and that his attorney made the suggestions and objections.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; at pages 169–171, record.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He did not say that Mr. Sulzer instructed his attorneys to do such and such a thing.

Mr. LARSEN. That is the point of difference between the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself. My understanding is that he said that the contestee did so instruct.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No, I did not say that; and if I did, I did not mean to say it, because the contestee was not there. He was here, and he sent the telegram which I read.

Mr. LARSEN. That is the point that I want information on.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; the contestee sent the telegram that I have read, and that telegram gave this sort of information with respect to these witnesses, and then the attorneys for the contestee there made the objections. Now, I think we have cleared that up and the record is perfectly clear and full on that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is it not a fact, however, that those soldiers were within their rights under the law when they declined to answer?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; it is a crime, and in violation of the statute provided for taking testimony in contested-election cases.

Mr. HAMLIN. A crime not to tell for whom they voted?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; when they are not legal voters.

Mr. HAMLIN. Can they be made to divulge for whom they voted?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; when they were not legal voters.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then what do you do with the Indians who said they did not know for whom they voted?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. They are in the same category.

Mr. HAMLIN. But they were counted?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Oh, no. You are asking about their civil status, under the law.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am asking about the question put to them, for whom they voted.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The soldiers?

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh. they declined to answer; and would not they be within their rights when they declined?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The gentleman can draw his own conclusion from the facts. I have stated the facts. Let me state why they declined to answer. The gentleman is a good Missouri Democrat and I am sure that he will appreciate this.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understood the gentleman to complain because the district attorney instructed them that they did not have to answer that kind of a question. Is not that true, as a matter of law?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I do not think it is.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think it is.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Very well. Here is why they declined to answer.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know why they declined to answer, but I think they were within their rights.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The record shows on page 164.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No. This man Robert Loghry on page 166 says that he declined to answer. On page 164 of the record it is shown that Robert Loghry was called and asked to be sworn and testify as a witness:

Mr. Loghry refused to be sworn and refused to testify as requested, stating that he had been directed by his superior officer, First Lieut. M. H. Faust, stationed at Valdez, Alaska, not to be sworn or to give testimony in this proceeding unless the officer before whom the depositions were to be taken showed proper authority so to do under chapter 8, Revised Statutes, United States, 1878.

That is why he did not answer; and at page 165 we also find the following:

Now, at 1 o'clock p. m., Cecil H. Clegg, Esq., being present, appeared James G. Coleman, Durwood M. Hocker, William A. Kirby, James E. Pegues, Austin L. Foster, Thomas G. Griffin, Harry Shutts, Raphael Myerson, Frank R. Moore, and Charles Agnetti, witnesses subpœnaed herein, and each being requested by me to be sworn and testify, each and all refused so to do, stating as grounds for refusal that they were acting under orders from their superior officer, said First Lieut. M. H. Faust aforesaid.

That is why they refused to answer, among others. Not only is that true with respect to these, but that is true with respect to all of them. These soldiers were marched down there and voted in violation of law, and then they were too cowardly to testify, and took refuge behind the fact that their superior officer had instructed them not to testify.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The gentleman read an order from an officer inviting the privates to see him before they voted.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Was this officer put on the stand to testify as to whether he was going to inquire as to their qualifications or to tell them how to vote?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; that testimony was taken by my opponent, and I do not think he was.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman referred to the deposition of the witness he just read. What was the page of that?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Pages 164–165.

Mr. RAKER. Under the gentleman's contention and his reasoning that the witness was disqualified, I want to ask, then, if it is not true that the witness may not refuse to answer under the Australian ballot law? Is not that true? A man qualified can refuse to testify, but a man who is disqualified—in other words, who is not a legal voter—you place him upon the witness stand, he has not the rights of the man who is qualified, and he can not refuse to testify for whom he voted?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is right.

Mr. RAKER. Was there any effort to make these men testify for whom they voted?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. They were not cited for contempt?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; it was too far away; it is way up in the interior of Alaska; and in 40 days or 50 days you can not do very much in respect to these matters at that distance.

Now, something was said by my opponent about a man voting for me in Sour Dough precinct by the name of Louis Klopsch. This is a very simple matter. He was from Fairbanks, lived there for many years, ran a newspaper there, and he was coming over the trail, and got to this road house on election day, and he voted. Now, I conceded that his vote was illegal, but there is an excuse for it, because the law of Alaska provides that—

SEC. 23. Any person who can qualify as a legal voter in the division in which he or she attempts or offers to vote may qualify and vote in any election precinct in such division by subscribing to the qualifications required for registration in this section—

And so forth.

So if he was qualified to vote in a division, he probably thought he was qualified by the law of the Territory of Alaska to vote in any precinct in the division.

Mr. RAKER. That is the same law Oregon had for many years.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Unfortunately, in this case he voted over the line—he was in the wrong division. I do not know whether he knew that or not; but I did, when the question was put to me, and very promptly conceded in my brief that he was not entitled to vote in that precinct; also a man by the name of Forsman, whom my opponent spoke about, who admitted he voted for me before he had become naturalized. Now, there is a reason for that, and one consistent with honesty. Congress had passed a law which is in regard to organizing towns in Alaska. In section 625, in Compiled Laws of Alaska, 1913, which is before me, it is provided:

SEC. 625. Every male person 21 years of age who is a citizen of the United States or has declared his intention to become such, and who has resided continuously one year next preceding the election in the district of Alaska and six months next preceding the election within the limits of the proposed corporation shall be qualified to vote at said or any subsequent municipal election.

It seems that Forsman had been voting in a municipality for municipal officers, and that was the reason he voted—by mistake of law—thinking that the act of Congress covered all elections.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. And I conceded he was not qualified to vote for Delegate, and that vote was stricken out. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can explain why it is within the precincts where the challenge occurred, eight of them I believe, the nonofficial ballot was used and what was the reason for not using the official ballot? Was there any evidence of that, and if so, what was the reason for not using the official ballot?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. In those precincts thrown out, you mean?

Mr. HARDY. As I understand there are eight precincts where it was said the nonofficial ballots were used and for which in returning them they did not give any reason. Now, does the evidence show any reason why they used a nonofficial ballot?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It is shown very clearly.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to hear it.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Now let me talk to the gentleman for a minute. The gentleman is a lawyer and a good one, and I am a lawyer at least and I try to decide cases according to the law and evidence and I am sure the gentleman does.

Mr. HARDY. That is the very reason I am calling the gentleman's attention to the question which I put.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. When the gentleman submits a case to a jury and as good a jury as this committee has been, as faithful and long pursuing the truth as they have been, and they have given it the greatest attention with respect to the law and the facts, I think their judgment is entitled to a great deal of consideration, and it does seem to me that when this committee, headed by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON], with six Democrats on the committee and three Republicans, have unitedly gone into these laws and facts carefully day after day, studying all of them in the greatest detail, have given Mr. Sulzer time after time opportunity to put in additional evidence and briefs as they did, and when they studied these facts out and reached a conclusion, it does seem to me it is entitled to some credit and that a big lot of noise on this floor ought not to destroy that verdict. That is true in court.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman catch my question?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I do.

Mr. HARDY. What reason has ever been given for not using the official ballots in those eight precincts?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I am going to answer now. The ballots did not reach the men who had charge of the election. Now, let me call this to your attention: The ballots and the paraphernalia for the election are not sent to the election officers; they are sent to the commissioner in the precinct. We have two precincts to consider in elections in Alaska. We have a recording precinct, which is an area of country sometimes 20 miles square, sometimes 100 miles square, and all the ballots for all elections in that large recording precinct are sent to the commissioner, for instance, at Nushagak or wherever he may happen to live. Now, it is the duty of the commissioner, 60 days before election, to divide his precinct into election precincts, and he has to make an order dividing that precinct into election precincts. He determines the number of precincts necessary in the larger precincts where all of the election paraphernalia is sent to him, and he distributes it around to the officers at the various polling places. Now, Mr. Lang's testimony—and the committee called attention to that very frankly and very fully—Mr. Lang's testimony is that he sent these election blanks, including the tickets, all to this commissioner.

If you will look at the record, you will find a very strong statement by Mr. Praeger, the Assistant Postmaster General, saying that for three months before that election no mails had gone out to that country. But the papers, some of them, did get there, because some of them came back. But they went to the commissioner of the recording precinct, in compliance with the law. The commissioner did not get them into the hands of the election officers in the various precincts within his precinct. Why it was, I do not know.

Mr. HARDY. Have you any way of accounting for the fact that the other papers got to these election officers and not the official ballots?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I have not, except when they got to the recording commissioner they may have been in different packages, and one package may not have reached him, or he did not distribute them to the election officers. Now, we do not know why, but we do know from every source of evidence in the record that they did not get there.

Mr. HARDY. Have you any of the testimony of any of the judges of elections saying that they did not get them?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes, sir: I have. I will read that to you.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Wait until I read this. Here is the statement, dated Dillingham, Alaska, May 5, 1917, which says:

We, the electors of this precinct, hereby express our strong disapproval of this action, as we cast our votes in good faith, honestly, and fairly, thereby expressing our wishes relative to the result of such election.

Mr. HARDY. What is that you are reading from?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. From a certificate signed by the judges of election.

It says further:

It was not the fault of either the election judges or the voters of this precinct that the proper ballots were not at our disposal.

We have held two elections here during former years, and at such elections we have made our own ballots, as we did in this instance.

As we were not furnished the proper ballots at the election November last, and as we were not informed as to any changes in the election laws, we feel that we have lost our votes unjustly.

The necessary registration books, tally books, etc., were furnished by the clerk of the district court, but there were no ballots with them.

It seems to us that if these votes were thrown out on account of the fact that the official ballot was not used, that the fault lies with the authorities who are supposed to furnish these supplies for election purposes, and therefore feel that we are and were deprived of our right as American citizens to cast our ballots for the persons we desired to represent us in our Government.

And that is signed by Adolf Osterhaus, judge of election; Louis Hansen, judge of election; and it is also signed by Otto A. Larson, postmaster; and Preston H. Nash, Government teacher.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does the law of Alaska provide where the official ballots do not arrive that other ballots can be used?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; it does specifically. The law of Alaska is perfectly plain and particular on that point. The law provides that.

Mr. LARSEN. Is there any testimony there as to what the commissioners did with them, or whether they received them or not?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No. I can only say this, that under the congressional act we have had the right to make our own ballots; that we had them printed and sent out through the country; but the Territorial legislature in 1915 passed a law called an Australian ballot system, and in that it provided for the form of ballot to be prepared by the clerk of the court, and to be sent out by the clerks, but it provided that if the official ballot should not reach the precinct they might make and vote their own ballot, as the act of Congress also provides. I think Mr. Sulzer has a good deal of merit in saying that the law is mandatory, and; if it is mandatory, then they had a right to make their ballots.

Mr. RUCKER. But what about the certificate accompanying the returns?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I think the law has been so well stated by the committee that there is no question about it. I say their right to vote this ballot is mandatory.

Mr. RUCKER. Would the gentleman claim that one part of it was mandatory and the other was not; that the part that they could make their own ballots was mandatory and that part that they shall accompany it with a certificate is not mandatory?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I think one part may be mandatory and the other part directory.

Mr. RUCKER. In the same section?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes, sir; in the same section. I think all the decisions are in a line on that point.

Mr. HARDY. Was this certificate that you read from a document furnished to the committee, or was there any evidence by any witnesses who testified to the facts stated?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I furnished that myself, because it came to me.

Mr. HARDY. It came to you; but was there any witness who testified to these facts, or simply a certificate from these men who signed as judges of the election?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is all; and that is all the law of Alaska requires, and the congressional act does not require even that.

Mr. HARDY. I was talking about the testimony before the committee. You had no witness?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; that is all the law requires—just their certificate.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I will.

Mr. STEAGALL. Did the gentleman take any part in the discussion or in the contest, if there was any, that led to the enactment of the Australian ballot law in the Territory?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I did not. I was not there.

Mr. STEAGALL. You have taken no position on that law as it affects the question here?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I have not committed myself in any way. I am in favor of the Australian ballot system.

Mr. STEAGALL. Are you in favor of it as adopted in the Territory?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I never favored it or disfavored it. I think it is a dreadful botch. As a matter of fact, that law was prepared by a Democrat from Fairbanks, who introduced it in the legislature and sought to secure its passage. When it went to the senate, where my opponent was a member, it was loaded up with amendments in order to kill it, but when it came back the lower house took it with all of the amendments, in order that they might have something.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman tell me whether the nonofficial ballot used in the eight boxes had his opponent's name on them, as well as his own?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. There was no official ballot used there, you understand; by that I mean the one prepared by the clerk. What was used there was a worker's ballot, in yellow, prepared by my opponent and sent out there as sample ballots. He had sent them out there in the summer time, when the mails were running, and when the election time came on they voted his ballots and scratched his name off and put mine on. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Does the record show that?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; it shows that.

Mr. BURNETT. Does it show that he sent out those particular ballots?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It shows that they voted those Democratic ballots.

Mr. BURNETT. Who testifies that he sent them?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I would not say that he sent them, but they were there.

Mr. BURNETT. Who testifies to it? Refer us to the record.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has expired.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I wish the House would give me a few minutes more.

The SPEAKER. How much?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Oh, say, 15 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman be allowed 20 minutes in which to complete his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alaska be permitted to proceed for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; in a moment.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; but I have already yielded to two gentlemen now, and the gentleman can wait a few minutes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I yield to Judge RAKER.

Mr. RAKER. It was not I who asked the gentleman to yield. It was Judge HARDY.

Mr. REAVIS. My question is in line with Judge HARDY's suggestion.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REAVIS. Does the record show that the ballots voted in that precinct were the ballots that had your opponent's name on, and were scratched off and your own name put on?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The presumption would be that you did not prepare them.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; I did not prepare any. They were all Democratic sample ballots, sent out there either by my opponent or by his representatives. But there is nothing wrong about it. I am not making any charge of anything wrong in the matter, because he had the right to send those sample ballots out. I am merely calling the attention of the House to the fact that those were the ballots that were voted. If I am making a mistake about that, the chairman of the committee is here, and he can correct me.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Did not the gentleman from Alaska see those ballots in the possession of the committee—the ballot bags and the ballots themselves?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; and all these ballots are in the possession of the House, in charge of the Committee on Elections No. 1. If you gentlemen want to look at them, you can send for them.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. They are in the possession of the committee, and the statement of the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. Wickersham] is absolutely true.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; and they are yellow. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; I yield for a question. The gentleman has been talking for two days, but I yield to him now for a question.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman has stated that these ballots were all Democratic workers' ballots, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES], although he has heard this discussion for two days and has read the record, makes the same statement. I therefore call the attention of the gentleman to page 10 of the report of the committee, Choggiung being the place of particular contention, where it is shown that—

> At Choggiung the judges of election had the official register and tally book just as they had at Naknek and Nushagak. The ballots were made with typewriter.

Now, the chairman of the committee said the same thing on the floor of the House. Why does the gentleman endeavor to create an erroneous impression in the minds of the gentlemen of the House?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I do not. The ballots are here in the committee's possession. The House or any Representative can see them. They were yellow ballots, and they were sent out by you or by somebody from the Democratic headquarters. I do not know who sent them.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I would like to say, for the information of the House, that at Choggiung and Nushagak the ballots were made on a typewriter.

Mr. SULZER. And at one other precinct they were made out by the party workers.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. There is nothing in the record about party-worker ballots. The record shows that they were used in two precincts.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman let me read a line?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. On page 11 of this report I find, under paragraph 3, this language:

> What reason could be given, for instance, for those who desired to vote for Mr. Wickersham declining to use ballots upon which his name was printed and taking ballots upon which the name of Mr. Sulzer was printed and going to the trouble to write Mr. Wickersham's name thereon in order to vote for him?

What does that mean?

Mr. SULZER. It simply means that they were not official ballots, but such as could be prepared on the outside of the polling place.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. These were printed.

Mr. SULZER. They dispensed with the official ballot. That was the reason.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes. They dispensed with the official ballot, but they used the ballot prepared by either you or the Democratic committee. But I am not quarreling about that.

There is nothing wrong about it; only those were the ballots that happened to be there, and they were voted, and they are in the possession of this committee. That answers the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas as to whether these other ballots got there. They did not get there. All the evidence in this record shows that they did not get there.

Mr. SULZER. What became of them. Where are they?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. You and your friends had the entire control of politics and the machinery of elections up there at that time, and if you do not know, nobody knows. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, something was said about my having had some friends at court at these elections. It is not true. We have had a difference of opinion in Alaska with respect to Republican politics, and I have been an independent Republican at times, because I would not yield my rights as an American citizen to the political boss up there, and when these election officers were selected and it became necessary to put on Republicans they always put on my political enemies, and, if anything, they were worse than the Democrats. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. Does the gentleman think that election officials who were friendly to me would do away with official ballots and use nonofficial ballots so that in a precinct like Choggiung, which cast 28 votes, I would receive only 3 of them and the contestant would receive 25?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No, I do not think that. I think the official ballots did not get to those outer precincts, that the election officials there did not receive them. The record is perfectly clear on that question. Now, the official ballots did not get to Utica and to Deering precinct up at Nome, and the returns from those precincts were sent in without the certificates, but subsequently the certificates came along, and when this proceeding began in this House those certificates were here, and they are all in the record. They are all perfectly clear and in accord with the law. There is a perfectly straight record with respect to those certificates before the House. The committee has examined all those matters and has been frank and honest, and it seems to me it would be a shame to throw out the election in Alaska and refuse to give me the right to which I am entitled under the law, after this committee has given the matter such careful attention as it has. The committee has been more than fair. If the committee has injured anybody it has injured me. It has made me wait here almost two years now for the right which the law gives me. I am not criticizing the committee, either. Mr. Sulzer has had the benefit of all that, and I do not think this House will take any such stand as that with respect to the matter.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is there any qualification in Alaska requiring a registration of the voters, such as we have in the United States?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; there is a registration there, but it takes place at the time the voter comes up to vote.

Mr. ROBBINS. And not prior to that time?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; not prior to that time.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. In this last campaign—last November—was the proposition discussed as to whether you were elected or Mr. Sulzer was elected?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It was discussed a little; yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Well, who was elected in the last election, or has not that been decided?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. We do not know yet. The answer will depend on whom you ask. If you ask me, I say that I am elected, and I have no doubt that if you ask Mr. Sulzer he will say that he is; but I am perfectly willing to say that it is so close that nobody can honestly tell you, and that neither you nor we will know until the official count is had.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. And there will probably be a contest over that?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Not if I lose here, because I have had enough of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. In reference to this matter of unofficial ballots, I find at the top of page 10 of the report the following:

> At Naknek there were no official ballots, the voters using what are termed in that section "Party workers' ballots," on which the name of Mr. Sulzer was printed. At this precinct there were 9 votes for Sulzer and none for Wickersham. The election judges attached to the returns a statement that no official ballots had been received. They had the official register and tally book, which is a part of the official election supplies.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The report further says:

> At Nushagak they had exactly the same election supplies and used exactly the same ballot as at Naknek. Here the vote was 10 for Wickersham and 3 for Sulzer.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; the record is fairly full and clear on that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I only call attention to that statement in the report.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is in the record, and my opponent sent those tickets out; I did not send out any.

Now, gentlemen, our elections in Alaska are fair elections. We have about 15,000 voters up there, and there is very little trouble amongst our people. The difficulty usually begins when we get down here to Washington. [Laughter.] As a matter of fact our elections are quiet and honest generally. There have been times when we have had some crooked transactions at our elections.

My friend Sulzer talks about the purity of elections, and how earnestly he is in favor of the purity of elections. He puts his hand on his heart and talks about the purity of his purposes, and so forth, as if nobody else, except somebody by the name of Sulzer, had any such pure purposes. I try to obey the law myself, and the people of Alaska are in favor of pure elections; we are in favor of a square deal and a fair count at our elections; and when the election is finally had and a man is elected by a majority of 31 votes, we object to anybody else taking the certificate. My opponent went before the court almost two years ago, when I was in Washington City, and brought the suit which has been mentioned by him. I was not made a party to that suit. No service was made on me in that case. Mr. Sulzer brought a suit against the canvassing board, consisting of the governor, the secretary, and the collector of customs. He did not give me any notice or serve any papers on me. The court tried the title to the office and issued a mandamus to the canvassing board, compelling them to throw out those six precincts and give Mr. Sulzer the certificate of election, without any notice of any kind to me, something that has never been done before in any court in America, and I hope never will be done again.

Mr. DENISON. Who is this judge?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. His name is Robert Jennings. He ran against me four years before for Delegate, and was defeated by every other candidate for Delegate on the ticket, and he has been unfriendly toward me ever since. He is a good lawyer, too. I want to say that on the floor of the House, so that it will go into the RECORD.

Mr. REAVIS. Does the gentleman say that a good lawyer would enter a decree in a case in which the issue was the title to an office and deprive a man of that office without giving him any notice or making him a party to the suit?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. He is a good lawyer in this, that he knows where to get cases and quotations to make a plausible opinion in a bad case.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman is either reflecting on this judge's ability as a lawyer or on his honesty as a man.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Well, those are the facts. You can draw your own conclusions. I was not made a party to the suit, and the record shows that. The record also shows that the governor and secretary of the Territory and collector of customs, who were the canvassing board, declined to employ any lawyer to defend the suit. It shows that the whole case was an agreed case without defense. They presented the matter to the court without any suggestion on my part, because the canvassing board made no defense, did not employ counsel; they prepared and filed an answer but said they had no money to hire a lawyer, and they simply filed the paper and let it go. In their answer they alleged:

> 5. These defendants further respectfully state that they have made no further answer to the allegations contained in the petition filed herein, for the reason that the canvassing board has no funds with which to employ legal counsel, and the members thereof do not conceive it to be their duty to employ such counsel and pay for his services from their private means.
> Wherefore, having answered the writ herein, these defendants respectfully ask that they be discharged therefrom and that the proceedings herein be dismissed.
>
> J. F. A. STRONG,
> CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
> Canvassing Board.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the genleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The decision to which the gentleman alluded is the one holding that the statute which requires the certification by the judges of election in the absence of the ballot was mandatory?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And the gentleman contends that it is directory?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is a difference of opinion about it?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I do not think so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If it were not mandatory, what law do you have to govern the election?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. We have a law governing elections. It requires that all voters shall have been one year a resident of Alaska, and a resident of the precinct for 30 days. Congress passed that law, and in relation to qualifications it says that they may in the absence of official ballots use written or printed ballots. That is the law passed by Congress. Then it says that the Territorial legislature shall not have the power to modify, amend, or repeal the congressional law. That is substantially what it says.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Let me see if I understand the gentleman.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The Territorial legislature had no authority to pass any law which would modify, repeal, or change the election law passed by Congress as to the holding of these Delegate elections. That is what this clause attempts to do.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman thinks that the legislative enactment is not valid because it is contradictory to the congressional legislation?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I do, but the committee did not hold that with me.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Speaking of the mandamus case of Sulzer against the canvassing board, the judge rendered the final decision in that case after sustaining the demurrer. Was not that judgment appealable?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. But I was not a party.

Mr. RAKER. That is not the question. Did not the commissioners have the right to appeal?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; but in their answer they stated that they had no money and declined to do anything.

Mr. RAKER. The mere fact that the governor and the secretary of state, who had an official duty to perform, lay down and said that they would not perform it indicates that something must have been wrong.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Something was wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. Were there also injunction proceedings commenced and served on the same official?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; there was an injunction in the original order.

Mr. RAKER. Any appeal taken from that?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. No.
Mr. RAKER. It became final?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.
Mr. RAKER. Is there any provision in the laws of Alaska that the contestee in any such mandamus proceeding is a proper party?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. I do not think there is any doubt about that in the world.
Mr. RAKER. I want to say that in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred he is not a proper party and could not be made a party.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Let me ask the gentleman a question: Does the gentleman think that Mr. Sulzer ought to have brought suit against the canvassing board in the court, try my right and title to that office, grant a mandamus against the canvassing board compelling them to throw the precincts out, and issue a certificate to Mr. Sulzer without any notice to me?
Mr. RAKER. Clearly from the record notice was given.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. To me?
Mr. RAKER. I do not know.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. There is no such claim as that made.
Mr. RAKER. Ordinarily notice is to be given, but under the statutes of the various States it is an exceptional case where the party in interest is permitted to be made a party to the mandamus proceedings against the officers.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. That arises where the mandamus is to compel the officers to move, but never in a case to try the title to the office. Mandamus in such cases issues only to compel the officers to move along within the law. It does not go to the right of another party or to compel the board to do or not to do a certain thing. That is the correct rule in mandamus, and that the judge did not do. He issued a mandamus to compel the canvassing board to throw out the precincts and grant a certificate to my opponent, and I was not not made a party.
Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.
Mr. GARRETT of Texas. In the suit which the gentleman refers to, by the contestee against the canvassing board for a mandamus, did the gentleman have knowledge of that suit? I do not mean notice, but did he have knowledge of it?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. I knew afterwards that the suit had been begun.
Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Did not the gentleman have a right under the law of Congress and of Alaska to intervene in the suit?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Possibly.
Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Did the gentleman intervene?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. I did not; I was in the city of Washington here in attendance on Congress. I was then the Delegate. I was attending to my duties; but I saw by the papers from Alaska two or three weeks afterwards that the suit had been begun.
Mr. GARRETT of Texas. And you received no word?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. None whatever, and no notice of any kind except in that way.
Mr. GARRETT of Texas. How long was this suit pending?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Probably three weeks.
Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Could you not have secured an attorney there to represent you if you had wanted to?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. I might, but I was not made a party.
Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.
Mr. SULZER. The gentleman knows that John Rustgard is one of the ablest attorneys in Alaska.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. I admit that.
Mr. SULZER. And he knows that John Rustgard was his campaign manager in this particular campaign.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. I deny that.
Mr. SULZER. The gentleman knows that John Rustgard was the attorney that acted for him when this testimony was taken.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is not true.
Mr. SULZER. He acted for the gentleman at Afognak and Seldovia in this case.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Oh, he did that; yes.
Mr. SULZER. John Rustgard is an intimate friend of the gentleman, is he not?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. He is at least an acquaintance.
Mr. SULZER. John Rustgard acted as amicus curiæ, and practically though not technically represented the contestant in this particular proceeding.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. He did not.
Mr. SULZER. He represented him as well as he could.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman interrupting me any longer. I will tell the story. When this case was called, Judge Jennings, who is a good lawyer, as I said before, notwithstanding the objections of my friend over here, knew that it was going to look bad not to have some one there to represent me, and he invited John Rustgard as amicus curiæ to make a showing.
The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLAYPOOL). The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has been interrupted so often, I ask that he be allowed to conclude his remarks.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Oh, give me 10 minutes.
Mr. KNUTSON. I ask unanimous consent that he be given 10 minutes.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. GARRETT of Texas. What was the date of the filing of this suit?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Some time in March—March 2, 1917.
Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I mean of the proceedings in Alaska against the returning board.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. It was some time in February or March. It is all in the record.
Mr. GARRETT of Texas. If it was in the month of March, then the gentleman's time had expired.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. But I was not at home, and it takes me some time to get home. I want to say this with respect to this amicus curiæ proceeding. When this case came up, Judge Jennings realized that it was going to look bad if he should try this case and render his judgment against me in my absence. He went to a member of the bar, Mr. John Rustgard, personally, as he says here in his opinion, and asked him to appear as amicus curiæ, although Mr. Sulzer was represented in the case by an array of attorneys and by the attorney general of Alaska as well. Judge Jennings did that so that he might have something between himself and criticism if he decided the case without giving me any notice. I never employed Mr. Rustgard in the matter, never was consulted about it, and in his appearance Mr. Rustgard says that he does not appear for me at all, that he appears at the request of the judge as amicus curiæ. Here is what he said:

In the district court for the district of Alaska, division No. 1, at Juneau. The Territory of Alaska, on the relation of Charles A. Sulzer, and Charles A. Sulzer, relator and plaintiff, v. The Canvassing Board for the Territory of Alaska, consisting of J. F. A. Strong, Charles E Davidson, and John F. Pugh, defendants. No. 1593–A.

Comes now John Rustgard, in response to the court's invitation to appear as amicus curiæ, and respectfully submits the following considerations as bearing upon the question before the court, with the distinct understanding, however, that he does not have any authority, desire, or intention to appear for or on behalf of James Wickersham.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Did he file any pleadings on your behalf?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. No; he only filed a brief. He did not file any pleadings. This case was tried before Judge Jennings, and this judgment and opinion which you gentlemen heard read here and have heard so much about was prepared substantially in a case where there was only one party in court. It took away my rights, took away the certificate from me, because the governor of the Territory of Alaska and the secretary of the Territory of Alaska and the collector of customs of the Territory of Alaska, three officials appointed by President Wilson and confirmed by the United States Senate, sitting as a returning board, had declared me elected. This Democratic canvassing board on the last day had declared that I was elected and had notified the attorney general that they were going to sign my certificate, and he asked to have it put over until the next morning, and before the next morning they were served with an injunction, and the matter then was brought on for hearing before the court, and the peremptory writ was issued on March 23, 1917, just three weeks from the filing of the writ. Those are the facts.
Mr. LARSEN. Conceding all votes to be legal votes—both Indian and soldiers—who received a majority?
Mr. WICKERSHAM. I did on the face of the returns. I received 31 majority over Mr. Sulzer, according to the findings of the canvassing board. The Democratic canvassing board declared me to be elected—a Democratic canvassing board—and a Democratic committee of this House has declared that I was honestly elected. Now, what are you going to do about it? [Applause.]
Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is the intention of the gentleman from Alabama to move to have this matter recommitted to the Committee on Elections. I hope that motion will not prevail, but that the report of the committee will be accepted by the House and that the resolutions recommended in that report will be adopted.
It seems to me that what has gone on here during the last two days has been a very extraordinary proceeding. Eighty per cent of the membership of this House are members of the legal profession, and I suppose that is true relatively of the Democratic side of the House as it is with the Republican side. If it were possible to suppose such a case, no member of the legal profession would think of being influenced in regard to the law or the facts in an action at law by listening to one of the parties, plaintiff or defendant, speaking at great length in his own behalf and reading particular portions of the evidence that might seem to favor his side after that case had been exhaustively tried before a jury and after all law and all of the evidence had been considered and every opportunity had been given to all of the parties to put in all their evidence, to make all their argument, and that jury had unanimously decided against the party in question. To any member of the legal profession such an idea is preposterous; but that is what you have had here for the last two days.

This Committee on Elections No. 1, I am proud to say, as the Committee on Elections No. 3 in another case in the present Congress, has not been actuated by partisanship. In the case of Beakes against Bacon a committee composed of members of both political parties unanimously decided in favor of the Democratic contestant, because on the law and the evidence they were satisfied that the Democratic contestant was entitled to his seat. This Committee on Elections No. 1 has had another case in the present Congress which has been acted upon by the House, namely, the case of Scott against Steele, where a Democratic contestant sought to unseat a Republican Member who had received a certificate, and, although that committee was composed of six Democrats and three Republicans, after an exhaustive study of the case it unanimously decided to allow the Republican Member to retain his seat.

In the case now before the House, Committee on Elections No. 1, composed of six Democrats and three Republicans, after a full and complete hearing, has unanimously decided in favor of unseating the Democratic Delegate from Alaska and seating his Republican opponent. And it is a remarkable fact that this Democratic Delegate from Alaska could not get one of the six Democratic members of the Committee on Elections, members of his own party, to file a minority report in his favor upon the law and the facts in this case.

Mr. Speaker, I have been surprised to see that some of the leaders on that side of the House have apparently thought so lightly of the judgment of the Committee on Elections No. 1, a committee controlled by members of their own party and with their able colleague from Louisiana as chairman. In my opinion, there never was a man at the head of a Committee on Elections of this House who was more conscientious, more painstaking, and more thoroughly conversant with the laws governing elections than the honorable gentleman from Louisiana, Judge WILSON, chairman of this committee. [Applause.] Does any Member of this House seriously think that Judge WILSON would deliberately do anything that would refuse a full and fair hearing or a square deal to a sitting member of his own party in this House? And yet that is what the contestee in this case has deliberately charged him with in his speech of yesterday.

On the contrary, he has carefully considered and studied every decision and citation that the counsel for the sitting Delegate has presented to the committee. The parties in this case came before us and fixed their own time. Mr. Sulzer was given every opportunity to file additional briefs after the case was closed; and even after the committee report had been made and agreed upon, the chairman reopened the matter, and we had another meeting of the committee in order that the committee might consider these decisions filed in this extra and extraordinary brief.

Now, to show how much credence should be given to this defendant, who has been allowed full opportunity and unlimited time to present his case to the membership of this House who have not been familiar with the proceedings before the committee, I desire to call your attention to just one incorrect statement out of many which he made in the course of his remarks. You heard him state yesterday in answer to a question that there was no evidence in the record that these official Australian ballots had not reached the eight precincts, the returns from which were arbitrarily thrown out by the judge on mandamus proceedings. He told you without the blinking of an eye that there was no evidence, and yet the record is full of it. On page 154 there is the sworn affidavit of two of the three judges of election in the Deering precinct, and on the same page the sworn affidavit of all three judges of election in the Utica precinct. I have here a memorandum of what the record shows in every one of these precincts, but I know the House is weary, and I do not intend to go into the matter in detail. Suffice it to say that there is plenty of evidence in the record upon which the committee made its findings, and yet because this interested party, who has had a unanimous verdict returned against him by a court controlled by his friends, gets up and tells you that there is no evidence on a particular point when the record shows that there is, it is seriously proposed to disregard the findings of an impartial committee and recommit the report, which means that the contestee will continue to keep the office and draw the salary to which he is not entitled.

Mr. Speaker, I do not blame the Delegate from Alaska for speaking in his own behalf, but I do protest, as a Member of the American Congress, against this treatment of a committee of the House of Representatives.

You Members on that side would never think of treating any of your other committees that way. It is almost impossible to get an amendment on an appropriation bill that has not the approval of the committee, and yet you propose to-day to try to overthrow the work of one of your committees, composed of a 2 to 1 majority of members of your own party, after months of careful and exhaustive study.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has already been pointed out here that the election machinery of the Territory of Alaska has been in the control, and was in the control at the time of this contested election, of the party to which Mr. Sulzer, the sitting Delegate, belonged. The canvassing board was a Democratic canvassing board. The board canvassed the returns and found that Mr. Wickersham was elected Delegate from the Territory of Alaska, and was about to issue a certificate to him, when there took place one of the most remarkable things that has ever taken place in the history of elections in this country. A petition for a writ of mandamus was brought before the judge of the United States court, the contestant not being made a party to the proceedings, and that judge issued a writ of mandamus ordering the canvassing board to throw out the returns of eight precincts. On what ground? On the ground that a certain provision in the law passed by the Territorial Legislature of Alaska was mandatory and not directory. Now, your committee did not go into the question raised by the contestant—Wickersham—that the Legislature of Alaska had no right to pass an Australian ballot law. I am one of those who believe that the legislature did not have that right, and that the act of Congress prescribing a form of government for the Territory of Alaska was to all intents and purposes the constitution of the Territory of Alaska; but we did not go into that question and did not consider it, because we did not consider it necessary, for the reason that the law in reference to the question of directory and mandatory provisions of election statutes is pretty well established. The provision of the Alaska statute, upon the strength of which the returns from eight precincts were arbitrarily thrown out, was enacted owing to the peculiar conditions in that Territory. It provided that where, owing to poor communication, the official Australian ballots did not reach a certain precinct, then the voters in that precinct should have the privilege, which they had always had previous to the passage of the Australian ballot-law statute, of preparing their own ballots. That was the situation all over the country before the Australian ballot law was passed. The different political parties used to print the ballots for their voters. There was no fraud about having ballots printed by the candidates or by their friends or by the political parties for the use of the voters.

Now, in the case of these eight precincts, there is evidence in the record that the ballots did not get there; but the judges of election, belonging to the majority party, belonging to the party of Mr. Sulzer, failed to send along with the returns from those eight precincts a certificate stating that the official ballots were not used for the reason that they did not get there in time. If there ever was a directory provision in the statute, it was that.

Now, I desire to call your attention to the decision that has already been referred to—and that is quoted in the committee's report—of the Supreme Court of Missouri in a recent case. Mr. Sulzer picks out one of the authorities cited by the committee, in the Twenty-first Congress, and tries to give you the impression that the Committee on Elections No. 1 was relying solely upon old and outgrown decisions. But this case of Norsefall against School District, reported in One hundred and forty-third Missouri, page 542, is a comparatively recent case, and it is the law in this country to-day. I ask you to listen and see if you do not agree that this is sound law and also sound common sense:

> Electors must not be deprived of their votes on account of any technical objection to the manner in which the election has been held or for any misconduct on the part of its presiding officers, if these have not affected the true result of the election. (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 617, 618; Prince v. Skillen, 71 Maine, 361.) This would be to deprive the citizen of a great constitutional privilege for a mere informality; to place it within the power of a few persons to defeat the right of suffrage altogether. The very means provided to insure a fair and proper election might become an instrument of fraud and dishonesty.

Now, I want the House to consider the importance of this precedent which, if Mr. Sulzer is allowed to retain his seat, will become established by the House of Representatives. It means that where, as in most parts of the country, the election boards are partisan, either composed entirely of members of one party or two of the majority party and one of the minority party, it is possible for these election officials, by neglecting or refusing to comply with some formality of the statute, to throw out the entire vote of precincts which have given the opposite party a majority. It is a most dangerous precedent. And I do not believe this House is going to establish any such precedent in this or any other case. So much for that.

Now, the contention of the contestee that Indians were illegally permitted to vote for the contestant has been disposed of most exhaustively by Mr. Wickersham himself. The committee found on the evidence that all of these so-called Indian votes complained of were votes of American citizens who were not Indians living in tribal relations at all, and who are protected in their civil and political rights by the treaty of 1867. If the Territorial Legislature of Alaska wants to pass on act providing for an educational qualification and providing that every person, in order to vote, must be able to read and write in the English language, it has that privilege, assuming, for the sake of argument, that it has the right to pass any election law modifying the act of Congress to which I have previously referred. But manifestly until it does pass such a statute the fact that a person can not read or write is no reason whatever why he or she can not vote in the Territory of Alaska, and no question to the contrary has ever been raised except by the contestee in his address to the Members of this House.

Now, I want to say a word in regard to the soldier vote. That is another question of establishing a precedent of the most vital importance to this Republic. As I said a minute ago, I do not believe that this House is going to override the well-established law in regard to directory and mandatory provisions of election statutes and establish the unfortunate precedent of permitting technical informalities to disfranchise whole precincts of voters. Neither do I believe that this House is going to establish a precedent by which soldiers of the American Army can be voted by an administration of any party in any part of the United States, regardless of their former domiciles. The law upon this question to-day is absolutely certain and there can be no real controversy in regard to it. The law is that a soldier of the United States can not gain a legal voting residence in any State of the Union during the time that he is in the military service; that when he enlists he has a certain domicile, and that domicile continues as long as he is in the military service of the United States Government. If any of these soldiers now in Alaska after their discharge from the Army wish to settle in that Territory and live there the year required by law, then they may become citizens of Alaska and entitled to vote. But until they do they can not vote. Just stop and think a minute what the establishment of any other precedent would mean, with the large standing Army that we are liable to have in the future or with the immense Army that we have at the present moment. It would be possible, Mr. Speaker, for a Republican administration at Washington to send northern troops coming from Republican localities to different camps and cantonments in the Southern States and absolutely dominate the politics of those States not only in national but in State and local elections. And, vice versa, it would be possible for a Democratic administration at Washington to send troops from the South, Democratic in their affiliation, into the close States and congressional districts of the North and determine the elections there. I believe that the law as it is now is sound, wise, and vitally necessary for the protection of free institutions, and I trust that this House will not override that law and establish any such dangerous precedent.

Mr. Speaker, I have touched briefly upon the chief points upon which this case was decided. Your committee has given the matter long and exhaustive study, and we have made a unanimous report to this House. Recommitting it to the committee will not change the result, because we have gone over all the facts and we have considered all the law and have exhaustively studied the question at issue from every possible angle. We believe that we ought to live up to the reputation that the Committees on Elections have made in this House, and that now and in the future these cases should be decided, as this case has been decided, upon their merits, upon the law and the facts in each particular case, without regard to personal or political consideration. I trust that this House will not adopt the motion to recommit, but will adopt the resolutions recommended by the committee in its report.

I thank you for your kind attention. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAKER. I desire to say a few words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for an hour.

[Mr. RAKER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I intend to offer the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and desire to discuss it only for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman offering it now or asking that it be read in his time?

Mr. BURNETT. I ask that it be read now, in my time, and give notice I shall offer it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the resolution.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURNETT moves to refer the contested election case of James Wickersham, contestant, against Charles A. Sulzer to Committee on Elections No. 1, and said committee shall report on said case by or before February 10, 1919.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Of course the committee is entitled to close debate under ordinary circumstances, but what I want to get at is for the convenience of the House and ascertain how long does the gentleman think it will take to conclude debate?

Mr. BURNETT. Well, I do not care, as far as my part is concerned, to consume more than 20 minutes. I presume the question is addressed to the chairman of the committee having the matter in charge.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I shall not use more than 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. At the end of that time is it the intention of the gentleman from Louisiana to move the previous question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes; on the resolution. Of course I do not know anybody else who wants to speak.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not so anxious whether anybody else wants to speak or not. I have listened to two days' debate on this, and I think I have listened to enough; but I think the House would like to know when we are going to get through.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It is the intention of the chairman of the committee to have a vote upon this resolution as soon as the gentleman from Alabama makes a statement and I make a short statement.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman will move the previous question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The previous question; yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, it was my purpose, without design to shut off the gentleman, to move the previous question and then ask unanimous consent for the gentleman to proceed for such time as he might desire; but I do not care; it is immaterial to me in regard to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset of this discussion that I would be the last man who would reflect on any member of the committee that reported this case. And the gentleman [Mr. DALLINGER] who spoke awhile ago urging that the report should be adopted because of the special sanctity that he thought was around the report of the committee can not say anything more favorable to the members of the committee, and especially to the chairman of the committee, with whom I have been associated at the same committee table for the last two years, than I can say.

Mr. Speaker, I would be the last man in this House to undertake to inject partisan politics into the question of seating or unseating a Member of Congress. I am the last man that ought to do that. I remember that 18 years ago I went through the same mill when there was a Republican House, with 30 or 40 majority, and when they had the power to pitch me out of the window without any ceremony.

I want to say further that, although I had made many a race inside of my party and against the common enemy, no contest that I ever had for the election scared me like that contest of my election before a Republican House. There were on that committee at that time men who were strong, able, fearless, honest, and fair. The present distinguished leader of the Republican Party himself was the ranking Republican on the committee. I haunted the committee room many and many a day, not for the purpose of buttonholing a Democrat or a Republican member of the committee, because I did not do that, but for the purpose of listening to contests and reading and trying to understand the precedents that had been established in contested-election cases. After the decision of that committee, I concluded that, so far as that Committee on Elections was concerned, there was not a member of it that would let partisan bias influence him for one moment.

And, Mr. Speaker, since that time I have followed, I believe, exactly that kind of policy in election cases. No man can throw it at me that I am inspired or moved by reason of the fact that Mr. Sulzer is a Democrat or Mr. Wickersham is a Republican. In the contested-election case in this House a few years ago against Mr. DYER, of St. Louis, Mo., I differed from the report of a majority Democratic committee, and from a majority of Democrats in this House, and voted against unseating that gentleman, because I believed that he had been honestly elected.

Mr. Speaker, my position is not a reflection upon this committee. Why, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] himself has not regarded the sanctity of unanimous reports of committees heretofore. I remember that but a few weeks ago when a unanimous report of a committee of which I was a member came in, and where the members of the committee of his party unanimously concurred in the report, he himself joined in defeating that report.

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of a committee and a member of committees, many times have I brought in reports that I felt a special interest in, which by the time the House of Representatives was through with them I did not know as our own offspring. So all that kind of argument, it seems to me, is for the purpose of throwing dust in the eyes of somebody.

The chairman of the committee has sat with me in too many important matters pending before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to believe that for one moment I would doubt either his sincerity, his ability, or his industry. As a lawyer and as a man he investigates carefully and honestly questions coming before him.

Mr. Speaker, an election contest is one of the most important questions that can be considered under the rules of this House, and one of the very highest privilege. It involves not only the question of a seat of a man in Congress but the representation of the constituents whose commission he holds. And I think I can approach it without any desire whatever to be the partisan of either.

I know the distinguished ex-Delegate from Alaska better than I do the sitting Member. I have never had occasion to entertain anything but the kindest feeling for him, and the only motive that I have is to try to see justice done everybody, and I approach the discussion with diffidence because of the great respect and high opinion that I have for the ability, as well as the fairness and industry, of the chairman of this committee and its membership. Any other motive can not be charged against me.

Mr. Speaker, there are two questions that I want to discuss briefly. In the first place, I concur with the views of my able friend from California [Mr. RAKER], that this statute of Alaska is mandatory and is not directory. I want to read from one or two authorities on that very question. Here is a case in Ninetieth Northwestern, 485:

> The statute under consideration is, then, not in terms mandatory, but it is well settled that the employment of express words is not always necessary to give it that character. Where the aim and purpose of the lawmaking power would be plainly defeated if the command to do the thing in a particular manner did not imply an inhibition to do it in any other, no doubt can be maintained as to the mandatory character of the statute.

What evil was sought to be corrected by the Alaska law requiring Australian ballots to be used? It was to prevent fraud, to protect the voter in the secrecy of the ballot which he was to cast, and, above all, to secure and maintain the honesty and sanctity of the ballot. If the statute had provided for an Australian ballot alone, no one would argue for a moment that any other kind could be used. But the legislature, realizing that on account of geographical and other conditions in Alaska the official ballots might not reach the voting places, provided for the use of unofficial ballots under certain regulations, to which I shall advert later on.

Why, my able friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] called attention to the hardship of the case; that election managers might defeat the will of electors by some error or mistake of their own. Yes; and such a condition might arise if the statute in terms declared the ballot void if the judges of the election failed to properly certify the same. The judge might fail to certify properly, even if the statute declared in so many words that it was mandatory, and then the innocent voter would lose his vote. It would be void, and the innocent voter would suffer just the same from the misconduct of the judges of the election. I have never seen a statute, Mr. Speaker, exactly in the form of this statute, and it seems to me the principle that is laid down in the decision I have just quoted, and other decisions along the same line, will bear me out in the view that I have that this statute is a mandatory one.

The first statute provided for the Australian ballot. If it had stopped there, the committee in its report admits that no other form could be used. Suppose that no Australian ballot had then been used. Would anyone claim that if this provision for the use of another ballot had not been provided that it would be a legal election? Let us see what the provision is that validates their nonofficial ballot. It is this:

> That in any precinct where the election has been legally called and no official ballots have been received the voters are permitted to write or print their ballots.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it had stopped there then the general certificate of the managers, I think, would be sufficient. But it does not stop there. It enters into the very essence of the legality of the ballot that something else shall be done, so jealously was the Legislature of Alaska trying to secure a fair election; and that is why the Australian ballot system has been so universally inaugurated all over the country, in order that there may be secrecy in the ballot, in order that the voter may be protected, in order that there may be no intermeddling, and that there may be no direct or indirect fraud perpetrated upon the voter or upon the candidate. If it had stopped there, I say, in my opinion the general affidavit certifying the returns by the judges of election would have been sufficient.

But it does not stop there, and there was a purpose in it. The purpose was to allow, in cases of a failure on the part of those sending the ballots to perform their duty, or failure on the part of the judges to receive them, something to be substituted for them, but they did not want the conditions to prevail that would prevail perhaps in the absence of these ballots, and therefore the judges are required to certify a reason. That is where it goes further and provides that—> the judges of elections shall in this event certify to the facts which prevented the use of the official ballot, which certificate must accompany and be made a part of the election returns.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that both in law and logic the conclusion is irresistible that that is a mandatory provision, because, as I have said, if it had stopped at the end of the other clause, then the authorities which gentlemen have cited would be in point and would be conclusive. But this certificate is a part of the essence of the ballot itself. The ballot is not legalized by the man voting it, but it is legalized only when the judges of elections "shall in this event certify to the facts which prevented the use of the official ballot, which certificate must accompany and be made a part of the official returns." It is to prevent those very things which the Australian ballot law was intended and designed to prevent that this statute was passed by the Legislature of Alaska, and it seems to me that the judge who so held and who has been so harshly criticized by gentlemen here was within the law when he made that decision. If that be true, there was nothing else for this committee to do except to throw out those precincts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I could cite a number of other authorities along the same line; but if it goes to the very merits of the election it is not necessary that the law must in terms state that it is void, and that is the principle that is laid down in the authorities. It certainly does go to the merits of election, and certainly the legislature intended that it should go to the merits of election when they so wrote it. Ita lex scripta est that it must be so certified by the judges of the election before it can be validated. In Thirty-sixth Cyclopedia it is said to be mandatory, "if from a consideration of the entire act, its nature, and its object, the consequences which would result from not construing it as mandatory would defeat the very objects of the legislation."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that upon that question these gentlemen on the committee have erred—honestly so, no doubt. But, Mr. Speaker, we will pass beyond that. It seems from the report of the committee that when they had gotten by that question their idea was that that was about all that was left for them to do. They seem to have decided that when they overruled the learned judge who held the statute to be mandatory that that about settled the case.

Now I will call attention to the statement in the report of the committee in which it said, right on the first page:

> The final conclusion of the committee is that the merits of the case are confined to matters involved in—
>
> First. Certain proceedings had before the judge of the United States District Court of Alaska, first division.
>
> Second. The legality of the votes cast by native Indians in certain sections of the Territory.
> Third. The legality of the votes of soldiers of the United States Army stationed at Fort Gibbon and who voted there, and the votes of other soldiers in the Army who voted at Eagle precinct.

I have not gone into the record in regard to the Indian and soldier votes, for I understand that if the votes from the six precincts where the certificate of the judges is illegal are thrown out, then the contestee, Mr. Sulzer, will be entitled to retain his seat. Hence I have confined and will confine my argument to these six precincts.

Now, when they overruled the decision of the judge, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the committee should have gone further in regard to these six contested precincts, and taken testimony; and upon that proposition I want to read you an authority that the committee themselves have cited. If these ballots had been legally certified, then they would have been prima facie evidence of their correctness. In the opinion of the court which the gentleman cites, on page 7 of the report, he says:

If strictly followed—

That is, these rules in regard to certification and matters of that kind—they furnish the best evidence that the election has been fairly conducted, and the burden of proof to show that it was not, either wholly or in part, rests upon the party attacking the returns.

Now, if there had been a correct certification, that would have been true. But suppose that I am incorrect in the assumption that this was a mandatory requirement and admit the contention of the gentleman that it was merely directory. Then, upon the very authority that the chairman cites, this was not even prima facie evidence of the correctness or genuineness of the votes, and they had no right to take the general certification of the judges to the correctness of that election, but they should have arrived at that conclusion by taking testimony aliunde, and that has not been done. The contestant brings his case into Congress, and the burden is upon him. He asserts, I believe in the fifteenth section of his notice, which is his declaration or pleading, that he was legally elected. Now, if I am wrong in my contention that the statute was mandatory, if I admit that it was only directory, then the burden was upon him to show that those votes were cast, and were cast for him at that place.

Mr. NORTON. How many votes were involved in that?

Mr. BURNETT. I have the calculation. I think it involves enough to change the result. I will say to my able and distinguished friend that that is the reason why I feel we are not ready to vote upon this most important question.

Mr. NORTON. The committee have had this matter under consideration now for nearly two years?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Do I understand the gentleman's motion to be to postpone this until February 10, 1919, or 1920?

Mr. BURNETT. I am not wedded to that particular date, but I will say to my friend that I merely make it because I think that would give them ample time to take the testimony that should have been taken. I would vote for a shorter time, but I believe it is fair to this House and to the people in this case that the depositions of the judges of election, by direct and cross examination, should be taken, for the purpose of showing that these were fair ballots, that they were voted by these people, and for whom they were voted.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman does not understand my question. The gentleman's motion is not to postpone this case until 1920, is it?

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, no; February 10, 1919. This is no trick or scheme on my part to try to keep a man in Congress unjustly. It is a mere effort upon my part, if possible, to have it so that this House, when it votes, may decide the question who has been elected; and although I feel strongly that I am well grounded in the proposition that this was a mandatory requirement, I am willing to pretermit that. I am willing to yield that view, and to say that if the proper evidence, when taken, of the votes cast, shows that the contestant is entitled to this seat, no man will vote more cheerfully to give it to him than I will. But, gentlemen, I believe that matter has not been sufficiently gone into.

I remember years ago in my contest to which I referred a short while ago one of my friends was the returning officer of an election, and he wanted a watcher at the precinct that was largely Republican in a county that was overwhelmingly Republican; and when the election judges refused to allow him a watcher to watch the count, when the ballots were put in the ballot box he took the box and all and carried it to the county seat and turned it over to the sheriff. The contention was made by gentlemen representing the contestant in that case that by reason of that action the votes that I received should be rejected, while only the votes cast for my opponents should be counted. I conceded that in that precinct he got 92 votes and I got only 26, but I wanted what I did get, and the contestant's counsel contended that on account of that action on the part of my friend my votes should be thrown out and his counted in their entirety.

I remember that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] called the lawyer who argued that proposition down and said, "Do you believe that the 26 men who voted for BURNETT ought to be disfranchised on account of some fellow running off with the ballot box?" We went to the county seat, opened the box, and counted the votes, and took the testimony of the voters themselves, and, gentlemen, you will be better satisfied, I will be better satisfied, these litigants ought to be better satisfied, if it is shown here to a reasonable certainty who were the real beneficiaries of these ballots. I am not going to charge fraud on the judges; I know nothing about that; but it is a strange thing that the election supplies all reached them, that the ballots did not reach them, and knowing that the supplies did reach them—there is testimony to that effect—we know that they returned the other supplies to the proper officers, but these official ballots never got there. The contestant, the beneficiary of those ballots, ought to explain this by proof. I do not care who furnished them, I do not care whether they were ballots sent by the contestant or the contestee, but you see how easy it would have been to secure a violation of the spirit and purpose of the Australian-ballot law by other substitutes for these ballots.

I am not going to ask the House to go as far as the facts warrant me in arguing. I simply ask that this committee may have this matter again before them, and that testimony may again be taken. Let the contestant, on whom the burden rests, clear up this strange proceeding by proper proof.

Let me tell you another thing. If we were confined to the strict letter of the law, the contestant ought to lose these ballots because it was upon him to have shown the correctness of the whole transaction. Gentlemen may argue that the contestee had an equal access to the ballots. Possibly that may be true, but, gentlemen, the man who brings his case into court is the man who assumes the burden, and he must carry it as he goes, and especially when he was the beneficiary of the mistake. He was the beneficiary of the failure on the part of the election judges, and he should have shown that these were ballots fairly cast for him. But he does not do it. You find some affidavits. He was out there during the taking of the testimony. He complains that he was away when the judge acted upon the mandatory injunction.

Well, the contestee was here discharging his duties while the testimony was being taken, and the contestant could have been there whether he was or not. I do not know whether he was keeping a room in the office building all that time or not, but he could have been right there looking into the honesty of these ballots that were cast at these places where they were not properly certified. Not having done so, the conclusion seems reasonable and just that there was something wrong in these ballots and that he ought to be charged with the wrong.

But I am not asking you to go to that extent. I am not asking you to visit anything he has done or anything he has left undone upon him. I am asking you—it is near the end of the session, it is true, but gentlemen have talked upon this case being here two years. I do not know but that the committee felt justified in taking all that time. My good friend the chairman of the committee has just told me that the committee has not had the case over six months. But if it has been two years the contestant in this case had all that time to go out there and have voter after voter and the election managers to have testified, and to have had an inspection made of the ballots, and reached the conclusion and furnished testimony to the committee upon the vital question of whether he was honestly elected or not. Gentlemen, that is what we want.

That is what my colleagues on this side and what you gentlemen want. I do not say that there is a Republican here who wants to treat a man unjustly. Now, what can be fairer than to allow this question to again be submitted to this committee in order that this matter may be cleared up?

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Ought not the officers who held the election where the official ballots were not used be called as witnesses where they could be cross-examined and be heard?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; nothing could be fairer. The ex parte affidavit that came afterwards is not a fair way to try a case. It would never do to turn a man out of Congress upon testimony that you would not admit in a little case on a promissory note in a country court.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. The gentleman is aware that the committee was ready to report on this case in September, but at the request of the contestee the report was held up until late in December. The gentleman knows that, does he not?

Mr. BURNETT. I did not know it; but that does not change it. It is what is due to us, gentlemen—what is due to the House and what we owe to ourselves. It is not a question of Mr. Sulzer; it is not a question of Mr. Wickersham. We do not lose a vote on this side by it and the other side does not gain a vote, as a Delegate can not vote in this House.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand the gentleman to say that these affidavits of the commissioners or the judges of election that the official ballots were not received is not sufficient evidence of that fact?

Mr. BURNETT. I do. If the certificates had come in the proper manner and at the proper time under the existing statute, they would have been evidence. That is the distinction I draw between things that are mandatory and directory.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If these same officers had made an election return, not under oath, but simply a certificate, that the majority of these votes had been cast for Mr. Wickersham, as the contestee admits, that would have sufficed to have the votes counted.

Mr. BURNETT. It would have sufficed if the certificate had been in proper form, because thus saith the law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, if the unverified, unsworn certificate of these men would have been sufficient to elect Mr. Wickersham, does not the gentleman think their affidavits, no allegation of which is denied anywhere by the contestee, should be sufficient?

Mr. BURNETT. Does not the gentleman know that kind of evidence, no matter how honest you may believe men to be, after the matter has passed beyond the jurisdiction of these men, becomes ex parte? They had the right, because the statute gave them the right, to make that certificate at the right time, and that validated those ballots, but after that the powers of these judges became functus officio, and their affidavits were no more sacred than the affidavit of anyone else, and they then had only the right to give their evidence, subject to the cross-examination of those who were interested. The gentleman knows that that is the law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman say that these officers had a right after they had sent the ballots away to have sent in another certificate?

Mr. BURNETT. I will again call the gentleman's attention to the law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. I asked that question because the United States district judge in Alaska held that the election officers, not having sent in a certificate with the ballots, could not subsequently furnish such certificate. Is not that so, I will ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON]?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That was the effect of the holding, as I understood it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And therefore the judge in that particular case was so extremely technical that he would not permit the filing of another certificate by the same men. And now the gentleman from Alabama will not accept their affidavits. In other words, by an overtechnical construction he would disfranchise the men who voted for Judge Wickersham, as the contestee admits.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, the gentleman misapprehends my contention.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the fact.

Mr. BURNETT. The law says that it must accompany the returns, and if it does not accompany the returns, then it becomes a nullity, so far as the sanctity of the certificate is concerned, and their testimony should then be taken. It should not be ex parte affidavits.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the committee had decided this case in September and the report was held up until December at the request of the sitting Member. If that be the case, and in view of the fact that the country believes that these contests ought to be decided quickly and not postponed until the end of the term, does not the gentleman think that the sitting Member early in September should have raised the very question that the gentleman raises now and that this House should not be asked to send back this case in order that he may fill out a full term in Congress?

Mr. SULZER rose.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, no; I shall answer that. If the sitting Member's interests were only at stake, then the laches of the sitting Member might well be visited upon him; but, Mr. Speaker, it is not the title of the sitting Member that is at stake, but it is the integrity of the House of Representatives and the honesty of the vote that we are asked to cast in this case. That is what it is.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman will recognize the fact that the committee that heard this testimony are men with full appreciation of the fact that they are discharging a very grave and solemn duty. They can be trusted to look after the dignity of the House, can they not, in matters of that kind? I think that is a very serious indictment of the members of the committee who have heard the evidence of the case to say that they have violated their oaths practically and have not looked after the integrity of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BURNETT. If the committee decided this question, then the statement of the gentleman would have some force, but when the committee makes this report on its oath, and they have no doubt done that conscientiously and honestly, then the responsibility shifted to the gentleman and myself and the Members of this House under our oath to discharge our duty in this matter. That is my answer to the gentleman. Let us discharge it, gentlemen, not as partisans—I have pointed out in my record where I allowed no partisanship to control or influence me in seating a man I thought was elected; but this House owes it to itself—no; it is not an indictment of these gentlemen. If it is an indictment, why is it not an indictment if you gentlemen probably at the next session shall come in and vote to seat somebody that we thought ought not to be seated, and vice versa? Is it an indictment of any committee to dissent from their views? If so, gentlemen, then legislation ought to stop at the door of the committees, and we have no further right or power. We become mere automatons to jump at the command of committees.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for one more question, and then I will not again interrupt him?

Mr. BURNETT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The New York Court of Appeals, in the case of People ex rel. Hirsh v. Wood (New York Report, 143), stated the law on this question as follows, and I ask the particular attention of the gentleman from Alabama, who is a good lawyer, to this language. This is the unanimous opinion of the supreme court, the highest court of the State of New York:

> We can conceive of no principle which permits the disfranchisement of innocent voters for the mistake or even willful misconduct of election officers in performing the duty cast upon them. The object of elections is to ascertain the popular will and not to thwart it.

Now, the contestee admits that in these seven precincts Judge Wickersham had a majority, and yet, upon a mere technicality, the failure of these election officers to send in certificates, which under their oath they were bound to forward, these voters are to be disfranchised. But the Court of Appeals of New York, in a unanimous opinion, say:

> We can conceive of no principle which permits the disfranchisement of innocent voters for the mistake or even willful misconduct of election officers in performing the duty cast upon them.

Mr. BURNETT. The contestee does not admit any such thing. Mr. Speaker, carrying that kind of an argument to its legitimate conclusion, if there had been a statute which said that unless the managers did do this thing the election was void, then the gentleman would say the man still ought to be elected because the man himself was honest.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to answer right there?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not at all, because any such construction of such a law as that which the gentleman from Alabama has just made would permit the grossest kind of fraud. But in the case now before us the contestant alleges, and the contestee admits, that there was no fraud——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. No!

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin (continuing). That there was no fraud in those precincts; that a majority of these were cast for Judge Wickersham in those seven precincts, just as set forth in the report; and in the absence of any allegation or evidence of fraud the court of appeals said:

> We can conceive of no principle which permits the disfranchisement of innocent voters for the mistake or even willful misconduct of election officers in performing the duty cast upon them.

In the pending case the intent of the voters and the act of the voters are admitted. And yet after they have cast a majority of their votes for Judge Wickersham we are asked to disfranchise them because of a failure of the election board to do its sworn duty. But, as I have said, the Court of Appeals of the State of New York unanimously declared that—

> We can conceive of no principle which permits the disfranchisement of innocent voters for the mistake or even willful misconduct of election officers in performing the duty cast upon them.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman certainly was not present when Mr. Sulzer called attention to place after place in the record that he contended showed that fraud had been committed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not in those seven precincts.

Mr. BURNETT. I always try to be fair to the gentleman——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But no such statement was made by Mr. Sulzer.

Mr. BURNETT. The House will remember, gentlemen. And not only that; if, as the gentleman contends, a man is an innocent voter, if the managers of the election fraudulently refuse or fraudulently violate the law, is that man to be allowed his vote? He is an innocent voter, and according to the argument of the gentleman there would be no case in which the innocent voter could be disfranchised, and yet in this very law, in these very decisions, the courts called attention to the fact that it may work a hardship sometimes on individuals, and yet it is fair to have laws that will prevent fraud in a general way, even where it might work an injustice in some particular case.

Now, let me just read this one thing, and this is the general proposition, Mr. Speaker. It is a proposition of law and of logic. Here is the law:

> Where the aim and purpose of the lawmaking power would be plainly defeated if the command to do the thing in a particular manner did not imply an inhibition to do it in any other, no doubt can be maintained as to the mandatory character of the statute.

Now, here is an inhibition against the casting and counting of these ballots and the validity of these ballots unless certified to. But I have gone past that. I say in the interest of absolute fairness I am willing to say that that question should not come in, but the other proposition is a correct and just one. You must not allow men a month afterwards to come in on ex parte statements, whether it be an affidavit or not. Their powers have ceased. The law says it was to accompany the returns, and, admitting it is all directory, then, Mr. Speaker, the burden is upon the man who is the beneficiary of that mistake in the law to furnish the testimony of the fact that he got these votes. That is what we are contending for.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I will.

Mr. SISSON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the peculiar affidavits and statements here. Now, on page 127 of the record you will find a list of voting precincts at which the contest was made. Now, as to all the places, except Deering and Utica, there is nothing but a letter written by some one to Mr. Wickersham, the contestant. There is only one certificate as to one man as to Utica and an affidavit of two officers of election as to Deering testifying that there were were no ballots there. The balance of this testimony is absolutely a blank, except as to certain letters written to Mr. Wickersham by certain individuals. So I believe the motion of the gentleman from Alabama should be sustained for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not these men really voted as has been returned here, because there is no testimony to show there was any effort to comply with the law at all, except these ex parte letters to Mr. Wickersham. Yes; and the very fact that the contestant only attempts to furnish ex parte statements as to two of the precincts raises a very violent presumption that the other precincts are tainted with fraud and that he can not clear it up. If he got these statements as to two of the precincts, why does he not produce them as to the other four? Let him answer that by producing the proof when this case is re-referred to the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. Will not the gentleman's anxiety be relieved a good deal after the 4th of March?

Mr. SISSON. I will say to my friend that it is not an anxiety about either of these gentlemen. But every man ought to have some caution about setting a precedent in this House for all these contested-election cases.

Mr. BURNETT. The remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] is unworthy of the gentleman. The gentleman seeks to inject some partisanship into this fight, when no one else has tried to do so.

Mr. Speaker, having presented this case fairly, I hope—and I believe justly—I will say that I believe the chairman of the committee desires to reply and will move the previous question on the resolution, and therefore I will not do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] is recognized.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I just wish to consume a few minutes and give notice that when I conclude I shall move the previous question, both upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama and the resolution of the committee, if that will be in order from a parliamentary standpoint.

Mr. BURNETT. The motion is pending.

Mr. MANN. It has not been offered yet.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I desire to offer it formally. I do not want to be shut off on a technicality. I believe the first vote will be on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Of course it will; but the gentleman ought to close the argument, and then before he moves the previous question the gentleman from Alabama can offer his motion, and then the gentleman can move the previous question on the whole thing.

Mr. BURNETT. If it is in order, I will offer it now.

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Will it be in order for me to move the previous question after he offers it?

The SPEAKER. Yes; after the final conclusion of the whole matter.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I feel that after all that has been said in this case it would be improper for me to make any continued or extended remarks. I appreciate very much the things that have been said by the gentlemen in reference to the committee, and I wish to say that the conclusions reached by the committee, and especially myself, in this case have been reached after mature deliberation. I am fully convinced of the correctness of the conclusion reached, and I hope that the time will never come when I should be influenced by the fear that in reaching a conclusion in any judicial matter I might not meet the approval of my friends in this House or in any other place, and I should feel disappointed if my friends should not act upon their own judgment and upon their own conscience in the same matter without any fear that they might offend me or any committee of this House.

This, gentlemen, is a judicial question. It is a legislative function, but it is a judicial performance. After all the extended debate on this case, we are back to the same proposition where we first started, and that is as to the proper construction of the Alaskan election law.

There is no doubt but that the House on yesterday, when it heard the statement of the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. Sulzer], was impressed. He is a business man, according to his own statement, and if he is not successful he is in the wrong calling, because he would make a wonderful lawyer. The House was impressed by his statement relative to Indians in various parts of Alaska. No doubt he felt that the committee had not properly considered that question; but after hearing the statement of Mr. Wickersham relative to the law and the conditions prevailing as to the citizenship of Indians in the southwestern portion of Alaska, where it is claimed that 21 voted for him, and as to the conditions existing where 28 Indians in other portions of Alaska, coming from a reservation, voted for Mr. Sulzer, I feel sure that the Members of this House will be of opinion that the committee has done no injury, at least to the contestee, in adopting the course it has pursued in relation to counting those Indian votes and adding to the number cast for him.

That is a complicated question in Alaska, and if we should go into all the details of it, as shown in this record, we might spend a week on this case. I do not think, although it was referred to in a critical way, that the proposition stated to the committee by the attorney for the contestee, that we should either count the Indian vote as an entirety or throw it out as an entirety, was without merit in the statement of this record, because it was impossible, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, to go through this record and feel that you could act with certainty on that subject; but nevertheless the statement of the committee, I am sure, is a correct statement.

Now, relative to the vote of the soldiers in Alaska, I do not believe there is any dispute about the law in respect to that matter. There was practically none before the committee. And while different Members might reach different additions in running through the record—I have been over it a number of times, and I went over it again last night and made it 37, because there are quite a number more soldiers involved in this matter—those shown in this report and held to be not qualified electors are those who the records of The Adjutant General's Office show had enlisted in States outside of Alaska, as follows: Ten from Missouri, 8 from California, 1 from Kansas, 1 from North Dakota, 4 from Washington, 3 from Ohio, 4 from Colorado, 2 from Texas, 1 from Louisiana, 1 from Minnesota, and 1 from New York. Now, it is possible to imagine that those soldiers lived in Alaska and wandered down into the States and then went into the Army and went back to Alaska and already had citizenship there. But that is an imaginary matter. But more than that, every one of these men mentioned in this report testified that he came to Alaska in the service of the Government as a soldier and that that had been his occupation ever since he came to Alaska and was such on the day he voted; and that brings them all directly within the law, and the whole mistake occurred there, if you wish to read the report; not because these soldiers wanted to commit perjury or to commit any wrong, but because they were advised legally that if they had been in Alaska for one year and 30 days they could vote there, provided they intended to make Alaska their residence. But, as the report states, this assumes that a man in the military service, because he testifies that he went there as a soldier and that that had been his occupation since he went there, and the official papers show that his enlistment was in the States, can, while in the service and subject to the orders of his superiors, form the necessary and requisite intention to acquire a new domicile, a proposition which is absolutely contrary to the law and which, of course, ought to be.

I think it would be most unfortunate if you should adopt a doctrine that would notify the soldier that Congress was placing a construction upon the laws of this country by which he might find when he had returned home that while absent in the service of his country he had forfeited his citizenship. And it would be very unjust to the various communities of this country if you should adopt a construction of the law that would make it possible to involve in local politics the various organizations in the Military Establishment in the different States of this Union at this time or in the future.

Gentlemen, these are the facts. I am sure it is useless to pursue that matter in an argument before the Members of this House.

So we come back to the question as to the proper construction of the Alaska election law. We come back clearly to the condition as it obtained before the courts in Alaska in this case. Of course, I do not believe now that the gentlemen who have spoken in this connection, including my able and dear friend, Judge BURNETT, of Alabama, agree with the court up there, because the proposition is that the statute is mandatory to the extent of rejecting the returns which were made to the canvassing board, but not to the extent of precluding the man from going into court and making proof as to what occurred at the precinct.

I do not think it is necessary to read any additional law in that connection. I have stated that according to my conception of the law, in just as plain terms as possible, and I can not make up my mind that under a statute relating to an election, after the poll is complete, the voter can be made to suffer for the action of the election officers without any proof of fraud. I think it was most correct action upon the part of this House, if it was the action of the House, that decided that that sheriff down in Judge BURNETT's district, by going out and violating the law and taking a ballot box and going away with it to the courthouse, had not disfranchised those 25 voters.

So after all that has been said, I am still firm in the belief that this section of the Alaskan election law is directory. I think Judge Jennings is correct in a great deal of his opinion. Now, if this is directory, it would make quite a difference as to the burden of proof, because Judge Jennings says that if the statute is mandatory the demurrer should be sustained and if it is directory the demurrer should be dismissed. There the lawsuit would have ended if the statute is directory, and Mr. Wickersham would have had the certificate, and the contest, of course, would have come the other way.

Now, it is easy to read statutes about the Australian ballot law, and to talk about the sacredness of the Australian ballot law in Alaska; but I do not think it is any compliment to the people of Alaska to assume that if this statute is held to be directory, they are just lying in wait up there to commit general fraud in that Territory. This is the first election ever held under this statute in that Territory, and I think it is very remarkable that there were only five precincts in which these certificates were missing.

I would not attempt at this time to quote any further law than has been recited in this report; but I am perfectly willing to concede and admit that everything said relative to the necessity of an official ballot being used under the Australian ballot law is absolutely correct. But in Alaska they have a provision in their statute by which you may use nonofficial ballots, and you can not apply the general law in relation to official ballots to that provision in that statute of Alaska. As I have said, it was written in there for the sole purpose of protecting the citizens in the various portions of that Territory in the right to cast their votes, and the duty was placed upon the various election officers to supply the voters with these ballots as they appeared to vote, and to receive nothing back except the official ballots after they had been marked by the voters; but, so far as I am concerned, I go back to the original statement of yesterday, that the circumstances in this case are just as convincing, or more convincing, to my mind, as any testimony that you will be able to take up there. But I do not wish the Members of the House to accept that until they agree with the reasons for it. Here, as I stated, is a whole section of the Territory where no official ballots have been used. Official ballots were present and nonofficial ballots were used, and if nonofficial ballots were used you would get mixed ballots in some boxes in some sections of the Territory. But here every officer, every voter, used and was permitted to use these ballots, and, as I stated before, they are all of the same character, whether the majority was solidly for Sulzer or where it was mixed or where it was for Wickersham, and the only fact is that the certificates are missing from a few precincts.

As to the precincts of Utica and Deering, the evidence is more convincing, because, whether it came with the returns or not, here is the certificate made long before the lawsuit came up stating the official form of ballot had been received at one precinct and the form sent by phone to the other two precincts. That is, they phoned the form of ballot from one precinct to the other precincts. There could have been no design in making the statement, and a year and a half afterwards, when the returns were examined, here were the ballots from Utica absolutely in official form except made by the typewriter, and here came other ballots from Deering made by pencil in the same form. Do you think it is possible to get circumstances like that all fixed up ahead of time and have them dovetail in at the end?

But I am not going to talk about that. If the House feels that it is not satisfied about the evidence which is brought to the House, I expect each Member to use his own judgment.

I want to say, gentlemen of the House, that in spite of all that has been said, if you wish to pursue the subject and go through this record I believe you will be convinced, as far as facts are concerned, that the committee has advised the House as correctly as is possible in a long and complicated matter like this. [Applause.] I feel that I owe that to the House, and I feel that the House owes it to the country and to its conscience upon the record as submitted here, and not vote as partisans, not to vote as friends, but to vote as your conscience and your judgment shall dictate. I shall be very much disappointed to know that any friend wavered in the discharge of that duty. I would rather have the approval of my own conscience and my own judgment in a matter of this kind than all of the applause and praise of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit a question? Was there any witness before your committee who testified in these precincts that no official ballot had been received, or was it ex parte affidavit?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No witness appeared before the committee. I went through that in the report, and I have gone through it in my statement.

Mr. HARDY. No depositions?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. I have stated the evidence upon which that is based.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURNETT moves to refer the contested-election case of James Wickersham, contestant, against Charles A. Sulzer to the Committee on Elections No. 1, and said committee shall report on said case by or before February 10, 1919.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana moves the previous question on the resolution and also on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The previous question having been agreed to, if the House should now adjourn, would this matter come up for final disposition when the House meets again?

The SPEAKER. Yes; on Monday, immediately after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent Mr. BRUMBAUGH was given indefinite leave of absence.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.
